While naturally there will be much vacant space in the basement, allowance has been made for a baggage-room, 54x29 feet; a carpenter shop, 17x20 feet; a kitchen, 17x27 feet; a serving room, 10x18 feet; a large boiler room with two boilers on one side and one boiler on the other; space for smoke and for foul-air exhaust, coal storage and heating and ventilating machinery. It has not been decided whether an electric-light plant will be established in the building, but the architects have kept such a possibility in view. The floor plan shows a main vestibule, 28x76 feet, from which entrance by two doors is made into a lobby seven feet wide at the front and fourteen feet wide on either side of the auditorium, which, by the way, is walled off from these lobbies. To the right of the vestibule come in succession a cloak and coat room, ladies' toilet, ladies' reception room, 16x24, a side vestibule opening on Massachusetts avenue, 17x37 feet; a ticket office, and offices for Mr. Mudgett, a bookkeeper, Mr. Comee and Mr. Ellis. To the left on entering are a coat room, gentlemen's toilet room, a boiler room, 18x72 feet, and a serving room. The stage, which is 60x32 feet, has at the right an artists' room and a dressing room, and at the left a tuning room, 33x37 feet.

The first balcony will also have a continuous lobby seven feet wide at the front and eight feet wide on the sides, with two large oblong lobbies, 14 by 20 feet, at the immediate right and left of the entrance. The libraries of the Symphony Orchestra and of the Handel and Haydn Society are to be on the right. Two artists' rooms are at the stage right, while corresponding to the tuning-room below is a large chorus room. The second balcony will have a foyer 75 by 28 feet, with two oblong lobbies at right and left of entrance, while the side lobbies will correspond in width with those on the first balcony floor.

The total seating capacity of the new Music Hall will be 2630, against 2397 in the old hall. The floor capacity will be 1511, that of the first balcony 608 and that of the second balcony, 511, against 1251, 680 and 466 for the old hall. This is a net gain of 233 seats, while the space available for standing room will be on each side of the auditorium thirty feet more than that in the old hall. All seats are to be larger and presumably more comfortable than those which have been in the old hall since it was built. There will be only two rows of seats in the first balcony, whereas there are three in the old hall. The new hall has an interior length of about 140 feet and a width of 75 feet, while the old hall is 97.6 feet long and 77.6 feet wide. The main ticket office will be on the Massachusetts-avenue side, and that at the main entrance will be used only prior to and during performances. The long standing complaint of draughts in the old hall will have no ground to stand on in the new hall, for it is proposed to close the two inner doors leading directly to the auditorium, and to send people round to the right and left to doors large enough to make congestion impossible. The two doors in question open directly on the two aisles, there being no centre or main aisle. It is estimated that, if necessary, the entire audience, assuming that the floor is filled, can be turned into the broad lobbies which encircle the auditorium.

In the old hall two sections of seats in the first balcony overlook the stage; in the new hall not a seat throughout will be over the stage. There should be an abundance of coatrooms, since there are to be two on the first floor and two more on the second floor. The balcony will have four entrances. The corridors on the floor conform to the pitch of the floor itself, and there are no steps. In the summer when the chairs and other appurtenances are removed the floor can be made level. Taken all in all, it can be seen that the plans include many improvements over the old hall's arrangement, and promise to yield a structure which will be desirable and satisfactory both as a whole and in detail.

March 13

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

The Noble "Sakuntala" Overture and the Wearying "Faust" Symphony—Margaret Boye-Jensen Was the Soloist.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, eighteenth concert. Margaret Boye-Jensen, soloist. The programme:

Overture to "Sakuntala"..............Goldmark
Aria, "Furibondo Spira," from "Parthenope"..............Handel
Air, "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from "Samson et Dalila"..........Saint-Saens

A Faust Symphony in C minor............Liszt

There is so little to say in the way of praise for this occasion that it is a rather delicate matter to decide whether to mention the one really fine feature of the concert first or last. As it came at the very beginning of the programme, however, perhaps it is well enough to adhere to that order. At any rate, the gorgeous and always stirring overture of Goldmark's had so fine a performance that no one remembers to have heard a better. The rich coloring, the great innate poetry, the broad sweep and swing of the various rhythms were each and all brought out by Mr. Gericke with really unexpected abandon and brilliancy. Especially fine was the playing of the massive and strenuous coda, which revealed new elements of greatness in itself.

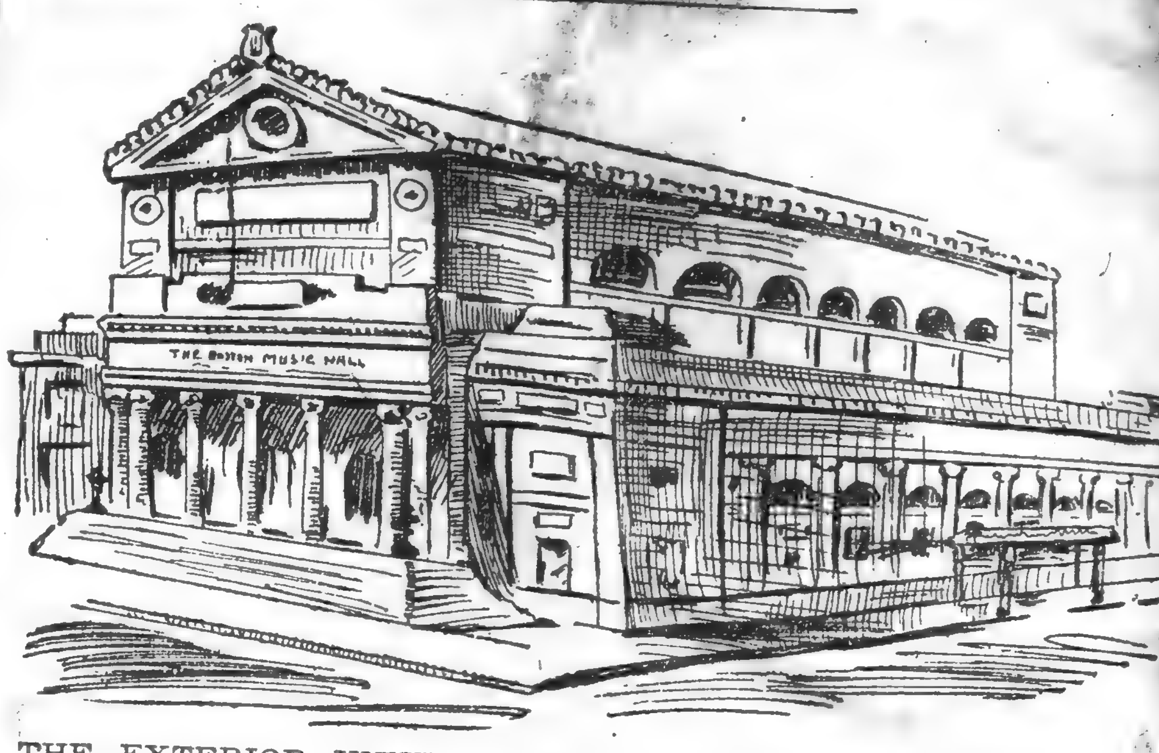
But after this? Well, there was singing by Mme. Boye-Jensen of Handel and Saint-Saens airs, upon which efforts I do not propose to dwell, except to express surprise that she should have been allowed to appear at these concerts, and amusement at the applause given her by a section of the audience.

And then Liszt's "Faust" symphony, a work that was planned to be metaphysical and turned out to be deadly dull because its music was at the extreme of bombast and triviality. The effort of giving it the attention due to any work played by this orchestra was worthy a far better cause. I do not mean to say that there was nothing at all of any beauty or value in the work. There are charming moments in the "Gretchen" movement, and a few phrases of power in the finale, but as a whole the thing is ineffective, uninteresting and generally worthless. Praise should be given the chorus of male voices from the Cecilia for their excellent singing, and to Mr. Herbert Johnson, who made the most a voice of fine quality could of the solo work.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, MARCH 14, 1899.

BOSTON'S NEW MUSIC HALL.



THE EXTERIOR VIEW OF THE PROPOSED STRUCTURE GIVES BUT A FAINT IDEA OF THE MAGNIFICENCE PLANNED FOR THE INTERIOR.

Plans for the new Music Hall, to be located at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington Avenues, arrived in this city Sunday morning from the New York office of the architects, McKim, Mead & White, and at present they may be seen in room 314 of the Tremont Building. The Building Committee of the new Music Hall corporation is to consider these plans before their acceptance, and it is possible that a number of alterations will be suggested; therefore as they are drawn at present they are not deemed to be final plans, but rather preliminary

There are eight plans in all; one is colored and represents the exterior of the building, while the others show longitudinal and transverse sections, the elevations on Massachusetts and Huntington Avenues, and plans of the basement, the floor of the first and second balconies. It is understood that the material to be used will be brick, probably red, and stone.

The main entrance, on Huntington Avenue, has an Ionic portico, with eight stone pillars, the main hall, or what better might be called the hall proper, rises higher than the rest of the building, with a pediment at the top; what seems to be a harp is the crowning glory of the roof front. At either corner of the front section is a pavilion which runs into a wing extending the length of the building; overlooking these wings in the main hall are clere-windows. On the Massachusetts Avenue side is a vestibule which if followed up makes a straight line through and across the hall interior; protecting this vestibule is a marquise, on the lines of that at the Thirty-fourth Street entrance to the Astoria in New York. The building will completely fill the lot purchased for it, and consequently will have a frontage of 150 feet on Huntington Avenue and will extend 210 feet on Massachusetts Avenue. It is notable that the plan measurements give no figure for the height of the building, but it would seem to be between 76 and 80 feet.

No estimate of the cost of the building, of the material to be used or of the quality or degree of interior embellishment has been made by the architects. They took into consideration solely general arrangements, such as seating capacity, offices, and, incidentally, acoustic properties. No one concert hall, either at home or abroad, has been taken as a model or as a basis for these plans; they stand as the results of original ideas, intended to meet the rather peculiar requirements of the builders. It is true that some conception of the ultimate exterior appearance can be had from the colored plan; at the front, on either side of the portico, stands a niched statue, while on the Massachusetts Avenue side a similar statue stands at each corner. Over the portico is a space reserved for appropriate inscription, while a smaller space is left, in the form of a square, at either end, about on a line with the larger space. As to the interior, the present plan allows for several statues along the walls; the windows, now drawn as full windows, may be cut down, giving an upper curved half only. The distinguishing features of the new building are that it is longer, narrower and lower than the old Music Hall.

While naturally there will be much vacant space in the basement, allowance has been made for a baggage-room, 54 by 29 feet; a carpenter shop, 17 by 20 feet; a kitchen, 17 by 27 feet; a serving room, 10 by 18 feet; a large boiler room with two boilers on one side and one boiler on the other; space for smoke and for foul air exhaust, coal storage and heating and ventilating machinery. It has not been decided whether an electric-light plant will be established in the building, but the architcts have kept such a possibility in view. The floor plan shows a main vestibule, 28 by 76 feet, from which entrance by two doors is made into a lobby 7 feet wide at the front and 14 feet wide on either side of the auditorium, which, by the way, is walled off from these lobbies. To the right of the vestibule come in succession a cloak and coat room, ladies' toilet, ladies' reception room, 16 by 24 feet; a side vestibule opening on Massachusetts Avenue, 17 by 37 feet; a ticket office, and offices for Mr. Mudgett, a bookkeeper, Mr. Comee and Mr. Ellis. To the left on entering are a coat room, gentlemen's toilet room, a boiler room, 18 by 72 feet, and a serving room. The stage, which is 60 by 32 feet, has at the right an artists' room and a dressing room, and at the left a tuning room, 33 by 37 feet.

The first balcony will also have a continuous lobby seven feet wide at the front and eight feet wide on the sides, with two large oblong lobbies, 14 by 20 feet, at the immediate right and left of the entrance. The libraries of the Symphony Orchestra and of the Handel and Haydn Society are to be on the right. Two artists' rooms are at the stage right, while corresponding to the tuning-room below is a large chorus room. The second balcony will have a foyer 75 by 28 feet, with two oblong lobbies at right and left of entrance, while the side lobbies will correspond in width with those on the first balcony floor.

The total seating capacity of the new hall will be 2630, against 2397 in the old hall. The floor capacity will be 1511, that of the first balcony 608, and that of the second balcony 511, against 1251, 680 and 466, for the old hall.

This is a net gain of 233 seats, while the space available for standing room will be on either side of the auditorium 30 feet more than that in the old hall. All seats are to be larger and presumably more comfortable than those which have been in the old hall since it was built.

There will be only two rows of seats in the first balcony, whereas there are three in the old hall. The new hall has an interior length of about 140 feet and a width of 75 feet, while the old hall is 97.6 feet long and 77.6 feet wide.

The main ticket office will be on the Massachusetts Avenue side, and that at the main entrance will be used only prior to and during performances.

The long-standing complaint of draughts in the old hall will have no ground to stand on in the new hall, for it is proposed to close the two inner doors leading directly to the auditorium and to send people round to the right and left to doors large enough to make congestion out of the question.

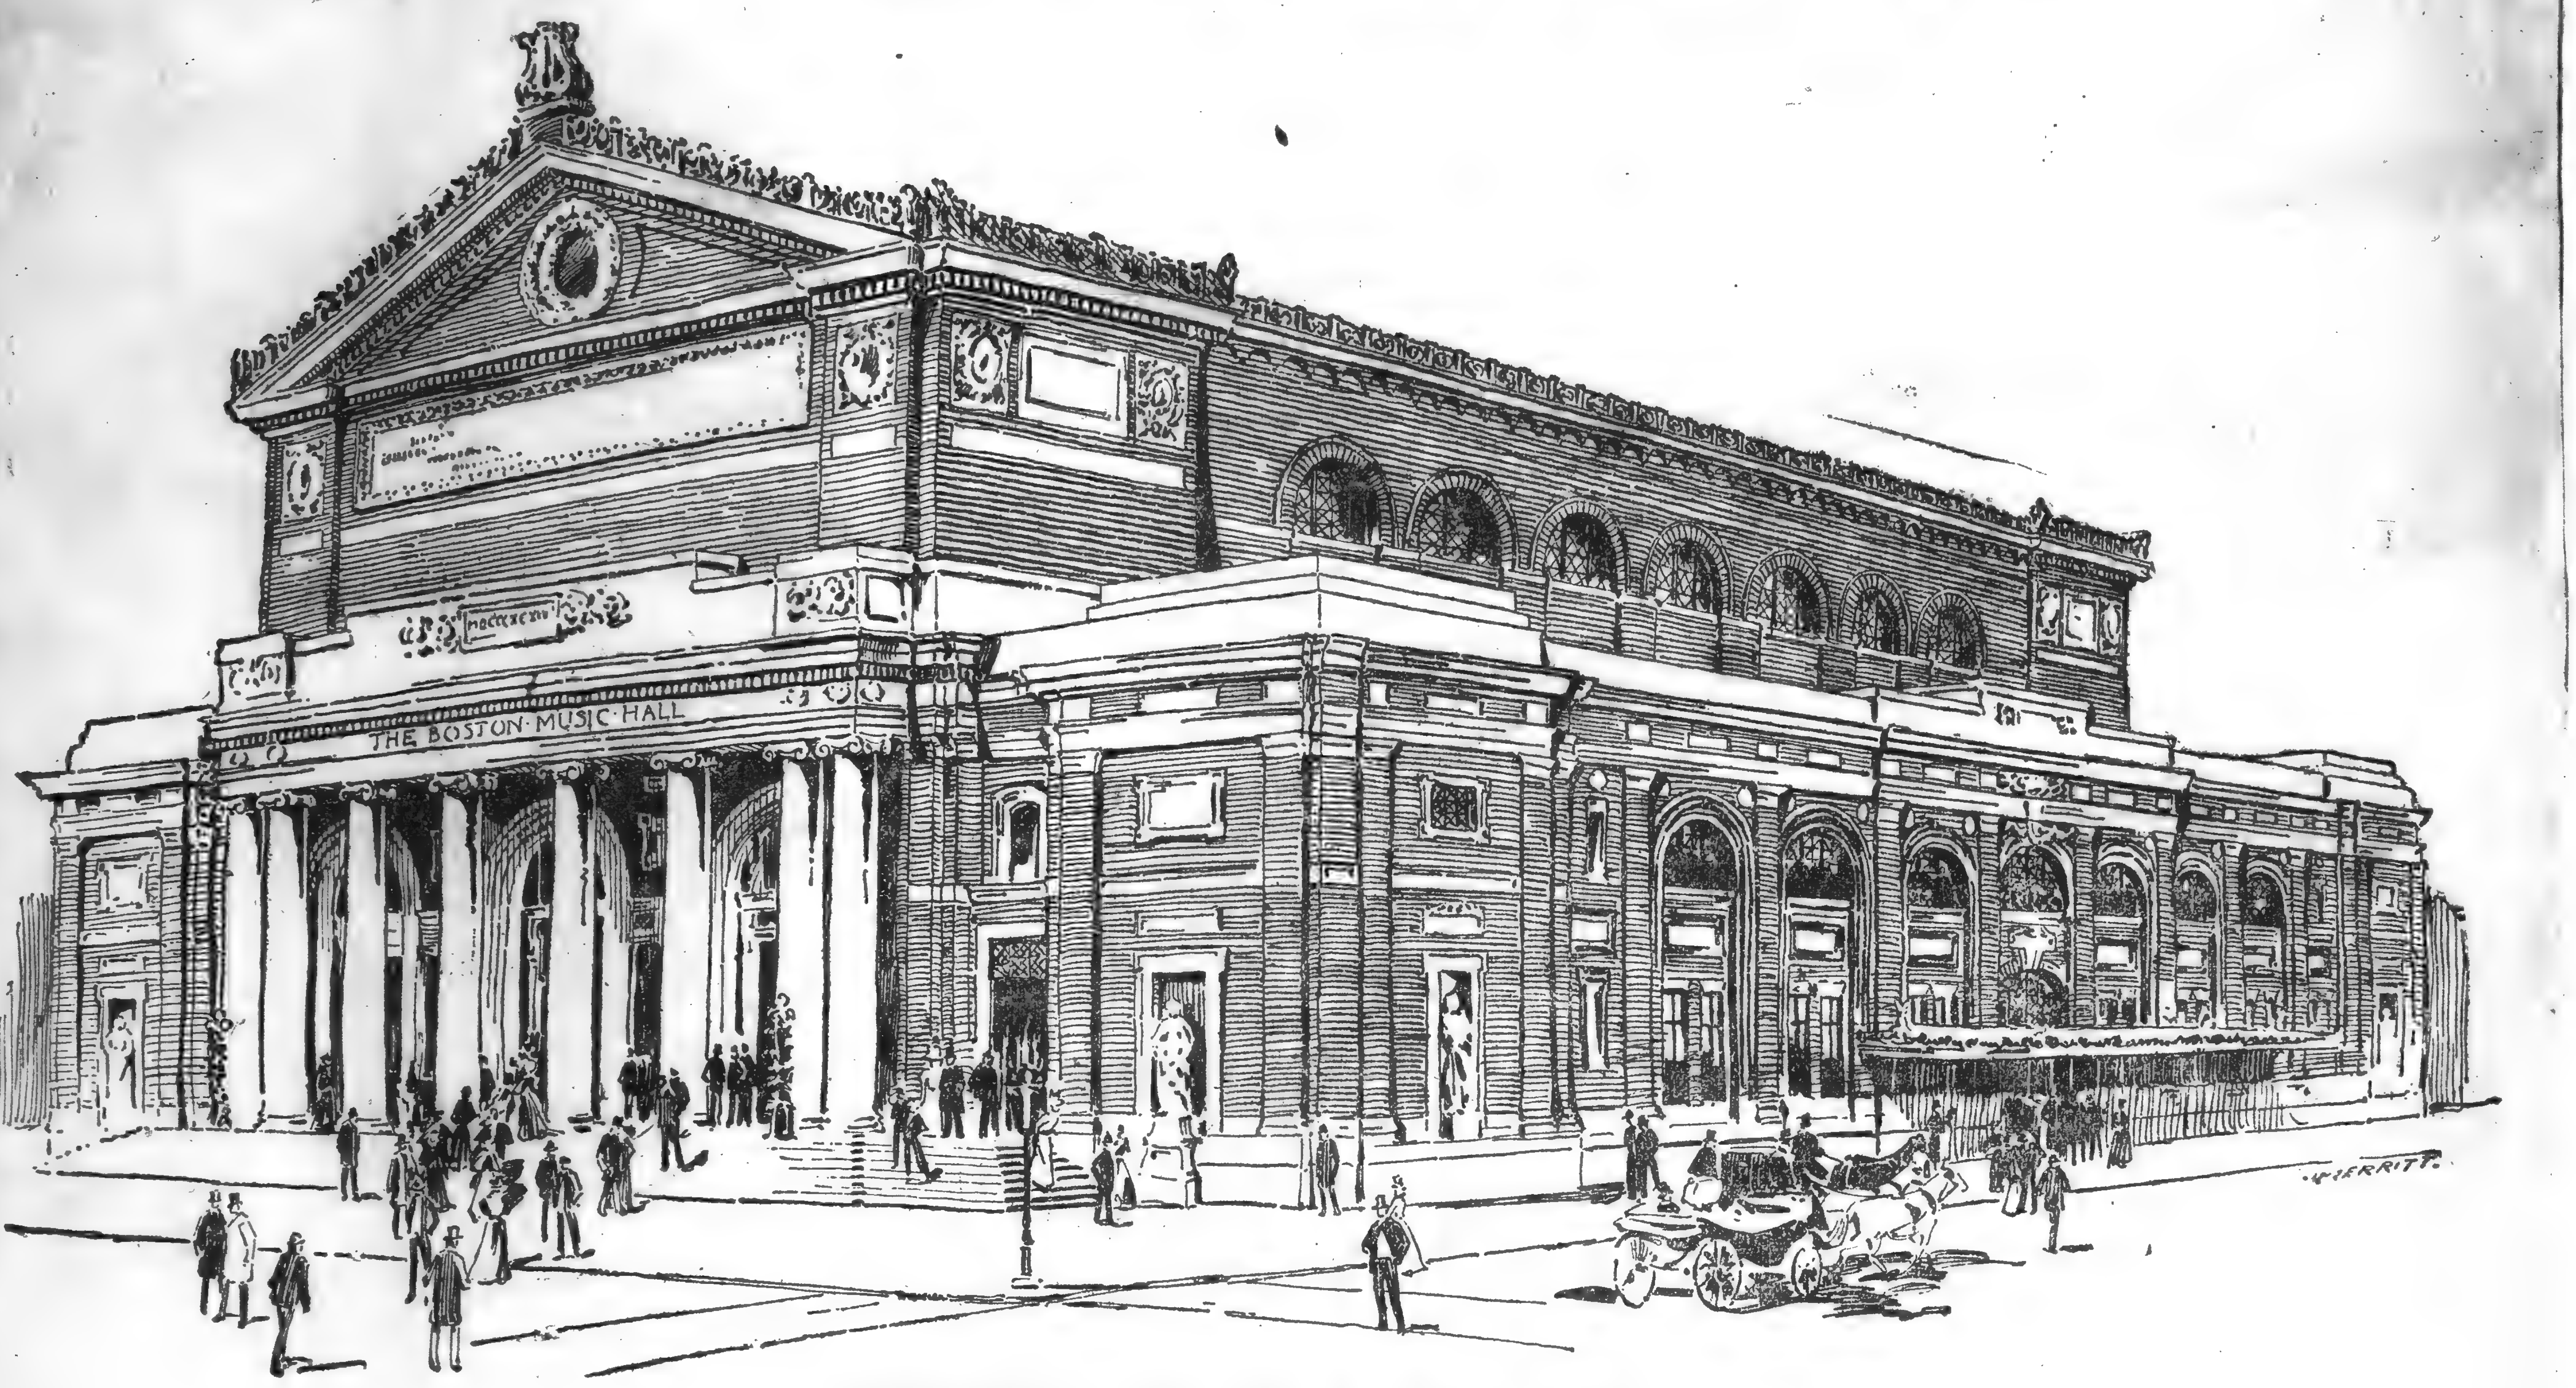
The two doors in question open directly on the two aisles, there being no centre or main aisle. It is estimated that, if necessary, the entire audience, assuming that the floor is filled, can be turned into the broad lobbies which encircle the auditorium.

In the old hall two sections of seats in the first balcony overlook the stage; in the new hall not a seat throughout will be over the stage. There should be an abundance of coatrooms, since there are to be two on the first floor and two more on the second floor.

The balcony will have four entrances. The corridors on the floor conform to the pitch of the floor itself, and there are no steps. In the summer when the chairs and other appurtenaces are removed the floor can be made level.

PLANS FOR MODERN MUSIC HALL.

Architects Submit Drawings Embodying Suggestions for an Auditorium With Fine Acoustic Properties.



ARCHITECT'S PLAN OF A MUSIC HALL.

Plans of the new music hall to be erected at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avs have arrived in Boston. A representative of McKim, Mead & White came on with them, and yesterday was engaged in hanging them upon the walls of the room, 314 Tremont building. Invitations were sent out to the stockholders of the company which is to construct and control the new hall. During the week shareholders will be admitted to view the plans.

The architects have presented a complete conception of what the building is to be, both as to interior construction and exterior lines. That is, in general they have presented for the consideration of the stockholders their scheme for the music hall, the details of interior ornamentation, etc, being, of course, liable to change when the architects are called upon to consider this subject more especially.

There are nine drawings upon the walls of room 314 in the Tremont building, a water-colored perspective and green and white prints showing a cross section of the building, a longitudinal section and the arrangement of each of the three floors. By examining these drawings, the visitor will have no difficulty in appreciating what the architect has proposed to furnish in the way of a new edifice for strictly musical entertainments. The hall has been designed apparently with a view to providing an edifice especially for the concerts of the symphony orchestra, the Handel and Haydn society and kindred performances, as it is in nosense adapted to the uses of an opera house.

The architect has, however, had in view the possibility of there being a demand for the new building for large banquets. He has provided for a kitchen in the basement and serving room on the hall floor beyond the south corridor.

The colored perspective drawing shows an attractive exterior of red brick with light stone trimmings. The central portion contains the main hall, and rises to a hight of three stories. The sections on either side of the central building rise to a hight of only two stories, with a slightly inclined roof running to the wall of the central structure. This gives the building the effect of a two-story structure with an enlarged monitor roof in the center running the whole length.

By this plan the entire interior of the central part of the building is made the music hall, while the side structures furnish the entrances, lobbies, side corridors, chorus rooms and business offices on the respective floors and also allow of a deeper gallery space.

The building is classic in style. It is entirely original in conception and design, and the architects have not gone to Munich for suggestions from the opera house there, as they were reported to have done.

It is to front on Huntington av, and will occupy the entire lot, which is 150 feet wide and 310 feet long.

The Huntington av facade is impressive, the broad portico being consistent with the lines of the roof of the central building. Over the portico is the inscription, "Boston Music Hall," while above, in the main front wall, there is a suggestion for a large tablet. On either side of the portico the architect, in the sketch, has placed two niches, one in the front wall and another in the side, just around the corner of the building. His idea is to place statues in these spaces, thus enhancing the classic exterior.

A succession of stone Ionic pillars rise to the entablature of the portico. The entrance is up a few steps. Practically the entire front is thrown open, as there are seven doors leading to the broad vestibule, which runs the entire width of the building. Beyond the vestibule is a lobby, the ticket office being in the center of the wall dividing the vestibule from the lobby. At either end of the lobby is a broad staircase running to the two gallery floors.

Two corridors, 14 feet wide, extend along the side of the hall from one end to the other. The main hall is enclosed, doors communicating with the corridors at frequent intervals.

There is another entrance from Massachusetts av, about in the center of that side of the building, with a small vestibule. This will be the entrance from and the exit to carriages, a marquee being provided at this doorway.

From the front lobby or the side corridors one enters the hall, which is 75 feet wide and 140 feet in length. The open stage is in the rear. There is no proscenium arch. There are two central aisles and an aisle along each side of the hall. The seats are arranged on a slight incline, not so abrupt as at a theater, but just enough to insure a view of the stage from the rear seats.

The hall is lighted by large arched and mullioned stained glass windows, which pierce the side and front walls of the main structure. These windows are so large that they extend almost from the roof line of the side structures to the ceiling of the music hall. As a part of the scheme of interior ornamentation, niches for statues have been suggested by the architect and placed between the large windows.

There are two galleries. The first gallery runs beyond the side limits of the hall, being set into the side structures a short space. The side lines of the balcony are straight, taking on a slight sweeping curve in the rear. This gives a rather narrow side balcony with a broad rear. As on the first floor, there is a vestibule in the rear of the balcony and corridors along the side. The same plan has been carried out with respect to the second gallery except that this one is not so broad in the rear, and does not run beyond the limits of the hall space on the sides. There is a lobby and a corridor on either side.

The seating capacity of the hall, including both galleries, is 2600.

While the roof of the building is a slight pitch, the ceiling of the hall is practically flat. It is 61 feet from the floor of the hall to the ceiling.

This is the main structure as laid out by the architects. The space obtained by the two-story sides has been utilized for the various needs of the orchestra and choral societies who will use the hall. To begin with, on each of the four corners there is a staircase in the side sections, giving ample ways of ingress and egress from the two galleries. Thus the side sections are carried just high enough to contain the stairways to the second gallery.

In the Massachusetts av side section, at the west end of the entrance, are the offices of the managers of the hall and the symphony orchestra. At the east end of the entrance there is a ladies' large reception room with adjoining toilet room and also a room for men. On the Massachusetts av side of the stage, a room is reserved for the orchestra or an "artists' room" as it is called on the plans. At the opposite side of the stage is a large tuning room for the use of the members of the orchestra.

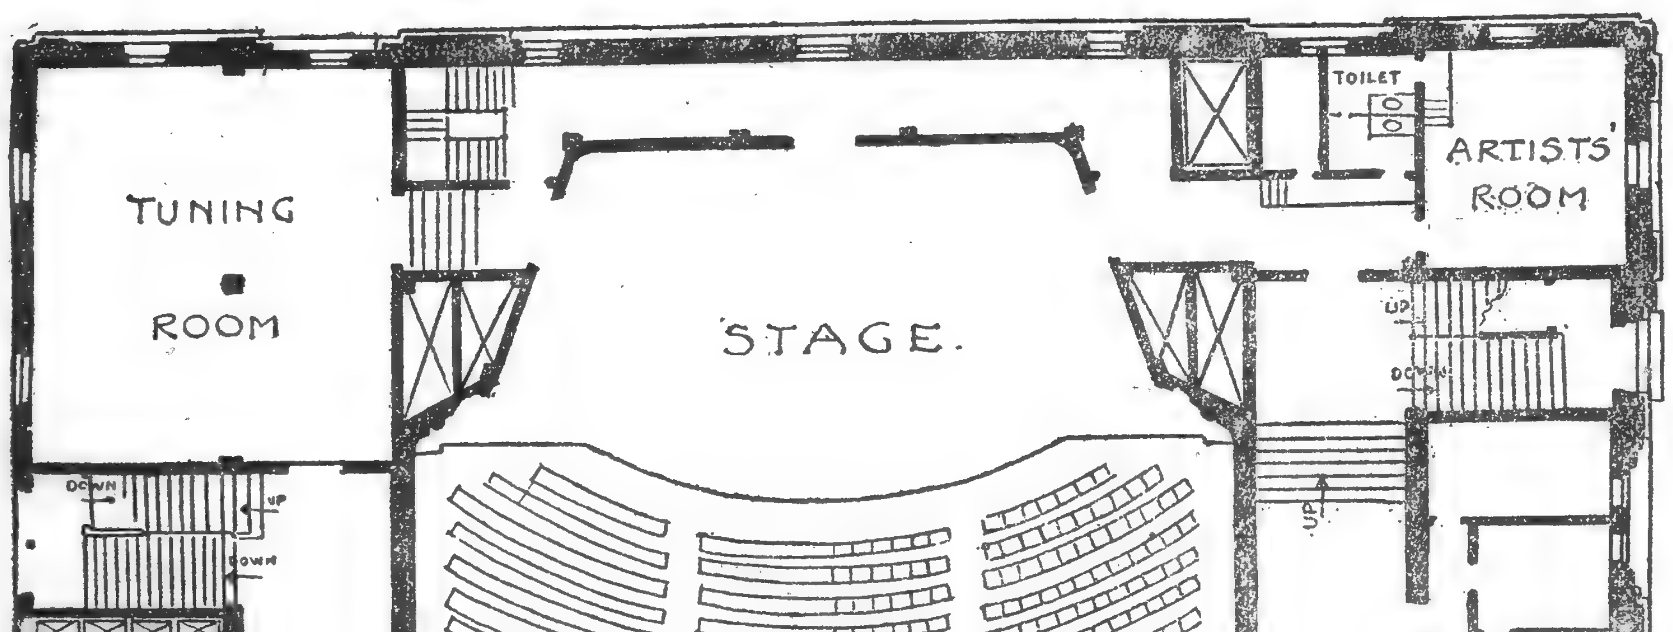
Further down in this south section there is a serving room. Directly over the basement kitchen and near the front vestibule are the cloak rooms.

On the first gallery floor there are additional cloak and toilet rooms. On the Massachusetts av side of this floor two large rooms have been set aside for the libraries of the symphony orchestra and the Handel and Haydn society, while there is another artists' room on this floor and two other small offices not assigned.

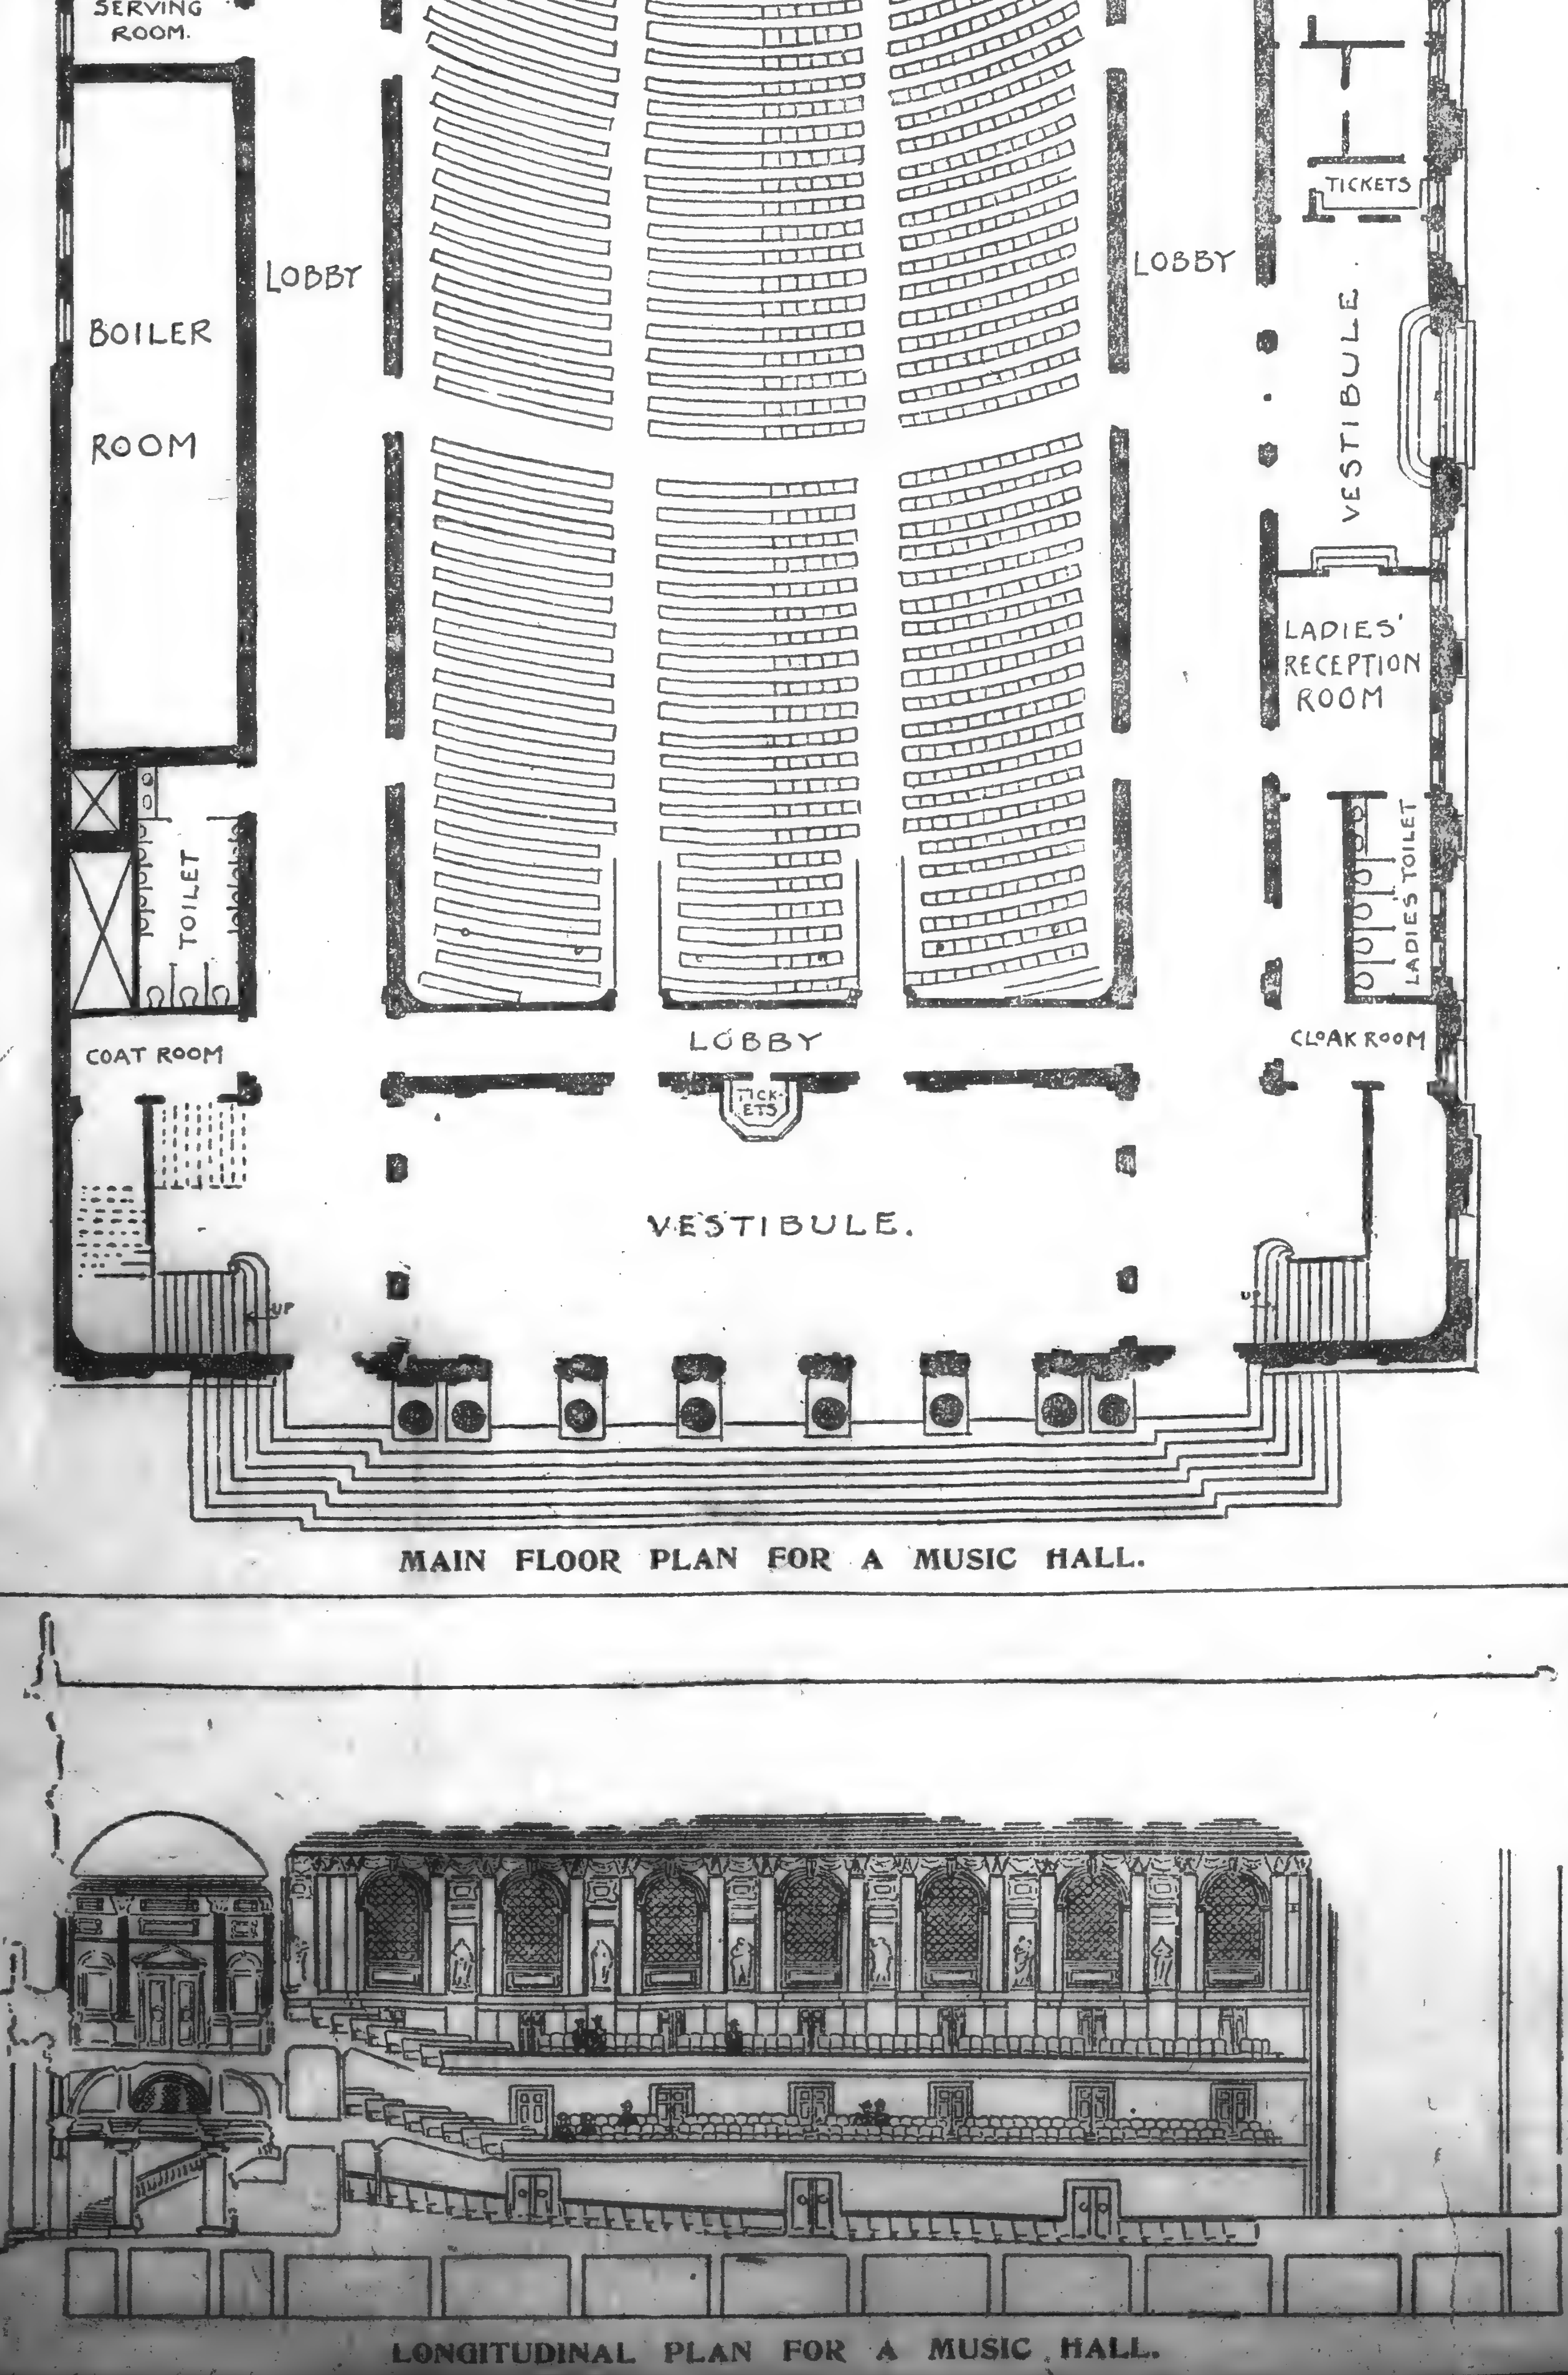
On the south side of the building on this floor a room 34x37 is designated the chorus room. It is intended to be used for rehearsals of choruses or small orchestras or for any similar purpose.

The basement contains the heating and ventilating apparatus and the kitchen. The ventilating shafts are placed on either side of the stage.

These plans are only suggestions to the stockholders and have not yet been accepted. The representative of the firm who brought them here says no estimates of the cost of such a building have been made, as it would depend a great deal upon how much details the stockholders wished. They were made, he says, to give the stockholders some suggestions for a modern music hall for concerts only, of fine acoustic properties and adapted especially for such purposes.



MAIN FLOOR PLAN FOR A MUSIC HALL.

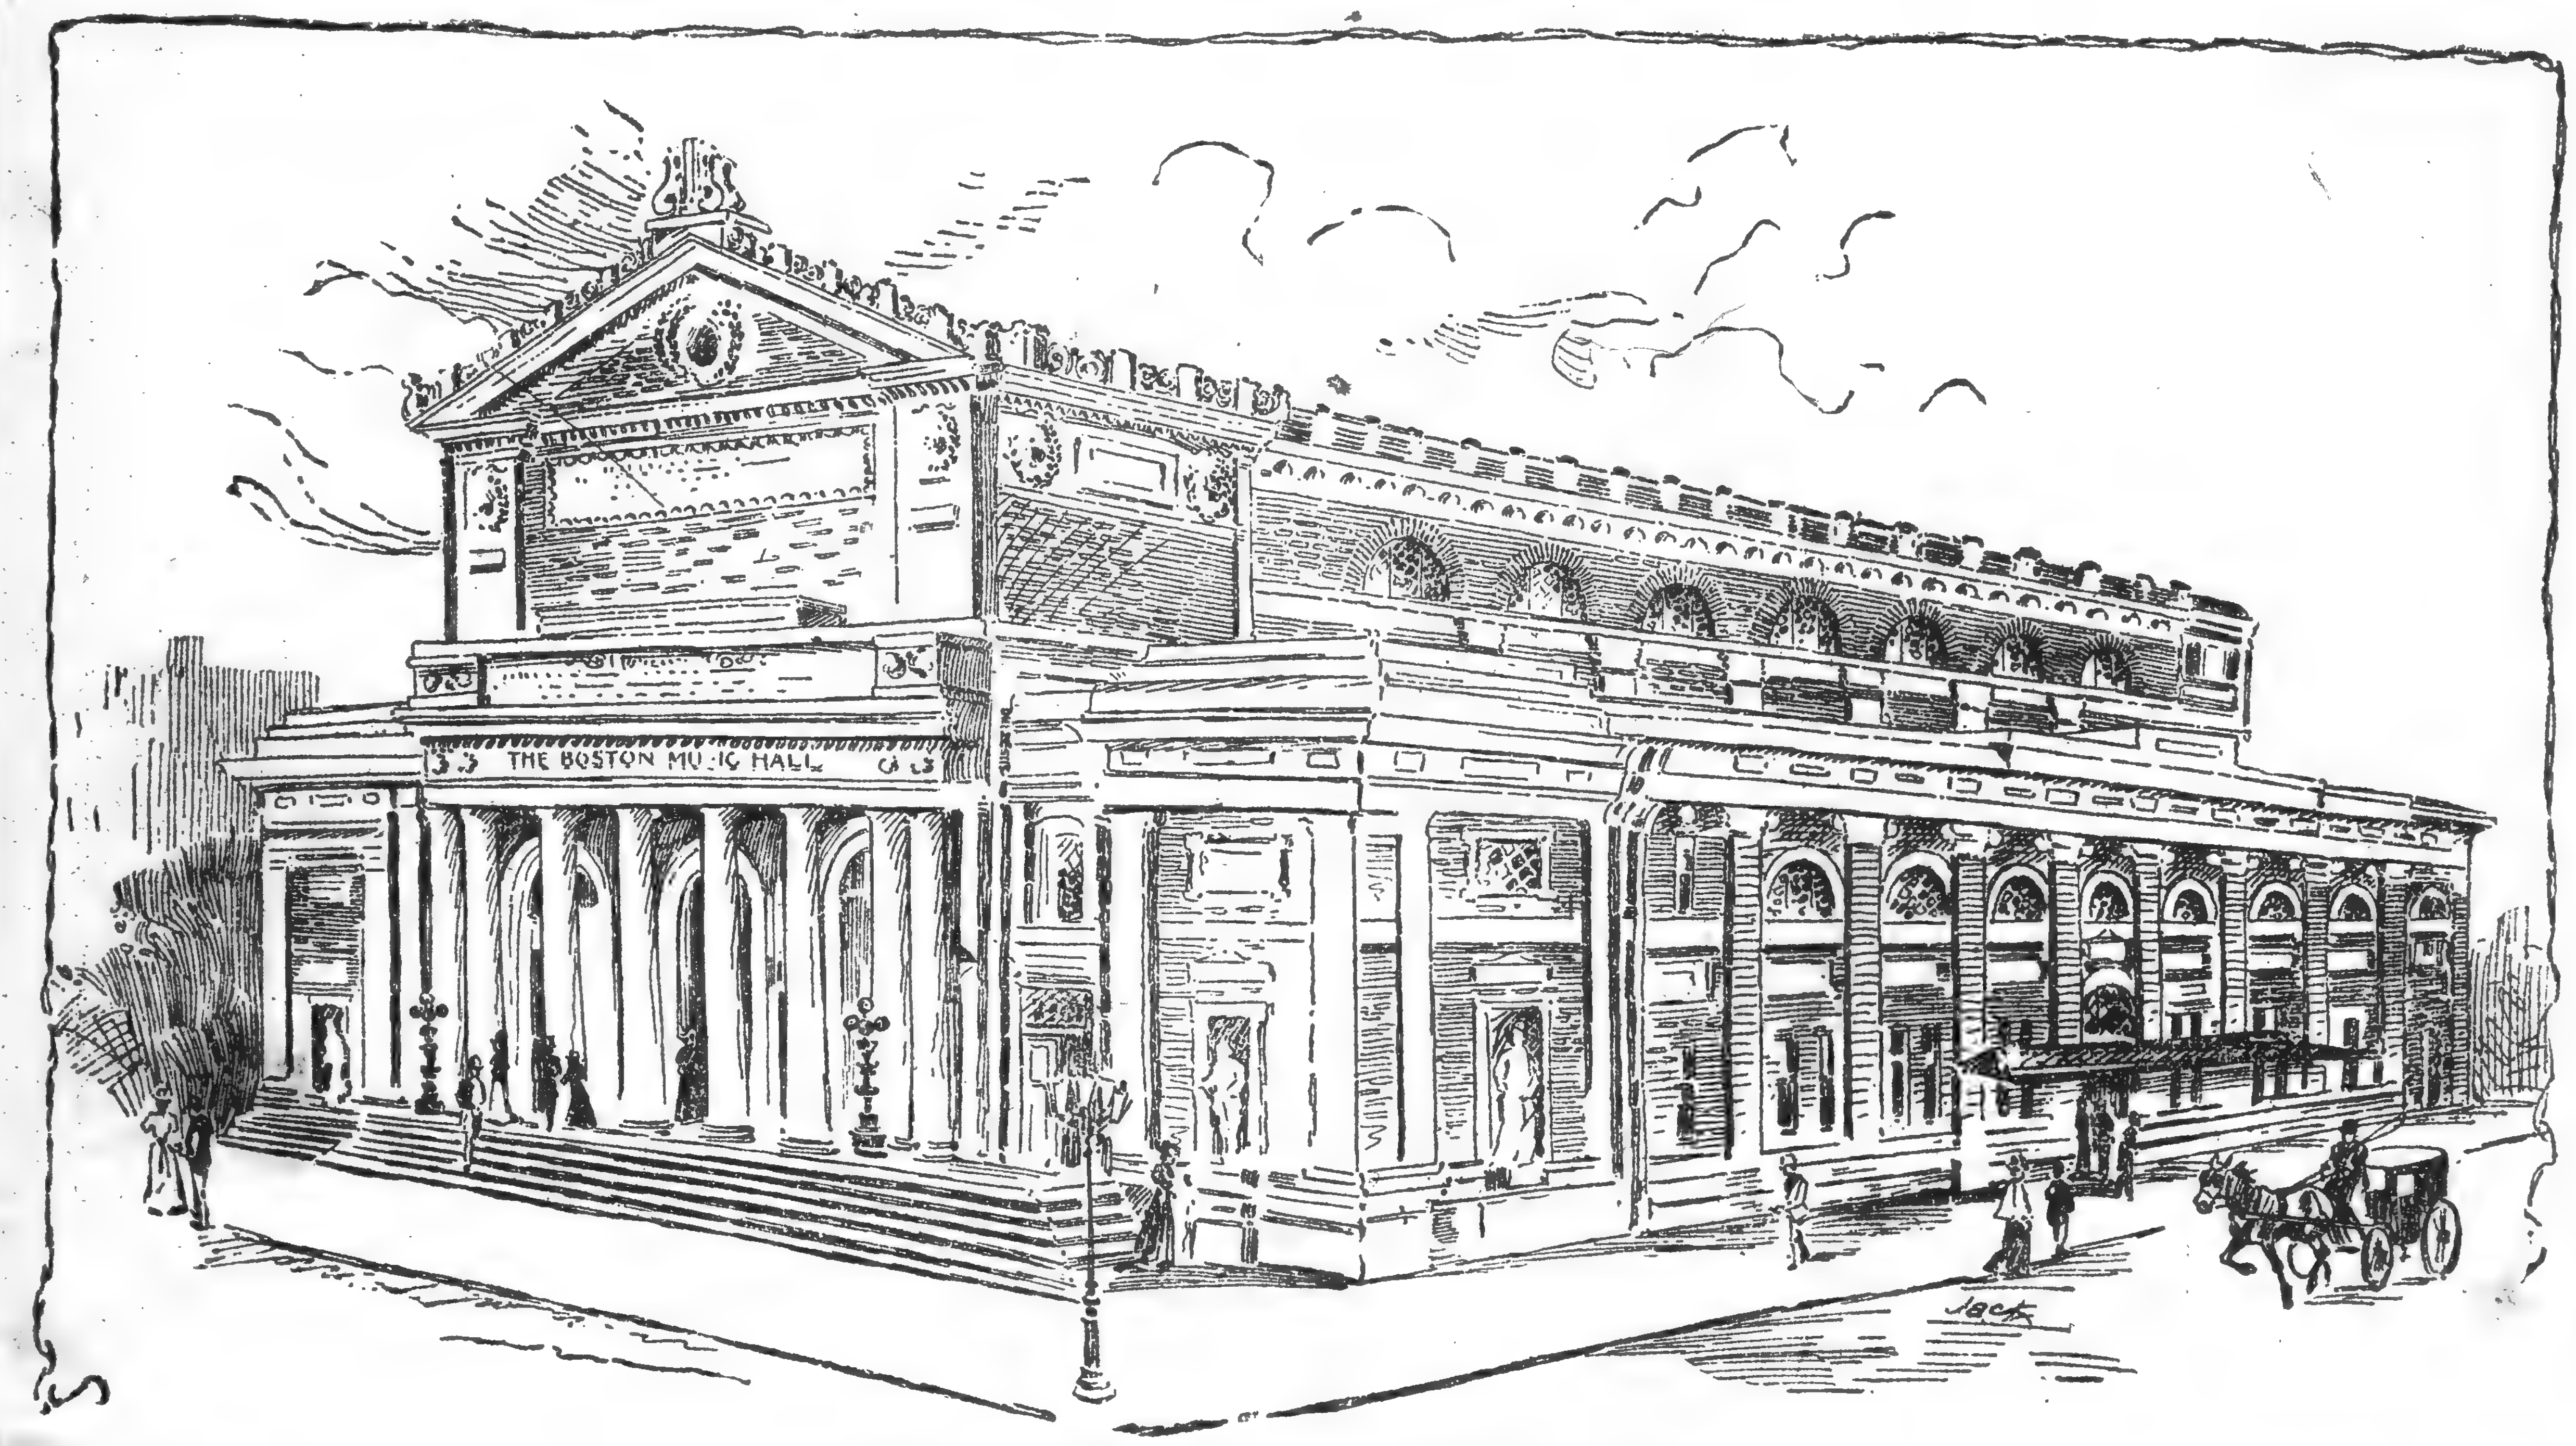


LONGITUDINAL PLAN FOR A MUSIC HALL.

THE BOSTON HERALD — TUESDAY, MARCH 14, 1899.

BOSTON'S HANDSOME NEW MUSIC HALL.

Beautiful Classical Building That Is Planned for the Corner of Huntington and Massachusetts Avenues.



THE PROPOSED NEW MUSIC HALL.

The above drawing is that of the proposed new Music Hall, which is to be located at Huntington and Massachusetts avenues. The building, as can be seen from the picture, is one of the finest and handsomest yet designed for this city. The cut is from a water-color perspective.

McKim, Mead & White, the New York architects, are the designers of the building, and a representative of theirs came on with the plans yesterday morning. He later superintended the hanging of these drawings on the walls of the offices in the Tremont building. The plans will be at the offices for a week, where they can be viewed by the stockholders of the company which is to build and own the building.

The material to be used is red brick and stone. The main entrance, which will be on Huntington avenue, will be very graceful and of unique design. The portico will be Ionic, and eight stone pillars will produce a very artistic as well as grand effect. The central hall occupies the main part of the building, and it rises to a height of three stories. The wings of the building on either side of this hall are to be built to the height of two stories only. There are to be slight inclines running from the roofs of the wings to the roof of the main hall. This will give the building the effect of having two stories with an enlarged monitor roof in the middle, which runs the entire length of the structure.

This plan was adopted so that the entire interior of the central part of the building is made the music hall, while the side structures include the entrances, lobbies, side corridors and business offices. The latter are on the different floors, but they allow of a deeper gallery space.

By a careful examination of the drawing, one can appreciate what the architects propose to do in giving to Boston a beautiful and finely equipped building to be used solely for musical entertainments. The hall has been designed primarily with a view to providing an edifice for the concerts of the Symphony orchestra, the Handel and Haydn Society, and kindred organizations. It is in no sense adapted to the uses of an opera house.

But for all that, one important fact has not been forgotten. The architect had in view the possibility of there being a demand in this new building for a number of banquets, and he has accordingly provided for such a want. His plans call for a kitchen in the basement, and a serving room on the hall floor beyond the south corridor.

The building is very classic in style, although it is not patterned after any edifice elsewhere. The report has been current that the architects have used ideas in accordance with those of an opera house in Munich. This they say is not so; that the building is entirely original in its conception.

The one who looks at the water-color representation of this building is at once impressed with its beauty and simplicity of design. Over the entrance on Huntington avenue is the inscription, "Boston Music Hall." Above this in the main front wall is a place for a tablet, for whatever inscription may be thought best. On either side of the portico are two indentations, one in the front wall and another in the side, just around the corner of the building. The idea of the architects in providing these niches was to make places for statuary. There are seven doors leading to the broad vestibule, which runs the entire length of the building. Beyond the vestibule is the lobby, while the ticket office is in the centre of the wall which divides the vestibule and the lobby.

Two corridors, 14 feet wide, extend along the side of the hall the entire length, in much the same manner as do those in the old hall. Doors enter from the corridors at frequent intervals, the hall being entirely inclosed except for these openings. Another entrance, which is by way of Massachusetts avenue, will be that for the carriages. It is in about the centre of the building, and it opens into a small vestibule. A marquee is provided at this doorway.

The hall itself is 140 feet long and 75 feet wide. The open stage is in the rear—that is, when entrance is made from the front lobby. There are four aisles passing through the hall, two in the middle and one on each side. While the seats are at an incline, the slope is not so great as in a theatre, but just enough to allow those who sit in the rear seats to have full command of the stage.

Light is let into the hall by windows in the front and rear of the main structure. The windows are large arched affairs of stained glass, these arches extending almost from the roof line of the side structures to the ceiling of the music hall. It is also planned that niches be placed in the walls between the windows, as places for statuary. This is only one of the many plans which have been proposed for the general scheme of interior decorations.

The first of the two galleries extends along the side limits of the hall, and is set into the side structures for a short distance. Except for a slight curvature in the rear, the side lines of the balconies are straight. This furnishes a narrow side balcony with a broad rear. While the second balcony is much the same as the first, it is not so broad in the rear, and does not extend beyond the hall space on the sides. On the first balcony there is a vestibule in the rear and corridors along the side, the same as on the floor. The second balcony has a lobby and a corridor on either side.

The exact seating capacity will be 2630. This is a gain over the old hall of 233. The floor capacity will be 1511, that of the first balcony 608 and of the second 511. The seats are to be larger and more comfortable than those in the old hall. While the old hall had three rows of seats in the first balcony, the new one will have but two.

Much care has been taken for the prevention of draughts. It is proposed to close the two inner doors leading to the auditorium, and to have the people enter by the right and left through doors which will be sufficiently large. While in the old hall two sections of seats on the first balcony overlooked the stage, not a seat in all the new hall will be over the stage.

The various needs of the orchestra and choral societies which have occasion to use the hall will be met by the use of the side rooms, which are to be in the two-story part of the building. On each of the four corners there is a staircase in the side sections, furnishing ample ways for coming into or going out of the building. For this reason the side sections are carried to sufficient height so that they contain the stairways to the second gallery.

The offices of the managers of the hall and the Symphony orchestra are on the side of the Massachusetts avenue section. The ladies' reception room is at the east end of this entrance and is very elaborate in its appointments, and has a toilet room adjoining. There is also a toilet room for men. An "artist's room," as it is called, has been reserved on the Massachusetts avenue side of the stage. The corresponding room on the other side of the stage is to be used as a tuning room for the members of the orchestra.

On the first gallery there are additional cloak and toilet rooms. On the Massachusetts avenue side two large rooms have been set off for libraries of the Symphony orchestra and the Handel and Haydn Society. There is still another room for artists on this floor, while two more have not yet been assigned. On the south side of the building, on the same floor, is a room 34x37, designated for a chorus room. It is to be used for rehearsals of choruses or smaller orchestras, or, in fact, for any similar purpose. There are ventilating shafts on either side of the stage.

These plans have only been submitted to the Music Hall stockholders for their consideration, and have as yet not been accepted. The representative of the architects who brought them here yesterday said that it would be impossible to make any estimate on how much it would cost to construct such a building, as it depended greatly on many details.

GRAND ARMY LEADERSHIP.

Senior Vice-Commander Johnson Will Be a Candidate.

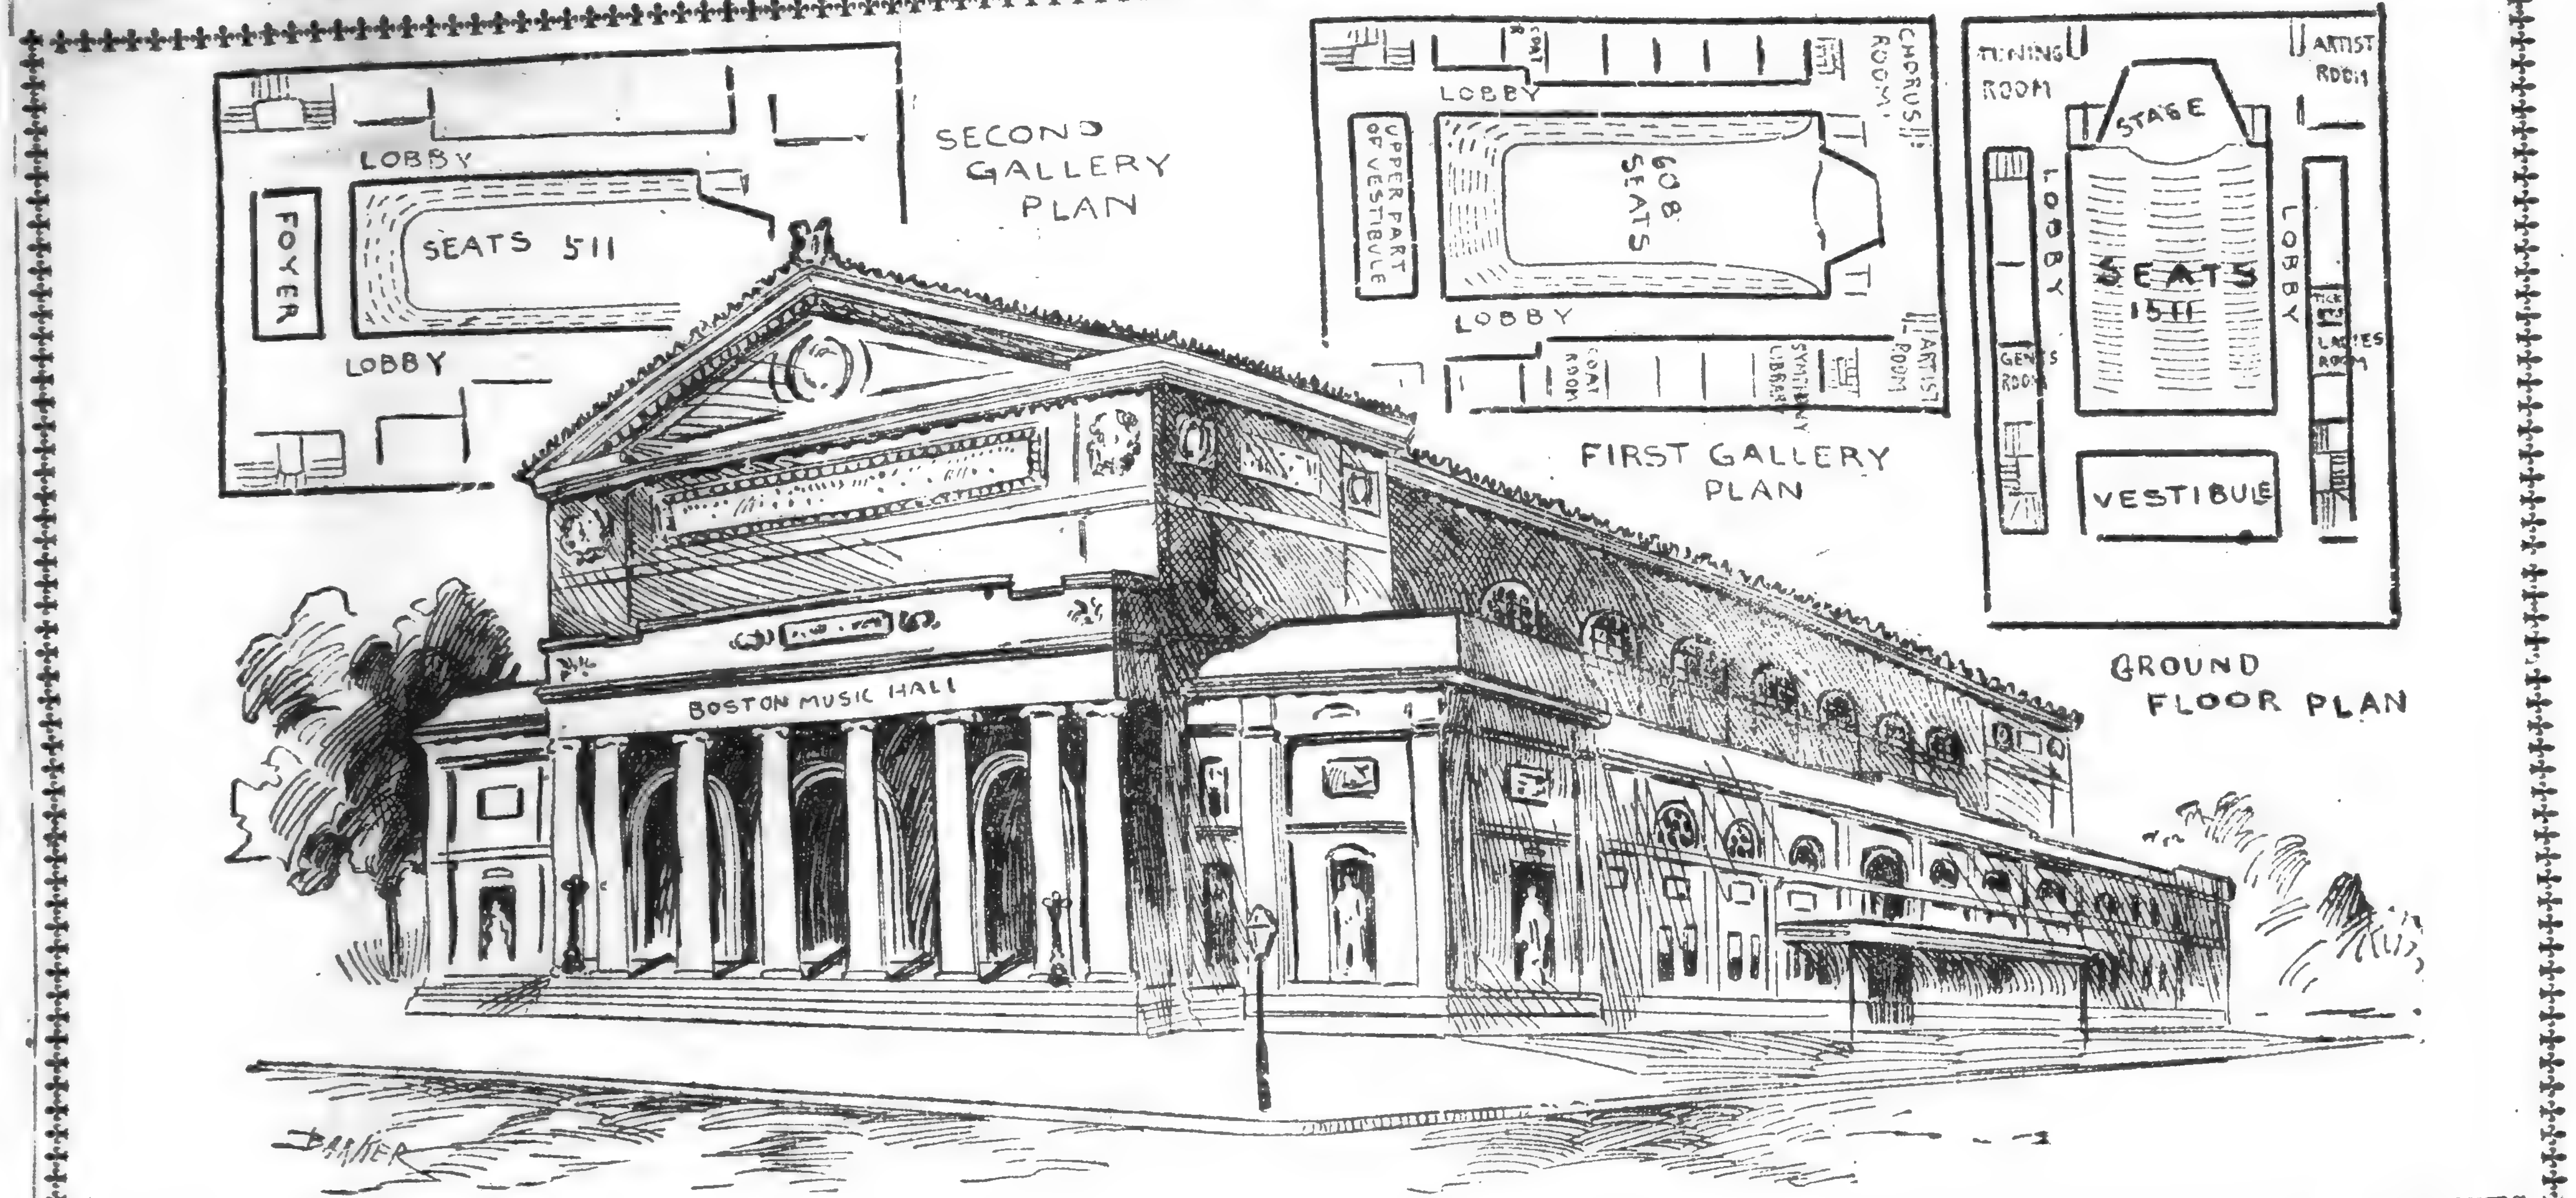
CINCINNATI, O., March 13, 1899. W. C. Johnson, senior vice-commander-in-chief of the Grand Army of the Republic, today issued a call for the executive committee of the national board of administration of the Grand Army to meet in Philadelphia on April 12 to select a commander-in-chief to succeed the late Gen. James A. Sexton.

Senior Vice-Commander Johnson has been indorsed by the department of Ohio, and will be a candidate for the leadership.

4 March 14

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

PLANS FOR BOSTON'S NEW MUSIC HALL.



SECOND GALLERY PLAN
LOBBY
FOYER
SEATS 511
LOBBY
LOBBY
UPPER PART OF VESTIBULE
608 SEATS
CHORUS ROOM LOBBY
COAT ROOM
SYMPHONY LIBRARY
ARTIST ROOM
FIRST GALLERY PLAN
TUNING ROOM
ARTIST ROOM
STAGE
LOBBY
SEATS 1511
LOBBY
GENTS ROOM
LADIES ROOM VESTIBULE
GROUND FLOOR PLAN
BOSTON MUSIC HALL
BARKER

ELEVATION AND INTERIOR PLANS OF THE NEW MUSIC HALL TO BE ERECTED AT THE CORNER OF MASSACHUSETTS AND HUNTINGTON AVENUES.

75
7
4
3
28
16
1
151

It Will Be 140 Feet Long, 75 Feet Wide, and Will Have a Seating Capacity of 2630, as Against 2397 in the Old Hall.

Plans for the new Music Hall, to be erected at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues, are on view in Room 314 of the Tremont building. They are merely preliminary, and it is likely that a great many alterations will be made in them before a final selection is made.

It is understood that the material to be used will be brick, probably red, and stone. The building will have a frontage of 150 feet on Huntington avenue and will extend 210 feet on Massachusetts avenue.

The distinguishing features of the new building are that it is longer, narrower and lower than the old Music Hall. The total seating capacity of the new Music Hall will be 2630, against 2397 in the old hall. The new hall has an interior length of about 140 feet and a width of 75 feet, while the old hall is 1?.6 feet long and 77.6 feet wide. The main ticket office will be on the Massachusetts avenue side.

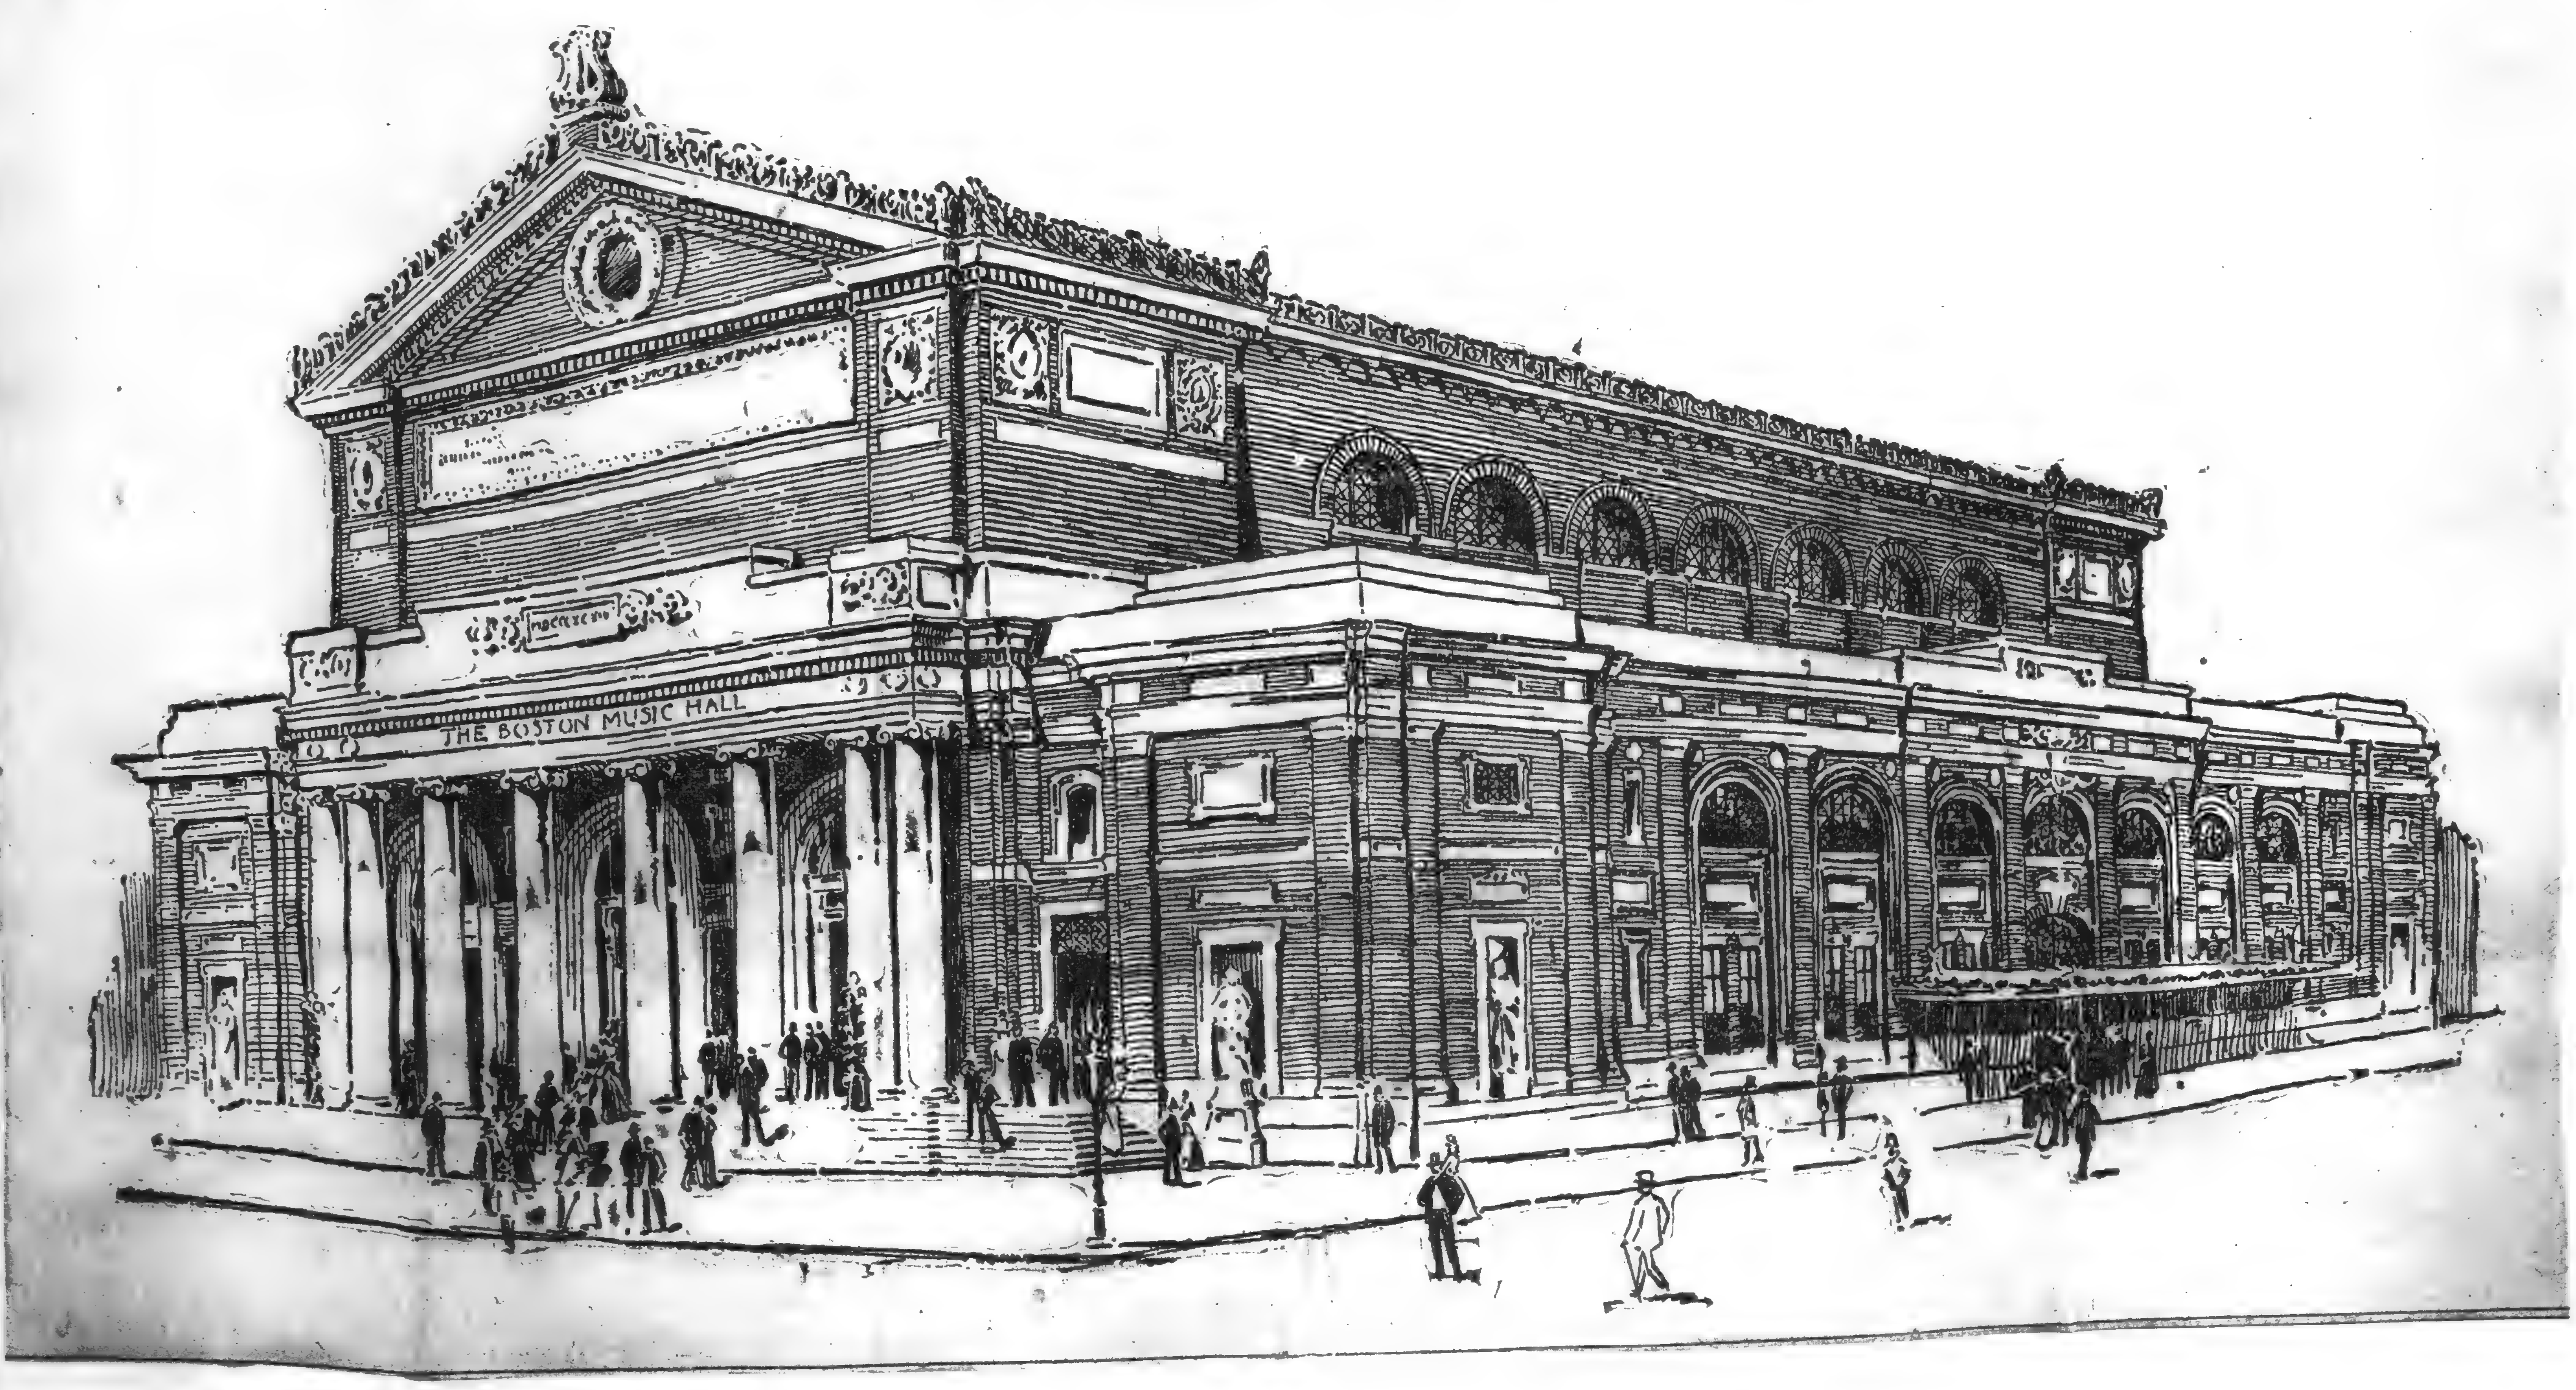
While naturally there will be much vacant space in the basement, allowance has been made for a baggage room, 54x29 feet; a carpenter shop, 17x20 feet; a kitchen, 17x27 feet; a serving room, 10x18 feet; a large boiler room with two boilers on one side and one boiler on the other; space for smoke and for foul air exhaust, coal storage and heating and ventilating machinery. It has not been decided whether an electric-light plant will be established in the building, but the architects have kept such a possibility in view.

The floor plan shows a main vestibule, 28x76 feet, from which entrance by two doors is made into a lobby seven feet wide at the front and fourteen feet wide on either side of the auditorium, which, by the way, is walled off from these lobbies. To the right of the vestibule come in succession a cloak and coat room, ladies' toilet, ladies' reception room, 16x24, a side vestibule opening on Massachusetts avenue, 17x37 feet, and offices. To the left on entering are a coat room, gentlemen's toilet room, a boiler room, 18x72 feet, and a serving room. The stage, which is 60x32 feet, has at the right an artists' room and a dressing room, and at the left a tuning room, 33x37 feet.

BOSTON EVENING TRANSCRIPT, TUESDAY, MARCH 14, 1899

THE NEW MUSIC HALL

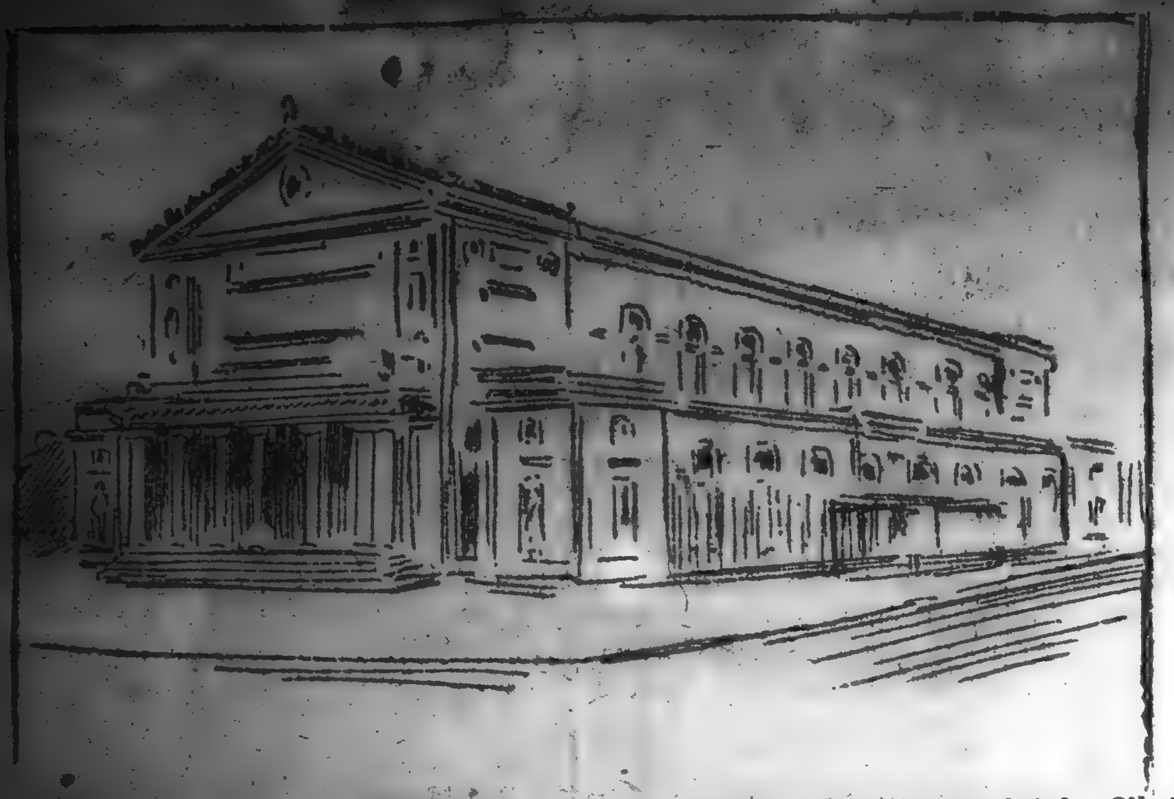
EXTERIOR OF THE PROPOSED BUILDING AS DESCRIBED AT LENGTH IN THE TRANSCRIPT LAST EVENING



THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL

1899.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.



Plans for the new Music Hall, to be located at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington aves., have arrived in this city from the New York office of the architects, McKim, Mead & White, and at present they may be seen in room 314 of the Tremont building.

The building committee of the New Music Hall corporation is to consider these plans before their acceptance, and it is possible that a number of alterations will be suggested.

It is understood that the material to be used will be brick, probably red, and stone. The main entrance, on Huntington ave., has an Ionic portico, with eight stone pillars; the main hall, or what better might be called the hall proper, rises higher than the rest of the building, with a pediment at the top; what seems to be a harp is the crowning glory of the roof front.

At either corner of the front section is a pavilion which runs into a wing extending the length of the building; overlooking these wings in the main hall are clere-windows. On the Massachusetts ave. side is a vestibule which, if followed up, makes a straight line through and across the hall interior; protecting this vestibule is a marquise.

The building will completely fill the lot purchased for it, and consequently will have a frontage of 150 ft. on Huntington ave. and will extend 100 ft. on Massachusetts ave.

The total seating capacity of the new Music Hall will be 2630, against 2397 in the old hall. The floor capacity will be 1511, that of the first balcony 608 and that of the second balcony 511, against 1251, 680 and 466 for the old hall.

The new hall has an interior length of about 140 ft., and a width of 75 ft., while the old hall is 97.6 ft. long and 77.6 ft. wide. The main ticket office will be on the Massachusetts ave. side, and that at the main entrance will be used only prior to and during performances.

It is estimated that, if necessary, the entire audience, assuming that the floor is filled, can be turned into the broad lobbies which encircle the auditorium.

In the old hall two sections of seats in the first balcony overlook the stage; in the new hall not a seat throughout will be over the stage.

The corridors on the floor conform to the pitch of the floor itself, and there are no steps. In the summer, when the chairs and other appurtenances are removed, the floor can be made level.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15, 1899.

Last evening the eighteenth concert of the season, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall with this program:

Overture to Sakuntala	Goldmark
Aria, Furibondo Spira, from Parthenope	Händel
Air, Mon Coeur S'ouvre à ta Voix, from Samson et Dalila	Saint-Saëns
A Faust-Symphony in C minor	Liszt

Mme. Margaret Boye Jensen was the soloist. In the Liszt work Herbert Johnson and a male chorus from the Cecilia assisted.

The playing of the orchestra through the whole concert was exceptionally brilliant. Mr. Gericke gave a gorgeously colored interpretation of the Goldmark overture. Notably effective were the fire and joyousness he imparted to the what may be called the coda of the work by taking it at a more rapid and stirring pace than has been customary, and after having heard it thus impressively treated it seemed strange that it should ever have been read otherwise, so irresistibly did it force itself on the mind as the composer's original idea. The effect was tremendous, and brought down the house in a fervor of approval.

It is hard to conceive why the dreary and desperately wearisome Liszt Symphony should have been revived. It is terribly dong drawn out. The opening movement, despite its noisiness, is conducive to slumber. It is true that the orchestration is rich and ingenious with its reflections of Berlioz, and its suggestions of Wagner, but there is in it little else than orchestration. It is worthy of note, however, that in this work Liszt seems to have anticipated the methods of contemporary Russian music, ugliness included. The Gretchen movement is depressingly dull, though her and there are some lucid and not unpoetic moments, but there is little of beauty, nothing that is not laboriously strained to the production of mere effect of tone color. The Mephistopheles finale is chiefly cacophony, intended to illustrate the cynicism and the irony of the fiend, but it is purely theatrical stuff; red fire, tinsel, a strong smell of lycopodium flashed from the hollow of a lighted tin torch and artificial thunder. Liszt's device of vulgarizing preceding themes was copied from the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz, who made his parodies clearer and more decisive. The commonplaces of bombast run riot. The reason for the chary chorus is not obvious, nor is the music of any interest. The symphony was last heard her some eighteen or more years ago. Now if a like term passes before it is performed here again, all shall be forgotten, all forgiven.

Of Madame Boye-Jensen there is nothing that need be said except that she scarcely succeeded in justifying her appearance at these concerts, and that her audience was kind enough or mistaken enough to applaud and to recall her.

THE SUN

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fourth Of The Series Thoroughly Enjoyed By A Large Audience At Music Hall.

At the fourth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Music Hall the following programme was offered:

Karl Maria von Weber,
Overture to "Der Freischutz."
Spohr,
Concerto for Violin, No. 8, in A minor, "Gesangszene," Op. 47.
Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky,
Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."
Hector Berlioz,
Symphony No. 3, in G major, with Viola obligata, "Harold in Italy," Op. 16.
(Viola obligata by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)

It was by no means a hackneyed programme. The symphony, for example, was almost unknown in this city. The interest which it excited was not, however, entirely the result of the curiosity which is usually felt upon hearing an unfamiliar composition. It was seen to be a stupendous work—big with sentiment and with a depth of thought which sometimes in a work of Berlioz is overlaid with such a wealth of coloring as to lose the real inner significance. The large effects that can only be obtained by heavy and rich orchestration were all present in the symphony, but not to such a degree as to make them the chief thing.

The addition of a solo instrument is a novelty which will not often be attempted. While it adds a certain element which is always connected with the performance of an individual, this must in most cases interfere with the real significance of a symphony.

The discreet and thoroughly musicianly manner with which Franz Kneisel fulfilled the task as soloist in the symphony did much to increase the interest in the beautiful work.

Of the soloist of the evening, Lady Halle, only words of commendation can be uttered. Her playing was graced with a suavity of tone and a finish of technique which stamp her as an artist of eminence. There was no evidence of overpowering inspiration, but there was much that was extraordinary and much that was admirable.

The Spohr Concerto, however, which was her selection for the concert, was in the stilted form which is characteristic of many of the compositions of a certain class of musicians living at the beginning of this century. It lacks sentiment and it lacks unity, but the considerable technical difficulties and the skillful adaptation to the limitations of the violin will make it an important number in the violinist's repertoire for a long time, as it has been for the past fifty years.

Mr. Gericke's reading of the Freishuetz Overture was not characterized either by originality or by true appreciation of the full meaning of the work. That it was played skillfully goes without saying, but it was just a bit commonplace and perfunctory. To be sure, it was not one of the pieces de resistance of the concert, but it is such a remarkably constructed composition that in spite of its being hackneyed it deserves always thoughtful handling.

The Tschaikowsky number was in the manner of a preparation for the symphony. The Russian composer is a debtor in many respects to Berlioz, but in no particular more than in the matter of orchestration. This was quite apparent last night because of the juxtaposition of the two works. The "Romeo and Juliet Overture" is somewhat in the style of the 1812 Overture, and in it the composer shows his great powers as a descriptive writer.

The position of the symphony at the end of the programme was, as it always is, felt to be a hardship. In the programme as it stood last night it would have been hard to effect a different arrangement, but the scheme should certainly be sparingly employed.

The audience shows a tendency to grow, thereby indicating the general appreciation that is felt of the effort on the part of the management to provide artists of the highest class.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Music Hall before a very large audience. The concert was exceedingly interesting, consisting as it did entirely of works by composers of the romantic school.

The overture to "Freischuetz" was the first orchestral number. Although this composition appears on programmes of various descriptions, sometimes even being given as an organ transcription, it is a work of such beauty that it never wearies, and when played as it was last evening by the Boston Orchestra, it becomes a positive treat. The soloist for the occasion was Lady Halle, better known as Norman Neruda. She played Spohr's violin concerto No. 8 "Gesangszene." Spohr belonged absolutely to the romantic school of composers, forming a link between the new and the old romantic schools; and in all his music a strong inclination to avoid the "absolute" music which characterizes the classical styles is noticeable. Of the 15 concertos which he wrote, the one played yesterday evening by the artiste is perhaps the best known. As a violinist, Norman Neruda ranks among the greatest, and as a lady violinist, she is certainly second to none. Her tone is rich, full and broad and absolutely pure; her crescendos and diminuendos are perfect, and her conception and interpretation of the work were artistic in the extreme. The manner in which Mr. Gericke kept his orchestra well subdued, so as not to overpower the soloist at any time, greatly enhanced the sensation of thorough enjoyment produced by the concerto.

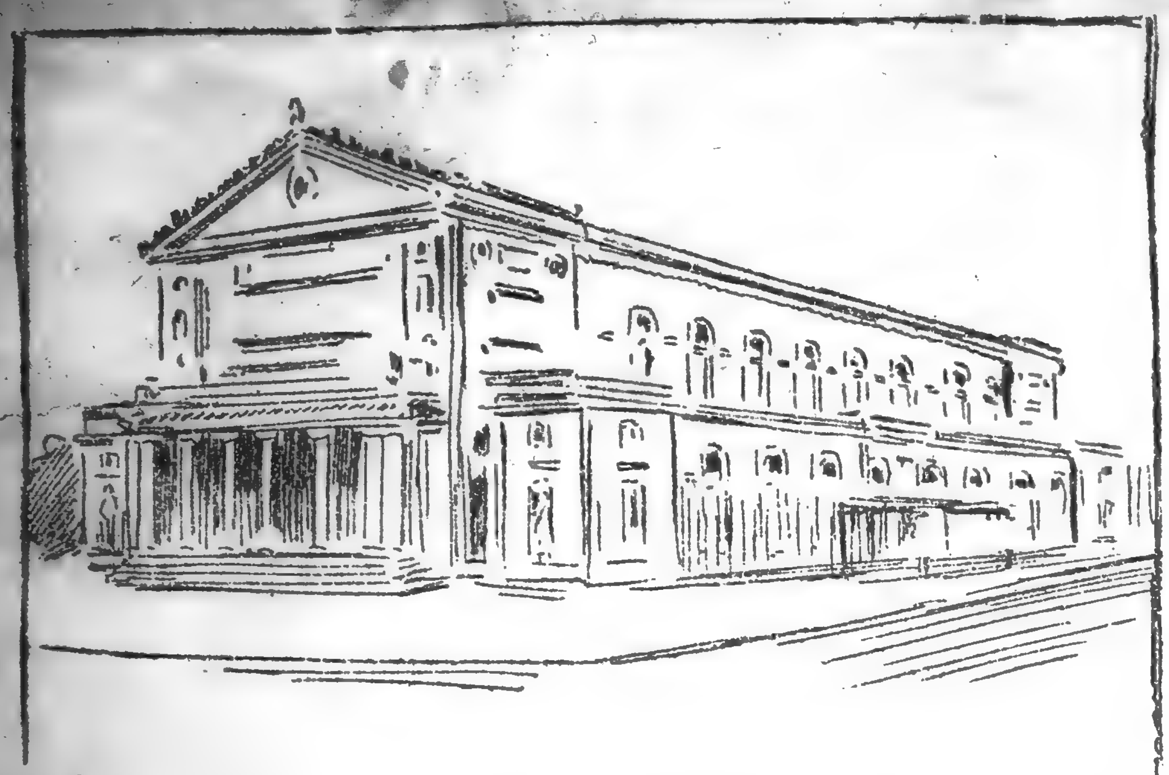
Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet" was the next work on the programme. This composer is a true representative of the Russian national character, and in most of his music exhibits originality, combined with interesting modulations and quaint rhythm. No composer has made use of the vast possibilities of the orchestra with more telling effects; and this may well be said of the "Romeo and Juliet" overture. The enmity of the two houses and the unhappy fate of the lovers is graphically portrayed in the orchestration. As a work it displays great power and imagination, and was admirably rendered.

Berlioz's Symphony No. 3, with viola obligato, "Harold in Italy," was the concluding number. It may be classed as one of the master's most prominent works. It was originally written at the desire of Paganini, who wished for a concerto for the viola. For this Berlioz wrote this symphony. The work contains numerous beauties, but they are somewhat marred by the prescribed programme with which the composer is fettered; nevertheless the impression produced is that of a true tonal poem, although the bells in the "Ave Maria" are rather too realistic. The part ascribed to the viola is as original as it is effective. The viola obligato was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel, who proved himself to be a master of the instrument and as much at home upon it as upon the violin.

News Feb 23, 1899

RECORD TUESDAY MARCH 14 1899.

THE NEW MUSIC HALL.



Plans for the new Music Hall, to be located at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington aves., have arrived in this city from the New York office of the architects, McKim, Mead & White, and at present they may be seen in room 314 of the Tremont building.

The building committee of the New Music Hall corporation is to consider these plans before their acceptance, and it is possible that a number of alterations will be suggested.

It is understood that the material to be used will be brick, probably red, and stone. The main entrance, on Huntington ave., has an Ionic portico, with eight stone pillars; the main hall, or what better might be called the hall proper, rises higher than the rest of the building, with a pediment at the top; what seems to be a harp is the crowning glory of the roof front.

At either corner of the front section is a pavilion which runs into a wing extending the length of the building; overlooking these wings in the main hall are clere-windows. On the Massachusetts ave. side is a vestibule which, if followed up, makes a straight line through and across the hall interior; protecting this vestibule is a marquise.

The building will completely fill the lot purchased for it, and consequently will have a frontage of 150 ft. on Huntington ave. and will extend 100 ft. on Massachusetts ave.

The total seating capacity of the new Music Hall will be 2630, against 2397 in the old hall. The floor capacity will be 1511, that of the first balcony 608 and that of the second balcony 511, against 1251, 680 and 466 for the old hall.

The new hall has an interior length of about 140 ft., and a width of 75 ft., while the old hall is 97.6 ft. long and 77.6 ft. wide. The main ticket office will be on the Massachusetts ave. side, and that at the main entrance will be used only prior to and during performances.

It is estimated that, if necessary, the entire audience, assuming that the floor is filled, can be turned into the broad lobbies which encircle the auditorium.

In the old hall two sections of seats in the first balcony overlook the stage; in the new hall not a seat throughout will be over the stage.

The corridors on the floor conform to the pitch of the floor itself, and there are no steps. In the summer, when the chairs and other appurtenances are removed, the floor can be made level.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 15, 1899.

Last evening the eighteenth concert of the season, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall with this program:

Overture to Sakuntala	Goldmark
Aria, Furibondo Spira, from Parthenope	Händel
Air, Mon Coeur S'ouvre à ta Voix, from Samson et Dalila	Saint-Saëns
A Faust-Symphony in C minor	Liszt

Mme. Margaret Boye Jensen was the soloist. In the Lizst work Herbert Johnson and a male chorus from the Cecilia assisted.

The playing of the orchestra through the whole concert was exceptionally brilliant. Mr. Gericke gave a gorgeously colored interpretation of the Goldmark overture. Notably effective were the fire and joyousness he imparted to the what may be called the coda of the work by taking it at a more rapid and stirring pace than has been customary, and after having heard it thus impressively treated it seemed strange that it should ever have been read otherwise, so irresistibly did it force itself on the mind as the composer's original idea. The effect was tremendous, and brought down the house in a fervor of approval.

It is hard to conceive why the dreary and desperately wearisome Liszt Symphony should have been revived. It is terribly dong drawn out. The opening movement, despite its noisiness, is conducive to slumber. It is true that the orchestration is rich and ingenious with its reflections of Berlioz, and its suggestions of Wagner, but there is in it little else than orchestration. It is worthy of note, however, that in this work Liszt seems to have anticipated the methods of contemporary Russian music, ugliness included. The Gretchen movement is depressingly dull, though her and there are some lucid and not unpoetic moments, but there is little of beauty, nothing that is not laboriously strained to the production of mere effect of tone color. The Mephistopheles finale is chiefly cacophony, intended to illustrate the cynicism and the irony of the fiend, but it is purely theatrical stuff; red fire, tinsel, a strong smell of lycopodium flashed from the hollow of a lighted tin torch and artificial thunder. Liszt's device of vulgarizing preceding themes was copied from the Fantastic Symphony of Berlioz, who made his parodies clearer and more decisive. The commonplaces of bombast run riot. The reason for the chary chorus is not obvious, nor is the music of any interest. The symphony was last heard her some eighteen or more years ago. Now if a like term passes before it is performed here again, all shall be forgotten, all forgiven.

Of Madame Boye-Jensen there is nothing that need be said except that she scarcely succeeded in justifying her appearance at these concerts, and that her audience was kind enough or mistaken enough to applaud and to recall her.

THE SUN

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fourth Of The Series Thoroughly Enjoyed By A Large Audience At Music Hall.

At the fourth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Music Hall the following programme was offered:

Karl Maria von Weber,
Overture to "Der Freischutz."
Spohr,
Concerto for Violin, No. 8, in A mincr, "Gesangszene," Op. 47.
Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky,
Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."
Hector Berlioz,
Symphony No. 3, in G major, with Viola obligata, "Harold in Italy," Op. 16.
(Viola obligata by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)

It was by no means a hackneyed programme. The symphony, for example, was almost unknown in this city. The interest which it excited was not, however, entirely the result of the curiosity which is usually felt upon hearing an unfamiliar composition. It was seen to be a stupendous work—big with sentiment and with a depth of thought which sometimes in a work of Berlioz is overlaid with such a wealth of coloring as to lose the real inner significance. The large effects that can only be obtained by heavy and rich orchestration were all present in the symphony, but not to such a degree as to make them the chief thing.

The addition of a solo instrument is a novelty which will not often be attempted. While it adds a certain element which is always connected with the performance of an individual, this must in most cases interfere with the real significance of a symphony.

The discreet and thoroughly musicianly manner with which Franz Kneisel fulfilled the task as soloist in the symphony did much to increase the interest in the beautiful work.

Of the soloist of the evening, Lady Halle, only words of commendation can be uttered. Her playing was graced with a suavity of tone and a finish of technique which stamp her as an artist of eminence. There was no evidence of overpowering inspiration, but there was much that was extraordinary and much that was admirable.

The Spohr Concerto, however, which was her selection for the concert, was in the stilted form which is characteristic of many of the compositions of a certain class of musicians living at the beginning of this century. It lacks sentiment and it lacks unity, but the considerable technical difficulties and the skillful adaptation to the limitations of the violin will make it an important number in the violinist's repertoire for a long time, as it has been for the past fifty years.

Mr. Gericke's reading of the Freishuetz Overture was not characterized either by originality or by true appreciation of the full meaning of the work. That it was played skillfully goes without saying, but it was just a bit commonplace and perfunctory. To be sure, it was not one of the pieces de resistance of the concert, but it is such a remarkably constructed composition that in spite of its being hackneyed it deserves always thoughtful handling.

The Tschaikowsky number was in the manner of a preparation for the symphony. The Russian composer is a debtor in many respects to Berlioz, but in no particular more than in the matter of orchestration. This was quite apparent last night because of the juxtaposition of the two works. The "Romeo and Juliet Overture" is somewhat in the style of the 1812 Overture, and in it the composer shows his great powers as a descriptive writer.

The position of the symphony at the end of the programme was, as it always is, felt to be a hardship. In the programme as it stood last night it would have been hard to effect a different arrangement, but the scheme should certainly be sparingly employed.

The audience shows a tendency to grow, thereby indicating the general appreciation that is felt of the effort on the part of the management to provide artists of the highest class.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERT.

The fourth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Music Hall before a very large audience. The concert was exceedingly interesting, consisting as it did entirely of works by composers of the romantic school.

The overture to "Freischuetz" was the first orchestral number. Although this composition appears on programmes of various descriptions, sometimes even being given as an organ transcription, it is a work of such beauty that it never wearies, and when played as it was last evening by the Boston Orchestra, it becomes a positive treat. The soloist for the occasion was Lady Halle, better known as Norman Neruda. She played Spohr's violin concerto No. 8 "Gesangszene." Spohr belonged absolutely to the romantic school of composers, forming a link between the new and the old romantic schools; and in all his music a strong inclination to avoid the "absolute" music which characterizes the classical styles is noticeable. Of the 15 concertos which he wrote, the one played yesterday evening by the artiste is perhaps the best known. As a violinist, Norman Neruda ranks among the greatest, and as a lady violinist, she is certainly second to none. Her tone is rich, full and broad and absolutely pure; her crescendos and diminuendos are perfect, and her conception and interpretation of the work were artistic in the extreme. The manner in which Mr. Gericke kept his orchestra well subdued, so as not to overpower the soloist at any time, greatly enhanced the sensation of thorough enjoyment produced by the concerto.

Tschaikowsky's overture-fantasy "Romeo and Juliet" was the next work on the programme. This composer is a true representative of the Russian national character, and in most of his music exhibits originality, combined with interesting modulations and quaint rhythm. No composer has made use of the vast possibilities of the orchestra with more telling effects; and this may well be said of the "Romeo and Juliet" overture. The enmity of the two houses and the unhappy fate of the lovers is graphically portrayed in the orchestration. As a work it displays great power and imagination, and was admirably rendered.

Berlioz's Symphony No. 3, with viola obligato, "Harold in Italy," was the concluding number. It may be classed as one of the master's most prominent works. It was originally written at the desire of Paganini, who wished for a concerto for the viola. For this Berlioz wrote this symphony. The work contains numerous beauties, but they are somewhat marred by the prescribed programme with which the composer is fettered; nevertheless the impression produced is that of a true tonal poem, although the bells in the "Ave Maria" are rather too realistic. The part ascribed to the viola is as original as it is effective. The viola obligato was played by Mr. Franz Kneisel, who proved himself to be a master of the instrument and as much at home upon it as upon the violin.

ST SYMPHONY CONCERT

ose of a Successful Season at the Music Hall—Features of the Programme.

Fitting indeed, as the termination of a most successful season, was the fifth and last concert given in the Music Hall last night by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The programme, orchestra, soloist and director were a blend of encouragement for a continuance of these instructive and enjoyable affairs.

Ordinarily the overture to "Der Freischutz," which began the concert, would be looked upon as a rather hackneyed number, but not when played by such an organization as the Boston Orchestra. Upon such occasions it is like brushing up old memories, as it were; putting on a new polish and making new many of the melodies which were until then thought to be stale and entirely too familiar.

The feature of the evening, however, was the performance of Berlioz's "Harold In Italy," a symphonic picturing of Byron's "Childe Harold," and embellished throughout with the contrapuntal [illegible]lessness and melodic originality of [illegible] composer. The most pronounced of [illegible] last-named characteristic is the viola obligato, which carries the title theme from beginning to end. It was Paganini with a newly acquired viola, who requested Berlioz to write a concerto featuring the instrument, and then became dissatisfied with the composition before it was completed. Berlioz went ahead with the work, according to his own idea, and the Symphony No. 3, in G major, was the result.

It is a ponderous creation, and only attempted by large orchestras under an intelligent director. Then, again, it requires an artist to handle the viola obligato, and the manner in which this part of the work was done last night by concert master Franz Kneisel was something in the manner of a revelation to a Baltimore audience. It requires a master of the strings to execute this evolution of the "gamba" with effect, and Mr. Kneisel's performance proved an artistic effort in every particular.

The eccentricities of instrumentation with which the symphony abounds were splendidly read by Mr. Gericke, and the orchestra in each detail was en rapport with the director's conception of the several movements. They are four in number and depict in turn the "Happiness and Joy of Harold in the Mountains," "Pilgrims' March and Chant," interwoven with the tolling of the chapel bell; "Mountaineers' Love Serenade," and the "Orgy of the Brigands."

Lady Halle, whose fame as a violin virtuoso preceded her to this city, was the soloist, and her performance of the Spohr concerto in A minor justified all that has been said and written in praise of her talents. For an exhibition of expressive performance she could hardly have made a better selection than this graceful and melodious composition. Her tone is clear and true, and she phrases to a nicety. In addition to this, Lady Halle's reading of the number is above criticism, and her bowing and technique are all that could be desired. The other number of the programme was Tchaikovsky's conception of the delineation of love as seen in "Romeo and Juliet." It is a fantastic tone picture of the Shakespearean idea, of moody motif and orchestral coloring.

Manager Comee expressed himself as being well pleased with the results of the series of concerts just finished, and hinted that a return next season was more than probable.

Sun Feb 22

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Fourth Of The Series Thoroughly Enjoyed By A Large Audience At Music Hall.

At the fourth concert of the series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night at Music Hall the following programme was offered:

Karl Maria von Weber,
Overture to "Der Freischutz."
Spohr,
Concerto for Violin, No. 8, in A minor, "Gesangszene," Op. 47.
Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky,
Overture-Fantasy, "Romeo and Juliet."
Hector Berlioz,
Symphony No. 3, in G major, with Viola obligata, "Harold in Italy," Op. 16.
(Viola obligata by Mr. Franz Kneisel.)

It was by no means a hackneyed programme. The symphony, for example, was almost unknown in this city. The interest which it excited was not, however, entirely the result of the curiosity which is usually felt upon hearing an unfamiliar composition. It was seen to be a stupendous work—big with sentiment and with a depth of thought which sometimes in a work of Berlioz is overlaid with such a wealth of coloring as to lose the real inner significance. The large effects that can only be obtained by heavy and rich orchestration were all present in the symphony, but not to such a degree as to make them the chief thing.

The addition of a solo instrument is a novelty which will not often be attempted. While it adds a certain element which is always connected with the performance of an individual, this must in most cases interfere with the real significance of a symphony.

The discreet and thoroughly musicianly manner with which Franz Kneisel fulfilled the task as soloist in the symphony did much to increase the interest in the beautiful work.

Of the soloist of the evening, Lady Halle, only words of commendation can be uttered. Her playing was graced with a suavity of tone and a finish of technique which stamp her as an artist of eminence. There was no evidence of overpowering inspiration, but there was much that was extraordinary and much that was admirable.

The Spohr Concerto, however, which was her selection for the concert, was in the stilted form which is characteristic of many of the compositions of a certain class of musicians living at the beginning of this century. It lacks sentiment and it lacks unity, but the considerable technical difficulties and the skillful adaptation to the limitations of the violin will make it an important number in the violinist's repertoire for a long time, as it has been for the past fifty years.

Mr. Gericke's reading of the Freishuetz Overture was not characterized either by originality or by true appreciation of the full meaning of the work. That it was played skillfully goes without saying, but it was just a bit commonplace and perfunctory. To be sure, it was not one of the pieces de resistance of the concert, but it is such a remarkably constructed composition that in spite of its being hackneyed it deserves always thoughtful handling.

The Tschaikowsky number was in the manner of a preparation for the symphony. The Russian composer is a debtor in many respects to Berlioz, but in no particular more than in the matter of orchestration. This was quite apparent last night because of the juxtaposition of the two works. The "Romeo and Juliet Overture" is somewhat in the style of the 1812 Overture, and in it the composer shows his great powers as a descriptive writer.

The position of the symphony at the end of the programme was, as it always is, felt to be a hardship. In the programme as it stood last night it would have been hard to effect a different arrangement, but the scheme should certainly be sparingly employed.

The audience shows a tendency to grow, thereby indicating the general appreciation that is felt of the effort on the part of the management to provide artists of the highest class.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 19, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mme. Teresa Carreno Scores a Great Success in MacDowell's D Minor Concerto.

The programme of the nineteenth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall, included the D minor suite No. 1, by Tschaikowski; piano concerto No. 2, MacDowell, and the symphonic poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24, by Richard Strauss.

Tschaikowski's suite, performed for the first time at these concerts, is a very enjoyable work, and is in the composer's best vein. It was admirably played and loudly applauded. Mme. Teresa Carreno is a great favorite with the patrons of these concerts, and her performance of the MacDowell concerto was among the best that she has ever given in Boston. The work continues to wear well, and is one that will always command respect not only among pianists but with the musical public. Mme. Carreno fully maintained her reputation, and she received over half a dozen recalls, a tribute accorded to but few who appear as soloists at these concerts. Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration" completed the programme. The performance was most brilliant. There will be no rehearsal and concert this coming week.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 13, 1899

NEW MUSIC HALL PLANS

They Arrived in This City Sunday

And Are Exhibited in the Tremont Building

General Style of Building Is to Be Classic

It Is Longer, Narrower and Lower Than Old Hall

Plans for the New Music Hall, to be located at the corner of Massachusetts and Huntington avenues, arrived in this city Sunday morning from the New York office of the architects, McKim, Mead & White, and at present they may be seen in room 314 of the Tremont Building. The building committee of the New Music Hall corporation is to consider these plans before their acceptance, and it is possible that a number of alterations will be suggested; therefore as they are drawn at present they are not deemed to be final plans, but rather preliminary. There are eight plans in all; one is colored and represents the exterior of the building, while the others show longitudinal and transverse sections, the elevations on Massachusetts and Huntington avenues, and plans of the basement, the floor and the first and second balconies. It is understood that the material to be used will be brick, probably red, and stone. The main entrance, on Huntington avenue, has an Ionic portico, with eight stone pillars; the main hall, or what better might be called the hall proper, rises higher than the rest of the building, with a pediment at the top; what seems to be a harp is the crowning glory of the roof front. At either corner of the front section is a pavilion which runs into a wing extending the length of the building; overlooking these wings in the main hall are clere-windows. On the Massachusetts side is a vestibule which if followed up makes a straight line through and across the hall interior; protecting this vestibule is a marquise, on the lines of that at the Thirty-fourth-street entrance to the Astoria in New York. The building will completely fill the lot purchased for it, and consequently will have a frontage of 150 feet on Huntington avenue and will extend 210 feet on Massachusetts avenue. It is notable that the plan measurements give no figure for the height of the building, but it would seem to be between seventy-six and eighty feet.

No estimate of the cost of the building, of the material to be used, or of the quality or degree of interior embellishment, has been made by the architects. They took into consideration solely general arrangements, such as seating capacity, offices, and incidentally acoustic properties. No one concert hall, either at home or abroad, has been taken as a model or as a basis for these plans; they stand as the results of original ideas, intended to meet the rather peculiar requirements of the builders. It is true that some conception of the ultimate exterior appearance can be had from the colored plan; at the front, on either side of the portico, stands a niched statue, while on the Massachusetts-avenue side a similar statue stands at each corner. Over the portico is a space reserved for appropriate inscription, while a smaller space is left, in the form of a square, at either end, about on a line with the larger space. As to the interior, the present plan allows for several statues along the walls; the windows, now drawn as full windows, may be cut down, giving an upper curved half only. The distinguishing features of the new building are that it is longer, narrower and lower than the old Music Hall.

While naturally there will be much vacant space in the basement, allowance has been made for a baggage-room, 54x29 feet; a carpenter shop, 17x20 feet; a kitchen, 17x27 feet; a serving room, 10x18 feet; a large boiler room with two boilers on one side and one boiler on the other; space for smoke and for foul-air exhaust, coal storage and heating and ventilating machinery. It has not been decided whether an electric-light plant will be established in the building, but the architects have kept such a possibility in view. The floor plan shows a main vestibule, 28x76 feet, from which entrance by two doors is made into a lobby seven feet wide at the front and fourteen feet wide on either side of the auditorium, which, by the way, is walled off from these lobbies. To the right of the vestibule come in succession a cloak and coat room, ladies' toilet, ladies' reception room, 16x24, a side vestibule opening on Massachusetts avenue, 17x37 feet; a ticket office, and offices for Mr. Mudgett, a bookkeeper, Mr. Comee and Mr. Ellis. To the left on entering are a coat room, gentlemen's toilet room, a boiler room, 18x72 feet, and a serving room. The stage, which is 60x32 feet, has at the right an artists' room and a dressing room, and at the left a tuning room, 33x37 feet.

The first balcony will also have a continuous lobby seven feet wide at the front and eight feet wide on the sides, with two large oblong lobbies, 14 by 20 feet, at the immediate right and left of the entrance. The libraries of the Symphony Orchestra and of the Handel and Haydn Society are to be on the right. Two artists' rooms are at the stage right, while corresponding to the tuning-room below is a large chorus room. The second balcony will have a foyer 75 by 28 feet, with two oblong lobbies at right and left of entrance, while the side lobbies will correspond in width with those on the first balcony floor.

The [illegible] capacity of the new Music Hall will be 2630, against 2397 in the old hall. The floor capacity will be 1511, that of the first balcony 608 and that of the second balcony 511, against 1251, 680 and 466 for the old hall. This is a net gain of 233 seats, while the space available for standing room will be on each side of the auditorium thirty feet more than that in the old hall. All seats are to be larger and presumably more comfortable than those which have been in the old hall since it was built. There will be only two rows of seats in the first balcony, whereas there are three in the old hall. The new hall has an interior length of about 140 feet and a width of 75 feet, while the old hall is 97.6 feet long and 77.6 feet wide. The main ticket office will be on the Massachusetts-avenue side, and that at the main entrance will be used only prior to and during performances. The long standing complaint of draughts in the old hall will have no ground to stand on in the new hall, for it is proposed to close the two inner doors leading directly to the auditorium, and to send people round to the right and left to doors large enough to make congestion impossible. The two doors in question open directly on the two aisles, there being no centre or main aisle. It is estimated that, if necessary, the entire audience, assuming that the floor is filled, can be turned into the broad lobbies which encircle the auditorium.

In the old hall two sections of seats in the first balcony overlook the stage; in the new hall not a seat throughout will be over the stage. There should be an abundance of coatrooms, since there are to be two on the first floor and two more on the second floor. The balcony will have four entrances. The corridors on the floor conform to the pitch of the floor itself, and there are no steps. In the summer when the chairs and other appurtenances are removed the floor can be made level. Taken all in all, it can be seen that the plans include many improvements over the old hall's arrangement, and promise to yield a structure which will be desirable and satisfactory both as a whole and in detail.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, MARCH 19, 1899.

Mme Carreno at the Symphony.

Mme Teresa Carreno was the soloist at last week's symphony concerts, the program of which comprised Tchaikovsky's suite No. 1, Edward MacDowell's concerto No. 2 for piano and the Strauss tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration." The Tchaikovsky suite was played for the first time at these concerts, the fourth movement being omitted, as it is not included in the orchestral parts although published in the score. The first movement shows the composer's skill in contrasting and subsequently blending tonal coloring, the dignity and melancholy suggestiveness of the first half of this part giving way to a peculiar figure, lively in nature and sharply modulated. The many phrases given to the bassoons, clarinets and horns are masterly hits in the invention of figures for these instruments. The orchestra brought out the varying shade and light with skill and sympathy, each contingent preserving a beautiful and harmonious balance of tonality. The second part shows the composer in one of his lighter moods, and brilliancy of a scherzo is here shown in the highest form. His infinite variety of combinations is displayed in many ways and despite the somewhat unique treatment of the themes, there is no loss of dignity in the musical subjects, their character retaining dignity and melodic beauty.

The third movement is romantic and oriental in character, the fifth is a scherzo developed from two themes, and the last movement, marked gavotte, resembles in the main the scherzo of the fifth. It will be seen that Tchaikovsky exhibits but little of his subsequent passion and barbaric boldness in this suite, and that the characteristics shown in his fifth and sixth symphonies are but faintly suggested in this earlier work. One might call it "Tschaikovsky in repose" when contrasted with his more dramatic compositions. The orchestra was in excellent form, and the delicate and tripping measures of the four movements were given with a grace and daintiness thoroughly enjoyable. A feature of the work was the harmony showed by the contrasting instruments when playing unison, the tones being exactly to pitch.

Mme Carreno renewed her triumphs of other years by her splendid interpretation of the MacDowell concerto, a composition that is far superior to many similar works of European composers of today. The orchestral part is rich in color, the presto and allegro movements being virile, brilliant and very effective in treatment. The charm this pianist exerts upon her auditors is undeniable, her frank and gracious personality seeming to "capture her audience" at the outset. As an artist she is at the hight of her powers, and is today one of a small group of really great pianists. The MacDowell concerto was played with an ease, vigor and brilliancy remarkable even in this era of wonderful artists, and the beauty of every movement was fully illustrated by her nimble fingers. Technique of the highest form is hers, and there is seemingly no difficulty of a piano score which she cannot easily surmount. Her marked skill in elevating the importance of the left hand work was clearly shown in the first movement. The whole work was interpreted with a sympathetic touch, rythmic perfection and a virtuosity seldom equalled. The audience was tumultuous in its demonstrations of appreciation, and called and recalled the great artist times innumerable to the platform. It was evident that most of the attendants came to hear and see Carreno, for many retired from the hall after her performance, not waiting to hear the admirable work of the orchestra in the gloomy "Death and Transfiguration" selection.

The 20th rehearsal and concert will take place March 31 and April 1. The program will comprise a Mozart symphony, "Good Friday Spell," from Wagner's "Parsifal" and Dvorak's second symphony.

The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
…DAY MORNING, MARCH 20, 1899.

Tschaikowsky, MacDowell and Strauss in Symphony Concert.

Tschaikowsky's first suite, MacDowell's second piano concerto, and Richard Strauss' tone-problem "Death and Transfiguration," formed the programme of Saturday night's concert. By an odd error an announcement (intended for the New York programmes) appeared in the programme-books stating that the concert would begin with Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, while it really commenced with a rather dull fugue. We wonder how many auditors found a tone-picture of the love-making of Dushianta and Sakuntala in the subject and answer of this contrapuntal work and the final reunion of the happy pair in the stretto! One is very apt to dilate with the wrong emotion under such circumstances.

Tschaikowsky's Suite seemed to have very little to say, but said it in a very genteel manner; it was almost impossible to recognize the composer of the "Pathetic Symphony" in the kid-gloved music of this Suite. Its uninspiring counterpoint was followed by a great deal of tonal sugar, as if the composer were carrying out the words of the Queen in "Hamlet"—"Sweets to the Suite." The Tartar, who appears when a Russian is scratched, made his appearance in the Oriental character of the third movement, but even here the dissonances were gentle and amiable.

The fourth movement, a tricksy little bit of musical humor, was not played, so that the public Cerberus was obliged to do without his sop. The pretty orchestral touches, a la Berlioz, which came in the Scherzo, were received with much favor, and the final Gavotte, a highly developed affair, with strongly-marked rhythm, was also applauded to the echo.

We could not, in this case, agree with the popular verdict; if Tschaikowsky had never written anything better than this, we would be obliged to rank him below Delibes, and in the same school.

MacDowell's Concerto, in D minor, seemed especially strong after this flimsy work, but it is also a fine work in its own right, without any adventitious aid. It was most brilliantly performed by Mme. Teresa Carreno, who has always taken a great interest in the evolution of this brilliant composer. The concerto is of the modern free school, yet by no means abandons form, only the usual succession of movements is changed.

If one may apply the word "virile" to feminine performance it surely would be in place in speaking of Mme. Carreno's piano-playing; yet there was more than mere masculinity to commend; there was a hearty abandon, a caprice and boldness of contrast that suited the concerto especially well. Perhaps the concerto has the fault that comes to every pianist-composer in this field, it places the solo instrument somewhat too much in the foreground, it is not first and foremost an orchestral composition, a "symphony with a thread of piano obbligato."

This may be a failing which leans to Virtue's side, for it enables the soloist to make a direct impression upon the audience; and this impression was certainly made on this occasion, for Mme. Carreno was called and recalled at its close until she walked from greenroom to stage and from stage to greenroom with the regularity and frequency of a soldier on sentry-go.

Now came the leoine Richard Strauss with his musical metaphysics, his large and varied assortment of dissonances, and his splendidly hazardous experiments in orchestration. We must confess that "Death and Transfiguration" made a much greater impression upon us than it did at its first performances; it received a superb interpretation, and familiarity revealed many points of ineffable beauty; but one may still ask—"Cui Bono?" Of what use is this genius which is presenting to us so many musical puzzles? Is the incoherency of the present to be at all compared with the musical logic of the masters? The picture here given is the death of a sufferer and his glorification: it is probramme-music of most definite character. The words on the score begin

> "In a chamber poor and squalid,
> Lighted by a feeble taper,
> Lies the suff'rer on his deathbed."

The music proceeds to illustrate this with minor triads and with sobs and gasps of violins, a latter-day instance of programme-music carried into the hospitals, a distortion of the functions of instrumental music. One would prefer a setting of Busch's poem,—

> "In den Kammer still und donkel
> Schlaeft die Tante bei dem Onkel."

if we needs must have such a new school of "Chamber-music." Harp arpeggios show us the invalid singing to slumber and flute phrases picture him uneasily smiling in dreams. But the picture is not to be of such gentle character; almost immediately there sets in a wild tumult in C minor which soon spreads into all the other keys, adjacent or otherwise. The sufferer is struggling with death; and his spasms are delineated. The kettle-drums are to be struck with sticks with wooden ends, the trombones are to be played with bells directed at the audience, the woodwind has an attack of chromatic cramps, the death knell rings on the gong, and finally the harp and the violins suggest in a pianissimo that the invalid has climbed the golden stair.

It is a work of genius in a wrong school; it attempts to do with instrumental music what should be done by vocal music only; it is giving us the Death of Tristan, (and quite as lingering a death), minus the pantomime, the stage action and the poetry. To indicate that a disappointed life had found its true fulfilment on the "other side," might be a fitting topic for the poet, or for the operatic or oratorio composer; but the instrumental writer had better let it alone, since it goes beyond his powers of suggestion, he must print an entire essay upon his programme if he wants his meaning even partially understood.

And if we call literature to the aid of instrumental music in this manner, why not give further jogs to the imagination?

Why not sprinkle disinfectants in the hall to suggest the atmosphere of the sick-room? Why not go still further in this direction and write a "Medical Symphony"? One could readily outline a list of headings for the movements, as, for example,—1st. Movement, Neurosis and Nervous Prostration; 2nd. (andante molto) Coma; 3rd. movement, St. Vitus Dance, (Scherzando); and 4th, finale, Delirium Tremens. A diagnosis could be printed upon the programme, and there could be "calomel-motives," "quinine-motives" and many other realistic touches.

It is a pity to see so much beauty as exists in this work, (in spasms only, however), going to waste. Liszt has given a [illegible] picture of Life as a Prelude to the Hereafter, (in "Les Preludes"); but he dwelt rather upon coming Glory than [illegible] sick-room, and even then he needed [illegible] usual explanatory poem. Strauss [illegible] him, and has led pro- [illegible] into a labyrinth whence [illegible] future may have some [illegible]

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 78.
SUNDAY, MARCH 19, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Tschaikowsky Suite Given for First Time Here.

Its Music Proves Scarcely Worthy the Composer—Mme. Carreno's Performance of Mr. MacDowell's Brilliant Concerto a Glorious One in Every Way.

The 19th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was given last evening with this programme:

Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 43...Tschaikawsky
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor ....MacDowell
"Death and Transfiguration"........R. Strauss

Mme. Teresa Carreno was the soloist.

Some confusion was created owing to the fact that a slip announcing a change of programme and intended for insertion in the programme book for New York was, by a mistake of the binder, inserted in that of last night, but as there were no fatal results in consequence, there is no excuse to dwell on the subject further.

The Tschaikowsky suite was given for the first time at these concerts. It consists of five movements—an introduction, a fugue, a divertimento, an intermezzo, a scherzo and a gavotte. The music is scarcely worthy the composer. It is for the most part pretty in a conventional way, cheap in melody and trivial in harmonies, which the pretentious and brilliant orchestration is not wholly successful in concealing. Now and then there is an almost vulgar quality in the themes and their treatment.

The fugue is far from a model in that order of composition, and is made with no very marked skill. The divertimento and the intermezzo are bright after a certain comic opera fashion, but are not especially interesting seriously considered. The best movement is the scherzo, which has an original individuality, a solidity and a freshness that are not apparent in the rest of the work.

The gavotte is neither musical fish nor flesh, and the coda attached to it is almost pitiful in its barren commonplaces. The best that can be said of the work as a whole is that it escapes being tiresome, and is ear-tickling. Of its performance there is nothing but admiration to be expressed.

The Strauss tone-poem, which had been heard at these concerts before, gained very much in clearness, interest and coherence on a second hearing. The composer's train of thought was easier to follow, the dignity and beauty of the themes became more apparent, and though the noisiness was still disturbing, a closer understanding of the poem that inspired the composer caused these tremendous masses of tone to take on a dramatic meaning and a logical sequence that were not apparent in them previously. And yet it is not music toward which admiration goes out spontaneously or without alloy; but perhaps it is insidious music that, like the old poet's description of sin as a creature of such hideous mien that, to be hated, needs but to be seen; but which, if not avoided, is at first tolerated and at last embraced.

It is hard to trust oneself with music of this school. One never knows what may happen if one becomes used to it. Familiarity accustoms one to its repulsiveness, and, instead of breeding contempt, incites toleration, and then there are twinges of conscience, a vain kicking against the pricks and remorse for the momentary departure from the true faith. And in these latter days there is considerable shaking up of this same true faith. The only reliance is that the beautiful in art must eventually triumph over the ugly.

The strength and the lucidity of Mr. Gericke's reading of the work and the splendor of the orchestral performance of it were potent in giving a powerful interest, if not attractiveness, to it.

Mme. Carreno's performance of Mr. MacDowell's brilliant concerto was glorious in every way. Of the large scope of her technique, the fine artistic intelligence with which she probes to the very heart of the music she interprets, the certainty of the musical touch, the dignity and animation of her style and the warmth and sincerity of feeling she brings to bear on her work, it is not necessary to speak at this late date. The storm of applause that rewarded her was tremendous and did not cease until she had responded to some half-dozen or more enthusiastic recalls.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Symphony, Mozart; "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," Wagner, and Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Dvorak.

At the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, Mme. Teresa Carreno, who was the soloist, looked charming in a lovely gown of pale pearl gray satin, the skirt showing green satin under white chiffon at the side. The bodice was covered with net embroidered in gold spangles. The hall was packed to the doors, and appreciation for Mme. Carreno's superb work was very hearty. There will be no rehearsal this week.

BOSTON JOURNAL.
SUNDAY, MARCH 19, 1899.

Teresa Carreno Played MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto at the 19th Symphony Concert—Mr. Rosenthal Gave His Farewell Recital.

The program of the 19th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 43........ Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, op. 23........................MacDowell
Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24...................Richard Strauss

It is a pity that on account of a singular omission in the orchestral parts, the fourth movement of the suite by Tschaiwowsky could not be played last night. The movement is a Marche miniature, a joke, and unlike too many deliberate attempts at musical jesting, this joke is an excellent one. I remember that when the suite was first played in Berlin—in '83 or '84 by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Franz Wüllner and at the concert when d'Albert made his first appearance there and played everything at hurricane speed—this little march met with instantaneous success and it was encored, a rare event at those formal concerts.

The suite itself is for the most part agreeable music, with a pretty steady tendency toward the commonplace. Here and there you hear the voice of Tschaikowsky, but the voice is conventional, and in the prelude and fugue you hear it as in a lecture near a blackboard. There is also a reminder of Russian folk song, but this song is not treated in such masterly and effective manner as it is in other works by him—for instance, his fourth symphony. There is pretty music; there is melody of a too well defined character; the audience was pleased, and, although in the fifth movement the performance was not up to the highest standard of the orchestra, the solo work and the merit of the performance as a whole deserved the public recognition.

⁂

Teresa Carreno gave a dazzling performance of MacDowell's brilliant concerto. The crispness of her running passages, the purity of her trill, her stormy octaves, her dash, swing and full-blooded individuality found ample opportunity for display. As long as there is a rule that no encores should be allowed, it is well to observe this rule; but I often think, especially when a pianist like this remarkable woman is on the stage, that the foreign idea of a program is not a bad one: the violinist or pianist plays a concerto with orchestra, and later in the evening a group of two or three short pieces. Of course, there are pianists and singers—alas, they have found their way of late years into the Boston Symphony concerts!—to whom this privilege would be as deadly boredom to the audience. Carreno was applauded most enthusiastically.

⁂

Strauss's tone poem, full as it is of harmonic and orchestral originality and daring, did not kill MacDowell's concerto, for the latter has his own voice, strong, lusty, tender, authoritative.

Richard Strauss has been censured by some, ridiculed by others for writing a symphonic poem to the long text printed on the fly-leaf of the orchestral score. Some have asked derisively, "How can you represent in music a sick man on his bed in a room lighted dimly by only a candle-end?"

As a matter of fact this poem was written after Strauss had composed the music. The poem was written by Alexander Ritter, a musician much older than Strauss, and a close friend of Wagner.

To me this is Strauss's most satisfactory work, one that must be ranked above his "Don Juan," but I have not heard his "Don Quixote" or his new symphony. Never mind the sick man and the candle-end, the title is hint enough. You may ticket the different motivs—Impression of Death, Hope, Childhood, Life's struggle, Youth, Conflict; or you may number them 1, 2, 3, etc., this will not make the music more impressive, it will not detract from it one whit. The music speaks for itself to any man or woman of imagination, to anyone that has suffered keenly from the loss of a loved one. I believe at least one critic in New York discovered that this symphonic-poem is immoral. But they discover all sorts of queer things in New York. Thus Mr. Krehbiel was shocked beyond measure at the naughty conduct of Manon Lescaut and even discovered some strange Byzantine vice in the drama of Maeterlinck which inspired Mr. Loeffler's well known music. No, this music is lofty and noble; if the word had not been made ridiculous by gushers and burlesque-writers, I should say this music is eminently soulful. There is only one greater thought than that of Death; that thought is of the Life to which Death is as new birth; and this music of Richard Strauss does not end in a pessimistic wail; it glorifies the final struggle of a poor mortal escaping from his prison; it is a consolation and a prophecy.

Philip Hale.

Miss Rose Stewart awakened genuine enthusiasm from audience and orchestra at the Boston Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre last Thursday evening. She sang Rossini's "Una Voce" and songs by Delibes and Dell' Acqua.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C. FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
For Publishers' Announcements, see Page 24.
New York, March 18, 1899.

MUSICAL BOSTON.

BOSTON, March 11, 1899.

The programme for the eighteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra embraced Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," and "Faust" symphony by Liszt. Mrs. Margaret Boye-Jensen was the soloist, and sang an aria from Händel's "Parthenope" and Dalila's air from St. Saëns' Samson and Dalila."

The male chorus of the Cecilia and Mr. Herbert Johnson, tenor, assisted in the choral part of the "Faust" symphony.

A most striking performance was the playing of the Goldmark overture. It was given with a spirit and a brilliancy that were electrifying.

As regards the "Faust" symphony, I cannot express the emptiness, dreariness, bombast and unmeaning character of this composition in a multiplicity of words so completely as has Philip Hale in his epigrammatic summary of this work in the Boston "Journal," to wit: "The symphony is a masterpiece of hollow pretension; it is a miracle of dullness."

What need to say that the difficulties of this work were easily and brilliantly overcome by the orchestra.

In the reading of the composition it was worked out upon the loom of coarseness that now characterizes most of Gericke's interpretations."

How so usually discriminating a critic as Mr. Ben Woolf, of the Boston "Herald," can pronounce the readings of this work by Gericke an effort of "masterful skill" I cannot understand, unless the monotone of loud, meaningless sound produced upon him a soporific influence that induced "nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep." Sometimes the jaded critic, like the lonely picket guard in the presence of the enemy, must succumb to nature's demands and fall into the arms of Morpheus at duty's post. A monotone of silence or sound might either be the medium inducing the welcome, if unguarded, relief of somnolency, and thus put the refreshed slumberer in a generous mood upon waking. It might also, as well, prove the loss of an empire or the making of a conductor's reputation.

To enumerate the many points in the "Faust" piece where the indications of the composer were ignored would occupy more space than these columns can accord this review.

However, the wind constantly overtopped the strings. Sempre piano was tooted at the dog trot of overloud playing, to the extinction of muted strings that had the prominent figure of the passage.

At the end of the Gretchen movement, where the tone should have been wafted away to a mere breath, double pianissimo, it was sustained with as little attempt to gain the desired expression as if it were the finale measures of a popular tune.

What has come over Gericke, that he no longer presents his former refined manner when he imparted repose in his readings, and in his interpretations dispensed the gamut of dynamic contrasts in its most minutely graded compass?

Compared to the artistic height to which he carried his efforts in former days as conductor of the Boston orchestra, he is now little less than a martinet in the exactitude of time-beating.

Mrs. Boye-Jensen has naturally a good voice, but she "hooted" her top notes in her pharynx and blew her low ones with the vibrating intensity of a human fog-horn." Her middle tones were consequently weak. Her effort was evidently that of one familiar with the stage. Such a performance is out of place in these concerts.

To the discredit of the audience, whether from courtesy to a guest, or because of its lack of discrimination, the singer was applauded sufficiently after her effort to cause her to return three times to acknowledge the recognition.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MARCH 20, 1899.

Tschaikowsky, MacDowell and Strauss in Symphony Concert.

Tschaikowsky's first suite, MacDowell's second piano concerto, and Richard Strauss' tone-problem "Death and Transfiguration," formed the programme of Saturday night's concert. By an odd error an announcement (intended for the New York programmes) appeared in the programme-books stating that the concert would begin with Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, while it really commenced with a rather dull fugue. We wonder how many auditors found a tone-picture of the love-making of Dushianta and Sakuntala in the subject and answer of this contrapuntal work and the final reunion of the happy pair in the stretto! One is very apt to dilate with the wrong emotion under such circumstances.

Tschaikowsky's Suite seemed to have very little to say, but said it in a very genteel manner; it was almost impossible to recognize the composer of the "Pathetic Symphony" in the kid-gloved music of this Suite. Its uninspiring counterpoint was followed by a great deal of tonal sugar, as if the composer were carrying out the words of the Queen in "Hamlet"—"Sweets to the Suite." The Tartar, who appears when a Russian is scratched, made his appearance in the Oriental character of the third movement, but even here the dissonances were gentle and amiable.

The fourth movement, a tricksy little bit of musical humor, was not played, so that the public Cerberus was obliged to do without his sop. The pretty orchestral touches, a la Berlioz, which came in the Scherzo, were received with much favor, and the final Gavotte, a highly developed affair, with strongly-marked rhythm, was also applauded to the echo.

We could not, in this case, agree with the popular verdict; if Tschaikowsky had never written anything better than this, we would be obliged to rank him below Delibes, and in the same school.

MacDowell's Concerto, in D minor, seemed especially strong after this flimsy work, but it is also a fine work in its own right, without any adventitious aid. It was most brilliantly performed by Mme. Teresa Carreno, who has always taken a great interest in the evolution of this brilliant composer. The concerto is of the modern free school, yet by no means abandons form, only the usual succession of movements is changed.

If one may apply the word "virile" to feminine performance it surely would be in place in speaking of Mme. Carreno's piano-playing; yet there was more than mere masculinity to commend; there was a hearty abandon, a caprice and boldness of contrast that suited the concerto especially well. Perhaps the concerto has the fault that comes to every pianist-composer in this field, it places the solo instrument somewhat too much in the foreground, it is not first and foremost an orchestral composition, a "symphony with a thread of piano obbligato."

This may be a failing which leans to Virtue's side, for it enables the soloist to make a direct impression upon the audience; and this impression was certainly made on this occasion, for Mme. Carreno was called and recalled at its close until she walked from greenroom to stage and from stage to greenroom with the regularity and frequency of a soldier on sentry-go.

Now came the leoine Richard Strauss with his musical metaphysics, his large and varied assortment of dissonances, and his splendidly hazardous experiments in orchestration. We must confess that "Death and Transfiguration" made a much greater impression upon us than it did at its first performances; it received a superb interpretation, and familiarity revealed many points of ineffable beauty; but one may still ask—"Cui Bono?" Of what use is this genius which is presenting to us so many musical puzzles? Is the incoherency of the present to be at all compared with the musical logic of the masters? The picture here given is the death of a sufferer and his glorification; it is probramme-music of most definite character. The words on the score begin

> "In a chamber poor and squalid,
> Lighted by a feeble taper,
> Lies the suff'rer on his deathbed."

The music proceeds to illustrate this with minor triads and with sobs and gasps of violins, a latter-day instance of programme-music carried into the hospitals, a distortion of the functions of instrumental music. One would prefer a setting of Busch's poem,— if we needs must have such a new school of "Chamber-music." Harp arpeggios show us the invalid singing to slumber and flute phrases picture him uneasily smiling in dreams. But the picture is not to be of such gentle character; almost immediately there sets in a wild tumult in C minor which soon spreads into all the other keys, adjacent or otherwise. The sufferer is struggling with death; and his spasms are delineated. The kettle-drums are to be struck with sticks with wooden ends, the trombones are to be played with bells directed at the audience, the woodwind has an attack of chromatic cramps, the death knell rings on the gong, and finally the harp and the violins suggest in a pianissimo that the invalid has climbed the golden stair.

> "In den Kammer still und donkel
> Schlaeft die Tante bei dem Onkel."

It is a work of genius in a wrong school; it attempts to do with instrumental music what should be done by vocal music only; it is giving us the Death of Tristan, (and quite as lingering a death), minus the pantomime, the stage action and the poetry. To indicate that a disappointed life had found its true fulfilment on the "other side," might be a fitting topic for the poet, or for the operatic or oratorio composer; but the instrumental writer had better let it alone, since it goes beyond his powers of suggestion, he must print an entire essay upon his programme if he wants his meaning even partially understood.

And if we call literature to the aid of instrumental music in this manner, why not give further jogs to the imagination?

Why not sprinkle disinfectants in the hall to suggest the atmosphere of the sick-room? Why not go still further in this direction and write a "Medical Symphony"? One could readily outline a list of headings for the movements, as, for example,—1st. Movement, Neurosis and Nervous Prostration; 2nd. (andante molto) Coma; 3rd. movement, St. Vitus Dance, (Scherzando); and 4th, finale, Delirium Tremens. A diagnosis could be printed upon the programme, and there could be "calomel-motives," "quinine-motives" and many other realistic touches.

It is a pity to see so much beauty as exists in this work, (in spasms only, however), going to waste. Liszt has given a similar picture of Life as a Prelude to the Hereafter, (in "Les Preludes"); but he has dwelt rather upon coming Glory than upon the sick-room, and even then he needed the usual explanatory poem. Strauss has out-Liszted him, and has led programme-music into a labyrinth whence the composer of the future may have some [illegible] in rescuing it. Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 78.
SUNDAY, MARCH 19, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Tschaikowsky Suite Given for First Time Here.

Its Music Proves Scarcely Worthy the Composer—Mme. Carreno's Performance of Mr. MacDowell's Brilliant Concerto a Glorious One in Every Way.

The 19th concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was given last evening with this programme:

Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 43...Tschaikawsky
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor ....MacDowell
"Death and Transfiguration"........R. Strauss

Mme. Teresa Carreno was the soloist.

Some confusion was created owing to the fact that a slip announcing a change of programme and intended for insertion in the programme book for New York was, by a mistake of the binder, inserted in that of last night, but as there were no fatal results in consequence, there is no excuse to dwell on the subject further.

The Tschaikowsky suite was given for the first time at these concerts. It consists of five movements—an introduction, a fugue, a divertimento, an intermezzo, a scherzo and a gavotte. The music is scarcely worthy the composer. It is for the most part pretty in a conventional way, cheap in melody and trivial in harmonies, which the pretentious and brilliant orchestration is not wholly successful in concealing. Now and then there is an almost vulgar quality in the themes and their treatment.

The fugue is far from a model in that order of composition, and is made with no very marked skill. The divertimento and the intermezzo are bright after a certain comic opera fashion, but are not especially interesting seriously considered. The best movement is the scherzo, which has an original individuality, a solidity and a freshness that are not apparent in the rest of the work.

The gavotte is neither musical fish nor flesh, and the coda attached to it is almost pitiful in its barren commonplaces. The best that can be said of the work as a whole is that it escapes being tiresome, and is ear-tickling. Of its performance there is nothing but admiration to be expressed.

The Strauss tone-poem, which had been heard at these concerts before, gained very much in clearness, interest and coherence on a second hearing. The composer's train of thought was easier to follow, the dignity and beauty of the themes became more apparent, and though the noisiness was still disturbing, a closer understanding of the poem that inspired the composer caused these tremendous masses of tone to take on a dramatic meaning and a logical sequence that were not apparent in them previously. And yet it is not music toward which admiration goes out spontaneously or without alloy; but perhaps it is insidious music that, like the old poet's description of sin as a creature of such hideous mien that, to be hated, needs but to be seen; but which, if not avoided, is at first tolerated and at last embraced.

It is hard to trust oneself with music of this school. One never knows what may happen if one becomes used to it. Familiarity accustoms one to its repulsiveness, and, instead of breeding contempt, incites toleration, and then there are twinges of conscience, a vain kicking against the pricks and remorse for the momentary departure from the true faith. And in these latter days there is considerable shaking up of this same true faith. The only reliance is that the beautiful in art must eventually triumph over the ugly.

The strength and the lucidity of Mr. Gericke's reading of the work and the splendor of the orchestral performance of it were potent in giving a powerful interest, if not attractiveness, to it.

Mme. Carreno's performance of Mr. MacDowell's brilliant concerto was glorious in every way. Of the large scope of her technique, the fine artistic intelligence with which she probes to the very heart of the music she interprets, the certainty of the musical touch, the dignity and animation of her style and the warmth and sincerity of feeling she brings to bear on her work, it is not necessary to speak at this late date.

The storm of applause that rewarded her was tremendous and did not cease until she had responded to some half-dozen or more enthusiastic recalls.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Symphony, Mozart; "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," Wagner, and Symphony No. 2 in D minor, Dvorak.

At the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, Mme. Teresa Carreno, who was the soloist, looked charming in a lovely gown of pale pearl gray satin, the skirt showing green satin under white chiffon at the side. The bodice was covered with net embroidered in gold spangles. The hall was packed to the doors, and appreciation for Mme. Carreno's superb work was very hearty. There will be no rehearsal this week.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, MARCH 19, 1899.

Teresa Carreno Played MacDowell's Second Piano Concerto at the 19th Symphony Concert—Mr. Rosenthal Gave His Farewell Recital.

The program of the 19th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Music Hall last evening, was as follows:

Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 43.......... Tschaikowsky
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, op. 23........................MacDowell
Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24..................Richard Strauss

It is a pity that on account of a singular omission in the orchestral parts, the fourth movement of the suite by Tschaiwowsky could not be played last night. The movement is a Marche miniature, a joke, and unlike too many deliberate attempts at musical jesting, this joke is an excellent one. I remember that when the suite was first played in Berlin—in '83 or '84 by the Philharmonic Orchestra under Franz Wüllner and at the concert when d'Albert made his first appearance there and played everything at hurricane speed—this little march met with instantaneous success and it was encored, a rare event at those formal concerts.

The suite itself is for the most part agreeable music, with a pretty steady tendency toward the commonplace. Here and there you hear the voice of Tschaikowsky, but the voice is conventional, and in the prelude and fugue you hear it as in a lecture near a blackboard. There is also a reminder of Russian folk song, but this song is not treated in such masterly and effective manner as it is in other works by him—for instance, his fourth symphony. There is pretty music; there is melody of a too well defined character; the audience was pleased, and, although in the fifth movement the performance was not up to the highest standard of the orchestra, the solo work and the merit of the performance as a whole deserved the public recognition.

⁂

Teresa Carreno gave a dazzling performance of MacDowell's brilliant concerto. The crispness of her running passages, the purity of her trill, her stormy octaves, her dash, swing and full-blooded individuality found ample opportunity for display. As long as there is a rule that no encores should be allowed, it is well to observe this rule; but I often think, especially when a pianist like this remarkable woman is on the stage, that the foreign idea of a program is not a bad one: the violinist or pianist plays a concerto with orchestra, and later in the evening a group of two or three short pieces. Of course, there are pianists and singers—alas, they have found their way of late years into the Boston Symphony concerts!—to whom this privilege would be as deadly boredom to the audience. Carreno was applauded most enthusiastically.

⁂

Strauss's tone poem, full as it is of harmonic and orchestral originality and daring, did not kill MacDowell's concerto, for the latter has his own voice, strong, lusty, tender, authoritative.

Richard Strauss has been censured by some, ridiculed by others for writing a symphonic poem to the long text printed on the fly-leaf of the orchestral score. Some have asked derisively, "How can you represent in music a sick man on his bed in a room lighted dimly by only a candle-end?"

As a matter of fact this poem was written after Strauss had composed the music. The poem was written by Alexander Ritter, a musician much older than Strauss, and a close friend of Wagner.

To me this is Strauss's most satisfactory work, one that must be ranked above his "Don Juan," but I have not heard his "Don Quixote" or his new symphony. Never mind the sick man and the candle-end, the title is hint enough. You may ticket the different motivs—Impression of Death, Hope, Childhood, Life's struggle, Youth, Conflict; or you may number them 1, 2, 3, etc., this will not make the music more impressive, it will not detract from it one whit. The music speaks for itself to any man or woman of imagination, to anyone that has suffered keenly from the loss of a loved one. I believe at least one critic in New York discovered that this symphonic-poem is immoral. But they discover all sorts of queer things in New York. Thus Mr. Krehbiel was shocked beyond measure at the naughty conduct of Manon Lescaut and even discovered some strange Byzantine vice in the drama of Maeterlinck which inspired Mr. Loeffler's well known music. No, this music is lofty and noble; if the word had not been made ridiculous by gushers and burlesque-writers, I should say this music is eminently soulful. There is only one greater thought than that of Death; that thought is of the Life to which Death is as new birth; and this music of Richard Strauss does not end in a pessimistic wail; it glorifies the final struggle of a poor mortal escaping from his prison; it is a consolation and a prophecy.

Philip Hale.

Miss Rose Stewart awakened genuine enthusiasm from audience and orchestra at the Boston Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre last Thursday evening. She sang Rossini's "Una Voce" and songs by Delibes and Dell' Acqua.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
For Publishers' Announcements, see Page 24.

New York, March 18. 1899.

MUSICAL BOSTON.

BOSTON, March [illegible] 1899.

The programme for the eighteenth concert of [illegible] Boston Symphony Orchestra embraced Goldmark's [illegible] to "Sakuntala," and "Faust" symphony by Liszt. Mrs. Margaret Boye-Jensen was the soloist, and sang [illegible] from Händel's "Parthenope" and Dalila's air from [illegible] Saëns' Samson and Dalila."

The male chorus of the Cecilia and Mr. Herbert [illegible] son, tenor, assisted in the choral part of the "Faust" symphony.

A most striking performance was the playing of the Goldmark overture. It was given with a spirit and a brilliancy that were electrifying.

As regards the "Faust" symphony, I cannot express the emptiness, dreariness, bombast and unmeaning [illegible] of this composition in a multiplicity of words [illegible] pletely as has Philip Hale in his epigrammatic [illegible] this work in the Boston "Journal," to wit: "The [illegible] is a masterpiece of hollow pretension; it is a [illegible] dullness."

What need to say [illegible] the difficulties of this work [illegible] easily and brilliantly [illegible] ercome by the orchestra.

In the reading of the composition it was wo[illegible] upon the loom of coarseness that now characterize[illegible] of Gericke's interpretations."

How so usually discriminating a critic as Mr. Ben Woo[illegible] of the Boston "Herald," can pronounce the readings of [illegible] work by Gericke an effort of "masterful skill" I cannot [illegible] derstand, unless the monotone of loud, meaningless [illegible] produced upon him a soporific influence that induced "nature's sweet restorer, balmy sleep." Sometimes the jaded critic, like the lonely picket guard in the presence of the enemy, must succumb to nature's demands and [illegible] the arms of Morpheus at duty's post. A [illegible] silence or sound might either be the mo[illegible] welcome, if unguarded, relief of somnolency and thus put the refreshed slumberer in a generous mood upon wa[illegible] It might also, as well, prove the loss of an empire [illegible] making of a conductor's reputation.

To enumerate the many points in the "Faust" pa[illegible] where the indications of the composer were ignored would occupy more space than these columns can accord this review.

However, the wind constantly overtopped the strings. Sempre piano was tooted at the dog trot of overloud playing, to the extinction of muted strings that had the prominent figure of the passage.

At the end of the Gretchen movement, where the tone should have been wafted away to a mere breath, double pianissimo, it was sustained with as little attempt to gain the desired expression as if it were the final measures of a popular tune.

What has come over Gericke, that he no longer presents his former refined manner when he imparted repose in his readings, and in his interpretations dispensed the gamut of dynamic contrasts in its most minutely graded compass?

Compared to the artistic height to which he carried his efforts in former days as conductor of the Boston orchestra, he is now little less than a martinet in the exactitude [illegible] time-beating.

Mrs. Boye-Jensen has naturally a good voice, but she "hooted" her top [illegible] in her pharynx and blew her low ones with the vibrating intensity of a human fog-horn. Her middle tones were consequently weak. Her effort was evidently that of one familiar with the stage. Such a performance is out of place in these concerts.

To the discredit of the audience, whether from courtesy to a guest, or because of its lack of discrimination, the singer was applauded sufficiently after her effort to cause her to return three times to acknowledge the recognition

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 19, 1899.

The reappearance of Mme. Teresa Carreno after a considerable absence drew to the nineteenth Symphony concert as many of the irregular patrons as could get tickets, and her performance was followed by warm, prolonged and enthusiastic plaudits and many recalls. She played the second MacDowell concerto, a work eminently suited to her style and to which her art and temperament are most advantageous. She has the technique ade[illegible] for his exigent and sometimes eccentric [illegible] and she has the right disposition for tempering his occasionally excessive vehemence, which in his early writing comes now and then pretty near to turbulence. Indeed, there are in the first movement of this concerto passages which serve no better purpose, so far as we can see, than giving the pianist a chance to show what a tremendous demonstration he can make. Mme. Carreno, who knows how to increase the emotional qualities while gathering material strength, carried his first movement through dignifiedly, gave a flashing brilliance to the gay presto which follows and set out in clear and faithful propation the contrasting moods and themes of the finale.

For the truly musical the chief and most valuable number was the heretofore unheard Tschaikowsky suite—No 1, D minor, opus 43. The first movement begins quaintly—almost dolorously, indeed—continues in plaintive, dreamy strains for a while, changing at last into a firm, strong, definite and well-knit fugue. But the succeeding movements are light, genial, dainty, half sportive at times again full of sparkle and fantasy and only becoming solidly serious as the finale approaches. The suite shows new phases of the composer's genius, and even his oddest and strangest turns of expression are neither grim nor sad, but bring smiles and good cheer. The score calls for no trombones, and so many bass passages are cast to the bassoons, which are delightfully prominent, as also are the oboe and clarinet—and in a less degree the flute—in frequent gracious and winning melodies.

The concert ended with that tremendous noisemaker of Richard Strauss, which he calls "Death and Transfiguration"—although "Niagara from Lake to Lake," "The Descent of the Glacier," or "The Cyclone" would be as good a name. Barring a few really stately and magnificent pages, the thing is a mass of gorgeously colored bathos and rodomontade, and with those exceptions should go to Sousa or the Banda Rossa. The orchestra certainly did wonders in making such an unlimited tone with so little offence. But why waste so much good time and trouble on what is but a musical curiosity after all?

No concert this week. The week after, this programme will be served up: A Mozart symphony, the "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal," and Dvorak's second symphony.

March 20

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, 19th concert. Mme. Teresa Carreno, soloist. The programme:

Suite No. 1 in D minor..........Tschaikowsky
Pianoforte concerto No. 2 in D minor.... Edward MacDowell
"Death and Transfiguration"....Richard Strauss

The inequalities of Tschaikowski were again forcibly brought to mind by the suite in D minor. played here for the first time. Not very often in it do you catch a glimpse of the mighty composer of the "Pathetique" symphony. It is musical and entertaining, and from a lesser man would be hailed as an acquisition to the concert stage, I feel certain. But it has no elements of greatness, and so does not stand the test of comparative criticism. Of the six movements the scherzo was perhaps the most charming, although the dainty gavotte at the end had some characteristic beauty.

The Richard Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" tone-poem still remains for me considerable of a noisy bore, an agonized attempt to torture sound into certain gruesome pictures that it can never adequately represent. There is no denying that as music of the modern and richly ornamented sort it has power and ingenuity in some degree. But it does not thrill very much as yet, nor is its message so entirely clear as to be accepted implicitly. Indeed, it is very doubtful if the school of which Mr. Strauss is the high priest has sufficient stamina behind its noise to last a great while longer. This particular piece was played with immense fire by the orchestra.

The dash, the enthusiasm, the magnetism of Teresa Carreno has in no whit lessened with the processes of time, and her playing of the fine concerto of MacDowell's was everything that was to be expected of her. Her technique, beauty of tone and depth of understanding place her far above any woman pianist who lives today; in some respects she is as satisfying as any of the other sex, for her attractive personality is an element of power and the superb abandon of her playing is very infectious. She was received with great applause by the audience.

MONDAY, MARCH 20, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was:

Tchaikovsky: Suite No. 1, in D minor, opus 43.
(First time at these concerts.)
MacDowell: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, opus 23.
Richard Strauss: Tone-Poem, "Tod und Verklärung, opus 24.

Mme. Teresa Carreno was the pianist.

An "important notice" on yellow paper was pasted into the programme-books, prefacing the above programme with Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; which was, however, not played. Perhaps this paster was intended for Philadelphia or Baltimore; certainly it got into the Boston programme-books by mistake. We wonder, though, how many people took the fugue in Tchaikovsky's suite for the "Sakuntala!" Of the new Tchaikovsky suite only five movements were given; the fourth, "Marche miniature," had perforce to be omitted because, although plainly down in the score, it was, for some reason, omitted in the orchestral parts.

Except for the fugue in the first movement—which is written with both freedom and skill on a subject with a very taking rhythmic hall-mark upon it—we found this suite of Tchaikovsky's deadly dull. After the first movement everything sounded cheap, if not downright vulgar; stay, we must except some trumpet-effects near the close of the third movement, which sounded right well and tellingly.

MacDowell's concerto brought us into a higher and purer atmosphere at once. We have liked this concerto extremely, from the first; last Saturday evening, it seemed even finer than ever before, more stoutly knit together, with more beauty of melodic line, more genuine warmth of feeling. As for brilliancy, it always was as brilliant as need be. Mme. Carreno's playing of it beggared description; it was masterful in every direction, and how enormously vital and pungent! Composer and pianist well deserved the persistent shower of applause that followed—which the pianist alone was present to receive.

We were immensely glad to hear Richard Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung" again, especially as the performance was in every way superb, exhaustive. The work decidedly grows upon one with better acquaintance. One may deplore certain tendencies evinced in it, if one happens to be in the deploring mood; yet it is well to remember that Richard Strauss has from the beginning—that is, from his symphony and his Italian suite—shown signs of being a man whose artistic tendencies it may be rather futile to deplore, a man of original genius who may end by winning criticism over to his side. After this second hearing of the work, we cannot help feeling that "Tod und Verklärung" is far more of an achievement than of a mere attempt; we cannot help feeling that the man has really succeeded in saying in it what he had to say—at least, as nearly succeeded as men of genius generally do in compassing their ideals. Call it crass realism, if you will, and say what you please about the a priori superiority of idealism over realism; your criticism still leaves the work unscathed, for Art is far more a matter of feeling and perception than of conviction. Its realism may be stronger than a weaker work's idealism; and who shall say that this apparently downright realism may not be found, in time, to have its accompanying ideality, when the composer's peculiar idiom shall have been better understood, when the logic of his strength shall have been seen to be not antagonistic to beauty? If there be a composer in the field today concerning whom and whose tendencies it behooves the critic to be cautious in forming a judgment, that composer is surely Richard Strauss. He began as a very ugly duckling indeed; but it is just the ugly duckling, and only the ugly duckling, that has any real chance of growing up into a swan. We already see what seems to us true greatness in this "Tod und Verklärung," not a little that is even beautiful. The enormous technical mastery displayed in it is not merely that of the skilful technician, it is the mastery of the man who has something to say. Let us say again that the performance was simply and completely ideal!

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, March 31, and Saturday evening, April 1 (there will be neither rehearsal nor concert this week)—is: Mozart, symphony; Wagner, "Charfreitags-Zauber," from "Parsifal;" Dvorak, symphony No. 2, in D minor, opus 70.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

For Publishers' Announcements, see Page 24.

New York, March 25, 1899.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the following programme: Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 43, by Tschaikowsky; concerto for piano No. 2, MacDowell; and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Teresa Carreño was the soloist, and gave a performance of the MacDowell concerto that left not one item of desire to be fulfilled upon the part of the most critical listener. It was a superb, consummate performance, bringing forth the most enthusiastic and prolonged applause of the season. What more can be said in praise of this exceptionally gifted artist?

The Tschaikowsky suite, although not in the most exalted vein of the composer, by any means, was nevertheless an interesting and agreeable number, especially as it was played with a better degree of consideration for its dynamic demands than anything Gericke has conducted thus far this season.

In the extraordinary capriciousness of Strauss' tone-poem the orchestra relapsed into the now-established habit of its "rougher renderings," as regards the intended effect of the author, and played regardless of discrimination as concerned the expression of the composer's score.

The obtuseness of Gericke as regards the necessities of the composer's score was in glaring evidence in his reading of this composition.

What an injustice an incompetent or indifferent conductor can do the music of a composer.

Like the actor upon the stage, he can almost turn the inspiration of the author into mediocrity through a commonplace dispensation of the material in hand.

There is not space to dwell upon the items of Gericke's neglect; how he imparted a con brio to Strauss' tranquillo, and failed to achieve the great climax of the work because of the generally loud, coarse manner of his reading.

Alas, that the efforts of such a superb orchestra should so inartistically be expended.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifth and last afternoon concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place on Wednesday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," overture, Tschaikowsky's B flat minor concerto for piano, Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," and Brahms' symphony in D major.

The orchestra, under Gericke, again revealed all those excellent points which have made it famous.

Teresa Carreño, the soloist, achieved remarkable success. Her playing will be reviewed at length in the next week's issue of Musical America.

[122]

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, MARCH 19, 1899.

The reappearance of Mme. Teresa Carreno after a considerable absence drew to the nineteenth Symphony concert as many of the irregular patrons as could get tickets, and her performance was followed by warm, prolonged and enthusiastic plaudits and many recalls. She played the second MacDowell concerto, a work eminently suited to her style and to which her art and temperament are most advantageous. She has the technique adequate for his exigent and sometimes eccentric demands, and she has the right disposition for tempering his occasionally excessive vehemence, which in his early writing comes now and then pretty near to turbulence. Indeed, there are in the first movement of this concerto passages which serve no better purpose, so far as we can see, than giving the pianist a chance to show what a tremendous demonstration he can make. Mme. Carreno, who knows how to increase the emotional qualities while gathering material strength, carried his first movement through dignifiedly, gave a flashing brilliance to the gay presto which follows and set out in clear and faithful propation the contrasting moods and themes of the finale.

For the truly musical the chief and most valuable number was the heretofore unheard Tschaikowsky suite—No I, D minor, opus 43. The first movement begins quaintly—almost dolorously, indeed—continues in plaintive, dreamy strains for a while, changing at last into a firm, strong, definite and well-knit fugue. But the succeeding movements are light, genial, dainty, half sportive at times again full of sparkle and fantasy and only becoming solidly serious as the finale approaches. The suite shows new phases of the composer's genius, and even his oddest and strangest turns of expression are neither grim nor sad, but bring smiles and good cheer. The score calls for no trombones, and so many bass passages are cast to the bassoons, which are delightfully prominent, as also are the oboe and clarinet—and in a less degree the flute—in frequent gracious and winning melodies.

The concert ended with that tremendous noisemaker of Richard Strauss, which he calls "Death and Transfiguration"—although "Niagara from Lake to Lake," "The Descent of the Glacier," or "The Cyclone" would be as good a name. Barring a few really stately and magnificent pages, the thing is a mass of gorgeously colored bathos and rodomontade, and with those exceptions should go to Sousa or the Banda Rossa. The orchestra certainly did wonders in making such an unlimited tone with so little offence. But why waste so much good time and trouble on what is but a musical curiosity after all?

No concert this week. The week after, this programme will be served up: A Mozart symphony, the "Good Friday Spell" from Wagner's "Parsifal," and Dvorak's second symphony.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MARCH 20, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the nineteenth symphony concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was:

Tchaikovsky: Suite No. 1, in D minor, opus 43.
(First time at these concerts.)
MacDowell: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, opus 23.
Richard Strauss: Tone-Poem, "Tod und Verklärung, opus 24.
Mme. Teresa Carreno was the pianist.

An "important notice" on yellow paper was pasted into the programme-books, prefacing the above programme with Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture; which was, however, not played. Perhaps this paster was intended for Philadelphia or Baltimore; certainly it got into the Boston programme-books by mistake. We wonder, though, how many people took the fugue in Tchaikovsky's suite for the "Sakuntala!" Of the new Tchaikovsky suite only five movements were given; the fourth, "Marche miniature," had perforce to be omitted because, although plainly down in the score, it was, for some reason, omitted in the orchestral parts.

Except for the fugue in the first movement—which is written with both freedom and skill on a subject with a very taking rhythmic hall-mark upon it—we found this suite of Tchaikovsky's deadly dull. After the first movement everything sounded cheap, if not downright vulgar; stay, we must except some trumpet-effects near the close of the third movement, which sounded right well and tellingly.

MacDowell's concerto brought us into a higher and purer atmosphere at once. We have liked this concerto extremely, from the first; last Saturday evening, it seemed even finer than ever before, more stoutly knit together, with more beauty of melodic line, more genuine warmth of feeling. As for brilliancy, it always was as brilliant as need be. Mme. Carreno's playing of it beggared description; it was masterful in every direction, and how enormously vital and pungent! Composer and pianist well deserved the persistent shower of applause that followed—which the pianist alone was present to receive.

We were immensely glad to hear Richard Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung" again, especially as the performance was in every way superb, exhaustive. The work decidedly grows upon one with better acquaintance. One may deplore certain tendencies evinced in it, if one happens to be in the deploring mood; yet it is well to remember that Richard Strauss has from the beginning—that is, from his symphony and his Italian suite—shown signs of being a man whose artistic tendencies it may be rather futile to deplore, a man of original genius who may end by winning criticism over to his side. After this second hearing of the work, we cannot help feeling that "Tod und Verklärung" is far more of an achievement than of a mere attempt; we cannot help feeling that the man has really succeeded in saying in it what he had to say—at least, as nearly succeeded as men of genius generally do in compassing their ideals. Call it crass realism, if you will, and say what you please about the a priori superiority of idealism over realism; your criticism still leaves the work unscathed, for Art is far more a matter of feeling and perception than of conviction. Its realism may be stronger than a weaker work's idealism; and who shall say that this apparently downright realism may not be found, in time, to have its accompanying ideality, when the composer's peculiar idiom shall have been better understood, when the logic of his strength shall have been seen to be not antagonistic to beauty? If there be a composer in the field today concerning whom and whose tendencies it behooves the critic to be cautious in forming a judgment, that composer is surely Richard Strauss. He began as a very ugly duckling indeed; but it is just the ugly duckling, and only the ugly duckling, that has any real chance of growing up into a swan. We already see what seems to us true greatness in this "Tod und Verklärung," not a little that is even beautiful. The enormous technical mastery displayed in it is not merely that of the skilful technician, it is the mastery of the man who has something to say. Let us say again that the performance was simply and completely ideal!

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, March 31, and Saturday evening, April 1 (there will be neither rehearsal nor concert this week)—is: Mozart, symphony; Wagner, "Charfreitags-Zauber," from "Parsifal;" Dvorak, symphony No. 2, in D minor, opus 70.

4

The Boston Traveler

THE SYMPHONY.

Eighteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, 19th concert. Mme. Teresa Carreno, soloist. The programme:

Suite No. 1 in D minor..........Tschaikowsky
Pianoforte concerto No. 2 in D minor.....
Edward MacDowell
"Death and Transfiguration"....Richard Strauss

The inequalities of Tschaikowski were again forcibly brought to mind by the suite in D minor played here for the first time. Not very often in it do you catch a glimpse of the mighty composer of the "Pathetique" symphony. It is musical and entertaining, and from a lesser man would be hailed as an acquisition to the concert stage, I feel certain. But it has no elements of greatness, and so does not stand the test of comparative criticism. Of the six movements the scherzo was perhaps the most charming, although the dainty gavotte at the end had some characteristic beauty.

The Richard Strauss "Death and Transfiguration" tone-poem still remains for me considerable of a noisy bore, an agonized attempt to torture sound into certain gruesome pictures that it can never adequately represent. There is no denying that as music of the modern and richly ornamented sort it has power and ingenuity in some degree. But it does not thrill very much as yet, nor is its message so entirely clear as to be accepted implicitly. Indeed, it is very doubtful if the school of which Mr. Strauss is the high priest has sufficient stamina behind its noise to last a great while longer. This particular piece was played with immense fire by the orchestra.

The dash, the enthusiasm, the magnetism of Teresa Carreno has in no whit lessened with the processes of time, and her playing of the fine concerto of MacDowell's was everything that was to be expected of her. Her technique, beauty of tone and depth of understanding place her far above any woman pianist who lives today; in some respects she is as satisfying as any of the other sex, for her attractive personality is an element of power and the superb abandon of her playing is very infectious. She was received with great applause by the audience.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

For Publishers' Announcements, see Page 24.

New York, March 25, 1899.

The nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the following programme: Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 43, by Tschaikowsky; concerto for piano No. 2, MacDowell; and Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration." Teresa Carreño was the soloist, and gave a performance of the MacDowell concerto that left not one item of desire to be fulfilled upon the part of the most critical listener. It was a superb, consummate performance, bringing forth the most enthusiastic and prolonged applause of the season. What more can be said in praise of this exceptionally gifted artist?

The Tschaikowsky suite, although not in the most exalted vein of the composer, by any means, was nevertheless an interesting and agreeable number, especially as it was played with a better degree of consideration for its dynamic demands than anything Gericke has conducted thus far this season.

In the extraordinary capriciousness of Strauss' tone-poem the orchestra relapsed into the now-established habit of its "rougher renderings," as regards the intended effect of the author, and played regardless of discrimination as concerned the expression of the composer's score.

The obtuseness of Gericke as regards the necessities of the composer's score was in glaring evidence in his reading of this composition.

What an injustice an incompetent or indifferent conductor can do the music of a composer.

Like the actor upon the stage, he can almost turn the inspiration of the author into mediocrity through a commonplace dispensation of the material in hand.

There is not space to dwell upon the items of Gericke's neglect; how he imparted a con brio to Strauss' tranquillo, and failed to achieve the great climax of the work because of the generally loud, coarse manner of his reading.

Alas, that the efforts of such a superb orchestra should so inartistically be expended.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifth and last afternoon concert of this season's series by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, took place on Wednesday afternoon at Carnegie Hall.

The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave," overture, Tschaikowsky's B flat minor concerto for piano, Chabrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," and Brahms' symphony in D major.

The orchestra, under Gericke, again revealed all those excellent points which have made it famous.

Teresa Carreño, the soloist, achieved remarkable success. Her playing will be reviewed at length in the next week's issue of MUSICAL AMERICA.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 22, 1899.

The program of the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 43 .... Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano, No. 2, in D minor .... MacDowell
Death and Transfiguration .... Strauss

Teresa Carreño was the soloist.

The Tschaikowsky suite was on this occasion heard for the first time at these concerts. The work is scarcely worthy its composer. It is for the most part pretty along conventional lines, often cheap in melody and harmonics, and oftener sinking to a triviality which the clever and brilliant orchestration is not always successful in concealing. The introduction and the fugue are its most pretentious movements, but both are stiffly academic, and the latter is no very favorable exemplification of the composer's skill in this species of writing. The divertimento and the intermezzo are bright and lively after a certain comic opera fashion, but are not especially interesting, musically considered. Through the whole suite there is a poverty in invention that is constantly accented, following up a phrase by a literal repetition and by an overfrequent indulgence in climbing sequences that are known by the name rosalia. The scherzo is the best and most refined portion of the work. The closing gavotte is neither fish nor fowl nor even good red herring, and the coda that is appended to it is almost pitifully commonplace. When Tschaikowsky descends from his stilts it is surprising how easy he can become vulgar.

The Strauss tone-poem, which had been previously given at these concerts, gained much in clearness, interest and meaning on better acquaintance. It impressed me on this occasion as a far nobler effort than his "Zarathustra," and pervaded by a more potent beauty and a deeper sincerity. Though the noisiness still seemed excessive and sensational, a clearer understanding of the composer's motive caused these solid masses of tone to take on a dramatic meaning and a logical sequence of ideas that were not apparent in them at the first hearing. And yet it is not music toward which admiration goes out spontaneously, nor music that lingers with one after it is over.

In recalling my earlier dislike of it and contrasting it with my changed feeling toward it, I have reached the conclusion that these are dangerous times in which to formulate a hasty judgment on latter-day music. Conservatism, no heed how conscientious it may be, is no longer the easy and comforting faith it was. Just now, fearful to confess, it is likely to be more alloyed with obstinacy than with reason. It is perilous to trust oneself with music of this school. One never knows what may happen if one should become used to it. Familiarity accustoms oneself to its repulsiveness, and then, instead of breeding the proverbial contempt, it incites toleration, and then there are twinges of conscience, a vain kicking against the pricks and repentance for the momentary departure from the true faith. And in these iconoclastic days there is considerable shaking up of this same true faith, and it brings to mind Pope's worldly wise observation about the frightful mien of the monster Vice, which is to be seen only to be hated, but which seen, until we become familiar with her face, we begin by enduring, then by pitying and end by embracing. One's sole reliance must be that the beautiful in art must eventually triumph over the ugly; but then comes a disturbing reflection as to what constitutes the beautiful and what the ugly, and by what court the final judgment shall be rendered. Isn't it a mere matter of individual taste after all?

Whatever may be the real value of the work, there can be no question of the strength and lucidity of Mr. Gericke's reading of it, nor of the splendor and dignity of the orchestral performance.

Madame Carreño's playing of Mr. MacDowell's brilliant and interesting concerto was glorious in every way. It was stirringly virile, vigorous in the artistic intelligence it demonstrated, free from trickery and an unalloyed delight to listen to.

* * *

I am distressed to find that I have fallen under the censure of my old and esteemed friend, Warren Davenport. This would have been sufficiently painful if his fault finding had been confided to me in private, but it is absolutely agonizing that he should have perpetuated his views anent my shortcomings in cold and cruel print. If Warren had taken me quietly aside and made me acquainted with his belief that I was wandering ignorantly in the wrong path he would no doubt have worked as speedy a reformation in me as he is likely to do by the method he has seen proper to adopt.

Warren is keenly sensitive on the subject of singers and singing, and it seems that I, in common with one or more of my confrères, have praised artists who, according to his opinion of their knowledge and exemplification of the art they profess, are no more nor less than "duffers." After long and conscientious study of his writings on singing I have reached the conclusion that there is only one method of singing, and that Warren is the fortunate possessor of the secret, which for some reason or other, doubtless an important one, he has hitherto refrained from divulging with a clearness that renders it possible for artists misguidedly pronounced great to avail themselves of its blessings. If I am not in error, it is his belief that there is only one singer that possesses his method, and that one is Adelina Patti. This of itself is sufficient to stimulate a profound regret that there are not more who have stumbled by chance on his invaluable system.

If I understand him right, his days and his nights must be made miserable by thoughts of distended pharynxes, the vulgar use of the nose as an organ for the emission of sound, the singing through a mask, the false location of the column of air, and the thousand and one other unpardonable faults that are committed by every singer, no heed how world-wide are the high reputations they enjoy, who come hither to exhibit their skill as vocalists. This is enough for any man, especially an enthusiast, to suffer, and I am overwhelmed by sorrow that I should have added to his woes by admiring singing that I should not have admired, and by bestowing praises on artists whose untoward fate has prevented them from profiting by Warren's instruction. I see no hope for them except in the establishing of conservatories here and abroad for the promulgation of his method. I cannot but lament that he should not have brought before the public pupils who have benefited by his knowledge and experience, for they would have carried conviction with them; but he has, of course, his own private motives for not having done so.

The number of so-called eminent artists who have been discovered by Warren to be ignorant of the fundamental principles of their art, and who display abject poverty of technical means, is absolutely appalling. I cannot recall one singer who has been heard here in years who has won the priceless dower of his unqualified praise. Of course it is their fault and not his; but is it not sad that such a low grade of vocal art should remain unchained and be permitted to wander whither it will to work irreparable injury? If the world were in peril of destruction and could be saved only by ten good singers, that is, by singers that would meet with my dear Warren's approval, I am sorely afraid that this orb would go to the demnition bow-wows, unless indeed he had as many perfect artists of his training up his sleeve to let loose at the critical moment.

This is very sad, but sadder than all is the reflection that I have been instrumental in leading the public astray through my ignorance of the proper manner in which the larynx, the pharynx, the diaphragm, the nose and the lower jaw should be used by singers. All I can do to show how repentant I really am is to promise to ignore for the future beauty of voice, purity of tone, intelligence of interpretation and the other things that I have mistakenly admired, and devote myself to learning how to condemn vocalists who sing well by any other method than Warren's.

I have fallen under his displeasure not only for my praise of bad singing, but for my commendation of the recent reading of the Liszt "Faust" Symphony by Mr. Gericke. Under this double load of disapproval I scarcely know where I am at. I shall be glad when the bicycle season comes around again and Warren is cavorting in and out of town on his machine, to the envy of his own sex and the admiration of the other. I fear he misses the exercise and is given to morbidity of thought in consequence. In his normal condition he roars at you as gently as any sucking dove, if he roars at all, and at such times I am sure he would never dream of reproving me or any of my confrères, the radiant joy of outdoor exercise, together with the blissful consciousness of "knowing it all," sufficing to make him contented with the world and everything of beauty in it, including himself.

B. E. WOOLF.

Boston Symphony Orchestra—March Itinerary.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, March 22, at 2.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, March 23, at 8 P. M.

Matinee at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 24, at 3:30.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 25, at 8 P. M.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CARNEGIE HALL, NEW YORK.

PROGRAM.

Wednesday Afternoon, March 22, 1899.

Overture, Fingal's Cave .... Mendelssohn
Concerto for piano, No. 1, op. 23 .... Tschaikowsky
Bourrée Fantastique .... Chabrier
(First time at these concerts.)
Symphony No. 2 .... Brahms
Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreño.

Thursday Evening, March 23, 1899.

Suite in D minor, op. 43 .... Tschaikowsky
(First time in New York.)
Concerto for piano, No. 2, op. 23 .... MacDowell
Tone poem, Death and Transfiguration .... Strauss
(First time at these concerts.)
Overture, Sakuntala .... Goldmark
Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreño.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 85.

SUNDAY, MARCH 26, 1899.

The Symphony orchestra, who were in New York last week had much praise from the critics for their fifth and last matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall Wednesday. The Herald says: "Under Mr. Gericke the orchestra played with the rhythmic swing, tonal beauty and general technical skill for which we are accustomed to look in performances of the Boston Symphony. Mme. Carreno gave an admirable interpretation of the concerto, overcoming its technical difficulties with apparent ease and entering thoroughly into the spirit of the work."

[illegible] MAIL A[illegible]

Broadway and Fulton St., New York.

THURSDAY EVENIN[illegible]

For the last pair of concerts of the New York series of the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke chose eight works by modern composers. Mendelssohn, earliest of the group, was represented on the programme yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall by his overture, "Fingal's Cave," and from that sober and judicious piece of modern classicism, the listeners turned next to Tschaikowsky's B flat piano concerto, with its fullblooded, almost rampant modernity. Emmanuel Chabeier was next on yesterday's list, with a "Bourree fantasque," scored by Felix Mottl, and played for the first time here. Last came the noble Brahms symphony in D major. The list for to-night's concert promises quite as well, embracing, in this order, the Goldmark overture, "Sakuntala;" Edward MacDowell's second piano concerto, in D minor, opus 23; Tschaikowsky's suite No. 1, in D minor, opus 43, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," opus 24. For each concert Mme. Teresa Carreno was engaged as soloist.

Coming, as it did, yesterday, after the Mendelssohn "Fingal's Cave" overture, the Tschaikowsky piano concerto fairly glowed with warmth and color. Mendelssohn's scoring of his overture was admirable and suited the musical ideas embodied in it, but those ideas did not call for the vividness of tone color in which Tschaikowsky's genius naturally found expression. The contrast was, therefore, the more happy, and Mr. Gericke and his men, to say nothing of Mme. Carreno, who played the solo part, made the most of it. The stirring first movement was performed with great breadth and expressiveness, by all concerned; the lovely andantino in the second movement was sung rather than merely played, while the final allegro, with its imperative and vigorous themes, brought to a close one of the most notable performances of this Tschaikowsky concerto that New York has recently heard. Mme. Carreno's temperament is evidently in close sympathy with such music as Tschaikowsky's, and her powers rarely have been employed here to better advantage. It was a presentation that more than justified the outburst of enthusiastic applause from the audience.

In the programme notes, by Mr. W. F. Apthorp, the interesting fact was recalled that the first public performance of Tschaikowsky's concerto on any stage took place in Boston on October 25, 1875, the soloist being Hans von Bulow and the conductor of the orchestra, Mr. B. J. Lang, the latter still one of Boston's best known musicians.

Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" proved to be a brilliant, gay, but unimportant addition to the repertory. The Bourree was an old dance, of French or Spanish origin, and the name often appears as title of one of the movements in suites by Bach and other early composers. Chabrier's piece is in the characteristic rhythm and has the true Latin lightness and swing. Mottl's scoring has been effectively done. Chabrier left the piece in piano score only, and Felix Mottl made the orchestral version after his death in 1894, the first public performance occurring in 1897 at Carlsruhe, where Mottl is conductor.

The second Brahms symphony grows more beautiful, more lovable, as time passes. It was played last season, under Mr. Seidl and Mr. Thomas, and its single performance this season seems scant allowance. The first movement, barring one or two small slips in the brass, has rarely been more admirably played here. Brahms understood, more than most composers, how to use the full beauty of the subdued notes of the horn and in this first movement, particularly, the horns have much of the coloring to do, besides proclaiming the opening theme with singular eloquence. The second movement, less suave and mellow, but full of significance, preserved its true character yesterday, the allegretto, with its graceful elegance, took its own place in the general scheme and the last movement, with its curious suggestions of Beethoven, was played in noble fashion. Mr. Gericke and his men seemed to enjoy their work as much as did the audience.

SAMUEL SWIFT.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
THE EVENING SUN, per month .... .20c
THE EVENING SUN, per year $2.00

FRIDAY, MARCH 24, 1899.

A delightful programme, delightfully rendered, was enjoyed by a large audience at the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening. In this the orchestra was aided by Mme. Teresa Carreno, who played the concerto for the pianoforte No. 2 in D minor, op. 23, by Edward MacDowell. Mme. Carreno was applauded vigorously and deservedly, but she declined to give an encore. The novelties of the evening were a suite in D minor by Tschaikowsky and a tone-poem, "Tod und Verklärung," by Richard Strauss. Goldmark's overture to Sakuntala was the opening number of a programme notable for its modern character, three of the selections being by living composers, while the fourth can hardly be classed as non-contemporary music, the composer having been dead not more than five years. Of this last named selection, the Tschaikowsky suite and the illuminating way in which it was rendered, too much cannot be said. The composition is a magnificent piece of work, original in conception and of heroic treatment. Its range is as broad as its finish is exquisite. The concert closed the eighteenth season of the orchestra and its thirt[illegible] in this city

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 22, 1899.

The program of the nineteenth concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 43..........................Tschaikowsky
Concerto for piano, No. 2, in D minor....................MacDowell
Death and Transfiguration....................................Strauss

Teresa Carreño was the soloist.

The Tschaikowsky suite was on this occasion heard for the first time at these concerts. The work is scarcely worthy its composer. It is for the most part pretty along conventional lines, often cheap in melody and harmonics, and oftener sinking to a triviality which the clever and brilliant orchestration is not always successful in concealing. The introduction and the fugue are its most pretentious movements, but both are stiffly academic, and the latter is no very favorable exemplification of the composer's skill in this species of writing. The divertimento and the intermezzo are bright and lively after a certain comic opera fashion, but are not especially interesting, musically considered. Through the whole suite there is a poverty in invention that is constantly accented, following up a phrase by a literal repetition and by an overfrequent indulgence in climbing sequences that are known by the name rosalia. The scherzo is the best and most refined portion of the work. The closing gavotte is neither fish nor fowl nor even good red herring, and the coda that is appended to it is almost pitifully commonplace. When Tschaikowsky descends from his stilts it is surprising how easy he can become vulgar.

The Strauss tone-poem, which had been previously given at these concerts, gained much in clearness, interest and meaning on better acquaintance. It impressed me on this occasion as a far nobler effort than his "Zarathustra," and pervaded by a more potent beauty and a deeper sincerity. Though the noisiness still seemed excessive and sensational, a clearer understanding of the composer's motive caused these solid masses of tone to take on a dramatic meaning and a logical sequence of ideas that were not apparent in them at the first hearing. And yet it is not music toward which admiration goes out spontaneously, nor music that lingers with one after it is over.

In recalling my earlier dislike of it and contrasting it with my changed feeling toward it, I have reached the conclusion that these are dangerous times in which to formulate a hasty judgment on latter-day music. Conservatism, no heed how conscientious it may be, is no longer the easy and comforting faith it was. Just now, fearful to confess, it is likely to be more alloyed with obstinacy than with reason. It is perilous to trust oneself with music of this school. One never knows what may happen if one should become used to it. Familiarity accustoms oneself to its repulsiveness, and then, instead of breeding the proverbial contempt, it incites toleration, and then there are twinges of conscience, a vain kicking against the pricks and repentance for the momentary departure from the true faith. And in these iconoclastic days there is considerable shaking up of this same true faith, and it brings to mind Pope's worldly wise observation about the frightful mien of the monster Vice, which is to be seen only to be hated, but which seen, until we become familiar with her face, we begin by enduring, then by pitying and end by embracing. One's sole reliance must be that the beautiful in art must eventually triumph over the ugly; but then comes a disturbing reflection as to what constitutes the beautiful and what the ugly, and by what court the final judgment shall be rendered. Isn't it a mere matter of individual taste after all?

Whatever may be the real value of the work, there can be no question of the strength and lucidity of Mr. Gericke's reading of it, nor of the splendor and dignity of the orchestral performance.

Madame Carreño's playing of Mr. MacDowell's brilliant and interesting concerto was glorious in every way. It was stirringly virile, vigorous in the artistic intelligence it demonstrated, free from trickery and an unalloyed delight to listen to.

* * *

I am distressed to find that I have fallen under the censure of my old and esteemed friend, Warren Davenport. This would have been sufficiently painful if his fault finding had been confided to me in private, but it is absolutely agonizing that he should have perpetuated his views anent my shortcomings in cold and cruel print. If Warren had taken me quietly aside and made me acquainted with his belief that I was wandering ignorantly in the wrong path he would no doubt have worked as speedy a reformation in me as he is likely to do by the method he has seen proper to adopt.

Warren is keenly sensitive on the subject of singers and singing, and it seems that I, in common with one or more of my confrères, have praised artists who, according to his opinion of their knowledge and exemplification of the art they profess, are no more nor less than "duffers." After long and conscientious study of his writings on singing I have reached the conclusion that there is only one method of singing, and that Warren is the fortunate possessor of the secret, which for some reason or other, doubtless an important one, he has hitherto refrained from divulging with a clearness that renders it possible for artists misguidedly pronounced great to avail themselves of its blessings. If I am not in error, it is his belief that there is only one singer that possesses his method, and that one is Adelina Patti. This of itself is sufficient to stimulate a profound regret that there are not more who have stumbled by chance on his invaluable system.

If I understand him right, his days and his nights must be made miserable by thoughts of distended pharynxes, the vulgar use of the nose as an organ for the emission of sound, the singing through a mask, the false location of the column of air, and the thousand and one other unpardonable faults that are committed by every singer, no heed how world-wide are the high reputations they enjoy, who come hither to exhibit their skill as vocalists. This is enough for any man, especially an enthusiast, to suffer, and I am overwhelmed by sorrow that I should have added to his woes by admiring singing that I should not have admired, and by bestowing praises on artists whose untoward fate has prevented them from profiting by Warren's instruction. I see no hope for them except in the establishing of conservatories here and abroad for the promulgation of his method. I cannot but lament that he should not have brought before the public pupils who have benefited by his knowledge and experience, for they would have carried conviction with them; but he has, of course, his own private motives for not having done so.

The number of so-called eminent artists who have been discovered by Warren to be ignorant of the fundamental principles of their art, and who display abject poverty of technical means, is absolutely appalling. I cannot recall one singer who has been heard here in years who has won the priceless dower of his unqualified praise. Of course it is their fault and not his; but is it not sad that such a low grade of vocal art should remain unchained and be permitted to wander whither it will to work irreparable injury? If the world were in peril of destruction and could be saved only by ten good singers, that is, by singers that would meet with my dear Warren's approval, I am sorely afraid that this orb would go to the demnition bow-wows, unless indeed he had as many perfect artists of his training up his sleeve to let loose at the critical moment.

This is very sad, but sadder than all is the reflection that I have been instrumental in leading the public astray through my ignorance of the proper manner in which the larynx, the pharynx, the diaphragm, the nose and the lower jaw should be used by singers. All I can do to show how repentant I really am is to promise to ignore for the future beauty of voice, purity of tone, intelligence of interpretation and the other things that I have mistakenly admired, and devote myself to learning how to condemn vocalists who sing well by any other method than Warren's.

I have fallen under his displeasure not only for my praise of bad singing, but for my commendation of the recent reading of the Liszt "Faust" Symphony by Mr. Gericke. Under this double load of disapproval I scarcely know where I am at. I shall be glad when the bicycle season comes around again and Warren is cavorting in and out of town on his machine, to the envy of his own sex and the admiration of the other. I fear he misses the exercise and is given to morbidity of thought in consequence. In his normal condition he roars at you as gently as any sucking dove, if he roars at all, and at such times I am sure he would never dream of reproving me or any of my confrères, the radiant joy of outdoor exercise, together with the blissful consciousness of "knowing it all," sufficing to make him contented with the world and everything of beauty in it, including himself. B. E. WOOLF.

Boston Symphony Orchestra—March Itinerary.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, March 22, at 2.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, March 23, at 8 P. M.

Matinee at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, March 24, at 3:30.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 25, at 8 P. M.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

CARNEGIE HALL, NEW YORK.

PROGRAM.

Wednesday Afternoon, March 22, 1899.

Overture, Fingal's Cave.....................................Mendelssohn
Concerto for piano, No. 1, op. 23..........................Tschaikowsky
Bourrée Fantastique...... ....Chabrier
(First time at these concerts.)
Symphony No. 2..Brahms
Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreño.

Thursday Evening, March 23, 1899.

Suite in D minor, op. 43............ ....Tschaikowsky
(First time in New York.)
Concerto for piano, No. 2, op. 23............................MacDowell
Tone poem, Death and Transfiguration.........................Strauss
(First time at these concerts.)
Overture, Sakuntala ....Goldmark
Soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreño.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. (V., NO. 85.

SUNDAY, MARCH 26, 1899.

The Symphony orchestra, who were in New York last week had much praise from the critics for their fifth and last matinee of the season at Carnegie Hall Wednesday. The Herald says: "Under Mr. Gericke the orchestra played with the rhythmic swing, tonal beauty and general technical skill for which we are accustomed to look in performances of the Boston Symphony. Mme. Carreno gave an admirable interpretation of the concerto, overcoming its technical difficulties with apparent ease and entering thoroughly into the spirit of the work."

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS

Broadway and Fulton St., New York.

THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 23, 1899.

For the last pair of concerts of the New York series of the Boston symphony orchestra, Mr. Gericke chose eight works by modern composers. Mendelssohn, earliest of the group, was represented on the programme yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall by his overture, "Fingal's Cave," and from that sober and judicious piece of modern classicism, the listeners turned next to Tschaikowsky's B flat piano concerto, with its fullblooded, almost rampant modernity. Emmanuel Chabeier was next on yesterday's list, with a "Bourree fantasque," scored by Felix Mottl, and played for the first time here. Last came the noble Brahms symphony in D major. The list for to-night's concert promises quite as well, embracing, in this order, the Goldmark overture, "Sakuntala;" Edward MacDowell's second piano concerto, in D minor, opus 23; Tschaikowsky's suite No. 1, in D minor, opus 43, and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," opus 24. For each concert Mme. Teresa Carreno was engaged as soloist.

Coming, as it did, yesterday, after the Mendelssohn "Fingal's Cave" overture, the Tschaikowsky piano concerto fairly glowed with warmth and color. Mendelssohn's scoring of his overture was admirable and suited the musical ideas embodied in it, but those ideas did not call for the vividness of tone color in which Tschaikowsky's genius naturally found expression. The contrast was, therefore, the more happy, and Mr. Gericke and his men, to say nothing of Mme. Carreno, who played the solo part, made the most of it. The stirring first movement was performed with great breadth and expressiveness, by all concerned; the lovely andantino in the second movement was sung rather than merely played, while the final allegro, with its imperative and vigorous themes, brought to a close one of the most notable performances of this Tschaikowsky concerto that New York has recently heard. Mme. Carreno's temperament is evidently in close sympathy with such music as Tschaikowsky's, and her powers rarely have been employed here to better advantage. It was a presentation that more than justified the outburst of enthusiastic applause from the audience.

In the programme notes, by Mr. W. F. Apthorp, the interesting fact was recalled that the first public performance of Tschaikowsky's concerto on any stage took place in Boston on October 25, 1875, the soloist being Hans von Bulow and the conductor of the orchestra, Mr. B. J. Lang, the latter still one of Boston's best known musicians.

Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" proved to be a brilliant, gay, but unimportant addition to the repertory. The Bourree was an old dance, of French or Spanish origin, and the name often appears as title of one of the movements in suites by Bach and other early composers. Chabrier's piece is in the characteristic rhythm and has the true Latin lightness and swing. Mottl's scoring has been effectively done. Chabrier left the piece in piano score only, and Felix Mottl made the orchestral version after his death in 1894, the first public performance occurring in 1897 at Carlsruhe, where Mottl is conductor.

The second Brahms symphony grows more beautiful, more lovable, as time passes. It was played last season, under Mr. Seidl and Mr. Thomas, and its single performance this season seems scant allowance. The first movement, barring one or two small slips in the brass, has rarely been more admirably played here. Brahms understood, more than most composers, how to use the full beauty of the subdued notes of the horn and in this first movement, particularly, the horns have much of the coloring to do, besides proclaiming the opening theme with singular eloquence. The second movement, less suave and mellow, but full of significance, preserved its true character yesterday, the allegretto, with its graceful elegance, took its own place in the general scheme and the last movement, with its curious suggestions of Beethoven, was played in noble fashion. Mr. Gericke and his men seemed to enjoy their work as much as did the audience.

SAMUEL SWIFT.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.

THE EVENING SUN, per month.......................... .20¢
THE EVENING SUN, per year..............................$2.00

FRIDAY, MARCH 24, 1899.

A delightful programme, delightfully rendered, was enjoyed by a large audience at the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening. In this the orchestra was aided by Mme. Teresa Carreno, who played the concerto for the pianoforte No. 2 in D minor, op. 23, by Edward MacDowell. Mme. Carreno was applauded vigorously and deservedly, but she declined to give an encore. The novelties of the evening were a suite in D minor by Tschaikowsky and a tone-poem, "Tod und Verklärung," by Richard Strauss. Goldmark's overture to Sakuntala was the opening number of a programme notable for its modern character, three of the selections being by living composers, while the fourth can hardly be classed as non-contemporary music, the composer having been dead not more than five years. Of this last named selection, the Tschaikowsky suite and the illuminating way in which it was rendered, too much cannot be said. The composition is a magnificent piece of work, original in conception and of heroic treatment. Its range is as broad as its finish is exquisite. The concert closed the eighteenth season of the orchestra and its thirteenth season in this city

New-York Daily Tribune

FRIDAY, MARCH 24, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra finished its season in the Borough of Manhattan last evening with a brilliant concert in Carnegie Hall, largely attended, as all its other evening concerts this winter have been, and marked by some of the most sumptuous and finished playing that the organization has done in this city for a long time. Mr. Gericke offered a programme of modern works exclusively, and without a symphony, the numbers including Goldmark's Sakuntala overture, Tschaikowsky's first suite, in D minor; Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," and Professor MacDowell's second pianoforte concerto, played by Mme. Terese Carreño. Of these Tschaikowsky's suite was heard for the first time in New-York. The fact that it has escaped a performance here so long is not easily explainable, considering the power of the composer's name and the alertness of the various orchestral conductors who have been providing new things for the New-York concert-goers. On the other hand, it cannot take rank with the most characteristic and important works of the Russian master, whose style and genius it represents wholly and only in miniature. It is in five movements, consisting of an introduction and fugue, a divertimento, an intermezzo, a marche miniature, a scherzo and a gavotte. The fourth was omitted. None of these contain ideas of much pregnancy or force, although the introduction and fugue are well made and effectively presented, and all four that were heard show much charming and skilful scoring for orchestra. It is, on the whole, an engaging composition, though somewhat long for the value of the material presented. It was deliciously played, with every piquancy of effect.

The Strauss tone poem gains little on repeated hearing. The subject is morbid, and it is morbid music with which the composer has illustrated it, scarcely intelligible or enjoyable without a close following of the printed programme; stubbornly ill-sounding in many places and effective only through the brute force of its climaxes. Mr. Gericke read it with abundant allowance for all the composer's intention, broadly, and evidently with a clear understanding of it; but it is difficult to imagine him in real sympathy with it. Mme. Carreño's performance of Professor MacDowell's superb concerto dwelt primarily on the dramatic effects in the first and third movements, which she put in the most vigorous and telling way, with a more than masculine fire and passion. It was an interpretation compelling enthusiasm, which was lavishly given.

New-York Daily Tribune.

THURSDAY, MARCH 23, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, on its last visit to New-York for the present season, makes offerings of unusual interest to its friends. Not the least of these is the co-operation of Mme. Teresa Carreño in all four of its New-York and Brooklyn concerts, who in this excellent company and with this most valuable support makes her first appearance here this season. In yesterday afternoon's concert in Carnegie Hall—not so numerously attended as the occasion deserved—she played Tschaikowsky's B flat minor concerto. The work is one with which her temperament finds fullest sympathy and in which she gives loose rein to her fiery impetuosity. Its technical difficulties do not seem to exist for her; at any rate, she rides over them with absolute indifference to them as obstacles, and if when the breathless end is reached the critical listener thinks to cavil, he finds himself disarmed in the triumphant sweep of her achievement. It may not be the highest in pianoforte playing, and it may not have its effect in other kinds of music of the highest sort, but in Tschaikowsky's concerto Mme. Carreño took her hearers captive, and yesterday afternoon was recalled again and again. One of the factors in this success was the superb accompaniment of the orchestra.

There was one novelty on the programme which need not call for extended comment, for its appeal was momentary and purely sensuous. This was a "Bourrée Fantastique" by Emmanuel Chabrier, scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl. The piece itself is supposed by the programme annotator to have been originally written for the pianoforte, though apparently without positive evidence of it. There can scarcely be much doubt that it has better reason for being in its orchestral form than as a piano piece. Its ideas are fragmentary and inconclusive, but they are of a sort that lend themselves to a rich smearing of orchestral color. The German conductor has certainly caught the French composer's febrile touch in the manipulation of such color, as displayed in the latter's most characteristic compositions, and has delivered a piece that arrests the attention at least and interests the student of instrumental combination.

The other numbers of the programme were Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture and Brahms's second symphony. Mr. Gericke devoted enthusiasm and loving care to illustrating every beauty of the symphony, which was glorified by the treatment it received—every theme, every phase was given its proper adjustment; every contrast and every climax shown forth in its true relation, with a broad perception of the unity of the composition and of the euphony with which Brahms's utterance is made in it. The spirit of beauty that dwells in the symphony was caught and laid bare.

The Commercial Advertiser.

By The
Commercial Advertiser Association.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, MAR. 23, 1899.

Mr. Gericke burst the bonds of his conservatism yesterday and at the fifth and last matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Carnegie Hall, presented a novelty, not one of great importance, to be sure, but still a novelty. It was Chabrier's Bourée Fantasque, scored for the orchestra by Felix Mottl. According to Mr. Apthorpe, it was probably a piano piece, although he has been unable to find it. However, it does not make much difference what it was, for in its present form it is decidedly attractive in its rich and varying colors, even if the foundation is slight. Mottl has shown himself a close student of Chabrier's methods of scoring, and has made free use of all those devices which make the orchestral work's of the Frenchman so brilliantly striking. It is a piece well fitted to show the virtuosity of a band and in things of this kind, as in works of solider merit the Boston men excel.

The other works presented were Mendelssohn's overture, Fingal's Cave (The Hebrides), Brahms's Symphony No. 2, in D major, and Tschaikowsky's B-flat minor Pianoforte Concerto, Teresa Carreño being the soloist. It is needless to say that Mr. Gericke got everything possible out of the Mendelssohn overture. He is of a rather Mendelssohnian turn of mind and the works of that composer never appear to better advantage than under his baton. The same was true also of the Brahms symphony. It was good to hear this work again, played as the Boston men play it, for its hold on one's affections increases perceptibly with each hearing. But what was in the composer's mind when he wrote that gloomy Adagio, so different in mood from the other three movements? In the first movement we have everything that is emblematic of peace; in the third the mood is one of joy, which becomes almost gayety, though of a rather subdued kind, in the finale. But the second is more than contemplative, it is even moody and introspective.

Few concertos are better fitted to pianists than Tschaikowsky's great first is to Teresa Carreño, and this artist showed her wisdom in choosing it on the occasion of her return to this city. It is full of color, filled with that peculiar fire and passion which the great Russian knew so well how to give voice to, and, more than that, it is something greater than a mere vehicle for pianistic fire-works. Carreño's performance can be called nothing short of stunning. From the very beginning, with its series of great introductory chords she swept all before her, making light of all the obstacles the cunning composer had placed in the way of the pianist. Hers was a superb and convincing performance and she was wise enough to refuse to destroy the impression she had made by playing an encore. To-night's programme will be.

Overture, "Sakuntala"..............Goldmark
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, D minor.
MacDowell
Suite No. 1, D minor (first time).Tschaikowsky
Tone-Poem, "Death and Transfiguration."
R. Strauss

The Evening Post.

New York, Friday, March 24 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last evening comprised Goldmark's ever-welcome "Sakuntala" overture, Edward MacDowell's second pianoforte concerto, Tchaikovsky's first suite, and Richard Strauss's tone poem "Death and Transfiguration." The last-named had been heard here before without awakening an eager desire for a repetition. It is a combination of philosophical bombast, orchestral massiveness, gorgeous coloring, and paucity of ideas eminently characteristic of Strauss. The first Tchaikovsky suite proved to to be far inferior to its companions; surely the great Russian nodded when he wrote this empty music. The "Sakuntala" overture brought out the best qualities of the Boston musicians; but the most interesting number of the programme was the MacDowell concerto, which grows more beautiful at every repetition. Even in a concerto—usually designed to be a show piece—Mr. MacDowell abhors and avoids mere displays of digital dexterity. The orchestra and the piano are friends who have a symposium together. Now one has the word, now the other, and listening to this dialogue the audience hears many choice thoughts expressed with consummate art. Mme. Tereso Carreño has played this concerto all over Europe, everywhere winning laurels with it for herself and its composer. That she did so last evening need hardly be said. She had to get up and bow repeatedly after every movement, and at the end the audience made a great demonstration.

The Bostonians have had a successful season under Mr. Gericke, and will keep up this year's plan next season.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
The Evening Sun, per month..........................30
The Evening Sun, per year..........................$2.00

THURSDAY, MARCH 23, 1899.

Exuberance of spirit and masterful execution marked the fifth and final matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given yesterday at Carnegie Hall. As usual, the visiting players were in capital form, and a responsive audience was not discouraged by prevailing conditions out of doors.

It was a gray afternoon, and Mme. Teresa Carreño, the piano soloist, had assumed a gray afternoon gown of satin and spangles appropriate to the occasion. There was a touch of gray also in the waving hair of this woman, who had formerly been the most dark and dashing of soloists to visit this country. But in all the gray and all the modish satin, the pianist seemed now, as then, a manifestation of elemental force, always well directed, but always difficult of restraint.

Tschaikowsky's first concerto for pianoforte, op. 23, in B flat minor, was well chosen for Mme. Carreño's reappearance here. Quite aside from its interest as characteristic of the composer in both matter and development, it fitted the executant in its abundant opportunity for brilliant, almost runaway, effect. The orchestra was often very loud, alternating with the piano in the musical evolution of themes, but the piano part was never lacking in power, dash or emphasis. If at times too emphatic, Mme. Carreño was rarely at fault in that particular.

The personal interest in her performance was that which always waits on striking effects by a genuine artist. After the concerto was finished, the soloist was compelled to promenade a very bad quarter of a mile over steps and benches, between the outer door and the stage centre, where she bowed in response to many recalls.

The orchestral novelty was a "Bourree Fantastique," a sort of picture of an old dance, composed by Chabrier in simpler form and scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl. The piece was brief and picturesque, an agreeable episode for any concert, and likely to be often heard here again.

The symphony was the second of Brahms, op. 73, in D major. Even its first movement, scholarly if not scholastic in composition, was not without interest for the untutored listener. The second movement was a very song without words, played with superb tone by the trained orchestra, while no less popular was the third movement, based on the development of a rustic theme. The final division had enough of Hungarian melody to make a brilliant ending. The only other number of the afternoon was Mendelssohn's "Hebrides" or "Fingal's Cave" overture.

To-night's concert, which brings to a close the Boston Orchestra's thirteenth season as a visitor in the local field, will present the following selections in this order:

Goldmark...........Overture to "Sakuntala," op. 13
MacDowell....Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, op. 23.
Tchaikowsky...........Suite No. 1, in D minor, op. 48
Richard Strauss....Tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration," op. 24.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, MARCH 24, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Final Concert of the Season Last Evening in Carnegie Hall.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's New York season terminated last night with a concert which was above reproach in every particular. The farewell programme contained two novelties, one a suite in D minor by Tschaikowsky, the other a tone-poem, "Tod und Verklärung," by Richard Strauss. The other numbers were the "Sakuntala" overture, by Goldmark, and Edward MacDowell's second piano concerto, played by Mme. Teresa Carreño. Of the four works performed it will be noticed that three are by living composers (one an American) and the fourth can be classed as contemporary music, even though Tschaikowsky has been dead about five years. The programme offered eloquent testimony to the high standard of the music of the present time.

Tschaikowsky's suite is a remarkable composition and it attests the great Russian's genius in its most admirable phases. There is a fugue of grand proportions, elaborated with the assistance of the entire orchestra with powerful effect. The second of the six movements, a divertimento, is most charming, and the manner in which a theme, played by the strings, is surrounded by a delicate tracery woven by the wood-wind, is captivating in the extreme. The intermezzo is a curious mingling of music of distinctively Oriental character and that inspired by European influence. The composer's intelligent use of the strings pizzicato is advantageously displayed in the gavotte. The orchestration is in the broad and sweeping style which marks all the works of this writer.

Of the overture as well as the other music it can be said that the orchestra played with splendid tone and wonderful unanimity. These players attempt nothing which they do not adorn.

Mme. Carreño's abundant gifts again compelled admiration.

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, MARCH 23, 1899.

MUSIC HEARD YESTERDAY.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's Fifth and Last Matinee Concert.

The fifth and last afternoon concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The audience was not as large as the merits of the concert deserved, yet it was not an insignificant assemblage. The afternoon entertainments of this organization have been somewhat experimental in the present season, and it may be that Wednesday, a popular day for theatre matinées, has not been altogether favorable to large audiences. Furthermore, yesterday's weather was not of a nature to encourage those who had not secured seats in advance to hasten to the concert. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's overture entitled "Fingal's Cave," Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, Charbrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl, and Brahms's D major symphony. The pianist mentation. The orchestration is full of color for the first time this season.

Charbrier's composition was originally written for the piano, but it cannot be set down as one of its writer's most distinguished works. It was probably the opportunity which it offered for brilliant instrumental effect which led Mottl to arrange it for orchestra and produce it in its new dress at his Carlsruhe concerts in 1897. The work contains two principal subjects with subsidiary episodes. It is simple in form, but contains some elaborate devices in the working out. Mottl has scored it for a large orchestra, and has shown acquaintance with Charbrier's style of instrumentation. The orchestration is full of color and the composition was effective yesterday. It was superbly played.

Although the orchestra was without the services of two of its well-known first violins, there seemed to be no deficiency in the body or brilliancy of tone, and in the Brahms symphony, especially, all the admirable qualities of the band were heard to advantage. Mme. Teresa Carreno has lost none of her immense physical power and none of her warmth of temperament. If any dispraise must be written of her performance it must be to the effect that some of her passages were forced in tone so that she seemed to be pounding the instrument unnecessarily. But on the whole her performance of the concerto was broad, vigorous, and musical, and it thoroughly deserved the enthusiasm which it aroused. The pianist wisely declined to add a supplementary number, thereby leaving undisturbed in the minds of the judicious the excellent impression which she had made. Mr. Gericke conducted the afternoon's music with his customary skill and his unfailing finish. To-night the orchestra will play again at the same place, but a wholly different programme.

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, MARCH 24, 1899.

MUSIC HEARD YESTERDAY.

Fifth and Last Concert of the Boston Orchestra Last Night at Carnegie Hall.

The fifth and last concert for the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Carnegie Hall. The audience was a large one, but that was to be expected, because the subscription for the season was sufficient to insure it. The programme was as follows: Goldmark's overture to "Sakuntala," Edward A. McDowell's second piano concerto, that in D minor; Tschaikowsky's orchestral suite in D minor, and Richard Strauss's tone poem entitled "Death and Transfiguration." The soloist was again Mme. Teresa Carreno, the distinguished pianist. The Strauss composition was performed for the first time at these concerts, but not for the first time in this city. It was made known to us by the Philharmonic Society on Jan. 8, 1892, in the Metropolitan Opera House, Anton Seidl conducting. The Tschaikowsky work was heard for the first time in New York.

Strauss's tone poem is a "poem" of dark and gruesome tendency. When it was produced here by the Philharmonic Society, THE NEW YORK TIMES was not in the mood to praise it. The opinions uttered at that time would not be out of place now The work has not changed, neither has the attitude of THE NEW YORK TIMES toward the pure and beautiful in art. In this symphonic study, Strauss's imagination was affected most powerfully by the thought of death, and it is the physical aspect of dissolution which the composer has endeavored to depict in his music. This is not a fit subject for musical illustration, and Mr. Strauss has made ugly and repulsive matter, though with great skill. The Tschaikowsky suite is in six movements. The first is an introduction and fugue, the second a divertimento, the third an intermezzo, the fourth a "Marche Miniature," the fifth a scherzo, and the sixth a gavotte. The works shows all of this composer's well-known skill in making compositions of this kind. Those who have heard the eminent Russian master's other two suites, which have been played in New York, do not need to be told that they are excellent specimens of this class of work. The first suite is not a fit companion for the other two. It is monotonous in color, sombre in tint, and without strong individuality. Of course, there is good workmanship in the fugue, and there are some tricks of instrumentation which would naturally be attributed to Tschaikowsky, but, on the whole, there is nothing in the work to stamp it as the equal of either the splendid third suite or the ingenious "Casse Noisette."

Mme. Carreno's performance of the MacDowell concerto was admirable in its rhythmic incisiveness, its tempestuous vigor, and its general breadth of style. She played the beautiful first movement especially with variety of feeling and ample poetry. The orchestra did all its work admirably, but in particular it must be praised for its brilliant performance of the Goldmark overture.

The World.

by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.

URSDAY, MARCH 23, 1899.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Teresa Carreno, the Pianist, Plays for the First Time This Season in New York.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday. Two of its first violins were missing, owing to illness—Messrs. C. M. Loeffler and Otto Roth—and their absence gave an unfamiliar look to the row of musicians.

The concert served to introduce Mme. Teresa Carreno to New York for the first time this season. The admirable pianist has been delighting the West with her exhibitions of enthusiastic and temperamental playing.

Her selection yesterday was Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto—an opus which did much to acquaint the world with the fact that in its composer a new force in music had come to life. It is a work which is full of the Russian's individuality, his fondness for native forms, his command of orchestral resources, his love of bright color—in fact, everything that has given his music its identity. It is a difficult composition for both the solo instrument and the accompanying orchestra.

Mme. Carreno found in it a vehicle for her exuberant love of music and her delight in phrases and passages that permit of vigorous and dramatic expression. Her performance was a superb one—big, broad, masterly, spontaneous, and yet well balanced in contrasts. The ornamental figure with which the piano accompanies the dainty waltz theme in the second movement was played with fairy fingers; the fortissimo which concludes the concert was thundered with wrists of steel. The interpretation was one to be recorded among the pianistic events of the season.

The orchestra played its numbers with fidelity to its high standard. In Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture it displayed its great plasticity; in the accompaniment to the piano concerto it was supporting in the true sense; in Felix Mottl's orchestrated version of Chabrier's "Bouffee Fantasque"—in which modern methods are utilized for virtuoso purposes—it was fairly arrogant in its technical superiority, and in Brahms's long, very long, second symphony it was obedient to Mr. Gericke's very conservative directions.

The World.

by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.

FRIDAY, MARCH 24, 1899.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA'S FAREWELL.

Visiting Musicians, with Teresa Carreno as Soloist, Give Their Last Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its last concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday evening. With it the thirteenth season in New York of these visiting musicians came to an end. It has been the most prosperous of all. Ten concerts have been given, of which five were matinees, and the same schedule will be followed next winter.

Last night's programme served to display the tonal beauties and virtuosity of the band to their fullest. It commenced with Goldmark's "Sakuntara" overture, with its insistent melodic suavity and its rich orchestral coloring. Mr. Gericke's reading of this familiar work was not altogether in accordance with usage. The second orchestral number was Tschaikowsky's Suite No. 1, a work which has no particular purpose and sugests the grouping of a few unutilized sketches. It is well-written music—the fugue in the first movement is developed in a masterly manner. The third was Richard Strauss's "Death and Transfiguration," which has not been heard here since Jan. 8 and 9, 1892, when it was played by the Philharmonic Society under Mr. Seidl's direction.

Mme. Teresa Carreno was the soloist. She played MacDowell's second pianoforte concerto, with its exquisitely eautiful first movement and its elfinlike presto. She was in the best of dispositions and fairly swept with an irresistible onward rush through the beautiful first movement and its elfintion of splendid spontaneity in musical execution. her performance ranked with that of Wednesday afternoon.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, MARCH 21, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Its Fifth and Last of This Season's Series—The Wonder of the Strauss Number.

The fifth and last concert for this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night at the Academy of Music and the programme was made up exclusively from modern music. The tone-poem of Richard Strauss, entitled "Death and Transfiguration," which concluded the concert, is an imaginative score descriptive of the vanity of the finite in a sense replete with woe. Elsewhere it has been designated as impure and diseased music, but the end of mortal life is such. It has been ridiculed for its abrupt changes and its didactic discords, but is not this also but a reflex of mortality? There may be those who will shudder and shrink from the story it tells, but its appeal to the heart touched with grief is absorbing and those in sympath th misery hang on the utterances of th core with bated breath from the first touch of the musician-reciter on the vehicle of his speech until its final wail. During the course of its narrative and when the tympani gives the final heart throbs, whereafter climax is heaped on climax and the grandeur of tone becomes intoxicating, a full realization of the smallness of individual life becomes well nigh burdensome so unerringly has this latest young master built his musical tragedy. There is one other piece of music which equals it in the exactness of its speech, but the duet in "Tristan and Isolde" has passion for its theme, while this tone-poem deals with woe's refining fire.

The playing of the orchestra in this number, as throughout the programme, was most superior, and Wilhelm Gericke has never yet conducted here with such distinct authority.

The Tschaikowsky suite, with which the concert began, is a beautiful work. Its second number and its last—the divert'mento and gavotte—were exquisitely presented and the orchestration of the fir t of these is one of the most abundant in contrast and color that may be found. The wood wind department gave a beautiful illustration of its technical mastery in the syncopated cadenza of the intermezzo, and the humor of the scherzo was impudently amusing.

Teresa Carreno was the soloist and played Macdowell's concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, op. 23, a composition prepared for her by the brilliant young man who was once her pupil. Needless to say that, while being legitimate in its form and clever in its construction, it is made to conform with the artist's superior accomplishments, not even omitting her beautiful mastery of the trill. The composition is one that Madame Carreno has played with success in Europe and its merit has gained it a prominent place among the classics for piano. At a first hearing the second movement leaves the most enjoyable impression and in it the artist also displayed her powers to the fullest advantage. Enthusiasm earned her four recalls after her conclusion of the last movement.

The Press

TUESDAY, MARCH 21, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Madame Carreno the Soloist in a Concerto by MacDowell.

Madame Carreno as a pianist is unquestionably one of the most thoroughly inspiriting of all the contemporary interpreters of the instrument. The MacDowell concerto, which she played at the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening, did not, it is true, give her marked opportunity to display depth and breadth of sentiment, since it rather exploits, so far as it goes, pianistic rather than emotional effects. In consequence, Madame Carreno made her impression particularly in the presto giocoso, through her marvelous agility, her dash of execution and the spirit with which she rounded up the solo passages. There was such a delicious crispness about her concluding phrases, such clean-cut workmanship and such a sense of sureness and absolute mastery of the instrument that the composition seemed lost in the interpreter, though much that was so beautiful in the first and second movements was due the more to the composer than to the perfection of its interpretation.

Just as Madame Carreno made her position as a virtuoso self-evident in the concerto, so the orchestra displayed its extraordinary excellence in the Tschaikowski suite, which was worthy of its steel, and in the rather tiresome Strauss potpourri of phrases and fragments labeled "Death and Transfiguration." The label meant little, the music less save in so far as it was the obvious music of the school which is wearing the Wagnerian formulae threadbare. Strauss, however, could not ask for a more sympathetic and discerning interpretation than his work received last evening. There was every variation in shading that the music and its subject called for, and if some other label might have fitted it as well, that was not the fault of Mr. Gericke's band. In the Tschaikowski number repeated opportunity was given for the exemplification not only of the superb work of the orchestra as a whole but of the perfection of its individual members, especially those of the wood-wind. The six movements, with their thematic, rhythmic and color contrasts were served up as fine morsels and the Slav triumphed for himself and in and by the orchestra.

This, the final concert, was curious in that the programme contained neither a symphony nor a Wagner number. The Tschaikowski suite was certainly acceptable in lieu of a symphony, but Strauss might have been thrown over for some of the older favorites.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, March 21, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Text of Richard Strauss's Extreme Tonal Poem.

Mme. Teresa Carreno, recently heard here at a Kneisel Quartet concert, was the soloist of the fifth and farewell Boston Symphony concert at the Academy of Music last evening, and she played Edward MacDowell's pianoforte concerto in D minor (No. 2, op. 23) in her characteristically brilliant and yet earnestly interpretative style. The orchestral novelties were Tchaikovsky's Suite No. 1, in D minor (Op. 43), which embraces six movements—an introduction, with chromatic theme, and a free Fugue; a very melodious diretimento; an Intermezzo, of contrasted Oriental and romanza themes; a somewhat jocose Marche Miniature; a brilliant Scherzo, and an elaborate Gavotte finale—and Richard Strauss' much-discussed tone-poem, "Death and Transfiguration," with its extreme musical realism. The text, on which the young Viennese composer has sought thus tonally to express is as follows:

In the necessitous little room, dimly lighted by only a candle-end, lies the sick man on his bed. But just now he has wrestled despairingly with Death. Now he has sunk exhausted into sleep, and thou hearest only the soft ticking of the clock on the wall in the room, whose awful silence gives a foreboding of the nearness of death. Over the sick man's pale features plays a sad smile. Dreams he, on the boundary of life, of the golden life of childhood?

But Death does not long grant sleep and dreams to his victim. Cruelly he shakes him awake, and the fight begins afresh. Will to live and power of Death! What frightful wrestling! Neither bears off the victory, and all is silent once more!

Sunk back tired of battle, sleepless, as in fever-frenzy the sick man now sees his life pass before his inner eye, trait by trait and scene by scene. First the morning red of childhood, shining bright in pure innocence! Then the youth's saucier play—exerting and trying his strength—till he ripens to the man's fight, and now burns with hot lust after the highest prizes of life. The one high purpose that has led him through life was to shape all he saw transfigured into a still more transfigured form. Cold and sneering, the world sets barrier upon barrier in the way of his achievement. If he thinks himself near his goal, a "Halt!" thunders in his ear. "Make the barrier thy stirrup! Even higher and onward go!" And so he pushes forward, so he climbs, desists not from his sacred purpose. What he has ever sought with his heart's deepest yearning he still seeks in his death sweat. Seeks—alas! and finds it never. Whether he comprehends it more clearly, or that it grows upon him gradually, he can yet never exhaust it, cannot complete it in his spirit. Then clangs the last stroke of Death's iron hammer, breaks the earthly body in twain, covers the eye with the night of death.

But from the heavenly spaces sounds mightily to greet him what he yearningly sought for here—deliverance from the world, transfiguration of the world!

The Sun.

THURSDAY, MARCH 23, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Pleasing Concert in Carnegie Hall Yesterday Afternoon.

An appreciative audience, of large numbers, attended the Boston Symphony Orchestra's last matinée concert of the season at Carnegie Hall yesterday. Mr. Gericke offered a programme consisting of the "Hebrides" (or "Fingal's Cave") overture, by Mendelssohn; the first piano cencerto by Tschaikowsky; "Bourrée Fantasque," by Chabrier, and the second symphony, by Brahms. Mme. Teresa Carreño was the soloist.

It has become impossible to write of this orchestra's playing without praising it The musicians form, as a result of their excellent training under gifted conductors and their constant public playing, a pliant and perfectly developed body, sensitive to the slightest indication of the leader's ideas. The fact that the orchestra has become such a splendid instrument throws the brunt of any criticism on the director, for the players are but the means through which he gives expression to his conception of a work. Mr. Gericke is not a virtuoso conductor, though he seems to have gauged his wonderful orchestra and brings its manifold excellences into prominent view; he adheres strictly to the letter of the music but often fails to appreciate its spirit. His conceptions are imbued with his academic and somewhat austere personality, consequently there is no passion and little of warmth or buoyancy expressed by his orchestra.

From its peaceful introduction to its brilliant close the symphony shows the more popular side of Brahms. A lover of music can appreciate this work without being so expert as to follow a theme closely through a maze of polyphony. The allegretto grazioso is a particularly bright and happy movement.

The Chabrier number was scored by Felix Mottl for a regular orchestra, strengthened in some places, and with some of the accessories affected by composers of the day. The work is said to be based on a piano piece by the composer of "Gwendoline," and is in imitation of an ancient dance, the bourrée, as the title indicates. It is effectively orchestrated and will doubtless be heard here again.

Mme. Carreño's playing, almost masculine in character, did not fail to please. The concerto she chose is in Tschaikowsky's best vein, containing beautiful themes and bright color and orchestrated with the usual lavishness of the Russian master. The pianist's style is well suited to such music and her performance was in every way excellent. She used to advantage the many opportunities afforded by the work to display her technique and her ability to produce good tone effects. The audience was enthusiastic in its applause, recalling Mme. Carreño repeatedly, but she played no encore.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 21, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Last of Their Series of Concerts at the Academy of Music.

The last of the series of five concerts which have constituted the present season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia took place yesterday evening at the Academy of Music before an audience which, as has habitually been the case, crowded the house from floor to ceiling.

Where all have been so good, it is difficult to pick out any one as best, but last night's programme, besides being magnificently interpreted, gained additional interest from the fact that two of the three numbers were played here for the first time. The one, Tchaikovsky's suite No. 1, in D minor, and the other, Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

The third number on the programme was Edward McDowell's concerto for the pianoforte No. 2, in D minor.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conducted.

The Tchaikovsky suite needs no second hearing to determine whether it is beautiful or no.A second hearing would doubtless bring to light many additional beauties and implant them in the memory, but that it is a most delightful composition was immediately and abundantly made evident last night. There is not the slightest suggestion of Slavonic flavor or of gloom, as there is in some of the Russian composer's other works. On the contrary, all is bright, sparkling and gay. Once in the first movement the working out of the theme seemed a trifle laborious, but the second movement, with its idyllic suggestion, and the third and fourth with their quaint and dainty texture, were delightful. The scherzo and gavotte in the last two movements are brilliant pieces of writing, and were admirably played by the orchestra.

The way is not so clear to an appreciation of Strauss's tone poem on a first hearing. Given a familiar acquaintance with the subject on which the composer builds his descriptive music, and it is easy and at times pleasant enough to follow his thoughts; but the subject is one that does not always promote happy inspirations. The opening effect is one of weariness, and the fight with death quickly develops into chaos. The final transfiguration becomes a poem of glorification rather than a suggestion of ethereal regions. But these are first impressions that a subsequent hearing might change. The scoring is rich and in the style of Wagner, the all-father of modern music.

Mme. Teresa Carreno was the soloist, and played Edward MacDowell's concerto for the pianoforte in a most brilliant manner. The work itself is written almost as much for the orchestra as for the piano, and with a less dashing player at the piano, or a less perfect orchestra accompanying, the former might be in danger of being eclipsed. Mme. Carreno has all the delicacy of touch, the flexibility and power that used to distinguish Arabella Goddard, but she adds to it poetry and sentiment that Miss Goddard never possessed. She fairly astonished the audience last night, many of whom were not prepared for so splendid an exhibition of talent. Mme. Carreno had to return at least half a dozen times to bow her acknowledgements to the delighted audience.

Philadelphia Inquirer

TUESDAY - - - - MARCH 21, 1899

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

Last Concert of the Season With Teresa Carreno as Soloist

The last and in many respects the most interesting concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. William Gericke, took place last night at the Academy. The program was brief and novel so far as these concerts are concerned. It comprised Suite No. 1, in D minor, by Tchaikowski; concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, by MacDowell, and the love poem, "Death and Transfiguration," by Richard Strauss.

The suite is characteristic of Tchaikowski, is full of life, at times sportive and always interesting. The themes are largely brought out by the woodwind, to which the strings play dainty and sometimes fantastic accompaniment. The composition is strikingly original and the six movements are varied in theme and treatment. It was admirably played, and though one would not want such a form of composition regularly as a piece de resistance, it was thoroughly enjoyable and refreshingly original.

The MacDowell concerto is a dignified composition by the young American master, who is just beginning to receive deserved recognition. The first movement is stately, the themes being worked out with great care with interesting orchestral score of more than usual independent character. The second movement is a marvelously beautiful theme worked out most daintily with bewildering technical effects. The last is a largo developing into a splendid climax, in which all the themes are admirably worked out. Mme. Carreno played exquisitely. She is a noble artist with exquisite touch and perfect command. The second movement was played with unexcelled grace and perfection. She received a deserved ovation.

The Strauss number is a beautiful piece of descriptive composition in which tonal beauty and the composer's marvelous power of producing instrumental effects are everywhere shown.

The concert was one of the most interesting of the season, not only for the numbers themselves, but because of the unique character of the program.

·LIFE·

MUSIC

THE ponderous delights of Wagner are now being dispensed with a lavish hand from the stage of the Metropolitan Opera House. Mature goddesses and corpulent fairies vociferate in Teutonic gutturals, assisted by hard-working males. These males appear, as a rule, in their underclothing, with occasional door-mats thrown across their shoulders.

The narrative in these Wagnerian operas is generally primitive, often clumsy and unsuitable for dramatic purposes, but enlivened by monologues of stupefying length.

Every note of the music, however, to the true Wagnerian, has its subtle relation with some other note somewhere else. Every bar and measure, every toot and bang, are so laden with significance as to render music by other composers too trivial and contemptible for serious consideration.

A pleasant relief from too much opera of this description, and from some of the humbug that is inevitable with such intolerant adoration, is afforded by the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

Nothing can be more serious, more sincere, more technically perfect, than this marvelous company. Their programmes may sometimes be a little too lofty for the popular taste, but they are rendered with such delicacy and feeling as to become a delight to the professional and an education to the amateur.

The North American

Daily Advertiser and United States Gazette.

TUESDAY, MARCH 21, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Last of the Season Given at the Academy of Music.

At the Academy of Music last evening the final concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given, which, while a musical treat in every way, was chiefly notable for the fact that for the first time at these concerts the programme did not include a symphony, although the suite for orchestra by Tschaikowsy may almost be so called.

A delightful feature of the concert was the return of Madame Teresa Carreno, who offered MacDowell's second concerto in D minor, which she played in almost faultless style.

American Mch 22/99

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Last Concert of the Season Given at Music Hall.

The fifth and last concert of this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night in Music Hall to a good audience. The symphony was Haydn's "The Chase," in D major. It takes its name from the fourth movement, in which is a stirring hunting call, and a general liveliness reminiscent of the chase. The symphony is a rather stately, precise sort of work, but it is melodious, and the picture it gives is fresh and pleasing. It was beautifully played.

A much more interesting number was Tschaikowsky's "Piano Concerto No. 1," in B flat minor. Madame Teresa Carreno was the soloist. She is always most warmly received in Baltimore, and last night the enthusiasm of the audience was very marked. The concerto is what Beethoven and Brahms thought a concerto should be an orchestral composition, with the solo part running through the web and woof of the whole. The parts are well balanced, and the composer's skill in using all the resources of a full modern orchestra, producing rich effects, is beautifully illustrated. The grand chords near the introduction in the first movement and the development that follows are in the great Russian's vein. The whole working out is elaborate and impressive.

The second movement—an andantino at the start—begins with a simple, soft melody, and is succeeded by a charming dance theme, both developed and elaborated artistically by orchestra and piano, the piano part in particular being brought out with rare clearness and sweetness by the soloist. She threw her whole soul into the performance, as she always does, and the effect was stirring.

The third movement was in strong contrast to the second, the chief theme being a Cossack dance tune, which is handled with splendid fire. Everything in the movement is developed with great spirit, the composer working up to the climax with such energy that the music throbs with life. Madame Carreno played with such spirit and life that the audience was keyed up to a high pitch. A great burst of applause followed the performance, and the player was recalled again and again. She seemed greatly pleased at the warmth of applause.

The remaining numbers were Chabrier's "Bourree Fantastique," scored in a stirring manner by Mottl, and the prelude to "The Meistersingers," the finest overture Wagner ever wrote. All the work of the orchestra was on a very high plane.

The series of concerts has been a success this year, and the orchestra will return next autumn for its fifteenth season.

Sun Mch 22/99

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT

The Season's Series By The Boston Orchestra Ends With A Delightful Performance.

Much to the regret of the subscribers the last concert of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last night. The programme that was offered made the regrets still stronger. First came the Haydn Symphony in D major, "La Chasse," so called from the hunting movement with which it closes; then the Tchaikowsky Piano Concerto No. 1, in B flat minor, opus 23, with Mme. Teresa Carreno as the soloist; then the "Bourree Fantasque," by Emanuel Chabrier, scored for the orchestra by Felix Mottl, with the prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg" as the closing number. The Chabrier "Bourree" and the symphony were given their first performance in Baltimore by the Boston musicians.

The opening movements of the symphony were just a trifle disappointing—they were played so faultlessly that they seemed almost to lack spirit. In the dainty little minuet which followed the strongly marked rhythm made the movement more appealing. But it was in the picturesque hunting movement, with its lyric freshness, its brisk hunting calls, its wholesome out-of-door-ness, that the orchestra gave itself up to the spirit of the thing, and the audience surrendered itself to complete enjoyment.

No two numbers could have been selected which would have furnished sharper contrast than the symphony—dainty, melodious and joyous as it is, but without deep undercurrents of passion—and the the concerto, with its characteristic Tchaikowsky coloring and orchestration, its strong passages vibrant with deep emotion, alternating with passages so deep and tender and mysterious as to be almost painful in their sweetness.

The climax of the symphony was in the hunting song, but the climax of the concert was in the concerto, and it was due as much to Mme. Carreno's magnetism as to her magnificent playing. From the opening crashing chords, which seemed to be flung out in great handfuls, to the closing exquisite melody, the audience listened with almost breathless interest. Her touch was characterized by marvelous virility and almost reckless abandon, which made the delicacy of some of the pianissimo passages still more marked. The solo instrument dominated the orchestra throughout the concerto, and at the same time was supported by it.

There was no possible misunderstanding of the appreciation of the audience. Half a dozen recalls brought Mme. Carreno back to the platform again and again. And it was only because of submission to the inevitable and to the inexorable law of "no encores" that the audience finally settled down to listen to the next number by the orchestra. In connection with the enthusiastic reception of the concerto, the story Mr. Apthorp has added to his programme notes is apropos.

Von Bulow was the soloist at the first production of the concerto, which happened to be in Boston in 1875. Nobody knew Tchaikowsky then, but when the opening chords were heard of the superb piece of work everybody knew that the composition was the work of a master hand. At the close of the concert Von Bulow cabled his success to the composer, and the cablegram sent was the first ever sent from Boston to Moscow.

The Chabrier "Bourree Fantasque," one of the new numbers on the programme, is the composer's modern version of the old French dance. It is bright, free, dashing, and was given that artistic treatment by the orchestra which characterizes whatever is presented by it.

News Mch 21/1899

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Last Recital of the Season at Music Hall Tonight.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give its last recital for the season at Music Hall tonight. The soloist will be Mme. Teresa Carreno, and her coming will be welcomed by the large audience which she pleased upon the occasion of a former recital at Music Hall. The programme is to include Haydn, Tchaikovsky, Chabrier and Wagner. There is special interest in Mme. Carreno's number, the Tchaikovsky concerto, which was first brought out in Boston, in October, 1875. Tchaikovsky was a Russian, and a cablegram was sent to him at Moscow announcing the success of the work. It was the first cablegram ever sent from Boston to Moscow. Tchaikovsky died in St. Petersburg in 1893.

Josef Haydn's symphony in D-major, "La Chasse," is to be presented for the first time in Baltimore tonight. It was written more than 100 years ago. The title comes from the fourth movement, which is a sort of hunting symphonic poem. Emmanuel Chabrier's "Bourree Fantasque" is also to be given its first Baltimore rendition. The Bourree was an old dance, presumably of French origin. It is said to be still in vogue at Biscay, Spain. Chabrier, who wrote the piece originally for the piano forte, died in 1894. Felix Mottl, who scored it for the orchestra, is still living. He is an Austrian. The Wagner number is the "Prelude to the Master Singers of Nuremburg."

The season has been very successful for the Symphony. Last season was not successful, and the management had determined to give no more concerts in this city. A number of wealthy gentlemen made a guarantee, however, and induced the organization to come again. The musical people of the city have seemed to appreciate the effort made, and the concerts were so popular that the guarantee was reached at the third concert, whereupon the guarantors were released from further liability.

Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, the new conductor, was well received. The works given by the Orchestra the past season have been those of Beethoven, Berlioz, Brahms, Chabrier, Goldmark, Haydn, Henselt, Liszt, MacDowell, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann, Spohr, Tchaikovsky, Wagner and Weber. The soloists have included Mr. Emil Sauer, Mr. Willy Burmeister, Lady Halle, Mme. Carreno and Mme. Gadski.

Herald Mch 22/99

SUCCESSFUL FINALE

Baltimore Season of the Boston Orchestra Ended.

AN ENJOYABLE CONCERT

Madame Teresa Carreno Scores Another Triumph in Her Performance at a Tchaikovsky Piano Concerto—Series Next Year.

It was with mixed feelings of gratification and regret that a large audience filed out of the Music Hall last night. The occasion was the final concert of the season in this city by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and the conflicting emotions of the people who were there can be ascribed to the success which has characterized these affairs this year, and the fact that the concerts were over, for the time being at least.

A more interesting and enjoyable programme than the one presented by Director Gericke could hardly have been asked, as the culminating event of a most satisfactory series. While one of the several selections announced as a novelty was no novelty at all, it was the first performance of the composition given in Baltimore by this organization, and for this reason was readily accepted as something new in every particular.

The stellar feature of the evening, however, was generally conceded to be the performance of Tchaikovsky's B flat minor piano concerto by Madame Teresa Carreno. Written at the time when the composer was practically entering the arena of higher art in melodic construction, it literally teems with that buoyancy and happy expectation so characteristic of the embryo in heavy contrapuntal work. There is hardly to be found in one of the movements that idea of sombreness and gruesome forboding which typified the Tchaikovsky compositions after one disappointment had followed another.

Musical enthusiasts of this city who have been attending concerts for years back will remember when first this concerto was given in this city. It was at a matinee performance at the Lyceum Theatre, some 10 years ago, when Adele Aus der Ohe was the soloist, and the composer himself conducted what was then known as the Boston Festival Orchestra.

While Tchaikovsky at the time complimented both band and soloist for the excellent manner in which his concerto was given, he would have been forced to acknowledge, could he have been present last night, that there were some things even better than the best. Madame Carreno, with all her fine sense of phrasing, colossal technique and general force of action, pictured in tone even to the minutest detail every bit of sentiment contained in the concerto. She was as though imbued with the same spirit as moved the man who wrote it, and her absolute control of the keyboard was only equaled by splendid manner in which the orchestral part was handled by Mr. Gericke, and the players under him.

With the exception of the last movement, wherein the dash and fearlessness of the Slav is made exceptionally plain, Tchaikovsky shows in his work a penchant for the then prevalent Allemanic idea. He molds the themes in broad harmony to meet the necessary blend of nationality and school, and successfully works out a succession of new and beautiful harmonies.

It was with considerable frequency that the Haydn D major symphony "La Chasse" was given place upon the programmes, when the Peabody Symphony Concerts were given in years gone by. The Boston Orchestra's performance of the work last night, however, was its first in this city for the composition, and the unity of the concerted movements, together with the careful and intelligent reading given it justifies referring to the selection as something of a novelty.

The other orchestrial numbers were the "Bourree Fantasque," a piano piece, by Chabrier, and orchestrated by Felix Mottl, and the prelude to Wagner's "Meistersinger." The former was given a crisp rendition, but will hardly become generally popular for any superior musical worth.

Manager Comee stated positively last night that the orchestra would give a series of five concerts on Tuesday evenings in Baltimore next season.

Correspondent Mch 29/99

Schluß-Conzert der Boſtoner.

Mit einem erfolgreichen Conzert unter Mitwirkung der berühmten Pianiſtin Thereſe Carrenno ſchließt das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter ſeine Saiſon.

Mit einem überaus erfolgreichen Conzerte brachte geſtern Abend das Boſtoner Symphonie-Orcheſter ſeine diesſwinterliche — die 14. Saiſon — in Baltimore zu Ende, und wenn man einen Rückblick auf die fünf Conzerte wirft und ſich die zur Aufführung gebrachten Werke, ſowie die mitwirkenden Soliſten in's Gedächtniß zurückruft, ſo iſt Baltimore gerade nicht ſchlecht gefahren. Novitäten hat der Dirigent Hr. Gericke zwar nicht viele geboten, im Ganzen nur drei, und davon geſtern Abend gleich zwei, Chaurier's „Bourree Fantasque" und Haydn's „Jagd-Symphonie;" die andere früher gehörte Novität war McDowell's ſymphoniſches Gedicht „Launcelot und Elaine." An Symphonie'n gab's ferner Beethoven's Nr. 4 in B-Dur, Berlioz's Nr. 13 in G-Dur „Harold in Italien," Schubert's Nr. 9 in C-Dur und Schumann's Nr. 2 in C-Dur. Daneben wurden von Orcheſter-Nummern geboten Brahms' Variationen über ein Thema von Haydn („Chorale Sancti Antoni") u. Walzer, welche Hr. Gericke orcheſtrirt hatte, Goldmark's „Frühlings-Ouvertüre," Liszt's „Les Preludes," Tſchaikowsky's Ouvertüre-Fantaſie „Romeo and Juliet," Wagner's „Tannhäuſer-Ouvertüre" und Vorſpiel zu den „Meiſterſingern" und Weber's „Freiſchütz-Ouvertüre. An Soliſten führte Hr. Gericke dem hieſigen Publikum Fr. Kneiſel, Willie Burmeiſter — der Einzige, der keinen Erfolg erzielte — die Violin-Virtuoſin Lady Halle, den Pianiſten Emil Sauer, die Primadonna Mdme. Gadski und geſtern Abend die berühmte Pianiſtin Thereſe Carrenno vor, ſo daß die hieſigen Muſikfreunde gerade keinen Grund zur Klage haben.

Was aber beſonders erfreulich für den Ruf Baltimore's als einer Muſik liebenden Stadt iſt, iſt die Verſicherung, welche der Geſchäftsführer des Orcheſters giebt, daß derſelbe im nächſten Winter Baltimore wieder beſuchen werde. Bekanntlich hat Baltimore die Conzerte in dieſem Winter nur der Hochherzigkeit einiger gut ſituirter Herren zu verdanken, welche der Geſchäftsleitung des Orcheſters eine beſtimmte Summe garantirten und dadurch die Serie der fünf Conzerte ſicherten. Die Conzerte brachten aber dieſesmal ſo viel ein, daß bereits nach dem dritten Conzert die Garantoren von jeder weiteren finanziellen Verantwortung befreit wurden.

Das geſtrige Conzert war auch wieder ſehr gut beſucht, und war es wohl einerſeits das intereſſante Programm, welches Hr. Wilhelm Gericke für dieſes Abſchieds-Conzert aufgeſtellt hatte, als auch andererſeits das Erſcheinen der Mad. Tereſa Carreno, der bekannten Klavier-Virtuoſin, welches die Muſikfreunde nach der „Muſikhalle" hinzog.

Madame Carrenno iſt hier keine Fremde, das bewies ihr bereits die herzliche Begrüßung, die ihr zu Theil wurde, als ſie an dem Flügel ſich niederließ, um Tſchaikowski's Klavier-Conzert Nr. 1 in B-Moll zu ſpielen. Und als ſie dann das herrliche Conzert in der ihr eigenen künſtleriſchen Vollendung interpretirt hatte und bereits nach jedem Satze durch den lebhafteſten Applaus ausgezeichnet worden, da erhob ſich ein wahrer Beifallsſturm, eine Ovation, wie ſie enthuſiaſtiſcher nicht ſein konnte. Der Applaus ſchien kein Ende nehmen zu wollen, und nicht weniger als ſieben Male wurde die Meiſterin des Klavierſpiels hervorgerufen. Meiſterin iſt ſie bei ihrer tadelloſen, verblüffenden Technik, und ihrer künſtleriſchen Interpretation; und nur gar zu gern hätten die Zuhörer noch einer weiteren Gabe der Künſtlerin gelauſcht. Was das Tſchaikowski'ſche Conzert anlangt, ſo iſt es bekanntlich das ſchönſte, das der große Ruſſe geſchrieben, und wie es das erſte war, das den damals noch unbekannten Tondichter vor die Welt brachte, ſo war es gewiſſermaßen wunderbar, daß 1893, bei ſeinem letzten öffentlichen Auftreten in St. Petersburg, eine Woche vor ſeinem Tode, gerade dieſes erſte Conzert geſpielt wurde, und zwar von Adele aus der Ohe, als ſie [illegible] burg auftrat.

An Orcheſter-Nummern bot das Conzert drei, wie oben bemerkt, zwei Novitäten, und Wagner's Vorſpiel zu „Die Meiſterſinger."

Die Haydn'ſche Symphonie in D-Dur iſt eine der beſten des Tondichters und fand bei der Leiſtungsfähigkeit der Boſtoner, hinſichtlich der Tonqualität und Technik eine treffliche Darlegung. Daſſelbe konnte man von dem urſprünglich nur für Klavier geſchriebenen Chabrier'ſchen Tanz „Bourre Fantasque," den Felix Mottl orcheſtrirt hat, ſagen, und effektvoll war auch der Beſchluß des Conzertes mit der Wiedergabe des Vorſpiels zu „Die Meiſterſinger."

"The country with its institutions belongs to the People who inhabit it."

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

March 28

AT ONCE

New Music Hall Will Be Begun.

A special meeting of the stockholders of the New Boston Music Hall was held in their room 314 Tremont building at 11 a.m. today, to consider the advisability of authorizing the construction of a music hall in conformity with the plans previously submitted by the directors.

The plans were thoroughly discussed and it was unanimously voted that they be adopted and the construction of the building be begun at once.

A call will be made for subscriptions to bring the amount for the building up to $500,000, $360,000 having already been subscribed.

The cost of the hall will approximate $400,000, although, as the estimates are not yet completed, it is difficult at the present time to make the figures other than general ones.

The hall will be located on the S.W. corner of Huntington and Mass. aves., and will be built of red brick and granite in the style of the French Renaissance.

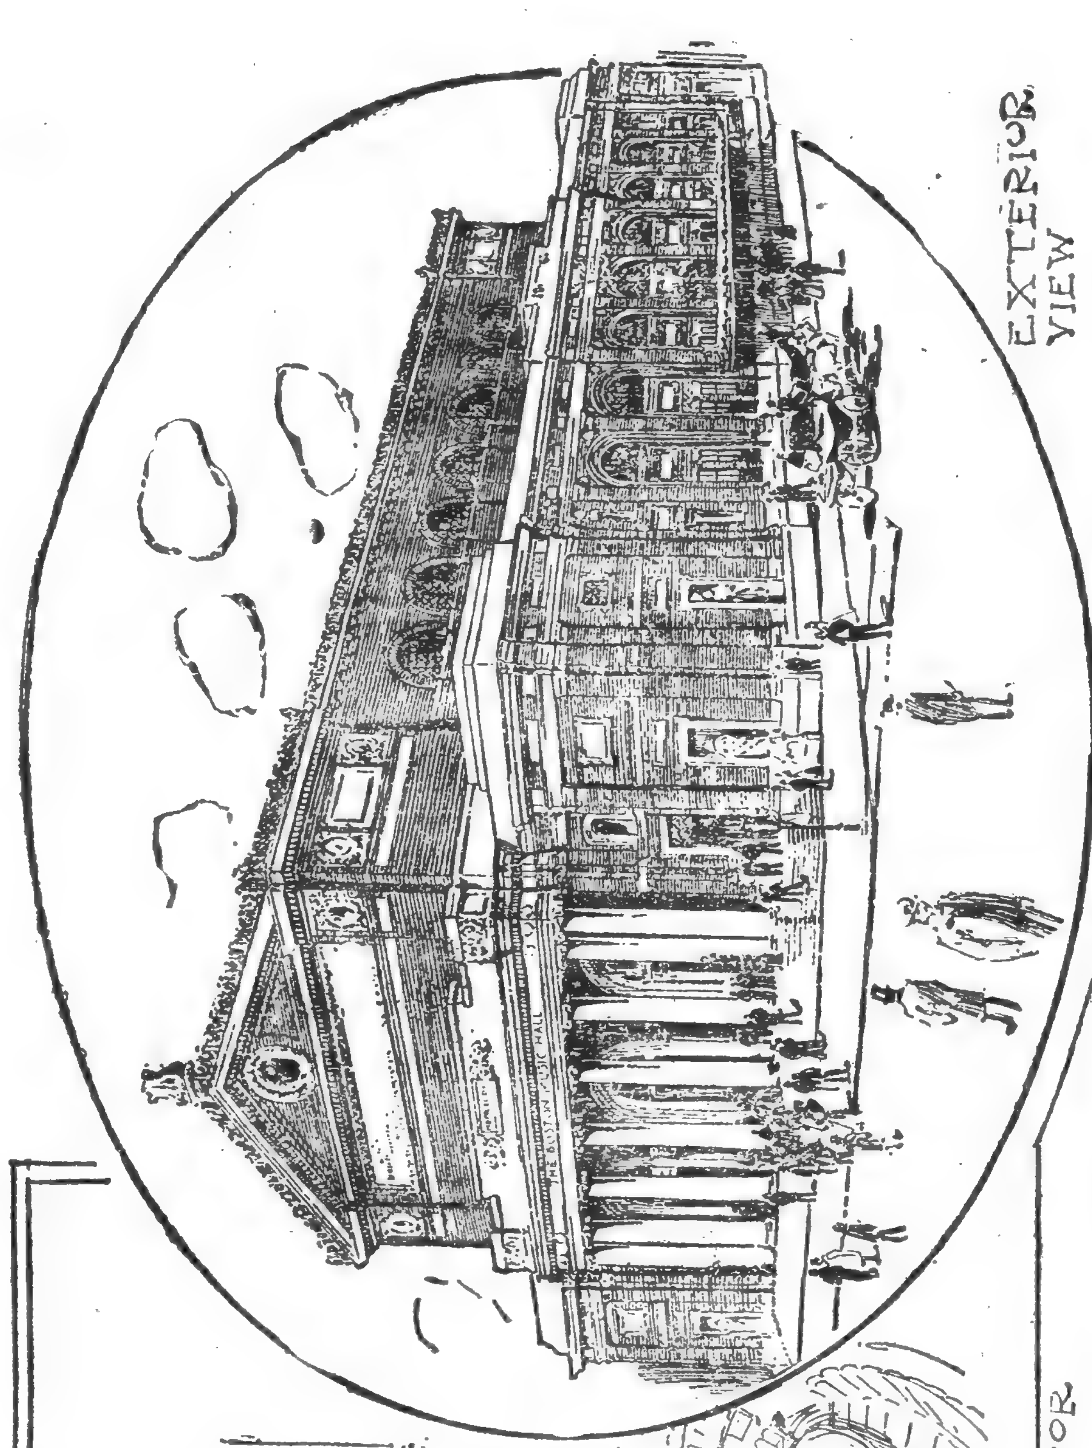
Boston Transcript

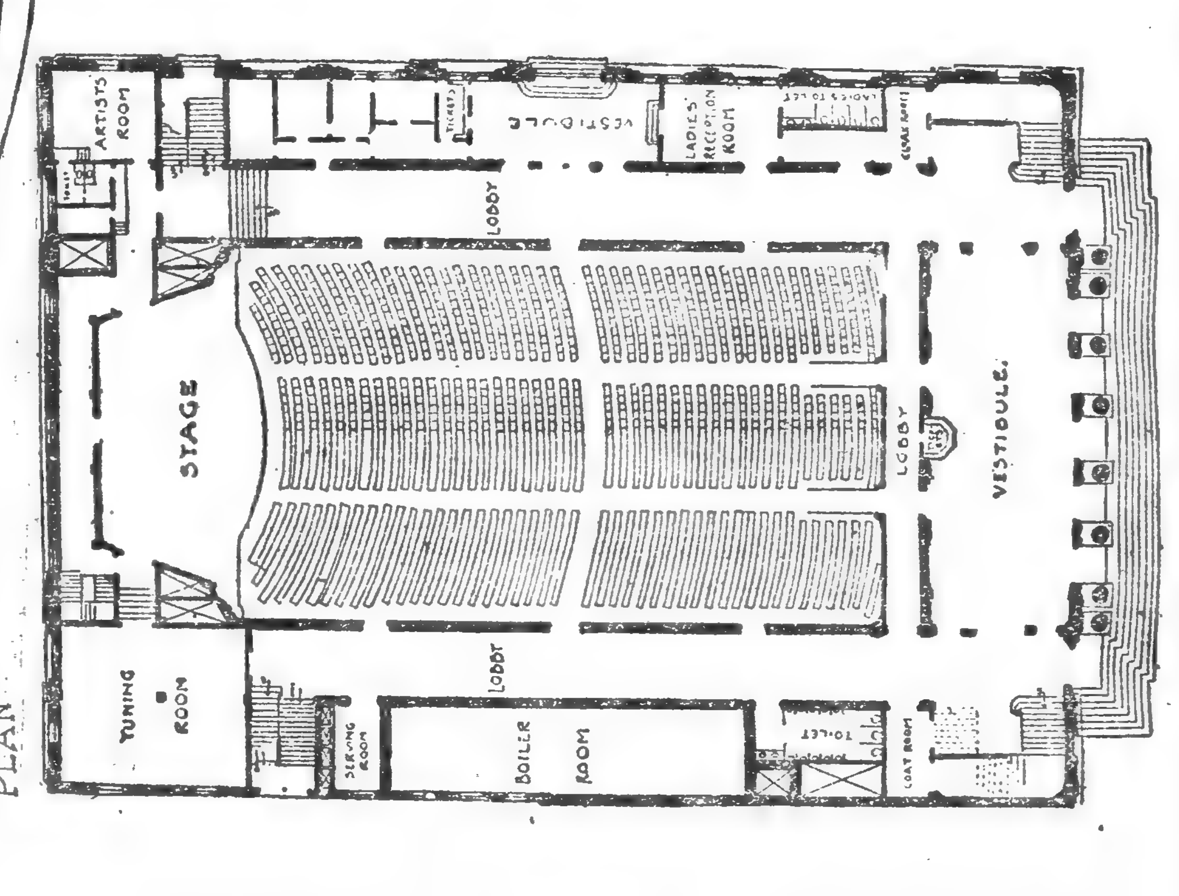
TUESDAY, MARCH 28,

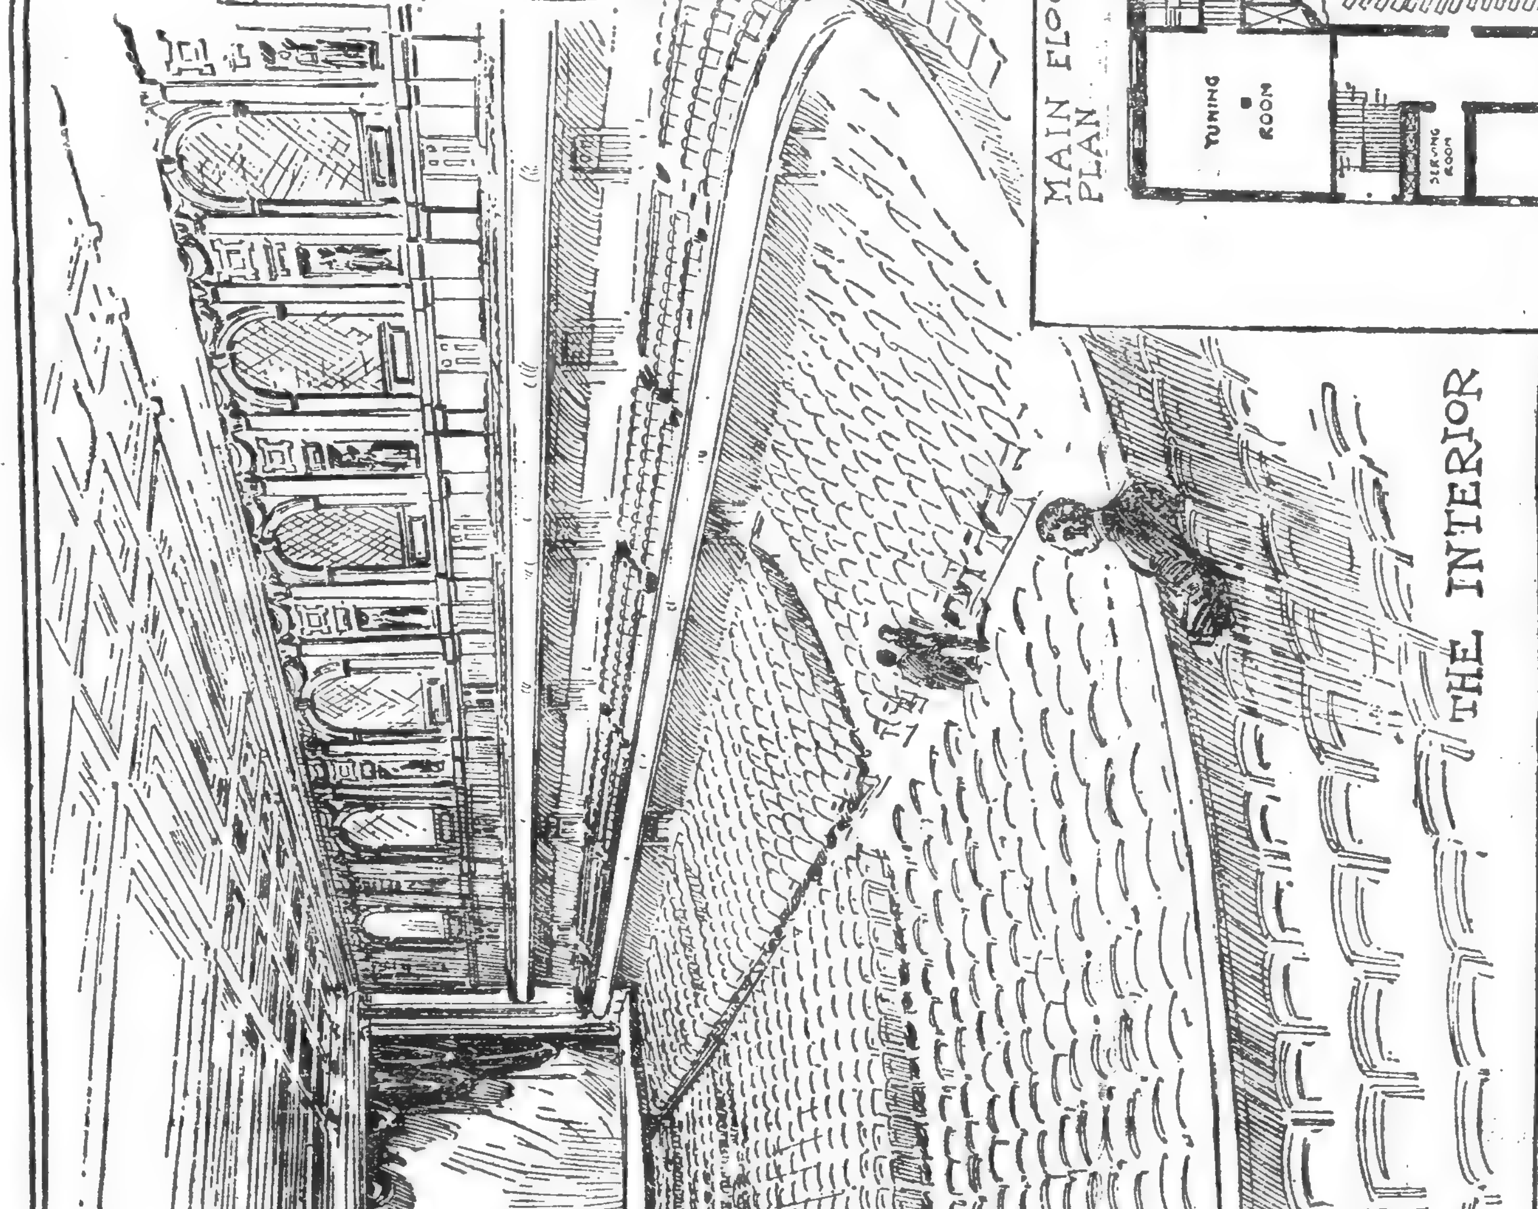
NEW MUSIC HALL PLANS APPROVED

Stockholders Have Authorized the Directors to Proceed with the Construction of the Building According to the Plans Practically as Submitted

A special meeting of the stockholders of the new Boston Music Hall was held this morning at eleven o'clock in room 314 of the Tremont Building, to consider the advisability of authorizing the construction of the building in conformity with the plans submitted by the directors. Colonel Henry L. Higginson presided, and it was at once unanimously voted, without debate, that the directors be authorized to proceed with the erection of the structure according to the plans practically as proposed. The whole proceeding occupied only a few minutes.







THE INTERIOR OF THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL AS IT WILL APPEAR ON COMPLETION.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CV., NO. 88.

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 1899.

NEW MUSIC HALL ASSURED.

A Meeting of the Stockholders Was Held Yesterday.

They Decided to Build Substantially in Accordance with Plans Made by McKim, Mead & White—Outstanding Subscriptions to Be Collected.

A special meeting of the stockholders of the new music hall was held at room 314, Tremont building, yesterday, to consider the advisability of authorizing the construction of a music hall in conformity with the plans submitted by the directors.

Col. Henry L. Higginson presided. Mr. Charles E. Cotting acted as secretary. About a dozen stockholders were present.

It was voted to build the new music hall substantially in accordance with the plans made by the architects, McKim, Mead & White.

Mr. Edward W. Hooper, in answer to a question put to him by another stockholder as to the price of the new building, said that no estimates have been given as yet. Continuing, he said: "We cannot start at all without the leave of the stockholders. We are trying to get the estimates."

Mr. Hooper suggested that all outstanding subscriptions be collected. Nine-tenths of the original subscriptions had been paid in. The directors had a claim against the Stevenson estate amounting to $10,000. There was some litigation about this estate, and it would be some time before a settlement could be made.

"We shall need more money," Mr. Hooper went on to say. "We will be glad if the stockholders will increase their subscriptions. Of course we shall go on and build the hall, even if we have to take a small mortgage on the structure. We shall not abandon the enterprise. We need about $500,000. There has been paid in now about $360,000, and about $260,000 of this has been expended."

Hanging on the walls of the committee room were several plans and sketches of the new music hall, which had been sent to the directors by McKim, Mead & White. Conspicuous among these drawings was a crayon sketch of the new edifice.

[127]

HERALD.
EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CV., NO. 87.
TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1899.

OUR NEW MUSIC HALL

Plans of McKim, Mead & White Adopted.

It Is Not Possible Yet to Estimate the Cost.

No Doubt That More Money Must Be Collected.

Work Will Proceed, Even if There Is a Mortgage.

Meeting of Stockholders, Col. Higginson Presiding.

A special meeting of the stockholders of the New Music Hall was held at room 314, Tremont building, at 11 o'clock this morning, to consider the advisability of authorizing the construction of a music hall in conformity with the plans submitted by the directors.

Col. Henry L. Higginson presided. Mr. Charles E. Cotting acted as secretary. About a dozen stockholders were present.

It was voted to build the New Music Hall substantially in accordance with the plans made by the architects, McKim, Mead & White.

Mr. Edward W. Hooper, in answer to a question put to him by another stockholder as to the price of the new building, said that no estimates have been given as yet. Continuing, he said: "De cannot start at all without the leave of the stockholders. We are trying to get the estimates."

Mr. Hooper suggested that all outstanding subscriptions be collected. Nine-tenths of the original subscriptions had been paid in. The directors had a claim against the Stevenson estate amounting to $10,000. There was some litigation about this estate, and it would be some time before a settlement could be made.

"We shall need more money," Mr. Hooper went on to say. "We will be glad if the stockholders will increase their subscriptions. Of course we shall go on and build the hall, even if we have to take a small mortgage on the structure. We shall not abandon the enterprise. We need about $500,000. There has been paid in now about $360,000, and about $260,000 of this has been expended."

Hanging on the walls of the committee room were several plans and sketches of the new Music Hall, which had been sent to the directors by McKim, Mead & White. Conspicuous among these drawings was a crayon sketch of the new edifice.

Boston Journal.
TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1899.

WILL BUILD NOW.

Short Meeting of Stockholders Authorizes Construction of New Music Hall.

The special meeting of the new Music Hall stockholders, which was held at the rooms in the Tremont Building this morning, was the shortest meeting on record. Only four members of the company were present, but they represented a quorum, as each had pocketsful of proxies. Col. Higginson presided, and put just one motion. This was on the question of authorizing the construction of the hall in conformity with the plan that has been published in the papers, and which had been accepted by the Directors.

Te plan was adopted, and the construction authorized.

Globe
DAY, MARCH 28,

BOSTON'S NEW MUSIC HALL.

Will be Built from the Plans Recently Published in The Globe—Matter Decided Today.

Boston is to have a new music hall built from the plans which were recently described and illustrated in The Globe. That is settled.

The stockholders held a special meeting this morning in the Tremont building. Col Henry L. Higginson presided. They voted unanimously, without any discussion, that the directors be authorized to proceed with the erection of a music hall according to the plans and specifications submitted by the said board of directors to the stockholders.

Edward W. Hooper said in reply to an inquiring stockholder that no estimate of cost had yet been given. Nine-tenths of the subscriptions had been paid and the remainder should be collected at once. A claim of $10,000 against the Stevenson estate probably could not be settled for some time owing to litigation.

Mr Hooper explained that $360,000 had been paid in of which $260,000 had been expended. About $500,000 was needed, and an increase of subscriptions would be welcomed. The hall would be built, however, even if it was necessary to place a small mortgage upon it.

March 28

The Boston Traveler

NEW MUSIC HALL.

Plans Submitted By Mc Kim, Mead & White Accepted at Meeting Today.

A special meeting of the stockholders of the new Music Hall was held at Room 314, Tremont building, at 11 o'clock, to consider the advisability of authorizing the construction of a music hall in conformity with the plans submitted by the directors.

Colonel Henry L. Higginson presided. Mr. Charles E. Cotting acted as secretary. About a dozen stockholders were present.

It was voted to build the new Music Hall substantially in accordance with the plans made by the architects, McKim, Mead & White.

"We shall need more money," Mr. Hooper went on to say. We need about $500,000. There has been paid in now about $360,000, and about $260,000 of this has been expended."

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CV., NO. 89.
THURSDAY, MARCH 30, 1899.

Have you picked out your seats on the plan of the new music hall for the opening night? The front row of the first balcony will be good enough for a king or queen, but I do hope it won't take years to build the place. Since we have known there was to be a new hall, how desperately threadbare that dear old thing saturated with endless memories and associations of concerts, lectures, shows and fairs, does look! The inner history of Music Hall can never be properly written. It would take too long and fill too many volumes. When it was first proposed to abandon the place, Boston cried out in anguish at the idea, but the owners have smoothed the way to part by refraining from necessary improvements and repairs, and now it is wondered how we can wait to be on with the new love. Fickle times and ever-changing public!

Boston Transcript
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 1899

TO COLLECT ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS

About $500,000 Needed for the New Music Hall—Up to Date About $360,000 Have Been Paid In

In regard to the construction of the new Boston Music Hall, with which the directors were yesterday authorised by the stockholders to proceed, Edward W. Hooper said that no estimates of the price of the new structure have as yet been given. He suggested that all outstanding subscriptions be collected. Nine-tenths of the original subscriptions have been paid in. The directors had a claim against the Stevenson estate amounting to $10,000. There was some litigation about this estate, and it would be some time before a settlement could be made. "We shall need more money," Mr. Hooper went on to say. "We will be glad if the stockholders will increase their subscriptions. Of course we shall go on and build the hall, even if we have to take a small mortgage on the structure. We shall not abandon the enterprise. We need about $500,000. There has been paid in now about $360,000, and about $260,000 of this has been expended."

WEDNESDAY, MAR. 29, 1899.

BOSTON'S NEW MUSIC HALL.

Will be Built from the Plans Recently Published in The Globe—Matter Decided Yesterday.

Boston is to have a new music hall built from the plans which were recently described and illustrated in The Globe. That is settled.

The stockholders held a special meeting yesterday in the Tremont building. Col Henry L. Higginson presided. They voted unanimously, without any discussion, that the directors be authorized to proceed with the erection of a music hall according to the plans and specifications submitted by the said board of directors to the stockholders.

Edward W. Hooper said in reply to an inquiring stockholder that no estimate of cost had yet been given. Nine-tenths of the subscriptions had been paid and the remainder should be collected at once. A claim of $10,000 against the Stevenson estate probably could not be settled for some time owing to litigation.

Mr Hooper explained that $360,000 had been paid in, of which $260,000 had been expended. About $500,000 was needed, and an increase of subscriptions would be welcomed. The hall would be built, however, even if it was necessary to place a small mortgage upon it.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MUSIC HALL PLANS ADOPTED.

At a special meeting of the stockholders of the New Music Hall yesterday, it was voted to build the New Music Hall substantially in accordance with the plans made by the architects, McKim, Mead & White.

No estimates have been given yet.

Mr. E. W. Hooper suggested that all outstanding subscriptions be collected. Nine-tenths of the original subscriptions had been paid in. The directors had a claim against the Stevenson estate amounting to $10,000.

"We shall need more money," Mr. Hooper went on. "Of course we shall go on and build the hall, even if we have to take a small mortgage on the structure. We need about $500,000. There has been paid in now about $360,000, and about $260,000 of this has been expended."

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK
For Publishers' Announcements, see Page 24.
New York, April 1, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifth and last evening concert of their series for this season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, last Saturday evening.

The entire interest centred in the soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreño, who played Prof. MacDowell's effective second concerto for piano. At the Friday afternoon concert the same pianist performed Tschaikowsky's B flat minor concerto, that monumental epic which is heard much too seldom in New York's concert rooms.

Mme. Carreño has changed neither in looks, manner nor accomplishments since her former visits to New York. Her masculine style, encompassing technic and glowing temperament still form a combination that sweeps everything before it. The variety of her musical moods is perfectly remarkable, and one can hardly stop wondering at the versatility that allows Mme. Carreño to thunder so imposingly through the first movement of the Tschaikowsky work, and then to trifle so charmingly with the fascinating scherzo from MacDowell's concerto.

Musical writers seem to delight in giving Mme. Carreño all sorts of absurd titles, such as "Female Paderewski," "Lioness of the Pianoforte," "Female Rubinstein," "Brünnhilde of the Keyboard," etc. She is none of these: she is—Carreño, and that is the highest compliment of all.

There is no other female pianist to-day so exceptionally gifted as Mme. Carreño; certainly none who can play the Tschaikowsky concerto as she did last Friday.

Messrs. Chickering & Sons could not have secured for the exposition of their instrument a pianist more capable than Mme. Carreño of revealing all its tonal and dynamic possibilities.

S. T. E.

MUSICAL PHILADELPHIA.

Preceding the Sauer concert by a day or two, we had the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its final concert of the season, under the direction of Wilhelm Gehricke, but it seemed to be a case of the orchestra directing the conductor, especially during that wonderful score, Strauss' "Tone-poem." In attack and phrase the band was in advance of the beat, and the disturbing sensation this produced injured an appreciation of the music. Teresa Carreño was the soloist, and played MacDowell's concerto No. 2, in D minor. Her success was pronounced.

HOME JOURNAL.
NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 1899.

Boston Symphony.

The matinée and evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last week were, as usual, of the highest excellence. Madame Teresa Carreño was soloist, and Mr. Gericke offered as novelties the "Bourrée Fantasque," by Emmanuel Chabrier, scored by Felix Mottl; Tschaikowsky's suite in D minor; and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Tod und Verklärung," given for the first time at these concerts.

At the afternoon concert Madame Carreño played Tschaikowsky's B flat minor concerto, and at the evening concert MacDowell's D minor concerto, op. 23. Madame Carreño is playing better than ever, and, after the automaton technicians—I do not say pianists—we have listened to this winter, her broad and virile playing comes like manna to the hungry. Carreño has in her playing not only all the inimitable qualities of her sex,—instinctive grace, charm, coquetry,—but all the hitherto exclusive qualities of the opposite sex,—inspiration, breadth, and grasp of sentiment. She played the Tschaikowsky concerto magnificently, with a passion, sentiment, and pathos truly Muscovite, and even against the whole orchestra her fortissimo tone rang out clear and distinct. At the matinée the programme was Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, the Tschaikowsky concerto, the Chabrier "Bourrée Fantasque," and the Brahms symphony No. 2, D major. Mr. Gericke and his men did excellent work.

The evening concert was perhaps the more interesting of the two. Tschaikowsky's suite, the MacDowell concerto, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, and Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung" made up the programme. The orchestra gave a singularly clear and lucid reading of this last remarkable work, and I for one was left wondering as to where lies the obscurity and vagueness critics insist in finding in this score. The orchestration, sombre and mournful, is great from every artistic standpoint; it is nowhere muddy or obscure; and it is always convincing.

The "Sakuntala" overture was brilliantly played, as also some parts of the Tschaikowsky suite. At times there is too much of the stolid Teuton in Mr. Gericke's readings,—a matter-of-factness that does not fit in well with the lyric breadth of Tschaikowsky's passionate utterance,—but there are spots even on the sun, and, although the conductor of the Boston Orchestra sometimes fails to please, he never offends. Madame Carreño's playing of the MacDowell concerto was gorgeous in tone color, and exquisite alike in detail and in sentiment. It was a marvellous piece of virtuosity, illuminated with enchanting musical intelligence. Carreño's technical skill is as great as that of any artist before the public, but far beyond this skill are other qualities possessed by few; there are the acumen, the sentiments, the artistic temperament which gives us such readings as those the Boston Symphony audiences listened to last week.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 2, 1899.

(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twentieth Symphony concert was given in Music Hall last evening. There was no soloist. The orchestral selections were Mozart's symphony in C, No. 34; "Good Friday Spell," from Wagner's "Parsifal," and Dvorak's symphony No. 2 in D minor, op. 70.

The Mozart symphony, one of several that were written without the usual minuet, is one of the brightest and most vivacious of any by the composer.

The scoring is of the simplest, and the work is easily understood by anyone at all familiar with symphonic writing. The performance was of the best.

The "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," is one of the most beautiful things that Wagner has written, and after hearing it one can only wish for the time when "Parsifal" will be given in this country. It was received with more favor than any other number of the programme.

Dvorak's symphony has been given here several times since it first appeared, in 1885. It has much melodic invention in all the movements, especially the last, there is great elaboration of the themes, and richness of orchestration is everywhere apparent. The symphony was admirably performed, but did not seem to leave much impression on the audience.

At the next rehearsal and concert Schumann's "Manfred" music will be given with soloists and a chorus from the "Cecilia."

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CV., NO. 87.

TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1899.

OUR NEW MUSIC HALL

Plans of McKim, Mead & White Adopted.

It Is Not Possible Yet to Estimate the Cost.

No Doubt That More Money Must Be Collected.

Work Will Proceed, Even if There Is a Mortgage.

Meeting of Stockholders, Col. Higginson Presiding.

A special meeting of the stockholders of the New Music Hall was held at room 314, Tremont building, at 11 o'clock this morning, to consider the advisability of authorizing the construction of a music hall in conformity with the plans submitted by the directors.

Col. Henry L. Higginson presided. Mr. Charles E. Cotting acted as secretary. About a dozen stockholders were present.

It was voted to build the New Music Hall substantially in accordance with the plans made by the architects, McKim, Mead & White.

Mr. Edward W. Hooper, in answer to a question put to him by another stockhelder as to the price of the new building, said that no estimates have been given as yet. Continuing, he said: "De cannot start at all without the leave of the stockholders. We are trying to get the estimates."

Mr. Hooper suggested that all outstanding subscriptions be collected. Nine-tenths of the original subscriptions had been paid in. The directors had a claim against the Stevenson estate amounting to $10,000. There was some litigation about this estate, and it would be some time before a settlement could be made.

"We shall need more money," Mr. Hooper went on to say. "We will be glad if the stockholders will increase their subscriptions. Of course we shall go on and build the hall, even if we have to take a small mortgage on the structure. We shall not abandon the enterprise. We need about $500,000. There has been paid in now about $360,000, and about $260,000 of this has been expended."

Hanging on the walls of the committee room were several plans and sketches of the new Music Hall, which had been sent to the directors by McKim, Mead & White. Conspicuous among these drawings was a crayon sketch of the new edifice.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1899.

WILL BUILD NOW.

Short Meeting of Stockholders Authorizes Construction of New Music Hall.

The special meeting of the new Music Hall stockholders, which was held at the rooms in the Tremont Building this morning, was the shortest meeting on record. Only four members of the company were present, but they represented a quorum, as each had pocketsful of proxies. Col. Higginson presided, and put just one motion. This was on the question of authorizing the construction of the hall in conformity with the plan that has been published in the papers, and which had been accepted by the Directors.

Te plan was adopted, and the construction authorized.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, MARCH 28, 1899.

BOSTON'S NEW MUSIC HALL.

Will be Built from the Plans Recently Published in The Globe—Matter Decided Today.

Boston is to have a new music hall built from the plans which were recently described and illustrated in The Globe. That is settled.

The stockholders held a special meeting this morning in the Tremont building. Col Henry L. Higginson presided. They voted unanimously, without any discussion, that the directors be authorized to proceed with the erection of a music hall according to the plans and specifications submitted by the said board of directors to the stockholders.

Edward W. Hooper said in reply to an inquiring stockholder that no estimate of cost had yet been given. Nine-tenths of the subscriptions had been paid and the remainder should be collected at once. A claim of $10,000 against the Stevenson estate probably could not be settled for some time owing to litigation.

Mr Hooper explained that $360,000 had been paid in of which $260,000 had been expended. About $500,000 was needed, and an increase of subscriptions would be welcomed. The hall would be built, however, even if it was necessary to place a small mortgage upon it.

March 25

The Boston Traveler

NEW MUSIC HALL.

Plans Submitted By Mc Kim, Mead & White Accepted at Meeting Today.

A special meeting of the stockholders of the new Music Hall was held at Room 314, Tremont building, at 11 o'clock, to consider the advisability of authorizing the construction of a music hall in conformity with the plans submitted by the directors.

Colonel Henry L. Higginson presided. Mr. Charles E. Cotting acted as secretary. About a dozen stockholders were present.

It was voted to build the new Music Hall substantially in accordance with the plans made by the architects, McKim, Mead & White.

"We shall need more money," Mr. Hooper went on to say. We need about $500,000. There has been paid in now about $360,000, and about $260,000 of this has been expended."

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CV., NO. 89.

THURSDAY, MARCH 30, 1899.

Have you picked out your seats on the plan of the new music hall for the opening night? The front row of the first balcony will be good enough for a king or queen, but I do hope it won't take years to build the place. Since we have known there was to be a new hall, how desperately threadbare that dear old thing saturated with endless memories and associations of concerts, lectures, shows and fairs, does look! The inner history of Music Hall can never be properly written. It would take too long and fill too many volumes. When it was first proposed to abandon the place, Boston cried out in anguish at the idea, but the owners have smoothed the way to part by refraining from necessary improvements and repairs, and now it is wondered how we can wait to be on with the new love. Fickle times and ever-changing public!

Boston Transcript

WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 1899

TO COLLECT ALL SUBSCRIPTIONS

About $500,000 Needed for the New Music Hall—Up to Date About $360,000 Have Been Paid In

In regard to the construction of the new Boston Music Hall, with which the directors were yesterday authorized by the stockholders to proceed, Edward W. Hooper said that no estimates of the price of the new structure have as yet been given. He suggested that all outstanding subscriptions be collected. Nine-tenths of the original subscriptions have been paid in. The directors had a claim against the Stevenson estate amounting to $10,000. There was some litigation about this estate, and it would be some time before a settlement could be made. "We shall need more money," Mr. Hooper went on to say. "We will be glad if the stockholders will increase their subscriptions. Of course we shall go on and build the hall, even if we have to take a small mortgage on the structure. We shall not abandon the enterprise. We need about $500,000. There has been paid in now about $360,000, and about $260,000 of this has been expended."

Boston Daily Globe.

WEDNESDAY, MAR. 29, 1899

BOSTON'S NEW MUSIC HALL.

Will be Built from the Plans Recently Published in The Globe—Matter Decided Yesterday.

Boston is to have a new music hall built from the plans which were recently described and illustrated in The Globe. That is settled.

The stockholders held a special meeting yesterday in the Tremont building. Col Henry L. Higginson presided. They voted unanimously, without any discussion, that the directors be authorized to proceed with the erection of a music hall according to the plans and specifications submitted by the said board of directors to the stockholders.

Edward W. Hooper said in reply to an inquiring stockholder that no estimate of cost had yet been given. Nine-tenths of the subscriptions had been paid and the remainder should be collected at once. A claim of $10,000 against the Stevenson estate probably could not be settled for some time owing to litigation.

Mr Hooper explained that $360,000 had been paid in, of which $260,000 had been expended. About $500,000 was needed, and an increase of subscriptions would be welcomed. The hall would be built, however, even if it was necessary to place a small mortgage upon it.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MUSIC HALL PLANS ADOPTED.

At a special meeting of the stockholders of the New Music Hall yesterday, it was voted to build the New Music Hall substantially in accordance with the plans made by the architects, McKim, Mead & White.

No estimates have been given yet.

Mr. E. W. Hooper suggested that all outstanding subscriptions be collected. Nine-tenths of the original subscriptions had been paid in. The directors had a claim against the Stevenson estate amounting to $10,000.

"We shall need more money," Mr. Hooper went on. "Of course we shall go on and build the hall, even if we have to take a small mortgage on the structure. We need about $500,000. There has been paid in now about $360,000, and about $260,000 of this has been expended."

MUSICAL AMERICA

EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND

PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

For Publishers' Announcements, see Page 24.

New York, April 1, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The fifth and last evening concert of their series for this season was given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, last Saturday evening.

The entire interest centred in the soloist, Mme. Teresa Carreño, who played Prof. MacDowell's effective second concerto for piano. At the Friday afternoon concert the same pianist performed Tschaikowsky's B flat minor concerto, that monumental epic which is heard much too seldom in New York's concert rooms.

Mme. Carreño has changed neither in looks, manner nor accomplishments since her former visits to New York. Her masculine style, encompassing technic and glowing temperament still form a combination that sweeps everything before it. The variety of her musical moods is perfectly remarkable, and one can hardly stop wondering at the versatility that allows Mme. Carreño to thunder so imposingly through the first movement of the Tschaikowsky work, and then to trifle so charmingly with the fascinating scherzo from MacDowell's concerto.

Musical writers seem to delight in giving Mme. Carreño all sorts of absurd titles, such as "Female Paderewski," "Lioness of the Pianoforte," "Female Rubinstein," "Brünnhilde of the Keyboard," etc. She is none of these: she is—Carreño, and that is the highest compliment of all.

There is no other female pianist to-day so exceptionally gifted as Mme. Carreño; certainly none who can play the Tschaikowsky concerto as she did last Friday.

Messrs. Chickering & Sons could not have secured for the exposition of their instrument a pianist more capable than Mme. Carreño of revealing all its tonal and dynamic possibilities.

S. T. E.

MUSICAL PHILADELPHIA.

Preceding the Sauer concert by a day or two, we had the Boston Symphony Orchestra in its final concert of the season, under the direction of Wilhelm Gehricke, but it seemed to be a case of the orchestra directing the conductor, especially during that wonderful score, Strauss' "Tone-poem." In attack and phrase the band was in advance of the beat, and the disturbing sensation this produced injured an appreciation of the music. Teresa Carreño was the soloist, and played MacDowell's concerto No. 2, in D minor. Her success was pronounced.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 1899.

Boston Symphony.

The matinée and evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last week were, as usual, of the highest excellence. Madame Teresa Carreño was soloist, and Mr. Gericke offered as novelties the "Bourrée Fantasque," by Emmanuel Chabrier, scored by Felix Mottl; Tschaikowsky's suite in D minor; and Richard Strauss's tone poem, "Tod und Verklärung," given for the first time at these concerts.

At the afternoon concert Madame Carreño played Tschaikowsky's B flat minor concerto, and at the evening concert MacDowell's D minor concerto, op. 23. Madame Carreño is playing better than ever, and, after the automaton technicians—I do not say pianists—we have listened to this winter, her broad and virile playing comes like manna to the hungry. Carreño has in her playing not only all the inimitable qualities of her sex,—instinctive grace, charm, coquetry,—but all the hitherto exclusive qualities of the opposite sex,—inspiration, breadth, and grasp of sentiment. She played the Tschaikowsky concerto magnificently, with a passion, sentiment, and pathos truly Muscovite, and even against the whole orchestra her fortissimo tone rang out clear and distinct. At the matinée the programme was Mendelssohn's "Fingal's Cave" overture, the Tschaikowsky concerto, the Chabrier "Bourrée Fantasque," and the Brahms symphony No. 2, D major. Mr. Gericke and his men did excellent work.

The evening concert was perhaps the more interesting of the two. Tschaikowsky's suite, the MacDowell concerto, Goldmark's "Sakuntala" overture, and Strauss's "Tod und Verklärung" made up the programme. The orchestra gave a singularly clear and lucid reading of this last remarkable work, and I for one was left wondering as to where lies the obscurity and vagueness critics insist in finding in this score. The orchestration, sombre and mournful, is great from every artistic standpoint; it is nowhere muddy or obscure; and it is always convincing.

The "Sakuntala" overture was brilliantly played, as also some parts of the Tschaikowsky suite. At times there is too much of the stolid Teuton in Mr. Gericke's readings,—a matter-of-factness that does not fit in well with the lyric breadth of Tschaikowsky's passionate utterance,—but there are spots even on the sun, and, although the conductor of the Boston Orchestra sometimes fails to please, he never offends. Madame Carreño's playing of the MacDowell concerto was gorgeous in tone color, and exquisite alike in detail and in sentiment. It was a marvellous piece of virtuosity, illuminated with enchanting musical intelligence. Carreño's technical skill is as great as that of any artist before the public, but far beyond this skill are other qualities possessed by few; there are the acumen, the sentiments, the artistic temperament which gives us such readings as those the Boston Symphony audiences listened to last week.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 2, 1899.

(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twentieth Symphony concert was given in Music Hall last evening. There was no soloist. The orchestral selections were Mozart's symphony in C, No. 34; "Good Friday Spell," from Wagner's "Parsifal," and Dvorak's symphony No. 2 in D minor, op. 70.

The Mozart symphony, one of several that were written without the usual minuet, is one of the brightest and most vivacious of any by the composer.

The scoring is of the simplest, and the work is easily understood by anyone at all familiar with symphonic writing. The performance was of the best.

The "Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal," is one of the most beautiful things that Wagner has written, and after hearing it one can only wish for the time when "Parsifal" will be given in this country. It was received with more favor than any other number of the programme.

Dvorak's symphony has been given here several times since it first appeared, in 1885. It has much melodic invention in all the movements, especially the last, there is great elaboration of the themes, and richness of orchestration is everywhere apparent. The symphony was admirably performed, but did not seem to leave much impression on the audience.

At the next rehearsal and concert Schumann's "Manfred" music will be given with soloists and a chorus from the "Cecilia."

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 1899.

Fifth Matinee and Concert of the Boston Orchestra.

THE last pair of concerts—the fifth matinee and fifth evening performance—at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday of last week, were wholly successful. The weather was not propitious for a matinee, so the audience was larger in its enthusiasm than numbers. Mr. Gericke conducted a program consisting of Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave"; Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, Chabrier's "Bourée Fantasque," and the D major Symphony of Brahms. Mme. Teresa Carreño played the solo part of the B flat minor piano concerto of the Russian composer. It has never received a broader, a more brilliant reading here. There is little that is academic in the work, much that is startling, and a modicum of reverence for formal beauty that gives it savor and value. Mr. Apthorp, in his new essays, speaks of the pleasure Von Bülow gave Boston, when he presented the composition there a quarter of a century ago. The processional character of the opening measures, the tantalizing figure in octaves that follows, the rhapsodic working out section, the charm of the slow movement—a genuine romanze—the sudden apparition of a scintillating scherzo, and the massive and almost morbid quality of the finale, render this concerto a thing apart in piano literature. Carreño was absolutely mistress of herself, and her performance was a memorable one.

The Chabrier novelty did not particularly commend itself, giving the effect of being rather meagre in ideas. In reality it was originally written for piano and scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl in 1897.

The Wagner conductor of Carlsruhe knows his business, and has decked off the Frenchman's piano piece in gorgeous raiment. The Brahms Symphony was extremely well played. Mr. Gericke is a Brahms lover, and also understands him. Anything more transparent in thematic treatment and unfeignedly lovely in a musical sense than the first movement would be difficult to imagine. The orchestra was in good condition. Although recalled, Madame Carreño wisely refused an encore number.

At the Thursday evening concert Carreño was again the solo performer. She played with overwhelming vigor, fantasy and mental grasp the D minor piano concerto of Edward MacDowell. The work was first presented here by the composer. Madame Carreño has given it throughout the country and on the Continent with signal success. It is the second composition in this form, the first in A minor being—if we mistake not—introduced by Carreño at Chicago in 1888, before an M. T. N. A. meeting. The second concerto has far more musical depth than its outline, and freedom in form more than compensated for by the aerial, poetic content, the ease with which the composer keeps abreast of his inspiration, and the unfailing sense of orchestral color. MacDowell is always happy in selecting the right tint.

Goldmark's most characteristic overture, "Sakuntala," was played as an old stalking horse of the band should be. The Tschaikowsky orchestral suite in D minor is not the overwhelming Tschaikowsky of the third suite, op. 55. It is pretty, but then it is small, almost academic for such a brilliant improviser as its composer. The scherzo is excellent, the gavotte rather cheap, the marche miniature clever, while the introduction and fugue, divertimento and intermezzo show how commonplace and a striver after the banal Tschaikowsky could be. For the first time was this D minor suite given here, and for the first time at these concerts did we hear Richard Strauss' astounding "Tod und Verklarung," although Mr. Seidl produced the symphonic poem at a Philharmonic Society concert early in January, 1892. While not equaling in thematic invention or brilliancy the "Don Juan," nor comparable in philosophic poignancy and emotional intensity to "Also Sprach Zarathustra," "Death and Apotheosis" remains a worthy companion of Strauss' audacious tonal triptych. It has its almost repulsive moments, such as the dallying on the borderland of mortality, but this far fetched realism is not an essential of the scheme. It is Strauss' splendid attempt to portray psychical states, rather than his minute delineation of certain sinister memoranda of the very gasp at death's door. A vast and more shadowy canvas than the one on which Berlioz attempted some such a problem, but there is more imaginative grasp in the Strauss music, more uplifting of spirit, despite the resounding cymbals of the Requiem. The orchestra and Mr. Gericke were at their best. This closes this season's series. As far as purely absolute music has had a chance in New York, this one has thriven. But the times are not yet propitious for orchestral music.

Had Dryden been a modern poet he would have said, "What art can teach, what human voice can reach the sacred orchestra," instead of "the sacred organ's tone." We all regret that the last Symphony concert for the season has been given, and that Mr. Gericke and his fine body of musicians are to visit us no more until the fall. They have given us musical feasts, to which the soloist of the occasion has, perhaps, represented the dessert. In our criticisms we take the good work of the orchestra for granted, and are too apt to let it pass with a few words of commendation, bestowing our most careful scrutiny upon the special artist, and not giving to this larger body of special artists the meed of praise which it deserves. But as we say "vale" we wish them to know that all their efforts to give us intelligent pleasure are fully appreciated.

The symphonies on Friday afternoon were Haydn's "La Chasse" and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," in which Franz Kneisel played the viola solo, handling the less effective instrument with the ease and skill with which he does his violin, and bringing out of it a rare music. For the Saturday evening program the orchestral position included the Goldmark overture to "Sakuntala," Brahms' Symphony in D major, and a "Bourée Fantastique" by Chabrier, scored for the orchestra by Felix Mottl and played for the first time at these concerts. This was a jolly little dance that is scored in a most "fetching" style, with odd and unexpected little accents varied in different renditions of a measure. It is sure to be popular.

Mme. Teresa Carreño played at both concerts, giving on Friday the Tschaikowsky Concerto for piano in B flat minor, and on Saturday evening the MacDowell Concerto in D minor. She has a temperament that adapted itself perfectly to these two, so different in spirit. The fire and energy of the Russian received its full interpretation, while the MacDowell Concerto was played with a spirit, brilliancy and forceful touch that seemed almost incompatible with the player's physique. The presto movement was taken at a tremendous speed, big octave chords being dashed off as easily as triolets, and the audience gave a half a dozen enthusiastic recalls at the close of the performance.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1899.

FORTY-EIGHT PAGES.

Twentieth Symphony Concert.

By way of recognition of holy week, Mr Gericke's 20th Boston symphony program included the "Good Friday" spell music from Wagner's "Parsifal." One need not enlarge upon the charm and singular grace of this excerpt, even when only the instrumental part is presented. Wagner's command of effect in orchestration, so strangely evidenced in many works, is beautifully exemplified in this passage, and the musicians who follow Mr Gericke's baton entered upon their pleasant task con amore and carried it through with distinguished and complete success.

With so long a record of notable symphony essays as that which is set down to the credit of our Boston symphony orchestra, it seems strange indeed that a symphony by Mozart should have waited until Friday afternoon last for its first performance at its concerts. While the symphony No. 34 in C major is by no means a storm-and-stress production—being indeed a singularly simple and straightforward orchestral work, without any digressions such as are the peculiar delight of sworn admirers of music up to date, it ranks as a thoroughly pleasant and pleasing work. From first to last it is Mozart, and Mozart at his most melodious and cheerful is always a welcome figure. The orchestra seemed to enjoy what may be called an excursion for once in a way into the land of simplicity and harmony.

With its vigor of tone, strongly drawn themes, and stimulating interest, Dvorak's second symphony in D minor was appreciated all the more keenly by players and hearers alike, because of the contrast it afforded. Certainly there was no lack of spirit in the interpretation of the work of the Bohemian composer, whose earlier essays do not suffer by comparison with his more recent attempts to evolve symphonies out of the music of the southern negro, which are generally acknowledged to be much more ambitious than successful.

A field program is announced by Mr Gericke for his Easter week rehearsal and concert offerings—nothing less than Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred" poem. The reader is to be Mr Ffrangcon Davies. The orchestra is to have the assistance also of an array of soloists, including Mrs Marian Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands and Messrs Herbert Johnson, Clarence E. Day, Frederic L. Martin, Clinton A. Hyland and Clarence B. Ashenden, besides a chorus made up of members of the Cecilia club.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 1, 1899.

LAST MATINEE AND LAST EVENING CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Gericke's Orchestra completed its work for this season last week, and the attendance, both afternoon and evening, as well as the judiciously bestowed applause, were evidence that this orchestra continues to enjoy the appreciation of the refined music-loving public. On Wednesday afternoon the program consisted of Mendelssohn's overture, entitled "Fingal's Cave," Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, Charbrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl, and Brahm's D major symphony; while on Thursday evening the orchestra was heard in a suite in D major by Tschaikowsky, "Tod und Verklärung," by Richard Strauss, the "Sakuntala" overture, by Goldmark, and Edward MacDowell's second piano concerto, Mme. Teresa Carreno being the soloist in the two piano concertos. The playing of this artiste still continues to give evidence of all its old-time fire. Mme. Carreno made an early start in life as a "child pianist" of striking ability, and to her credit, be it said, she has so nurtured and cared for her art that it continues to be endowed almost with eternal youth. She gave unalloyed pleasure to her auditors, who rewarded her with most enthusiastic applause. In particular did her admirable art come to its fullest manifestation in the MacDowell concerto, which she invariably renders with great brilliancy. Of the work of the orchestra, it may be said that it was of the very highest order, holding the audience in rapt enjoyment. Tschaikowsky's suite produced almost startling effect upon those present, in fact, it may be said that the strings, in their rendering of the divertimento, reached absolute perfection of accord and coloring, holding the listeners spell-bound. A very cordial greeting was accorded to Mr. Gericke at the close of the concert, which may be classed with the most artistic and successful of this brilliant season.

[illegible] JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, MARCH 30, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance by the Orchestra and Mme. Teresa Carreno.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its seventh appearance for this season at Infantry Hall last evening. There was a good attendance; indeed, as compared with that seen at some of the earlier concerts of this year's course, it might be termed very good. The programme was a brilliant one, chiefly modern in its make-up, and presenting an unusual array of novelties. Among these was a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra by Edward MacDowell, who is generally ranked as America's greatest composer. The work fully sustains Mr. MacDowell's reputation, and, brilliantly played by that fine artist, Teresa Carreno, made a decidedly favorable impression. This was the list of the programme numbers:

Suite No. 1, in D minor, Op. 43..........
..................Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky
(First time at these concerts.)
I. Introduction:
Andante sostenuto (D minor)
Fugue:
Moderato con anima (D minor)
II. Divertimento:
Allegro moderato (B-flat major)
III. Intermezzo:
Andantino semplice (D minor)
V. Scherzo:
Allegro con moto (B-flat major)
VI. Gavotte:
Allegro (D major)
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, Op 23..................Edward MacDowell
I. Larghetto calmato (D minor)
II. Presto giocoso (B-flat major)
III. Largo (D minor)
Molto allegro (D major)
Bourree fantasque.........Emmanuel Chabrier
(Scored for Orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
(First time.)
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72.....
..........................Ludwig van Beethoven

Tschaikovsky's suite in D minor, which began the concert and occupied nearly one-half the evening, was heard here for the first time. Judging from the cordial applause which greeted its performance it will be a welcome number upon future programmes. The well-known characteristics of the greatest Russian composer—the greatest composer, indeed, of any nationality since Richard Wagner, are distinctly traceable in this work. Tschaikovsky, like Brahms, delights in odd rhythms, and a general complexity of structure. But, unlike the German master, he does not habitually wander about in a musical fog nor leave his hearers in one. Again, a resemblance to the methods of Wagner is distinctly traceable in the wonderful richness of his instrumentation and the skill with which he combines melodies apparently as diverse in character as they are forceful and pregnant. But Tschaikovsky is in no sense a copyist. No composer has stamped his music with a plainer mark of originality and individuality than he.

This suite is written in a free style, though keeping roughly within the lines of the conventional form usually applied to works of this character. Tschaikovsky was not an impressionist in music, though his palette contained all the colors. There is vivid contrast, wealth of melody, richness of combination, overwhelming climax, and, to crown all, the poignant note of sadness that is never absent in his music. The suite made a profound impression, to which its superb performance by the orchestra contributed in no small degree. The work is long, containing six movements, of which the fourth was omitted in last night's performance.

Madame Teresa Carreno, the soloist of the evening, chose for her number the second pianoforte concerto of Edward MacDowell. The work is brilliant in the extreme besides being decideldy fresh and unconventional. It may be said in passing that it is also extremely difficult, though the apparent ease with which it was handled by orchestra and soloist would scarcely convey that impression to a careless listener. Prof. MacDowell has composed a piano concerto in which the piano has really something to do. While its prominent feature is brilliancy rather than melodiousness, it is certainly a very interesting work, the working up of the material and the tasteful and effective orchestration being worthy in every way of the composer's well-won reputation.

The concerto is well suited to Mme. Carreno's powers, for she excels in the style of playing that calls for plenty of fire and dash. To say that she is one of the most brilliant of living players is not to deny her the possession of other ability. That was what happened to be called for last night and she supplied it in ample measure. Her technic was most admirable, combining power that never degenerated into pounding with delightful clearness in the extraordinarily rapid passage work with which the concerto is filled. Great was the applause when she concluded, and the three hearty recalls were fully deserved.

Another interesting novelty was Chabrier's Boure Fantasque, orchestrated from the piano score by Felix Mottl. In spite of the fact that the German and French schools have little in common, Herr Mottl has succeeded remarkably in reproducing Chabrier's weird and fantastic style of orchestration. Again the orchestra did some marvellous playing. The familiar but always welcome "Leonore" (No. 3) overture of Beethoven brought the concert to an end.

Altogether, taking the variety and novelty of the programme and the excellence of the performance into consideration, last evening was one of the most enjoyable of the Symphony series. The eighth and last concert for this season will be given on Wednesday evening, April 19.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MARCH 29, 1899.

Fifth Matinee and Concert of the Boston Orchestra.

THE last pair of concerts—the fifth matinee and fifth evening performance—at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday afternoon and Thursday of last week, were wholly successful. The weather was not propitious for a matinee, so the audience was larger in its enthusiasm than numbers. Mr. Gericke conducted a program consisting of Mendelssohn's overture, "Fingal's Cave"; Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, Chabrier's "Bourée Fantasque," and the D major Symphony of Brahms. Mme. Teresa Carreño played the solo part of the B flat minor piano concerto of the Russian composer. It has never received a broader, a more brilliant reading here. There is little that is academic in the work, much that is startling, and a modicum of reverence for formal beauty that gives it savor and value. Mr. Apthorp, in his new essays, speaks of the pleasure Von Bülow gave Boston, when he presented the composition there a quarter of a century ago. The processional character of the opening measures, the tantalizing figure in octaves that follows, the rhapsodic working out section, the charm of the slow movement—a genuine romanze—the sudden apparition of a scintillating scherzo, and the massive and almost morbid quality of the finale, render this concerto a thing apart in piano literature. Carreño was absolutely mistress of herself, and her performance was a memorable one.

The Chabrier novelty did not particularly commend itself, giving the effect of being rather meagre in ideas. In reality it was originally written for piano and scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl in 1897.

The Wagner conductor of Carlsruhe knows his business, and has decked off the Frenchman's piano piece in gorgeous raiment. The Brahms Symphony was extremely well played. Mr. Gericke is a Brahms lover, and also understands him. Anything more transparent in thematic treatment and unfeignedly lovely in a musical sense than the first movement would be difficult to imagine. The orchestra was in good condition. Although recalled, Madame Carreño wisely refused an encore number.

At the Thursday evening concert Carreño was again the solo performer. She played with overwhelming vigor, fantasy and mental grasp the D minor piano concerto of Edward MacDowell. The work was first presented here by the composer. Madame Carreño has given it throughout the country and on the Continent with signal success. It is the second composition in this form, the first in A minor being—if we mistake not—introduced by Carreño at Chicago in 1888, before an M. T. N. A. meeting. The second concerto has far more musical depth than its outline, and freedom in form more than compensated for by the aerial, poetic content, the ease with which the composer keeps abreast of his inspiration, and the unfailing sense of orchestral color. MacDowell is always happy in selecting the right tint.

Goldmark's most characteristic overture, "Sakuntala," was played as an old stalking horse of the band should be. The Tschaikowsky orchestral suite in D minor is not the overwhelming Tschaikowsky of the third suite, op. 55. It is pretty, but then it is small, almost academic for such a brilliant improviser as its composer. The scherzo is excellent, the gavotte rather cheap, the marche miniature clever, while the introduction and fugue, divertimento and intermezzo show how commonplace and a striver after the banal Tschaikowsky could be. For the first time was this D minor suite given here, and for the first time at these concerts did we hear Richard Strauss' astounding "Tod und Verklarung," although Mr. Seidl produced the symphonic poem at a Philharmonic Society concert early in January, 1892. While not equaling in thematic invention or brilliancy the "Don Juan," nor comparable in philosophic poignancy and emotional intensity to "Also Sprach Zarathustra," "Death and Apotheosis" remains a worthy companion of Strauss' audacious tonal triptych. It has its almost repulsive moments, such as the dallying on the borderland of mortality, but this far fetched realism is not an essential of the scheme. It is Strauss' splendid attempt to portray psychical states, rather than his minute delineation of certain sinister memoranda of the very gasp at death's door. A vast and more shadowy canvas than the one on which Berlioz attempted some such a problem, but there is more imaginative grasp in the Strauss music, more uplifting of spirit, despite the resounding cymbals of the Requiem. The orchestra and Mr. Gericke were at their best. This closes this season's series. As far as purely absolute music has had a chance in New York, this one has thriven. But the times are not yet propitious for orchestral music.

Had Dryden been a modern poet he would have said, "What art can teach, what human voice can reach the sacred orchestra," instead of "the sacred organ's tone." We all regret that the last Symphony concert for the season has been given, and that Mr. Gericke and his fine body of musicians are to visit us no more until the fall. They have given us musical feasts, to which the soloist of the occasion has, perhaps, represented the dessert. In our criticisms we take the good work of the orchestra for granted, and are too apt to let it pass with a few words of commendation, bestowing our most careful scrutiny upon the special artist, and not giving to this larger body of special artists the meed of praise which it deserves. But as we say "vale" we wish them to know that all their efforts to give us intelligent pleasure are fully appreciated.

The symphonies on Friday afternoon were Haydn's "La Chasse" and Berlioz's "Harold in Italy," in which Franz Kneisel played the viola solo, handling the less effective instrument with the ease and skill with which he does his violin, and bringing out of it a rare music. For the Saturday evening program the orchestral position included the Goldmark overture to "Sakuntala," Brahms' Symphony in D major, and a "Bourée Fantastique" by Chabrier, scored for the orchestra by Felix Mottl and played for the first time at these concerts. This was a jolly little dance that is scored in a most "fetching" style, with odd and unexpected little accents varied in different renditions of a measure. It is sure to be popular.

Mme. Teresa Carreño played at both concerts, giving on Friday the Tschaikowsky Concerto for piano in B flat minor, and on Saturday evening the MacDowell Concerto in D minor. She has a temperament that adapted itself perfectly to these two, so different in spirit. The fire and energy of the Russian received its full interpretation, while the MacDowell Concerto was played with a spirit, brilliancy and forceful touch that seemed almost incompatible with the player's physique. The presto movement was taken at a tremendous speed, big octave chords being dashed off as easily as triolets, and the audience gave a half a dozen enthusiastic recalls at the close of the performance.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1899.

FORTY-EIGHT PAGES.

Twentieth Symphony Concert.

By way of recognition of holy week, Mr Gericke's 20th Boston symphony program included the "Good Friday" spell music from Wagner's "Parsifal." One need not enlarge upon the charm and singular grace of this excerpt, even when only the instrumental part is presented. Wagner's command of effect in orchestration, so strangely evidenced in many works, is beautifully exemplified in this passage, and the musicians who follow Mr Gericke's baton entered upon their pleasant task con amore and carried it through with distinguished and complete success.

With so long a record of notable symphony essays as that which is set down to the credit of our Boston symphony orchestra, it seems strange indeed that a symphony by Mozart should have waited until Friday afternoon last for its first performance at its concerts. While the symphony No. 34 in C major is by no means a storm-and-stress production—being indeed a singularly simple and straightforward orchestral work, without any digressions such as are the peculiar delight of sworn admirers of music up to date, it ranks as a thoroughly pleasant and pleasing work. From first to last it is Mozart, and Mozart at his most melodious and cheerful is always a welcome figure. The orchestra seemed to enjoy what may be called an excursion for once in a way into the land of simplicity and harmony.

With its vigor of tone, strongly drawn themes, and stimulating interest, Dvorak's second symphony in D minor was appreciated all the more keenly by players and hearers alike, because of the contrast it afforded. Certainly there was no lack of spirit in the interpretation of the work of the Bohemian composer, whose earlier essays do not suffer by comparison with his more recent attempts to evolve symphonies out of the music of the southern negro, which are generally acknowledged to be much more ambitious than successful.

A field program is announced by Mr Gericke for his Easter week rehearsal and concert offerings—nothing less than Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred" poem. The reader is to be Mr Ffrangcon Davies. The orchestra is to have the assistance also of an array of soloists, including Mrs Marian Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands and Messrs Herbert Johnson, Clarence E. Day, Frederic L. Martin, Clinton A. Hyland and Clarence B. Ashenden, besides a chorus made up of members of the Cecilia club.

American Art Journal.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, APRIL 1, 1899.

LAST MATINEE AND LAST EVENING CONCERT OF THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Mr. Gericke's Orchestra completed its work for this season last week, and the attendance, both afternoon and evening, as well as the judiciously bestowed applause, were evidence that this orchestra continues to enjoy the appreciation of the refined music-loving public. On Wednesday afternoon the program consisted of Mendelssohn's overture, entitled "Fingal's Cave," Tschaikowsky's first piano concerto, Charbrier's "Bourrée Fantasque," scored for orchestra by Felix Mottl, and Brahm's D major symphony; while on Thursday evening the orchestra was heard in a suite in D major by Tschaikowsky, "Tod und Verklärung," by Richard Strauss, the "Sakuntala" overture, by Goldmark, and Edward MacDowell's second piano concerto, Mme. Teresa Carreno being the soloist in the two piano concertos. The playing of this artiste still continues to give evidence of all its old-time fire. Mme. Carreno made an early start in life as a "child pianist" of striking ability, and to her credit, be it said, she has so nurtured and cared for her art that it continues to be endowed almost with eternal youth. She gave unalloyed pleasure to her auditors, who rewarded her with most enthusiastic applause. In particular did her admirable art come to its fullest manifestation in the MacDowell concerto, which she invariably renders with great brilliancy. Of the work of the orchestra, it may be said that it was of the very highest order, holding the audience in rapt enjoyment. Tschaikowsky's suite produced almost startling effect upon those present, in fact, it may be said that the strings, in their rendering of the divertimento, reached absolute perfection of accord and coloring, holding the listeners spell-bound. A very cordial greeting was accorded to Mr. Gericke at the close of the concert, which may be classed with the most artistic and successful of this brilliant season.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum; $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, MARCH 30, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Fine Performance by the Orchestra and Mme. Teresa Carreno.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra made its seventh appearance for this season at Infantry Hall last evening. There was a good attendance; indeed, as compared with that seen at some of the earlier concerts of this year's course, it might be termed very good. The programme was a brilliant one, chiefly modern in its make-up, and presenting an unusual array of novelties. Among these was a concerto for pianoforte and orchestra by Edward MacDowell, who is generally ranked as America's greatest composer. The work fully sustains Mr. MacDowell's reputation, and, brilliantly played by that fine artist, Teresa Carreno, made a decidedly favorable impression. This was the list of the programme numbers:

Suite No. 1, in D minor, Op. 43..........
..................Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky
(First time at these concerts.)
I. Introduction:
Andante sostenuto (D minor)
Fugue:
Moderato con anima (D minor)
II. Divertimento:
Allegro moderato (B-flat major)
III. Intermezzo:
Andantino semplice (D minor)
V. Scherzo:
Allegro con moto (B-flat major)
VI. Gavotte:
Allegro (D major)
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in D minor, Op 23..................Edward MacDowell
I. Larghetto calmato (D minor)
II. Presto giocoso (B-flat major)
III. Largo (D minor)
Molto allegro (D major)
Bourree fantasque.... ....Emmanuel Chabrier
(Scored for Orchestra by Felix Mottl.)
(First time.)
Overture to "Leonore," No. 3, Op. 72....
....................Ludwig van Beethoven

Tschaikovsky's suite in D minor, which began the concert and occupied nearly one-half the evening, was heard here for the first time. Judging from the cordial applause which greeted its performance it will be a welcome number upon future programmes. The well-known characteristics of the greatest Russian composer—the greatest composer, indeed, of any nationality since Richard Wagner, are distinctly traceable in this work. Tschaikovsky, like Brahms, delights in odd rhythms, and a general complexity of structure. But, unlike the German master, he does not habitually wander about in a musical fog nor leave his hearers in one. Again, a resemblance to the methods of Wagner is distinctly traceable in the wonderful richness of his instrumentation and the skill with which he combines melodies apparently as diverse in character as they are forceful and pregnant. But Tschaikovsky is in no sense a copyist. No composer has stamped his music with a plainer mark of originality and individuality than he.

This suite is written in a free style, though keeping roughly within the lines of the conventional form usually applied to works of this character. Tschaikovsky was not an impressionist in music, though his palette contained all the colors. There is vivid contrast, wealth of melody, richness of combination, overwhelming climax, and, to crown all, the poignant note of sadness that is never absent in his music. The suite made a profound impression, to which its superb performance by the orchestra contributed in no small degree. The work is long, containing six movements, of which the fourth was omitted in last night's performance.

Madame Teresa Carreno, the soloist of the evening, chose for her number the second pianoforte concerto of Edward MacDowell. The work is brilliant in the extreme besides being decideldy fresh and unconventional. It may be said in passing that it is also extremely difficult, though the apparent ease with which it was handled by orchestra and soloist would scarcely convey that impression to a careless listener. Prof. MacDowell has composed a piano concerto in which the piano has really something to do. While its prominent feature is brilliancy rather than melodiousness, it is certainly a very interesting work, the working up of the material and the tasteful and effective orchestration being worthy in every way of the composer's well-won reputation.

The concerto is well suited to Mme. Carreno's powers, for she excels in the style of playing that calls for plenty of fire and dash. To say that she is one of the most brilliant of living players is not to deny her the possession of other ability. That was what happened to be called for last night and she supplied it in ample measure. Her technic was most admirable, combining power that never degenerated into pounding with delightful clearness in the extraordinarily rapid passage work with which the concerto is filled. Great was the applause when she concluded, and the three hearty recalls were fully deserved.

Another interesting novelty was Chabrier's Boure Fantasque, orchestrated from the piano score by Felix Mottl. In spite of the fact that the German and French schools have little in common, Herr Mottl has succeeded remarkably in reproducing Chabrier's weird and fantastic style of orchestration. Again the orchestra did some marvellous playing. The familiar but always welcome "Leonore" (No. 3) overture of Beethoven brought the concert to an end.

Altogether, taking the variety and novelty of the programme and the excellence of the performance into consideration, last evening was one of the most enjoyable of the Symphony series. The eighth and last concert for this season will be given on Wednesday evening, April 19.

HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEA
VOL. CV., NO. 92.

SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1899.

Symphony Concert Inclu One of Mozart's Masterpiec

His Symphony in C Major, No. 34, Given for the First Time—Wagner's "Good Friday Spell" Perfectly Read—Handel and Hay and Godfrey Concerts Tonight.

Last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 20th concert of the season in Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony in C-major, No. 34..........Mozart
"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal"..Wagner
Symphony No. 2, in D-minor............Dvorak

The Mozart symphony was heard for the first time at these concerts. It is not among the greater works in kind by the composer, and is without clarinets and flutes. From beginning to end, it overflows with charm, and its geniality is delightful. The opening movement is in the master's most vigorous vein, and perhaps somewhat dwarfs the rest of the work; but it is all beautiful, and is still fragrant in freshness, and strong in vitality. The andante is simplicity itself, in both themes and treatment, the only instruments used in addition to the strings being two bassoons, but the effect is delicious. The finale overflows with gaiety and exuberance of animal spirits. It is good to hear these more neglected works of Mozart, if only to be reminded occasionally that there is a phase of musical art that makes a deep and strong impression without resorting to bluster. Mr. Gericke's reading of the work brought out all its grace, its beauties and its meaning, and the performance by the orchestra was fairly exquisite.

The Wagner selection was also perfectly read and played. There is a fine nobility of sentiment in the music, and the composer here is heard in his most conscientious vein. That the music was not quite coherent to those who have not heard it amid the surroundings for which it was written, and that its intended effect was, in consequence, not fully felt, was inevitable. By itself the composition says little, but its nobility of sentiment, beauty of tone color and its grave and impressive flow made it wholly interesting in the hearing. The Dvorak symphony is one of the composer's most powerful achievements in kind. Sometimes it is overgarrulous, and now and then there is a slight lapse in the direction of commonplace; but taken altogether, the work deserves a high rank among latter-day symphonies. It was read with fine force and splendidly played, the slow movement and the finale especially.

The next concert is to be devoted to the performance of Schumann's "Manfred." Mr. Ffrangcon Davies is to be the reader, and the soloists are Mrs. Marian Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. Herbert Johnson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Frederic L. Martin, Mr. Clinton A. Hyland and Mr. Clarence B. Ashenden. A chorus of members of The Cecilia will assist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the Saturday symphony concert seemed peculiarly appropriate for Easter even. Any depressing effects of the solemn Lenten season were in a measure counteracted by Mozart's symphony in C major, No. 34, and any undue elation at the prospect of resumed festivities were tempered by Wagner's "Good Friday Spell," Charfreitagszauber, which, though of a tender pastoral character, voices Parsifal's wail that nature should do naught but mourn on the "highest day of grief." But promise of gayer things comes with the Dvorak symphony No. 2 in D minor, which certainly suggests, in the weird, piquant effects of the scherzo, something of the world and the flesh, if not the devil.

Despite the attractions of the opera of the present and the other musical feasts of the immediate future the hall was filled by an audience that thoroughly enjoyed the novelty of the Mozart symphony which was performed for the first time at these concerts, and would doubtless have welcomed the addition of the voice parts to the Parsifal selection. There are many passages in the Mozart symphony that appeal to the popular taste; themes melodious and sprightly; delicate string effects, and the strings have the burden of the symphony, which is scored without clarinets and with little brass.

The Wagner selection is characteristic and in the composer's best vein, but it loses somewhat in being given alone in that there is some difficulty in following the composer's thought and purpose. It was played, however, as only our orchestra can play it, and with intelligent reading by Mr. Gericke.

Dvorak's symphony, which closed the rather short concert, was first brought out in 1885 and is a delightful composition full of the piquant rhythm of the Czech and with a wealth and beauty of melodic invention and rich orchestration. Whether it was owing to the shortness of the programme or anticipated enjoyment of the final movement, few people left the hall until the last note had sounded.

The programme for this week is filled with Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred," with Ffrangcon Davies as reader and well-known soloists. The chorus parts will be given by members of the Cecilia.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert at Music Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conducting, was as follows:

Symphony No. 34, C major............Mozart
"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal"..
Wagner
Symphony No. 2, D minor, Op. 70.....Dvorak

This was perhaps the shortest concert of the season. No doubt the shortness accommodated many in divers ways. The prime feature of the concert was the performance of the Dvorak symphony. In the first place, this is one of the gifted Czech's best works. Its melodies are beautiful and substantial, while the musicianship revealed in the composition of each of the four movements is entirely admirable. The work possesses a freshness that not only holds the hearer but inspires the player. So it happened that it was performed with extraordinary sympathy—with a vigor here and a repose there that would unquestionably have excited the praise of the composer himself. Equally happy and it was Mr. Gericke's reading. It was in the Dvorak symphony that the conductor really first rose out of an unusually complacent attitude last night.

The performance of the Mozart symphony, of course, was notable for the exquisite playing by the violinists. The sprightliness that abounds in all the movements was perfectly interpreted. In fact, betwixt the simplicity of the music and the excellence of the performance, Mr. Gericke found little to do.

The music of the "Good Friday spell" was nobly played, but with doubtful effect. Such an extract from a work like "Parsifal" almost always falls short of the right mark for lack of the true atmosphere. It was almost a shock, this plunge from the giddy plane reached with Mozart to the solemn, half-pastoral, half-spiritual region of Parsifal and Gurnemanz.

During the concert, especially in the music by Wagner and Dvorak, the first clarinettist, the first oboist and the first flutist were frequently called upon to show their art, and they responded on every occasion in a manner that made admiration.

The audience throughout was enthusiastic.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 2, 1899.

Mr. Gericke's twentieth Symphony programme was placid enough for Holy Week, stirring up the listeners with no novelty and solo number. The orchestra played a Mozart Symphony, "The Good Friday Spell," from Wagner's "Parsifal," and Dvorak's second Symphony. It only needs to be said that the men played as they ought and he conducted as usual.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 9, 1899.

Symphony Concert.

The program for the 21st concert of the Boston symphony orchestra consisted of the overture, entre actes and incidental music to Byron's drama, "Manfred," by Robert Schumann. The assisting artists were Mr David Ffrangcon-Davies reader, Mrs Marian Titus soprano, Miss Gertrude Edmands contralto, Mr Herbert Johnson tenor, Messrs Clarence E. Hay, Frederic L. Martin, Clinton A. Hyland, Clarence B. Ashenden basses, and a chorus of the members of the Cecilia club.

The first performance of this work took place in Weimar in 1852, under the direction of Franz Liszt, and since then the overture has become tolerably familiar to concert goers. It is a composition of profoundly tragic expressiveness, and its manifold beauties were carefully brought forth by Mr Gericke on this occasion.

A dramatic invocation by the reader is followed by the song of the four spirits, for contralto, soprano, bass and tenor, sung behind the stage. The incantation for four bass voices, a very effective and deeply tragic number, was well sung by the artists.

The chorus work in the hymn to Arimanes was very effective, but the same cannot be said concerning the short phrases for full chorus in the two succeeding numbers, in which the attack was very ragged.

The most beautiful number in the whole work is the melodrama, "Manfred's Apostrophe to Astarte," in which the reader is accompanied by a ravishingly beautiful melody in the violins.

The "Requiem," sung by a chorus behind the stage with organ accompaniment (later joined by the orchestra) proved a fitting close to a work which contains some of the best pages that Schumann ever wrote.

What little work the soloists had to do was very well done. The orchestral accompaniments were beautifully managed, commendable care being exercised to keep a proper balance between the voices and the orchestra.

Too much praise cannot be given to Mr Ffrangcon-Davies for his masterly reading of the text. His diction and enunciation were simply perfect, and he followed the spirit of the words with rare fidelity, rising ofttimes to a great dramatic climax. His excellent reading was an agreeable surprise, for he had heretofore been known here only as a singer.

The program for the next rehearsal and concert will be as follows: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; three sonata movements, Sebastian Bach (orchestration by Wilhelm Gericke); symphonic poem, "Vltava," Smetana; symphony in D minor, Cesar Franck (first time.)

Music hall was filled to overflowing Friday afternoon at the 21st rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra. The program consisted of music to Byron's "Manfred," the poem being read by Mr David Ffrangcon-Davies. Among the most interested were Mme Emma Eames Story and Mrs McKean, who accompanied her. Mme Story was gowned in fawn colored cloth, the bodice opening over white, and a long cape of the same cloth trimmed with sable. Her hat was dark-blue velvet, with standing bows of violet velvet. Mrs McKean was in gray cloth, with violet velvet hat in two shades.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 10, 1899.

Schumann's "Manfred" by the Symphony Orchestra.

Of the singing of songs there is no end. It was only recently that the piece de resistance at the Symphony concert was Liszt's tumultuous "Faust," of which the choral feature was important. The choral societies have been much in evidence lately. The memories of two different seasons of opera are confused with sights of belated suburbanites rushing frantically to catch the last trains home. Even the Symphony has caught the infection, apparently. Not content with the recent presentation of Faust, Mr. Gericke Saturday night gave Schumann's "Manfred," thus completing the vocal expansionist movement in a blaze of glory.

Byron said of his poem that "the thing could never be attempted or thought of for the stage;" but he also expressed his doubts whether it was even worth publication. Even when Schumann has shown what he could do with such a theme, it is really a matter of doubt where the proper scena for the presentation of the work should be. As has been intimated, Byron's dictum may be worthless, if the poem be regarded as having dramatic merit. The Schumann "Manfred" may almost as fairly claim a place on the operatic stage as some of the standard operas that amused a former generation. So long as the vocalists have their parts, and the music is written to the words, the Manfred may be described as an opera without directions for stage setting, or dramatic "business."

Yet, if the analytical harmonies of the morgue in Richard Strauss's well-known style have claims to consideration as a symphonic poem, the music of Manfred without its choral features may surely be regarded as having a better or more reasonable claim to such a title. The vocalism of the work is unnecessary. If Schumann had written "Manfred" in the present year of grace, he would have presented it as a symphonic poem, pure and simple; and it would have been intelligible in such form—more intelligible than as in its present form, on a concert programme of the Symphony.

The same thing might have been said with even more emphasis of Liszt's Faust, which recently cumbered a programme. The allusion is not merely a coincidence, for it was charged at the time that Manfred was first published, that Byron had stolen his central idea from Marlow's "Faust." Jeffrey mentioned the charge in his review in the Edinburgh Magazine, while Goethe, who asserts that Manfred was undoubtedly inspired by "Faust," defends Byron from all charges of real plagiarism. Goethe, however, assumes that in Manfred, the British poet is really describing actual and personal remorse—a supposition that may have tickled the excessive vanity of the poet, however contrary it must have been to the fact.

Yet, with all the inflated and bombastic style of Manfred, with all its turgid bathos, there was at least enough of the horrible within it to appeal to a musician like Schumann with decided appeal. The work as it exists today was not the result of the musician's original plan, of course. It is a matter of common knowledge that the overture was first written, as descriptive of the poem in general; and that it was not until afterwards that Schumann conceived the scheme of writing the other parts.

It may be said also that there is a decided difference between the poem and the musical melodrama. Schumann has found beauties in the poem that were never there when Byron wrote; just as Goethe discovered a grewsome tragedy in the poet's life, that never really occurred. Between them the artists of the continent found in the poem mysticisms that the more phlegmatic Briton had never intended. In the matter of the close of the melodrama, for example, Schumann has departed altogether from the Byronic idea.

Possibly Schumann, in his reading of the poem, had the first edition. That closed the poem with the Abbot's lines:—

> "He's gone—his soul has taken its earthless flight."

This ending infuriated the poet, because it dropped completely what he chose to regard as the most important line of the poem. The later editions complete the Abbot's soliloquy:—

> "Whither? I dread to think—but he is gone!"

Schumann's closing movement suggests the uncompleted line, which does not so strongly suggest the damnation of Manfred.

In many ways the vocal parts in "Manfred" are rather thankless. Yet they were taken with all possible spirit and taste. The chorus of the spirits—"Crush the Worm"—was really dramatic in its intensity. All of the singers interpreted their parts with good judgment, so far as the music allows. The Cecilia won many new laurels, and Mrs. Titus, Miss Edwards, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Hay and the other soloists may claim their shares.

It is the orchestral rather than the vocal parts that are of chief interest in "Manfred," however. It cannot be said that the music is great or tremendously tragic; but it is marked often by extreme grace and beauty. The Symphony Orchestra has played the music before, but never better than it was played at this concert. The brilliant triumph attained in that direction almost led one to wish that the chief orchestral parts had been played, to the exclusion of the rest of the work. At all events, even the weakness of the vocal scores, and the fact that at times Mr. Davies was inaudible to many of the audience, did not serve to make the evening uninteresting or unenjoyable.

It is impossible to speak too highly of the orchestra's performance. All the delicacy, the etherial quality of the music, the light, airy gracefulness of the entr'actes and the brilliancy of the melodramas were given with a rare taste and a delicacy that have rarely been equalled in this city.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 99.

SUNDAY, APRIL 9, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schumann's "Manfred" Given, but Not with Effect.

Reading by Mr. Davies Not Received with Much Enthusiasm—His Work Devoid of Dramatic Force—Orchestra and Chorus Meet with General Approval.

Last evening the 21st concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall. The programme was confined to Schumann's music to Lord Byron's "Manfred." Mr. David Ffrangon Davies read those portions of the drama which the composer had chosen to illustrate. The vocalists were Mrs. Marion Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. Herbert Johnson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Frederic L. Martin, Mr. Clinton A. Hyland and Mr. Clarence B. Ashenden. A mixed chorus of members of the Cecilia assisted.

The music that Schumann has written for this play is of rare beauty, but it is not effective in the concert room, except the overture, the entr'acte and the adjuration to the witch. The vocal numbers are singularly unemotional and uninteresting, and impressive dramatic color is wholly absent, save perhaps in the melos during the apparition of the spirits.

The dramatic instinct is not strongly evidenced in any of Schumann's more ambitious works in which voices have important prominence, and "Manfred" is no exception. Last evening the brief solos and the quartets were even less effective than usual by reason of placing the singers out of sight and at a distance, and under conditions that caused their voices to sound muffled. This arrangement might have been well enough if the performance had been given in a theatre, with scenery and other necessary adjuncts. But as Manfred did not appear on a mountain peak, and as the spirit of Astarte was not visible, and as, moreover, the mournful misanthropist was clad in full-dress evening attire, placing the soloists where they could not be seen and scarcely heard was not justified by the results.

The performance, as a whole, was very dull. Mr. Davies, though an admirable singer, did not manifest any special talents as a reader. He was unemphatic, solemnly dreary and even tiresome. His reading was at times indistinct, very often scarcely intelligible, and it was characterized by a low monotony of voice and long pauses that were better calculated to soothe his hearers to slumber than to keep their attention alert. Of dramatic force of expression, of effective accentuation of sentiment, of anything resembling passion, there was scarcely a trace. His speech trickled slowly and boresomely on its way, as if he were an unimpassioned pedagogue delivering a lecture on metaphysics to a class of students.

The Manfred of the poet is a poseur, not wholly without interest in his splendid self-esteem and his brummagem melancholy, but Mr. Davies transformed him into an unmitigated bore, and illustrated convincingly the ne sutor ultra crepidam theory. His singing is always a delight. His "cantillation" is not without a certain stirring effectiveness; but his reading, as exemplified on this occasion, has nothing to commend it to favorable consideration.

Mr. Gericke gave a brilliant and richly colored reading of the overture, and his interpretation of the score throughout was in his most thoughtful and most artistic vein. The orchestra also was at its very best. The chorus singing could hardly have been better. What was heard of the soloists was, with the exception of uncertain intonation and unsteadiness in the singing of the contralto solo, efficient if ineffective.

There was little enthusiasm; in fact, the audience appeared to be bored by the droning delivery of the text, and departures were numerous before the performance was half over.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; three sonata movements by Bach, orchestrated by Mr. Gericke; Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vltava," and a symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck.

THE TIMES
Apr ESTABLISHED 1864. 6

There has been little of importance musically during the week save the opera and the Symphony concerts. The Symphony programme was unique as these programmes go calling, into play the services of a reader, seven soloists and a chorus composed of members of the Cecilia. The work performed was Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred." Mr. Ffrangcon Davies read the work and the soloists were Mrs. Marian Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. Herbert Johnson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Frederic L. Martin, Mr. Clinton A. Hyland and Mr. Clarence B. Ashenden.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1899.

The performance of "Manfred," which constituted last night's Symphony programme, cannot be discussed in the small space at command this morning, but will be spoken of at length in our next issue.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 92.
SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1899.

Symphony Concert Inclu One of Mozart's Masterpiec

His Symphony in C Major, No. 34 Given for the First Time—Wagner's "Good Friday Spell" Perfectly Read—Handel and Hayd and Godfrey Concerts Tonight.

Last evening the Boston Symphony orchestra gave its 20th concert of the season in Music Hall. The programme was:

Symphony in C-major, No. 34...........Mozart
"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal"..Wagner
Symphony No. 2, in D-minor............Dvorak

The Mozart symphony was heard for the first time at these concerts. It is not among the greater works in kind by the composer, and is without clarinets and flutes. From beginning to end, it overflows with charm, and its geniality is delightful. The opening movement is in the master's most vigorous vein, and perhaps somewhat dwarfs the rest of the work; but it is all beautiful, and is still fragrant in freshness, and strong in vitality. The andante is simplicity itself, in both themes and treatment, the only instruments used in addition to the strings being two bassoons, but the effect is delicious. The finale overflows with gaiety and exuberance of animal spirits. It is good to hear these more neglected works of Mozart, if only to be reminded occasionally that there is a phase of musical art that makes a deep and strong impression without resorting to bluster. Mr. Gericke's reading of the work brought out all its grace, its beauties and its meaning, and the performance by the orchestra was fairly exquisite.

The Wagner selection was also perfectly read and played. There is a fine nobility of sentiment in the music, and the composer here is heard in his most conscientious vein. That the music was not quite coherent to those who have not heard it amid the surroundings for which it was written, and that its intended effect was, in consequence, not fully felt, was inevitable. By itself the composition says little, but its nobility of sentiment, beauty of tone color and its grave and impressive flow made it wholly interesting in the hearing. The Dvorak symphony is one of the composer's most powerful achievements in kind. Sometimes it is overgarrulous, and now and then there is a slight lapse in the direction of commonplace; but taken altogether, the work deserves a high rank among latter-day symphonies. It was read with fine force and splendidly played, the slow movement and the finale especially.

The next concert is to be devoted to the performance of Schumann's "Manfred." Mr. Ffrangcon Davies is to be the reader, and the soloists are Mrs. Marian Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. Herbert Johnson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Frederic L. Martin, Mr. Clinton A. Hyland and Mr. Clarence B. Ashenden. A chorus of members of The Cecilia will assist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 3, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY.

The programme of the Saturday symphony concert seemed peculiarly appropriate for Easter even. Any depressing effects of the solemn Lenten season were in a measure counteracted by Mozart's symphony in C major, No. 34, and any undue elation at the prospect of resumed festivities were tempered by Wagner's "Good Friday Spell," Charfreitagszauber, which, though of a tender pastoral character, voices Parsifal's wail that nature should do naught but mourn on the "highest day of grief." But promise of gayer things comes with the Dvorak symphony No. 2 in D minor, which certainly suggests, in the weird, piquant effects of the scherzo, something of the world and the flesh, if not the devil.

Despite the attractions of the opera of the present and the other musical feasts of the immediate future the hall was filled by an audience that thoroughly enjoyed the novelty of the Mozart symphony which was performed for the first time at these concerts, and would doubtless have welcomed the addition of the voice parts to the Parsifal selection. There are many passages in the Mozart symphony that appeal to the popular taste; themes melodious and sprightly; delicate string effects, and the strings have the burden of the symphony, which is scored without clarinets and with little brass.

The Wagner selection is characteristic and in the composer's best vein, but it loses somewhat in being given alone in that there is some difficulty in following the composer's thought and purpose. It was played, however, as only our orchestra can play it, and with intelligent reading by Mr. Gericke.

Dvorak's symphony, which closed the rather short concert, was first brought out in 1885 and is a delightful composition full of the piquant rhythm of the Czech and with a wealth and beauty of melodic invention and rich orchestration. Whether it was owing to the shortness of the programme or anticipated enjoyment of the final movement, few people left the hall until the last note had sounded.

The programme for this week is filled with Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred," with Ffrangcon Davies as reader and well-known soloists. The chorus parts will be given by members of the Cecilia.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 2, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program of the twentieth Symphony concert at Music Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conducting, was as follows:

Symphony No. 34, C major.............Mozart
"Good Friday Spell," from "Parsifal"..
Wagner
Symphony No. 2, D minor, Op. 70.....Dvorak

This was perhaps the shortest concert of the season. No doubt the shortness accommodated many in divers ways. The prime feature of the concert was the performance of the Dvorak symphony. In the first place, this is one of the gifted Czech's best works. Its melodies are beautiful and substantial, while the musicianship revealed in the composition of each of the four movements is entirely admirable. The work possesses a freshness that not only holds the hearer but inspires the player. So it happened that it was performed with extraordinary sympathy—with a vigor here and a repose there that would unquestionably have excited the praise of the composer himself. Equally happy and fit was Mr. Gericke's reading. It was in the Dvorak symphony that the conductor really first rose out of an unusually complacent attitude last night.

The performance of the Mozart symphony, of course, was notable for the exquisite playing by the violinists. The sprightliness that abounds in all the movements was perfectly interpreted. In fact, betwixt the simplicity of the music and the excellence of the performance, Mr. Gericke found little to do.

The music of the "Good Friday spell" was nobly played, but with doubtful effect. Such an extract from a work like "Parsifal" almost always falls short of the right mark for lack of the true atmosphere. It was almost a shock, this plunge from the giddy plane reached with Mozart to the solemn, half-pastoral, half-spiritual region of Parsifal and Gurnemanz.

During the concert, especially in the music by Wagner and Dvorak, the first clarinettist, the first oboist and the first flutist were frequently called upon to show their art, and they responded on every occasion in a manner that made admiration.

The audience throughout was enthusiastic.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 2, 1899.

Mr. Gerricke's twentieth Symphony programme was placid enough for Holy Week, stirring up the listeners with no novelty and solo number. The orchestra played a Mozart Symphony, "The Good Friday Spell," from Wagner's "Parsifal," and Dvorak's second Symphony. It only needs to be said that the men played as they ought and he conducted as usual.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 9, 1899.

Symphony Concert.

The program for the 21st concert of the Boston symphony orchestra consisted of the overture, entre actes and incidental music to Byron's drama, "Manfred," by Robert Schumann. The assisting artists were Mr David Ffrangcon-Davies reader, Mrs Marian Titus soprano, Miss Gertrude Edmands contralto, Mr Herbert Johnson tenor, Messrs Clarence E. Hay, Frederic L. Martin, Clinton A. Hyland, Clarence B. Ashenden basses, and a chorus of the members of the Cecilia club.

The first performance of this work took place in Weimar in 1852, under the direction of Franz Liszt, and since then the overture has become tolerably familiar to concert goers. It is a composition of profoundly tragic expressiveness, and its manifold beauties were carefully brought forth by Mr Gericke on this occasion.

A dramatic invocation by the reader is followed by the song of the four spirits, for contralto, soprano, bass and tenor, sung behind the stage. The incantation for four bass voices, a very effective and deeply tragic number, was well sung by the artists.

The chorus work in the hymn to Arimanes was very effective, but the same cannot be said concerning the short phrases for full chorus in the two succeeding numbers, in which the attack was very ragged.

The most beautiful number in the whole work is the melodrama, "Manfred's Apostrophe to Astarte," in which the reader is accompanied by a ravishingly beautiful melody in the violins.

The "Requiem," sung by a chorus behind the stage with organ accompaniment (later joined by the orchestra) proved a fitting close to a work which contains some of the best pages that Schumann ever wrote.

What little work the soloists had to do was very well done. The orchestral accompaniments were beautifully managed, commendable care being exercised to keep a proper balance between the voices and the orchestra.

Too much praise cannot be given to Mr Ffrangcon-Davies for his masterly reading of the text. His diction and enunciation were simply perfect, and he followed the spirit of the words with rare fidelity, rising ofttimes to a great dramatic climax. His excellent reading was an agreeable surprise, for he had heretofore been known here only as a singer.

The program for the next rehearsal and concert will be as follows: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; three sonata movements, Sebastian Bach (orchestration by Wilhelm Gericke); symphonic poem, "Vltava," Smetana; symphony in D minor, Cesar Franck (first time.)

—Music hall was filled to overflowing Friday afternoon at the 21st rehearsal of the Symphony orchestra. The program consisted of music to Byron's "Manfred," the poem being read by Mr David Ffrangcon-Davies. Among the most interested were Mme Emma Eames Story and Mrs McKean, who accompanied her. Mme Story was gowned in fawn colored cloth, the bodice opening over white, and a long cape of the same cloth trimmed with sable. Her hat was dark-blue velvet, with standing bows of violet velvet. Mrs McKean was in gray cloth, with violet velvet hat in two shades.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 10, 1899.

Schumann's "Manfred" by the Symphony Orchestra.

Of the singing of songs there is no end. It was only recently that the piece de resistance at the Symphony concert was Liszt's tumultuous "Faust," of which the choral feature was important. The choral societies have been much in evidence lately. The memories of two different seasons of opera are confused with sights of belated suburbanites rushing frantically to catch the last trains home. Even the Symphony has caught the infection, apparently. Not content with the recent presentation of Faust, Mr. Gericke Saturday night gave Schumann's "Manfred," thus completing the vocal expansionist movement in a blaze of glory.

Byron said of his poem that "the thing could never be attempted or thought of for the stage;" but he also expressed his doubts whether it was even worth publication. Even when Schumann has shown what he could do with such a theme, it is really a matter of doubt where the proper scena for the presentation of the work should be. As has been intimated, Byron's dictum may be worthless, if the poem be regarded as having dramatic merit. The Schumann "Manfred" may almost as fairly claim a place on the operatic stage as some of the standard operas that amused a former generation. So long as the vocalists have their parts, and the music is written to the words, the Manfred may be described as an opera without directions for stage setting, or dramatic "business."

Yet, if the analytical harmonies of the morgue in Richard Strauss's well-known style have claims to consideration as a symphonic poem, the music of Manfred without its choral features may surely be regarded as having a better or more reasonable claim to such a title. The vocalism of the work is unnecessary. If Schumann had written "Manfred" in the present year of grace, he would have presented it as a symphonic poem, pure and simple; and it would have been intelligible in such form—more intelligible than as in its present form, on a concert programme of the Symphony.

The same thing might have been said with even more emphasis of Liszt's Faust, which recently cumbered a programme. The allusion is not merely a coincidence, for it was charged at the time that Manfred was first published, that Byron had stolen his central idea from Marlow's "Faust." Jeffrey mentioned the charge in his review in the Edinburgh Magazine, while Goethe, who asserts that Manfred was undoubtedly inspired by "Faust," defends Byron from all charges of real plagiarism. Goethe, however, assumes that in Manfred, the British poet is really describing actual and personal remorse—a supposition that may have tickled the excessive vanity of the poet, however contrary it must have been to the fact.

Yet, with all the inflated and bombastic style of Manfred, with all its turgid bathos, there was at least enough of the horrible within it to appeal to a musician like Schumann with decided appeal. The work as it exists today was not the result of the musician's original plan, of course. It is a matter of common knowledge that the overture was first written, as descriptive of the poem in general; and that it was not until afterwards that Schumann conceived the scheme of writing the other parts.

It may be said also that there is a decided difference between the poem and the musical melodrama. Schumann has found beauties in the poem that were never there when Byron wrote; just as Goethe discovered a grewsome tragedy in the poet's life, that never really occurred. Between them the artists of the continent found in the poem mysticisms that the more phlegmatic Briton had never intended. In the matter of the close of the melodrama, for example, Schumann has departed altogether from the Byronic idea.

Possibly Schumann, in his reading of the poem, had the first edition. That closed the poem with the Abbot's lines:—

> "He's gone—his soul has taken its earthless flight."

This ending infuriated the poet, because it dropped completely what he chose to regard as the most important line of the poem. The later editions complete the Abbot's soliloquy:—

> "Whither? I dread to think—but he is gone!"

Schumann's closing movement suggests the uncompleted line, which does not so strongly suggest the damnation of Manfred.

In many ways the vocal parts in "Manfred" are rather thankless. Yet they were taken with all possible spirit and taste. The chorus of the spirits—"Crush the Worm"—was really dramatic in its intensity. All of the singers interpreted their parts with good judgment, so far as the music allows. The Cecilia won many new laurels, and Mrs. Titus, Miss Edwards, Mr. Johnson, Mr. Hay and the other soloists may claim their shares.

It is the orchestral rather than the vocal parts that are of chief interest in "Manfred," however. It cannot be said that the music is great or tremendously tragic; but it is marked often by extreme grace and beauty. The Symphony Orchestra has played the music before, but never better than it was played at this concert. The brilliant triumph attained in that direction almost led one to wish that the chief orchestral parts had been played, to the exclusion of the rest of the work. At all events, even the weakness of the vocal scores, and the fact that at times Mr. Davies was inaudible to many of the audience, did not serve to make the evening uninteresting or unenjoyable.

It is impossible to speak too highly of the orchestra's performance. All the delicacy, the etherial quality of the music, the light, airy gracefulness of the entr'actes and the brilliancy of the melodramas were given with a rare taste and a delicacy that have rarely been equalled in this city.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 99.
SUNDAY, APRIL 9, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schumann's "Manfred" Given, but Not with Effect.

Reading by Mr. Davies Not Received with Much Enthusiasm—His Work Devoid of Dramatic Force—Orchestra and Chorus Meet with General Approval.

Last evening the 21st concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall. The programme was confined to Schumann's music to Lord Byron's "Manfred." Mr. David Ffrangon Davies read those portions of the drama which the composer had chosen to illustrate. The vocalists were Mrs. Marion Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. Herbert Johnson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Frederic L. Martin, Mr. Clinton A. Hyland and Mr. Clarence B. Ashenden. A mixed chorus of members of the Cecilia assisted.

The music that Schumann has written for this play is of rare beauty, but it is not effective in the concert room, except the overture, the entr'acte and the adjuration to the witch. The vocal numbers are singularly unemotional and uninteresting, and impressive dramatic color is wholly absent, save perhaps in the melos during the apparition of the spirits.

The dramatic instinct is not strongly evidenced in any of Schumann's more ambitious works in which voices have important prominence, and "Manfred" is no exception. Last evening the brief solos and the quartets were even less effective than usual by reason of placing the singers out of sight and at a distance, and under conditions that caused their voices to sound muffled. This arrangement might have been well enough if the performance had been given in a theatre, with scenery and other necessary adjuncts. But as Manfred did not appear on a mountain peak, and as the spirit of Astarte was not visible, and as, moreover, the mournful misanthropist was clad in full-dress evening attire, placing the soloists where they could not be seen and scarcely heard was not justified by the results.

The performance, as a whole, was very dull. Mr. Davies, though an admirable singer, did not manifest any special talents as a reader. He was unemphatic, solemnly dreary and even tiresome. His reading was at times indistinct, very often scarcely intelligible, and it was characterized by a low monotony of voice and long pauses that were better calculated to soothe his hearers to slumber than to keep their attention alert. Of dramatic force of expression, of effective accentuation of sentiment, of anything resembling passion, there was scarcely a trace. His speech trickled slowly and boresomely on its way, as if he were an unimpassioned pedagogue delivering a lecture on metaphysics to a class of students.

The Manfred of the poet is a poseur, not wholly without interest in his splendid self-esteem and his brummagem melancholy, but Mr. Davies transformed him into an unmitigated bore, and illustrated convincingly the ne sutor ultra crepidam theory. His singing is always a delight. His "cantillation" is not without a certain stirring effectiveness; but his reading, as exemplified on this occasion, has nothing to commend it to favorable consideration.

Mr. Gericke gave a brilliant and richly colored reading of the overture, and his interpretation of the score throughout was in his most thoughtful and most artistic vein. The orchestra also was at its very best. The chorus singing could hardly have been better. What was heard of the soloists was, with the exception of uncertain intonation and unsteadiness in the singing of the contralto solo, efficient if ineffective.

There was little enthusiasm; in fact, the audience appeared to be bored by the droning delivery of the text, and departures were numerous before the performance was half over.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; three sonata movements by Bach, orchestrated by Mr. Gericke; Smetana's symphonic poem, "Vltava," and a symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck.

THE TIMES
ESTABLISHED 1864. 6

There has been little of importance musically during the week save the opera and the Symphony concerts. The Symphony programme was unique as these programmes go calling, into play the services of a reader, seven soloists and a chorus composed of members of the Cecilia. The work performed was Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred." Mr. Ffrangcon Davies read the work and the soloists were Mrs. Marian Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. Herbert Johnson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Frederic L. Martin, Mr. Clinton A. Hyland and Mr. Clarence B. Ashenden.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1899.

The performance of "Manfred," which constituted last night's Symphony programme, cannot be discussed in the small space at command this morning, but will be spoken of at length in our next issue.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

[illegible] APRIL [illegible], 1899.

“[illegible]ANFRED.”

Schumann's Music to Byron's Dramatic Poem Performed at the 21st Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night in Music Hall.

Schumann's music to Byron's “Manfred” was performed last night at the [illegible] Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor. Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies was the reader. The singers were Mrs. Titus, Miss Edmands, Messrs. Herbert Johnson, Hay, Martin, Hyland, Ashenden, and a chorus of members of the Cecilia. There was a large audience.

The last performance of this work was Jan. 9, 1892, under Mr. Nikisch, when Mr. George Riddle was the reader, and the singers were Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. W. Heinrich, [illegible]meyn, Lamson, Sargent, Hay.

⁂

Although this poem has been given in stage-dress with Schumann's music—the first performance in the theatre was at Weimar under Liszt's direction, June 13, 1852—and although Hanslick when he heard it thus given in Vienna under Herbeck declared that the music gained immeasurably thereby, especially the vocal music—it is nevertheless true that Byron himself did not write “Manfred” for the theatre. In a letter to Murray, the publisher, he said: “I have made it impossible that it should be put upon the stage, having the greatest contempt for the theatre ever since my affair with Drury Lane.” And in another letter (April 9, 1817), he said: “You may call it ‘a poem,’ for it is no Drama, and I do not choose to have it called by so damned a name—a ‘Poem in dialogue,’ or—Pantomime, if you will; anything but a green-room synonyme.”

Does anybody read “Manfred,” or for that matter “Childe Harold” today? Byron is to this younger generation the poet of “Beppo” and “Don Juan” and the writer of the letters—and I doubt if even these are read as much as they should be. There was talk about “Manfred” when Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe published her vile, outrageous book, but is not the hero at rest and buried with the Giaour, Lara, Childe Harold and the other scowling, mysterious, gloomy, melodramatic puppets contrived and dressed by the noble Lord, whose favorite tipple was gin and water?

And yet this Manfred, this Faust without a Gretchen, without a Mephistopheles, this Manfred indulging in subtle, metaphysical inquiries, human only in his longing for Astarte—and inhuman in that—was once a real, authoritative figure in the eyes of German romanticists.

The perturbed Schumann found special pleasure in this poem. He once said that he never devoted himself to any composition with such love and concentration as to his music to “Manfred.” Wasielewski tells us that when Schumann was reading the poem aloud at Düsseldorf his voice suddenly faltered, he burst into tears, and he was so overcome that he could read no farther.

But was Schumann the man to write the music to “Manfred?” His genius was essentially undramatic. He proved this in sundry of his attempts at dramatic writing in larger or smaller form. He had not the faculty of musical characterization, whether he wrote an opera, “Genoveva,” or a dramatic ballad, “Belshazzer.” His genius shone the brightest when he was purely lyrical.

His disarrangement of Byron's text shows that he had little or no instinct for the theatre, or even for dramatic effects. To me—for I have never seen “Manfred” on the stage—Schumann's music is simply a record of his impressions in music of the poem. Perhaps they go too far who insist that it should not be heard in concert, on the ground that the music does not bring vividly the play before the audience; that the text suffers from the musical interruption and the music is neglected in desire to hear the text. At the same time, it might have been more to the purpose if Mr. Gericke had allowed us to hear Tschaikowsky's “Manfred” symphony—which has been played in Chicago this season—or even Louis Lacombe's similarly entitled symphony with chorus.

The orchestral music of Schumann's Manfred is far superior to the vocal music. The short solos sung by the Spirits are characterless and dull. The incantation, sung by four bass voices, is of force only in the text. Are you awed or thrilled by the Hymn of the Spirits of Arimanes? The Requiem is more effective—but it seems like a cruel mockery when the voice of the Abbot is heard at the same time, saying: “He's gone—his soul hath ta'en his earthless flight—Whither? I dread to think—but he's gone.” But when you examine the incidental orchestral music, then you find Schumann in more romantic mood. The passion of the overture is well known in concert halls, although you may not believe with the ingenious Mr. [illegible]mann that the “three syncopated [illegible] chords remind us of the crime which hangs over Manfred with its oppressive weight.” I know of few things more beautiful in melodramatic music than the entr'acte in F major, the calling of the Witch of the Alps, the appearance of a Magic Figure, and the [illegible] music.

⁂

The performance was one of insufferable dullness. Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies is an interesting singer both in lyric and dramatic parts. What in the world persuaded him to come before the public as a reader? He has neither authority nor skill for such work. He read as though he were in a parish church and the first lesson was from I. Chronicles [illegible] 24, which begins “Now these are the divisions of the sons of Aaron. The sons of Aaron; Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar.” An undramatic [illegible] undramatic music for the most [illegible] and an undramatic, unschooled [illegible] who at his best separates words so that a street [illegible] be driven between them. [illegible] orchestra was not at its [illegible] attack was frequently slovenly [illegible] the men seemed bored, as [illegible] probably were, and with excellent [illegible]. The singers were good [illegible] what had they to sing? [illegible] bore it all with praise-

---

[illegible] list. The [illegible] that the [illegible] of most of the works quoted [illegible] based [illegible] or less [illegible] the Manfred of [illegible] the Manfred of [illegible] He is not the same—not the same.

Philip Hale.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 3, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programe of the twentieth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in C major, No. 34.
Wagner: Charfreitags-Zauber, from “Parsifal.”
Dvorak: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 70.

Mr. Gericke showed anew his fine sense of “the eternal fitness of things” in arranging the programme for Eastertide. First came the Mozart Symphony No. 34 in C major, given for the first time at these concerts. This symphony—one of the few written without minuet—though not the highest example of Mozart's art expression, is in every respect worthy of Mozart and his refined treatment of melodious sentiment. Mr. Gericke's sympathy with classical form was never better indicated than in the simple, forceful reading he gave this abbreviated Mozart symphonic idea. It was in the spirit of gratitude with which we greet an opportunity—rare, indeed—to hear even fragments of the Parsifal music given the requisite nobility of setting, that we listened to the “Good Friday spell.”

Mr. Gericke brought out splendidly, subtlely the spiritualized essence of the Parsifal motives in contra-distinction to the sensuous dramatic force of all else Wagner created. Wagner could not write of spiritual repose; all he knew was spiritual action in opposition to physical action, and in his Parsifal, even amidst the flowers, he exclaims, “O weh; des höchsten Schmerzentag's!” That inevitable grief of the spirit Mr. Gericke felt and wove with understanding into the Wagner harmonies, whose gentleness in the “Good Friday spell” would belie their creator were the spirit of restless grief lost.

Never before has Antonin Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 appealed to us with the same large, fullness of sentiment and richness of coloring. One felt almost as if the orchestra were improving upon the composer as an actor creates a part. Mr. Gericke's knowledge of values in the musical pictures he paints is to be regarded as one of the points at which he has few peers. The programme taken as a whole was restful and significant, just the finishing touch put upon a week of remarkable musical events in Boston.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schumann's “Manfred” Music Given Last Evening in Music Hall.

Schumann's music to Byron's “Manfred,” [illegible] was given last evening in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra, with the assistance of Mr. David Ffrangcon Davies as reader, Mrs. Marian Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Messrs. Herbert Johnson, Clarence E. Hay, Frederic L. Martin, Clinton A. Hyland, Clarence B. Ashenden, soloists, and a chorus of members from the Cecilia.

As to the performance last evening, it can be said that it was in all respects admirable and one that was thoroughly enjoyable.

Especial praise must be given to Mr. Davies for his reading or the text. His voice was of the right quality, his enunciation at all times clear and distinct, and there was not a moment when he failed to make what he said of interest to the listener.

The chorus was of fine volume and purity, and what there was to do was well done, as might be always expected from the members of the Cecilia. The soloists did not have much that was very interesting, but they acquitted themselves well.

The orchestra gave an admirable performance of the overture, and their work in the entr'actes and accompaniments left nothing to be desired. In a word, it was good to hear the “Manfred” music once again, and it should be heard more frequently than has been the case in the past. There was an immense audience and there was much applause.

[illegible]ONDAY, APRIL [illegible]

[illegible] Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-first symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was devoted to a performance of Schumann's music to Byron's “Manfred.” The solo parts were sung by Mrs. Marian Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. Herbert Johnson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Frederic L. Martin, Mr. Clinton A. Hyland and Mr. Clarence B. Ashenden. Portions of Byron's text were read by Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies. The chorus was composed of members of the Cecilia.

In the music to “Manfred,” his opus 115, Schumann seems to have dived farther down into the human soul, and brought up richer treasures of expression from its depths, than in anything else he ever wrote for voices and orchestra. Even the wonderful, tear-laden “Sleep on, in visions of odor rest!” in the second finale of “Paradise and the Peri,” pales before the combined fathomless pathos and acute poignancy of the G major melodrama accompanying Manfred's speech to Astarte. One knows not where to look for another such musical expression of anguish of soul. Yet here, as elsewhere, Schumann remains the old Schumann; poignant and infinitely beautiful as the thing is, it is in no true sense dramatic; it is one of the most vivid pictures of a psychical condition in all music, but suggests none of the external modes of expression that belong to the stage. It affords the actor no histrionic help; it has, to be sure, little musical independence, one can hardly imagine it divorced from the words of the text; but at the same time it adds not a jot of emotional penetrating force to those words. It simply supplies a sort of musical atmosphere, all a-throb with emotion, and communicating its heart-beat directly to the listener, thus trebling his emotional receptivity. As far as regards the result, no dramatic writing we can imagine could efficiently take its place; no dramatic definiteness of appeal could do what this vaguer musical appeal does! Here Schumann has been great, not merely in spite of, but because of his remaining his true self.

In some other portions of the work, notably in the songs of the Spirits, he seems almost to have gone wantonly out of his way, to escape being dramatic. These spirit songs are pure atmosphere, nothing but mood; they seem to take pains to say nothing. Yet they are not without a certain impressiveness of their own; they are impressive by the mere fact of their being there, by the mere fact of their existence. The same may be said of the closing “Requiem”; its effect is, in a sense, purely scenic. But how the human element comes to the fore, how the composer overmasters us with his emotional expression, when that fragment of the Astarte-motive comes in, as a last heart-broken farewell, in the flute and clarinet! Wagner did well to remember this in the last few measures of his “Tristan und Isolde.” The mighty overture and the exquisite intermezzo we all know well.

The performance by orchestra and chorus left nothing to be desired; it was masterly, exhaustive, from beginning to end. The solo parts made less effect. It was a pleasure, at first, to hear Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies's pure, silvery voice and clear, high-bred utterance as he read the poetic text. By the way, where does he get the short penult in Arimanes? The only authority we have consulted gives the penult as long, and another form of the name is Arimannis; but this is merely by the way. As he went on, however, one caught something of a pulpit whine in his delivery that was not pleasant; and, when the orchestra came in, his voice was all but inaudible; at times we did not catch one word in twenty. It seemed a mistake not to have the text printed in the programme books; had it been, one could have followed the reader more easily. But only the words to the songs and choruses were given in the books.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 16, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance in Boston of Cesar Franck's D Minor Symphony.

The twenty-second Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. There was no soloist.

The principal number of the programme was the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck, which received its first performance in this city. It is a work of great seriousness, elaborate treatment of themes and the orchestration in the most modern manner, without being, however, in any way coarse or noisy. The performance was of the highest degree of excellence.

The other numbers were Cherubini's “Anacreon” overture, Smetana's symphonic poem, “The Moldau,” and three sonata movements of Bach, arranged for orchestra by Mr. Gericke.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 12, 1899.

The twenty-first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The program consisted of Schumann's music to Lord Byron's “Manfred.” Ffrangcon-Davies was the reader. The performance was by no means of a stirring kind. The wort[illegible] of the work centres wholly in the orchestral music. The solos and quartets are without dramatic color, and are u[illegible]terly ineffective, nor were they made any more interesting because the singers were placed out of sight and so far away that they were heard only in muffled tones that were more or less impregnated with overtunefulness. But even these drawbacks to enjoyment might have been borne patiently if the reading had been in any way tolerable.

Mr. Davies as a singer has rare merits, but as a reader he is an impossibility. Nothing more unemphatic, more solemnly and profoundly dull, and more wearisome than was his reading of the text, can be easily conceived. He droned along in utterances that were seldom distinct, that were often unintelligible, and that were delivered in a monotonously low tone of voice, and with long pauses that at last became almost exasperating. Dreary oppressiveness was the somniferous outcome. This Manfred took on the aspect of a garrulous and unimpassioned professor of moral philosophy, delivering a perfunctory lecture to his class. Byron's Manfred is a combination of all his heroes who made of melodramatic gloom and of posing as martyrs to the world's injustice, a profession; but he is not without a certain interest as a sublime egotist, an artistic simulator of melancholy, and a brummagem moralist. Mr. Davies contrived with unimpeachable success to change him into a sluggish bore of the first rank. Why this artist should have been tempted to become a reader surpasses understanding, in view of the fact that on this occasion he exemplified no talent in that capacity to commend him to favorable consideration.

For once a Symphony audience remained passive through a whole concert. Overcome by the undramatic nature of the poem, the undramatic quality of the vocal music, and the droning undramatic reading of the text, it began to seek relief by disappearing a few at a time at every convenient pause in the performance, before it was half over. And a Symphony audience is proverbially a courteous and a patient one, that submits to weariness of spirit with exemplary fortitude, and that is generously prone to applaud even under the most discouraging circumstances.

MUSICAL AMERICA
EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND
PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

For Publishers' Announcements, see Page 24.

New York, April 15, 1899.

GERICKE'S DISCIPLINE.

Mr. W. S. B. Matthews, the well-known Chicago teacher and writer, tells an interesting story of the manner in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is dominated by its leader. He says: “I have heard many anecdotes of Gericke's way of doing business. For example: When the ensemble had reached what seemed very like perfection, the idea of playing in New York was broached, and Mr. Higginson (the Boston rich man and lover of music and his kind, who has financiered the Boston Orchestra at his own expense) caused a hall to be engaged and advertisements put out. Such was the interest awakened that the house was sold out a fortnight before the date of playing. The last rehearsal took place in Boston, perhaps on Thursday morning, the New York date being the following Monday. The rehearsal went apparently as usual, the programme being mainly gone through with and corrections being made from time to time. Nothing indicated that Gericke was less pleased than usual. After the close of the rehearsal Mr. Gericke called at the office of Mr. Higginson, and after the customary greetings remarked in his usual quiet voice: ‘We will not be able to play in New York on Monday.’ Mr. Higginson stared and thought his ears must be playing him false. Gericke repeated the statement, in the same quiet voice. ‘But,’ exclaimed the financial master, ‘we have to play; the house is all sold out, and we have promised.’ ‘I cannot help that,’ said Gericke, ‘we cannot play next Monday; we do not play well enough.’ Mr. Higginson is said to have drawn a long breath, and to have remembered that the contract with Mr. Gericke provided that he was to be sole judge of the readiness of the orchestra to play outside Boston. Accordingly he recalled the advertisements, paid back the money for tickets, paid the hall rent, etc. The following year, when the season was well under way, Mr. Gericke came to Mr. Higginson's office, one day after rehearsal, and remarked, quietly, as before: ‘We are ready now to play in New York.’ The concert was duly announced, sold out and given. The result was a great triumph, and at one bound the Boston Orchestra established itself as the leading orchestral body of this country.”

Boston Journal

SUNDAY, APRIL 9, 1899.

"MANFRED."

Schumann's Music to Byron's Dramatic Poem Performed at the 21st Concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra Last Night in Music Hall.

Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred" was performed last night at the 21st Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor. Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies was the reader. The singers were Mrs. Titus, Miss Edmands, Messrs. Herbert Johnson, Hay, Martin, Hyland, Ashenden, and a chorus of members of the Cecilia. There was a large audience.

The last performance of this work was Jan. 9, 1892, under Mr. Nikisch, when Mr. George Riddle was the reader, and the singers were Mrs. Nikisch, Mrs. Wyman, Messrs. W. Heinrich, Meyn, Lamson, Sargent, Hay.

⁂

Although this poem has been given in stage-dress with Schumann's music—the first performance in the theatre was at Weimar under Liszt's direction, June 13, 1852—and although Hanslick when he heard it thus given in Vienna under Herbeck declared that the music gained immeasurably thereby, especially the vocal music—it is nevertheless true that Byron himself did not write "Manfred" for the theatre. In a letter to Murray, the publisher, he said: "I have made it impossible that it should be put upon the stage, having the greatest contempt for the theatre ever since my affair with Drury Lane." And in another letter (April 9, 1817), he said: "You may call it 'a poem,' for it is no Drama, and I do not choose to have it called by so damned a name—a 'Poem in dialogue,' or—Pantomime, if you will; anything but a green-room synonyme."

Does anybody read "Manfred," or for that matter "Childe Harold" today? Byron is to this younger generation the poet of "Beppo" and "Don Juan" and the writer of the letters—and I doubt if even these are read as much as they should be. There was talk about "Manfred" when Mrs. Harriet Beecher Stowe published her vile, outrageous book, but is not the hero at rest and buried with the Giaour, Lara, Childe Harold and the other scowling, mysterious, gloomy, melodramatic puppets contrived and dressed by the noble Lord, whose favorite tipple was gin and water?

And yet this Manfred, this Faust without a Gretchen, without a Mephistopheles, this Manfred indulging in subtle, metaphysical inquiries, human only in his longing for Astarte—and inhuman in that—was once a real, authoritative figure in the eyes of German romanticists.

The perturbed Schumann found special pleasure in this poem. He once said that he never devoted himself to any composition with such love and concentration as to his music to "Manfred." Wasielewski tells us that when Schumann was reading the poem aloud at Düsseldorf his voice suddenly faltered, he burst into tears, and he was so overcome that he could read no farther.

But was Schumann the man to write the music to "Manfred?" His genius was essentially undramatic. He proved this in sundry of his attempts at dramatic writing in larger or smaller form. He had not the faculty of musical characterization, whether he wrote an opera, "Genoveva," or a dramatic ballad, "Belshazzer." His genius shone the brightest when he was purely lyrical.

His disarrangement of Byron's text shows that he had little or no instinct for the theatre, or even for dramatic effects. To me—for I have never seen "Manfred" on the stage—Schumann's music is simply a record of his impressions in music of the poem. Perhaps they go too far who insist that it should not be heard in concert, on the ground that the music does not bring vividly the play before the audience; that the text suffers from the musical interruption and the music is neglected in desire to hear the text. At the same time, it might have been more to the purpose if Mr. Gericke had allowed us to hear Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony—which has been played in Chicago this season—or even Louis Lacombe's similarly entitled symphony with chorus.

The orchestral music of Schumann's Manfred is far superior to the vocal music. The short solos sung by the spirits are characterless and dull. The incantation, sung by four bass voices, is of force only in the text. Are you awed or thrilled by the Hymn of the Spirits of Arimanes? The Requiem is more effective—but it seems like a cruel mockery when the voice of the Abbot is heard at the same time, saying: "He's gone; his soul hath ta'en his earthless flight—Whither? I dread to think—but he is gone." But when you examine the incidental orchestral music, then you find Schumann in more romantic mood. The passion of the overture is well known in concert halls, although you may not believe with the ingenious Mr. Reissmann that the "three syncopated opening chords remind us of the crime which hangs over Manfred with its oppressive weight." I know of few things more beautiful in melodramatic music than the entr'acte in F major, the calling of the Witch of the Alps, the appearance of a Magic Figure, and the Astarte music.

⁂

The performance was one of insufferable dullness. Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies is an interesting singer both in lyric and dramatic parts. What in the world persuaded him to come before the public as a reader? He has neither authority nor skill for such work. He read as though he were in a parish church and the first lesson was from I. Chronicles, Chap. 24, which begins "Now these are the divisions of the sons of Aaron. The sons of Aaron; Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar." An undramatic text, undramatic music for the most part, and an undramatic, unschooled reader, who at his best separated words so that a street car could be driven between them. The orchestra was not at its best. The attack was frequently slovenly, and the men seemed bored, as they undoubtedly were, and with excellent reason. The singers were good enough, but what had they to sing? The audience bore it all with praiseworthy fortitude.

Yes, it would have been better to have performed Tschaikowsky's "Manfred" symphony, which the compiler of the program-book forgot to mention in his list. The compiler says (page 799) that the texts of most of the works quoted are "probably based more or less upon Byron's dramatic poem." As a matter of fact the Manfred of score is seldom if ever the Manfred of Byron's poem. He is not the same—yet the same.

Philip Hale.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 3, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programe of the twentieth Symphony concert, given in Music Hall Saturday evening, was as follows:

Mozart: Symphony in C major, No. 34.
Wagner: Charfreitags-Zauber, from "Parsifal."
Dvorak: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 70.

Mr. Gericke showed anew his fine sense of "the eternal fitness of things" in arranging the programme for Eastertide. First came the Mozart Symphony No. 34 in C major, given for the first time at these concerts. This symphony—one of the few written without minuet — though not the highest example of Mozart's art expression, is in every respect worthy of Mozart and his refined treatment of melodious sentiment. Mr. Gericke's sympathy with classical form was never better indicated than in the simple, forceful reading he gave this abbreviated Mozart symphonic idea. It was in the spirit of gratitude with which we greet an opportunity—rare, indeed—to hear even fragments of the Parsifal music given the requisite nobility of setting, that we listened to the "Good Friday spell."

Mr. Gericke brought out splendidly, subtlely the spiritualized essence of the Parsifal motives in contra-distinction to the sensuous dramatic force of all else Wagner created. Wagner could not write of spiritual repose; all he knew was spiritual action in opposition to physical action, and in his Parsifal, even amidst the flowers, he exclaims, "O weh; des höchsten Schmerzentag's!" That inevitable grief of the spirit Mr. Gericke felt and wove with understanding into the Wagner harmonies, whose gentleness in the "Good Friday spell" would belie their creator were the spirit of restless grief lost.

Never before has Antonin Dvorak's Symphony No. 2 appealed to us with the same large, fullness of sentiment and richness of coloring. One felt almost as if the orchestra were improving upon the composer as an actor creates a part. Mr. Gericke's knowledge of values in the musical pictures he paints is to be regarded as one of the points at which he has few peers. The programme taken as a whole was restful and significant, just the finishing touch put upon a week of remarkable musical events in Boston.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 9, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Schumann's "Manfred" Music Given Last Evening in Music Hall.

Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred," op. 115, was given last evening in Music Hall by the Symphony Orchestra, with the assistance of Mr. David Ffrangcon Davies as reader, Mrs. Marian Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Messrs. Herbert Johnson, Clarence E. Hay, Frederic L. Martin, Clinton A. Hyland, Clarence B. Ashenden, soloists, and a chorus of members from the Cecilia.

As to the performance last evening, it can be said that it was in all respects admirable and one that was thoroughly enjoyable.

Especial praise must be given to Mr. Davies for his reading of the text. His voice was of the right quality, his enunciation at all times clear and distinct, and there was not a moment when he failed to make what he said of interest to the listener.

The chorus was of fine volume and purity, and what there was to do was well done, as might be always expected from the members of the Cecilia. The soloists did not have much that was very interesting, but they acquitted themselves well.

The orchestra gave an admirable performance of the overture, and their work in the entr'actes and accompaniments left nothing to be desired. In a word, it was good to hear the "Manfred" music once again, and it should be heard more frequently than has been the case in the past. There was an immense audience and there was much applause.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 10, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-first symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was devoted to a performance of Schumann's music to Byron's "Manfred." The solo parts were sung by Mrs. Marian Titus, Miss Gertrude Edmands, Mr. Herbert Johnson, Mr. Clarence E. Hay, Mr. Frederic L. Martin, Mr. Clinton A. Hyland and Mr. Clarence B. Ashenden. Portions of Byron's text were read by Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies. The chorus was composed of members of the Cecilia.

In the music to "Manfred," his opus 115, Schumann seems to have dived farther down into the human soul, and brought up richer treasures of expression from its depths, than in anything else he ever wrote for voices and orchestra. Even the wonderful, tear-laden "Sleep on, in visions of odor rest!" in the second finale of "Paradise and the Peri," pales before the combined fathomless pathos and acute poignancy of the G major melodrama accompanying Manfred's speech to Astarte. One knows not where to look for another such musical expression of anguish of soul. Yet here, as elsewhere, Schumann remains the old Schumann; poignant and infinitely beautiful as the thing is, it is in no true sense dramatic; it is one of the most vivid pictures of a psychical condition in all music, but suggests none of the external modes of expression that belong to the stage. It affords the actor no histrionic help; it has, to be sure, little musical independence, one can hardly imagine it divorced from the words of the text; but at the same time it adds not a jot of emotional penetrating force to those words. It simply supplies a sort of musical atmosphere, all a-throb with emotion, and communicating its heartbeat directly to the listener, thus trebling his emotional receptivity. As far as regards the result, no dramatic writing we can imagine could efficiently take its place; no dramatic definiteness of appeal could do what this vaguer musical appeal does! Here Schumann has been great, not merely in spite of, but because of his remaining his true self.

In some other portions of the work, notably in the songs of the Spirits, he seems almost to have gone wantonly out of his way, to escape being dramatic. These spirit songs are pure atmosphere, nothing but mood; they seem to take pains to say nothing. Yet they are not without a certain impressiveness of their own; they are impressive by the mere fact of their being there, by the mere fact of their existence. The same may be said of the closing "Requiem": its effect is, in a sense, purely scenic. But how the human element comes to the fore, how the composer overmasters us with his emotional expression, when that fragment of the Astarte-motive comes in, as a last heart-broken farewell, in the flute and clarinet! Wagner did well to remember this in the last few measures of his "Tristan und Isolde." The mighty overture and the exquisite intermezzo we all know well.

The performance by orchestra and chorus left nothing to be desired; it was masterly, exhaustive, from beginning to end. The solo parts made less effect. It was a pleasure, at first, to hear Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies's pure, silvery voice and clear, highbred utterance as he read the poetic text. By the way, where does he get the short penult in Arimanes? The only authority we have consulted gives the penult as long, and another form of the name is Arimannis; but this is merely by the way. As he went on, however, one caught something of a pulpit whine in his delivery that was not pleasant; and, when the orchestra came in, his voice was all but inaudible; at times we did not catch one word in twenty. It seemed a mistake not to have the text printed in the programme books; had it been, one could have followed the reader more easily. But only the words to the songs and choruses were given in the books.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 16, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Performance in Boston of Cesar Franck's D Minor Symphony.

The twenty-second Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. There was no soloist.

The principal number of the programme was the D minor symphony of Cesar Franck, which received its first performance in this city. It is a work of great seriousness, elaborate treatment of themes and the orchestration in the most modern manner, without being, however, in any way coarse or noisy. The performance was of the highest degree of excellence.

The other numbers were Cherubini's "Anacreon" overture, Smetana's symphonic poem, "The Moldau," and three sonata movements of Bach, arranged for orchestra by Mr. Gericke.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 12, 1899.

The twenty-first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The program consisted of Schumann's music to Lord Byron's "Manfred." Ffrangcon-Davies was the reader. The performance was by no means of a stirring kind. The worth of the work centres wholly in the orchestral music. The solos and quartets are without dramatic color, and are utterly ineffective, nor were they made any more interesting because the singers were placed out of sight and so far away that they were heard only in muffled tones that were more or less impregnated with overtunefulness. But even these drawbacks to enjoyment might have been borne patiently if the reading had been in any way tolerable.

Mr. Davies as a singer has rare merits, but as a reader he is an impossibility. Nothing more unemphatic, more solemnly and profoundly dull, and more wearisome than was his reading of the text, can be easily conceived. He droned along in utterances that were seldom distinct, that were often unintelligible, and that were delivered in a monotonously low tone of voice, and with long pauses that at last became almost exasperating. Dreary oppressiveness was the somniferous outcome. This Manfred took on the aspect of a garrulous and unimpassioned professor of moral philosophy, delivering a perfunctory lecture to his class. Byron's Manfred is a combination of all his heroes who made of melodramatic gloom and of posing as martyrs to the world's injustice, a profession; yet he is not without a certain interest as a sublime egotist, an artistic simulator of melancholy, and a brummagem [illegible]. Mr. Davies contrived with unimpeachable success to change him into a sluggish bore of the first rank. Why this artist should have been tempted to become a reader surpasses understanding, in view of the fact that on this occasion he exemplified no talent in that capacity to commend him to favorable consideration.

For once a Symphony audience remained passive through a whole concert. Overcome by the undramatic nature of the poem, the undramatic quality of the vocal music, and the droning undramatic reading of the text, it began to seek relief by disappearing a few at a time at every convenient pause in the performance, before it was half over. And a Symphony audience is proverbially a courteous and a patient one, that submits to weariness of spirit with exemplary fortitude, and that is generously prone to applaud even under the most discouraging circumstances.

MUSICAL AMERICA

EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND

For Publishers' Announcements, see Page 24.

New York, April 15, 1899.

GERICKE'S DISCIPLINE.

Mr. W. S. B. Matthews, the well-known Chicago teacher and writer, tells an interesting story of the manner in which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is dominated by its leader. He says: "I have heard many anecdotes of Gericke's way of doing business. For example: When the ensemble had reached what seemed very like perfection, the idea of playing in New York was broached, and Mr. Higginson (the Boston rich man and lover of music and his kind, who has financiered the Boston Orchestra at his own expense) caused a hall to be engaged and advertisements put out. Such was the interest awakened that the house was sold out a fortnight before the date of playing. The last rehearsal took place in Boston, perhaps on Thursday morning, the New York date being the following Monday. The rehearsal went apparently as usual, the programme being mainly gone through with and corrections being made from time to time. Nothing indicated that Gericke was less pleased than usual. After the close of the rehearsal Mr. Gericke called at the office of Mr. Higginson, and after the customary greetings remarked in his usual quiet voice: 'We will not be able to play in New York on Monday.' Mr. Higginson stared and thought his ears must be playing him false. Gericke repeated the statement, in the same quiet voice. 'But,' exclaimed the financial master, 'we have to play; the house is all sold out, and we have promised.' 'I cannot help that,' said Gericke, 'we cannot play next Monday; we do not play well enough.' Mr. Higginson is said to have drawn a long breath, and to have remembered that the contract with Mr. Gericke provided that he was to be sole judge of the readiness of the orchestra to play outside Boston. Accordingly he recalled the advertisements, paid back the money for tickets, paid the hall rent, etc. The following year, when the season was well under way, Mr. Gericke came to Mr. Higginson's office, one day after rehearsal, and remarked, quietly, as before: 'We are ready now to play in New York.' The concert was duly announced, sold out and given. The result was a great triumph, and at one bound the Boston Orchestra established itself as the leading orchestral body of this country."

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 17, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the twenty-second symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Cherubini: Overture to "Anacréon."
J. S. Bach: Three Sonata Movements, arranged for Orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.
Smetana: Symphonic Poem, "Vltava."
César Franck: Symphony in D minor.
(First time in Boston.)

The delightful Cherubini overture was superbly played. It is a great pleasure to hear such a performance of such a work; and yet one cannot but wonder that this "Anacréon" and "Les deux Journées" are about all that is left of Cherubini in our current concert repertory. One may even wonder that "Les deux Journées (Wasserträger)," being the greater work of the two, is far less often given than the other. There may be some of Cherubini's overtures that would seem a little stiff in the joints, if suddenly waked up after their long sleep; but surely the experiment would be worth trying with "Les Abencérages" and "Médée;" which latter has always seemed to us the most supremely tragic thing Cherubini ever wrote—that is, tragic in the classical sense of the term, the sense in which Brahms's "Tragische Ouvertüre" and Mr. Chadwick's "Melpomene" are tragic.

Mr. Gericke's arrangements of the movements from Bach's flute and violin sonatas with Clavier had not been heard here since he gave them years ago, in his first term as conductor. The first two are divinely beautiful, Bach at his best; and the third is almost as good in its way. Mr. Gericke has done the work of arranging with consummate musicianship and sympathy with Bach's style; especially fine is the way he has expanded these three-voice movements into the larger, fuller part-writing of orchestral composition. This is quite a different matter from the mere instrumentation; it is actual composing. The orchestration, in itself, is excellent—with perhaps a passage or two that might be improved—but this is a far less difficult matter than the actual writing we have referred to. The performance left little to be desired; indeed, we should have called it admirable were we not somewhat in doubt whether the occasional falling short of entirely satisfying effect, mentioned above, was due to the instrumentation or the playing.

Smetana's "Vltava" was superbly played. It has never seemed to us the best of the "Ma Vlast" cyclus; and this time we were both agreeably and unpleasantly disappointed in it. The Vltava-theme itself—with its annoying reminder of an old German children's song, "Der Fuchs, der hat die Gans gestohlen"—is essentially commonplace; yet it has undeniable beauty of musical outline, and we found this time that its rather Mendelssohnish fluency was relieved by a touch of Smetana's own poetic "Innigkeit;" when it comes in in major, the effect is entrancing! The poetically suggestive and picturesque parts of the writing are admirable, the orchestral coloring, charming throughout. We found the first three-quarters of the composition unexpectedly delightful; only, when, after all these poetic and picturesque developments, that Vltava-theme returns in triumph "in the widest part of the river Moldau," then does it show all its intrinsic cheapness and puerility. It comes almost like a slap in the face!

And at last we have heard the César Franck symphony! a composition which has been patiently waiting for years in the antechamber of our concerts, and has only now succeeded in getting an audience. There is evidently a great deal of true beauty, of masculine strength and poetic imaginativeness in the work. The musicianship displayed in it seems absolute. The composer has given himself a good deal of elbow-room in his development of each one of the three movements; which may account for his omission of the customary Scherzo—the more tricksy, spookish parts of the Allegretto perhaps doing duty for that. Yet we did not find the development excessive, except perhaps in parts of the middle movement, in which there is a good deal of repetition. The resemblance between the theme of the first movement and that of Liszt's "Les Préludes" may pass as a coincidence, and does no real harm. It is a resemblance, not identity. The admirable ease, grace and solidity of all the polyphonic portions of the writing is conspicuous; for a man to write so, he must have done more than studying, he must have counterpoint in his blood. In few new works have we found such superb, adamantine basses. The thing is a real symphony, in all the best and highest features the term implies. We cannot help feeling, however, that there is really more in the work than was shown forth in the performance; we think the orchestra would have done well to give it another week's rehearsing. As in Berlioz's "Fantastic," the individual parts are not difficult for the players; but we suspect the ensemble of being very difficult indeed. Franck does not seem to have been one of those complete masters of orchestration—like Wagner or Mendelssohn—whose scores almost play themselves, who have made provision for every nuance in the way they have grouped their instruments. In this matter, Franck's symphony seems more like a score by Schumann——widely different as the style of instrumentation is—or, still better, like Beethoven's Ninth. Here Beethoven did a great deal that was new in the matter of instrumentation, and did it after he was too deaf to make practical experiments; there are many passages, notably in the Adagio, in which conductor and players have to do a good deal before the effect is that which the composer evidently heard in his mind's ear; there is no little dynamic retouching to be done; play the notes as they stand, with mere routine obedience to expression-marks, and you get next to nothing! The same is true of all Schumann's orchestral works. In this symphony of Franck's, too, we suspect that the nuance has not always been fully achieved by the composer, in his scoring, but has been largely left to the players, and, with all its stoutness of structure, harmonic wealth, and beauty of outline, the true gist of the work seems still to be the expressive [illegible] like Chopin; the playing is not everything, for there is ample material there that will remain musical and masterly, no matter how played; but the playing is still a great deal, and, moreover, quite indispensable. The symphony was well played, but not what the French call "enlevée;" it is a work that calls for a great performance, and the performance fell short of greatness. We sincerely hope this symphony has "come to stay," that our orchestra will have opportunity to make it entirely their own.

The next programme is: Haydn, symphony in C major (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3); Liszt, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in A major; Paine, prelude to "Œdipus Tyrannus;" Wagner, Kaiser-Marsch. Mr. Carl Baermann will be the pianist.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 16, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

First Performance of Cesar Franck's Symphony in D Minor in This City—Mr. Gericke's Orchestration of Chamber Music by Bach.

The program of the 22d Symphony Concert in Music Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Anacreon" .... Cherubini
Three sonata movements .... Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
1—Andante (B minor).
2—Siciliano; andante moderato (F sharp minor).
3—Rondeau; allegro (A major).
Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau" .... Smetana
Symphony in D minor .... César Franck
(First time in Boston.)
1—Lento (D minor).
Allegro non troppo (D minor).
2—Allegretto (B flat minor).
3—Allegro non troppo (D major).

This was a concert of genuine interest from beginning to end. Cherubini's overture, a masterpiece of classic writing; ingenious arrangements for orchestra of chamber music by Bach; a fair specimen of program music by Smetana; and a symphony, which, whatever you may personally think of it, has aroused the most hearty admiration, as well as hot discussion, in Europe.

The overture to "Anacreon" is Greek in its coolness, its marble nudity. There is not the slightest hint at passion of any kind; there is not a rag to cover the sculptural exposure of themes and development. We are told that the story of the opera was ghastly in its dullness. But imagine what a wild-eyed composer of the Paris of today would write were such a subject given him for text. Bacchanales, panting love scenes and a realistic finale representing Anacreon choked to death with a grape-stone—to adopt an old legend that no doubt is scandalous to the memory of the poet. Cherubini's Anacreon is a man of frieze. It is beautiful music—so pure, so clear, so clean. And are there not other overtures by the old contrapuntist that are worth playing?

I am inclined to shy at arrangements, whether they be for the orchestra or the organ or "two German flutes," but Mr. Gericke orchestrated the pieces by Bach with such taste and skill, that they gave great pleasure—especially the siciliano. The first of the three pieces is the less inherently interesting; the second is exquisite in original version and in transcription; and the rondeau brings a lively close, inciting to applause.

Smetana's "Moldau," the second in order of his cycle of six patriotic symphony poems, was written in 1874; and at the end of the original score is this melancholy note: "Totally deaf." It is a charming work in much of its detail and in the honesty and frankness of the whole. Smetana was a program-composer without taint of insincerity. You realize, hearing his music, that the man was aroused to invention by a given scheme; not that he wrote music and then fitted a scheme to it. "The Moldau" has not the simple nobility of its predecessor, "Vysehrad," which was played here early in the season, but it is full of romance, with its suggestion of brooks, hunters, peasant dance, moonlight, water nymphs. I wish, however, that when Smetana had said good-by to his loved river, he had not shouted his farewell in the last loud chords. They are more than superfluous; they are jarring and impertinent.

And what shall be said about César Franck's symphony? I am inclined to say nothing about it, for I heard it last night for the first time, and it is not right or possible to pass a snap-judgment on such an unusual work.

Played for the first time at the Paris Conservatory, Feb. 17, 1889, it did not please. Played again at a Lamoureux concert, Nov. 19, 1893, it was applauded to the skies. Remember, however, that much music by Franck was heard between those dates. Not that he was accepted by everybody in 1893, for Servières tells us that when he spoke later about writing the biography of Franck in presence of a well-known publisher, the publisher said: "I remember Franck perfectly; he was always in a terrible hurry, he used to wear a sober suit of black, and his trousers were always at half-mast. But he wrote nothing for the stage. If he had only written a ballet!" Franck, by the way, did write two operas, but they have never been produced in Paris. Emma Eames created the part of the heroine in one; Saléza created the part of the hero in the other.

Let me record only impressions of this remarkable work. The first movement is noble music, full of high thoughts and lofty speech. I find nothing to complain of in the repetition of the introduction with the change of key from D minor to F minor. Such music gains by repetition; the attention is riveted more firmly, and what a beautiful theme is the one in F major that is prepared by the mysterious, murky counter subjects! The typical theme of the symphony—typical, for it appears in the three movements, is of great effect; but I should avoid all attempts at analysis, which without the notes is useless to the musician and incomprehensible to the amateur. Let me say that the first movement seems to be the great movement of the symphony. It is grand, heroic music. The second movement is ingenious, not without melancholy beauty, and the first theme given to the cor anglais is very characteristic of Franck in its climbing sorrow and harmonic dress. But as a whole, the first movement is more spontaneous, more striking. I should like to hear the third movement again, and especially this movement, because last night it made little impression on me, and I am ready to admit at present that the fault was with me. The second of the new themes introduced—the one characterized by Guy Ropartz as the "Theme of Triumph" is noble; and the summing up of what has gone before is done in masterly fashion; but the movement as a whole left me cold and disappointed.

There are several singular features about this symphony to which I should like to call attention: its modernity, the reduction of the form to three movements, the return in the finale to preceding themes, the abandonment of the reprise, the introduction of so many themes—thus there are at least five in the first movement. To speak at length concerning the technical skill displayed would be a waste of time. Franck's contrapuntal knowledge is indisputable. I wish that some of his themes were longer in this symphony; I wish that his development was not at times so amazingly polyphonic only for a moment; and I find that the orchestration as a whole is too monochromatic and drab. It is a pity that such an important work is played once and then put upon the shelf for a season. Two consecutive performanices—I do not mean to say that Mr. Gericke should imitate von Bülow and play such works twice in the same concert—would enable us all to deal more fairly with compositions of long breath and unusual scheme of harmonic and contrapuntal treatment.

Philip Hale.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL (Morning), $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), $1.00 per annum in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, APRIL 20, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Season Closed with a Brilliant Performance Last Evening.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra closed its 17th season in Providence with the concert given last evening in Infantry Hall. The performance was a brilliant one, and worthily rounded out the fine series given this year. Mr. Ben Davies, the famous English tenor, was the assisting soloist. The audience was an appreciative and enthusiastic but not a large one. As is well known, the attendance during the whole of this season has been discouraging to those who hope for the maintenance here of these unrivalled concerts.

Providence was one of the first cities to be favored with the visits of the Symphony Orchestra. During the first year of its organization little or no playing was done outside of Boston, all the time being required for the acquirement of a working ensemble, and a respectable concert repertory. But in the second season of the orchestra's existence, it began to branch out, and naturally Providence, Boston's nearest neighbor among large cities, was one of the first to be included in the circuit. Since then no season has passed without a series of symphony concerts here, varying in number from three at the beginning to eight during the past two years.

As was naturally to be expected, audiences were small at first. Education in the higher forms of musical art was sadly needed here. And, besides, so far as the mere sensuous enjoyment of the performances is concerned, the orchestra was not at that time the magnificent organization it has since become. But it was good, and as no pains or expense was spared to perfect its drill and personnel, it was steadily improving. And the audiences grew, slowly but surely, until some years ago enough regular patrons were secured to half fill Infantry Hall, or, perhaps, a little more. This, unfortunately, proved to be high water mark, for during the past few seasons no increase has been perceptible. On the contrary, the present season has shown a marked diminution of attendance.

The reason for this is hard to seek. It is a unique experience in the history of the orchestra. In every other city in the country which it visits regularly an increase of interest and patronage has resulted which has stopped only at the seating capacity of the largest concert hall. The natural inference would be either that Providence is far below other cities in appreciation of the highest class of music, or that it is too poor to pay for the gratification of its taste. The latter theory seems hardly tenable in view of the amount of money spent here for various forms of entertainment every year, and the other explanation is not an agreeable one to fall back on.

It is hardly necessary to enlarge upon the value of such concerts as those of the Symphony Orchestra. As an educational factor, as an aid and stimulas to a broad culture and appreciation of art, they are simply unrivalled. It is not to be expected that such luxuries can be furnished for the price of a ticket to a cheap variety show or a base ball game, even if they were likely to appeal to that class of patrons. What the outcome of the present situation will be it is difficult to say. But it is certainly proper to hope that before another season begins there will be sufficient encouragement of a tangible nature offered the management of the orchestra that the concerts here may be continued. One thing is certain—that if the orchestra can only draw empty benches, empty benches will fail to draw the orchestra. It is a question not only of lack of money, but of lack of appreciation.

Last night's programme was an interesting one, presenting both the classics and the moderns. It contained the following numbers.

Overture to "Anacreon," Op. 241 .... Luigi Cherubini
Recitative, "Deeper and Deeper Still," and Air, "Waft Her, Angels," .... from "Jephthah"
Selections from "Siegfried" and "Twilight of the Gods" (arranged by Hans Richter) .... Richard Wagner
Air, "Lend Me Your Aid," from "Irene" .... Charles Gounod
Symphony No. 2, in D major, Op. 73 .... Johannes Brahms
I. Allegro non troppo (D major)
II. Adagio non troppo (B major)
III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi Andantino (G major)
IV. Allegro con spirito (D major)

The overture to "Anacreon" has always been a popular concert number, though the opera to which it belonged is long since buried in oblivion. Cherubini was a composer of great industry and talent who fell just short of genius. He was a purist of the first water. No man had a greater command of the technical side of composition. Accomplished upon all sides of musical art, his writings are of great value to the student. The "Anacreon" overture is a good example of his style, and his thorough mastery of the details of instrumentation. It was brililantly played by the orchestra. The familiar excerpts from Wagner's "Trilogy" which filled the middle of the programme, were given a forceful and effective rendition.

The closing number, Brahms's second symphony, is one of that usually turgid composer's most bright and spontaneous works. In fact, the symphonies of Brahms present him at his best. When writing for the orchestra he seems to find tools enough to work with, while in his lesser compositions he is apparently forever groping for something out of his reach. The last two movements of this symphony, in particular, while they have the genuine Brahms complexity of structure, are at the same time melodious and delightful music. The whole work was exquisitely played, and the orchestra wound up the symphony, concert and season with a glorious rush in the finale.

The vocalist, Mr. Davies, always a great favorite here, gave the celebrated air from Handel's "Jepthah," which he has a reputation for singing superbly, with consummate taste and skill. Aside from his fine delivery of the air, his eloquent declamation of the long preceding recitative was most impressive. For his second number he gave the air beloved of all tenors, Gounod's "Lend Me Your Aid," with such success as to win a half-dozen stormy recalls.

The orchestral numbers, too, won their meed of applause, the audience perhaps being in the mood of the poet when he wrote "Blessings brighten as they take their flight"—giving way to an unusual display of enthusiasm.

---

stage
sic last evenin
formance, "The ade, a plea ing and elaborate combination of sta pictures, tableaux, marches songs and specialties. The performers were excellent, and a large audience gave them generous applause. The theatre was well filled, and in the boxes were parties that included Congressman Roberts and other prominent Chelsea men.

Beside the other performers, detachments from Theodore Winthrop post 35, G. A. R., battery H, 1st heavy artillery, M. V. M.; the Chelsea high school cadets, and the Soldiers' Home

INCOMPLETE

[illegible] HERALD.

[illegible] EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 106.

SUNDAY, APRIL 16, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Work of Franck's Heard for the First Time Here.

Dignified and Earnest, Yet Mournful to a Marked Degree—Movements from Bach Sonatas Given the Best Possible Production—Other Good Features.

The programme arranged by Mr. Gericke for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music hall was:

Overture, "Anacreon"..................Cherubini
Three sonata movements..................Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau"......Smetana
Symphony in D minor.............Cesar Franck

The Cesar Franck symphony was new to Boston, and is the first work of the composer in this class of music that has been heard here. It is so strange in every way that no adequate idea of it can be obtained on a single hearing, let one listen never so attentively. The only thing that is carried away is a strong impression of the dignity and the earnestness of the music, of a deep poetic feeling that pervades it, and of a certain weird fascination that it exerts on the listener. In these qualities it is like all of Franck's music that has been performed here. It is always mournful, even to morbidity.

That it has beauties of a high order is undeniable, but they are invariably attuned to melancholy. One yearns at last for something that suggests joyousness of spirit, for something that uplifts, if only for a moment, to vary the sense of depression that fills the listener. One may say, without the remotest intention of treating the work with disrespect, that it is full of graveyard suggestions; that it might have been conceived by a perturbed ghost, for an orchestra of restless spirits to perform among the tombstones on a sultry night, when the moon, magnified by the mist, is seen glaring through the fleecy clouds that are passing swiftly over its face. Frequent hearing of the symphony may do away with this uncanny effect; may even cause it to take on an appearance of healthfulness, and to run through the whole gamut of the emotions, but lack of familiarity with it makes for other results. And yet, with all these drawbacks, it is interesting in its strong and original individuality. It is no Kappelmeister music, but speaks in a language distinctly and independently its own. Even while one is not moved to enthusiasm over it, one feels profound respect for it, and is certain that one's objections are stirred [illegible] activity through not fully understanding it.

An attempt to pass judgment on such a work under the circumstances would be to risk almost certain error. It therefore only remains to be said that while the symphony, under the sway of first impressions, never seemed dull, it did seem spun out to a length which the brevity of its themes scarcely appeared to warrant, and that, if the attention was not wearied by the constant and apparently wearisome repetitions, it often flagged.

The Bach number is made up of movements from different sonatas, the first and second from sonatas for clavier and flute, and the finale from a sonata for clavier and violin. Mr. Gericke has been felicitous in placing them in juxtaposition, and his arrangement of them for orchestra is not only musicianly in the best sense of the word, but is charming in effect and in the fidelity with which he has transcribed the music without in the slightest degree departing from the spirit of the composer. The instrumentation is equally fine in [illegible] delightful variety of tone color has been imparted to it, and in its [illegible] dignified simplicity. All [illegible] movements show Bach in his most [illegible]. The second movement, a Siciliano, is an exquisite little bit of chaste melody, and the rondeau finale is joyousness itself. The performance was one of rare beauty and finish, and won the heartiest applause of the evening.

The noble "Anacreon" overture, worthy to take its place by the side of the masterpieces in its class, perhaps even with those of Beethoven, was splendidly interpreted and brilliantly performed. Smetana's spirited and poetic symphonic poem was again heard with pleasure, intensified on this occasion by the sympathetic and effective treatment it received.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3, in C major, revised by Franz Wullner; concerto for pianoforte in A major, Liszt; prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus," J. K. Paine, and "Kaisermarsch," Wagner. Mr. Carl Baermann is to be the soloist.

[illegible]

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 17, 1899.

Symphony Orchestra Performs Franck's Symphony.

The old and the new touched elbows in Saturday's programme and the works of Bach and of Cesar Franck marked the two extremes of the concert. Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" is by no means an Anacreontic but is a clear and orderly exposition of the style of one of the greatest of musical conservatives.

It gave a good opportunity to the violins to display their proficiency, but to speak of the excellence of this part of our orchestra would be gild refined gold. It was pleasant to note that the audience did not find the work too severe and applauded most heartily.

If Bach is to be modernized at all, if his thin, skeleton forms are ever to receive orchestral flesh, then Mr. Gericke is, next to Robert Franz, the man to make the transformation, for he approaches the task in a reverent spirit and carries out in a contrapuntal spirit the suggestions of Bach's polyphony. On this occasion he presented selections from three different works of Bach, made into a pretty little Suite, and orchestrated with much discretion; the three movements had been selected with excellent taste as foils to each other and the heterogeneous effect of a "pasticcio" was avoided.

The first movement, an Andante from a flute and piano sonata, was rather a learned dose for the laity, but the second, a Siciliano from another flute sonata, made charming amends. There is far more melody in Bach than the average auditor supposes; too often it is obscured to the modern auditor, accustomed to strong rhythms, by the master's employment of counterpoint, which is often the least rhythmic expression of music.

Set a modern accompaniment to the Polonaise of the 5th French Suite and one has a Chopin effect, simplify the accompaniments to Bach's Gigues (or "Jigs") and one discovers the rollicking tune of the barn-yard dance, set Celtic words and a simple accompaniment to the subject of Fugue No. 11, Book II., of the "Well-tempered Clavichord" and one has a good beginning of an Irish folk-song. The Siciliano was an excellent example of the melodic side of Bach and it was evidently appreciated by the audience, for it won the most spontaneous applause.

The final Rondeau, from a violin and piano sonata, was also bright in character and Mr. Gericke took care not to obscure any of its jollity by abstruse treatment. The conductor was applauded to the echo at the end of his work and deserved the compliment both for his leadership and his conscientious scoring.

Now followed "Vltava" (the river "Moldau") one of Smetana's tone-pictures of his native Bohemia. Spite of the fact that programme-music is generally on a lower level than compositions in the more subjective vein, it is not difficult to recognize the voice of Genius in almost everything that Smetana has done.

He was a man who had something to say, and that something lay closer to his heart than the metaphysical dreams of Richard Strauss or the Wagnerian worship of Bruckner could possibly come to the souls of these composers. Music is too often the child of Sorrow, either national or individual; with Smetana it was the offspring of both.

He dreamed of old Bohemia, the glorious land of art and of prosperity, as it was before the scourge of the 30-years' war made it into a desert; he brooded over the Bohemia of the present, an insignificant fief of an alien prince; he grieved over the loss, by death, of some of his nearest and dearest; he became deaf while at work on some of his noblest works; finally his spirit broke, he became insane. It is certain that with this Bohemian Schubert, "the anguish of the singer made the beauty of the strain."

"Vltava" has been heard here before, but it has never received so brilliant a performance as at this concert; all the caprice and contrast of the work was brought out finely, and the composition does not grow less powerful on closer acquaintance. It would be interesting to hear the other numbers of the set of Smetana's symphonic poems, three of them, we believe, would be quite new to Boston.

An important novelty ended the concert; Cesar Franck's symphony is one of the few really solid orchestral works that have come to the world from France. Berlioz and St. Saens have been the representative French composers in orchestral forms hitherto; were Franck not a Belgian, he might complete the French symphonic trinity. Yet, although Flemish by birth, Franck's entire working days were spent in France, and he may fairly be classed with the Gallic composers. One might speak of him as a kind of French Schumann, without Schumann's melodic gifts.

It is difficult to speak with authority of Franck's symphony at a first hearing. It has some unconventional touches which are yet not entirely new. It has three movements; Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale" is a symphony without a slow movement; this work may be classed as a symphony

[illegible] chief figure used for development, reminds one of the three-noted "Fate movement" used by Wagner so prominently in his Trilogy.

There is an enormous amount of solid learning displayed in the first movement, but the result is music for the musician, not for the general public. Bulwer-Lytton once claimed that his better works were not intended for the "common herd;" we fancy that even the cultured herd may find difficulty in digesting this symphony. But it contains so many lofty thoughts that we believe that repeated hearing will cause, with some, the permanent fondness of an acquired taste. It is quite certain that the composition obliterates the firm of Vincent d'Indy et Cie.

That there is much of sadness in the work cannot be denied, but it is not of the Gummidge school of tearfulness on the one hand, nor of the moroseness of the modern school of musical dyspepsia on the other; there is dignity in every measure. The Allegretto is a slow and brooding one, like that used by Beethoven in his 7th symphony, and that instrument of dreamy melancholy, the English horn, is prominently employed in this part of the work, and was excellently played, too.

The finale is lofty in expression and the great contrapuntal skill of the composer enables him to bring back reminiscences of preceding movements without becoming monotonous, each treatment of old subject matter being new in either harmonic or rythmic effect.

A composer's bones may rest in peace when his work is performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Gericke gives the reading! The interpretation of the symphony was masterly; nothing was muddy or unclear, and even the intricate contrapuntal passages unravelled themselves to the musician at the first hearing. But a second or even a third audition is necessary before the full scheme of such an earnest and learned work is grasped. We fear, however, that the symphony will be somewhat too melancholy and ascetic for the general taste at any time.

Louis C. Elson.

Ap. 15

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the twenty-second symphony concert was:

Overture, "Anacreon"........Cherubini
Three Sonata Movements....J. S. Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
Symphonic Poem, "The Moldan"..
..........................Smetana
Symphony in D minor....Cesar Frank
(First time in Boston.)

The symphony orchestra seems to gain rather than lose in power and brilliancy as the end of an exacting season approaches, and the program was interpreted in the most brilliant manner. Mr. Gericke's arrangement of the Bach sonata movements is a most delightful work, the orchestration is charmingly piquant and original, and yet the Bach coloring is carefully retained, a feat that is not often successfully performed. The Smetana work was given with rare spirit, grace and fire and it does not lose anything by repetition.

Of the Franck symphony it would be a relief to say that the work cannot be judged at one hearing, but it is doubtful if any number of hearings would make it a lovable composition. It is clever and learned to prodigality, the workmanship is always of the best, suggesting the hand of a master; the intellect is always kept in full and pleasant activity, but one listens coldly and refuses to be convinced. It is undeniable that there are several delightful moments that lead one to look eagerly forward to an expected outburst of inspiration, but the hope is never realized. On the other hand there are not a few weary moments where the composer dwells on an idea, the fragment of an idea, or a shadow of an idea to monotony and exasperation. The thing is done, done again and then done over and repeated, and as the thing is, generally, not interesting in itself, is often trivial, the exasperation ends in despair. It is a brilliant but not a satisfying work, typical of an era that is groping about for originality at any expense, and finding it at a very great expense. On the theory that all great works have been misunderstood and adversely criticised on first hearing this symphony of Cesar Franck is a great work. The program for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3 in C major, revised by Franz Wullner, Haydn; concerto for pianoforte in A major, Liszt; prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus," Paine; "Kaisermarsch," Wagner. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Baermann.

Symphony Concert.

The 22d rehearsal and concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was given in Music hall Friday afternoon and last evening, the usual large gatherings being present on each occasion. The program was of a very substantial character, and no doubt afforded much gratification to the more scholarly inclined members of the audience. The numbers were the overture to Cherubini's "Anacreon," three movements from sonatas by Bach for clavier and flute, arranged for orchestra by Mr Gericke; symphonic poem, "The Moldau," by Bedrich Smetana, and symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck.

The chiefly interesting features of the concert were Mr Gericke's arrangement of the Bach sonatas and the Franck symphony, the latter receiving its first performance here. Mr Gericke has treated his material in a thoroughly musicianly manner, preserving the simple dignity of the original themes in an orchestral setting that is as appropriate as it is agreeable to the ear and satisfying to the artistic sense. The composition was played with exquisite refinement, and the hearty demonstration of applause from the audience was well merited.

The Cesar Franck symphony is calculated to appeal more to the educated musician than to the average concert patron. It is a work of large proportions and scholarly construction, not notable for abundance of melody, but marked by distinct originality in development of thematic material and possessed of a wealth of artistically blended tonal color and harmonic effects quite out of the ordinary. The performance by the orchestra was, needless to state, admirable in every respect.

The "Anacreon" overture was heard with pleasure, and the several brilliant passages for the violins were played in a manner possible only to an orchestra of the highest attainments. Smetana's "The Moldau" is a descriptive composition of much charm and grace, and its manifold beauties were given full exemplification under Mr Gericke's intelligent direction.

The program for this week's symphony concert, the last but one of the season, will be as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in C major, Haydn; concerto for pianoforte in A major, Liszt; prelude to "Œdipus Tyrannus," Paine; "Kaisermarsch," Wagner; soloist, Mr Carl Baermann.

[133]

INCOMPLETE

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 106.
SUNDAY, APRIL 16, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Work of Franck's Heard for the First Time Here.

Dignified and Earnest, Yet Mournful to a Marked Degree—Movements from Bach Sonatas Given the Best Possible Production—Other Good Features.

The programme arranged by Mr. Gericke for last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall was:

Overture, "Anacreon"..............Cherubini
Three sonata movements..............Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
Symphonic poem, "The Moldau"......Smetana
Symphony in D minor............Cesar Franck

The Cesar Franck symphony was new to Boston, and is the first work of the composer in this class of music that has been heard here. It is so strange in every way that no adequate idea of it can be obtained on a single hearing, let one listen never so attentively. The only thing that is carried away is a strong impression of the dignity and the earnestness of the music, of a deep poetic feeling that pervades it, and of a certain weird fascination that it exerts on the listener. In these qualities it is like all of Franck's music that has been performed here. It is always mournful, even to morbidity.

That it has beauties of a high order is undeniable, but they are invariably attuned to melancholy. One yearns at last for something that suggests joyousness of spirit, for something that uplifts, if only for a moment, to vary the sense of depression that fills the listener. One may say, without the remotest intention of treating the work with disrespect, that it is full of graveyard suggestions; that it might have been conceived by a perturbed ghost, for an orchestra of restless spirits to perform among the tombstones on a sultry night, when the moon, magnified by the mist, is seen glaring through the fleecy clouds that are passing swiftly over its face. Frequent hearing of the symphony may do away with this uncanny effect; may even cause it to take on an appearance of healthfulness, and to run through the whole gamut of the emotions; but lack of familiarity with it produces far other results. And yet, with all these drawbacks, it is interesting in its strong and original individuality. It is no Kappelmeister music, but speaks in a language distinctly and independently its own. Even while one is not moved to enthusiasm over it, one feels profound respect for it, and is certain that one's objections are stirred into activity through not fully understanding it.

An attempt to pass judgment on such a work under the circumstances would be to risk almost certain error. It therefore only remains to be said that while the symphony, under the sway of first impressions, never seemed dull, it did seem spun out to a length which the brevity of its themes scarcely appeared to warrant, and that, if the attention was not wearied by the constant and apparently wearisome repetitions, it often flagged.

The Bach number is made up of movements from different sonatas, the first and second from sonatas for clavier and flute, and the finale from a sonata for clavier and violin. Mr. Gericke has been felicitous in placing them in juxtaposition, and his arrangement of them for orchestra is not only musicianly in the best sense of the word, but is charming in effect and in the fidelity with which he has transcribed the music without in the slightest degree departing from the spirit of the composer. The instrumentation is equally fine in the delightful variety of tone color [illegible] has been imparted to it, and in its [illegible] and dignified simplicity. All [illegible] movements show Bach in his most [illegible] mood. The second movement, a Siciliano, is an exquisite little bit of [illegible] melody, and the rondeau finale is joyousness itself. The performance was one of rare beauty and finish, and won the heartiest applause of the evening.

The noble "Anacreon" overture, worthy to take its place by the side of the masterpieces in its class, perhaps even with those of Beethoven, was splendidly interpreted and brilliantly performed. Smetana's spirited and poetic symphonic poem was again heard with pleasure, intensified on this occasion by the sympathetic and effective treatment it received.

The programme for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3, in C major, revised by Franz Wullner; concerto for pianoforte, in A major, Liszt; prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus," J. K. Paine, and "Kaisermarsch," Wagner. Mr. Carl Baermann is to be the soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 17, 1899.

Symphony Orchestra Performs Franck's Symphony.

The old and the new touched elbows in Saturday's programme and the works of Bach and of Cesar Franck marked the two extremes of the concert. Cherubini's overture to "Anacreon" is by no means an Anacreontic but is a clear and orderly exposition of the style of one of the greatest of musical conservatives.

It gave a good opportunity to the violins to display their proficiency, but to speak of the excellence of this part of our orchestra would be gild refined gold. It was pleasant to note that the audience did not find the work too severe and applauded most heartily.

If Bach is to be modernized at all, if his thin, skeleton forms are ever to receive orchestral flesh, then Mr. Gericke is, next to Robert Franz, the man to make the transformation, for he approaches the task in a reverent spirit and carries out in a contrapuntal spirit the suggestions of Bach's polyphony. On this occasion he presented selections from three different works of Bach, made into a pretty little Suite, and orchestrated with much discretion; the three movements had been selected with excellent taste as foils to each other and the heterogeneous effect of a "pasticcio" was avoided.

The first movement, an Andante from a flute and piano sonata, was rather a learned dose for the laity, but the second, a Siciliano from another flute sonata, made charming amends. There is far more melody in Bach than the average auditor supposes; too often it is obscured to the modern auditor, accustomed to strong rhythms, by the master's employment of counterpoint, which is often the least rhythmic expression of music.

Set a modern accompaniment to the Polonaise of the 5th French Suite and one has a Chopin effect, simplify the accompaniments to Bach's Gigues (or "Jigs") and one discovers the rollicking tune of the barn-yard dance, set Celtic words and a simple accompaniment to the subject of Fugue No. 11, Book II., of the "Well-tempered Clavichord" and one has a good beginning of an Irish folk-song. The Siciliano was an excellent example of the melodic side of Bach and it was evidently appreciated by the audience, for it won the most spontaneous applause.

The final Rondeau, from a violin and piano sonata, was also bright in character and Mr. Gericke took care not to obscure any of its jollity by abstruse treatment. The conductor was applauded to the echo at the end of his work and deserved the compliment both for his leadership and his conscientious scoring.

Now followed "Vltava" (the river "Moldau") one of Smetana's tone-pictures of his native Bohemia. Spite of the fact that programme-music is generally on a lower level than compositions in the more subjective vein, it is not difficult to recognize the voice of Genius in almost everything that Smetana has done.

He was a man who had something to say, and that something lay closer to his heart than the metaphysical dreams of Richard Strauss or the Wagnerian worship of Bruckner could possibly come to the souls of these composers. Music is too often the child of Sorrow, either national or individual; with Smetana it was the offspring of both.

He dreamed of old Bohemia, the glorious land of art and of prosperity, as it was before the scourge of the 30-years' war made it into a desert; he brooded over the Bohemia of the present, an insignificant fief of an alien prince; he grieved over the loss, by death, of some of his nearest and dearest; he became deaf while at work on some of his noblest works; finally his spirit broke, he became insane. It is certain that with this Bohemian Schubert, "the anguish of the singer made the beauty of the strain."

"Vltava" has been heard here before, but it has never received so brilliant a performance as at this concert; all the caprice and contrast of the work was brought out finely, and the composition does not grow less powerful on closer acquaintance. It would be interesting to hear the other numbers of the set of Smetana's symphonic poems, three of them, we believe, would be quite new to Boston.

An important novelty ended the concert; Cesar Franck's symphony is one of the few really solid orchestral works that have come to the world from France. Berlioz and St. Saens have been the representative French composers in orchestral forms hitherto; were Franck not a Belgian, he might complete the French symphonic trinity. Yet, although Flemish by birth, Franck's entire working days were spent in France, and he may fairly be classed with the Gallic composers. One might speak of him as a kind of French Schumann, without Schumann's melodic gifts.

It is difficult to speak with authority of Franck's symphony at a first hearing. It has some unconventional touches which are yet not entirely new. It has three movements; Schumann's "Overture, Scherzo and Finale" is a symphony without a slow movement; this work may be classed as a symphony without a Scherzo.

[illegible] a certain continuity, and, following the example of Beethoven (9th symphony) and Brahm's (C minor symphony) Franck introduces themes from the first two movements into the Finale. There is a great deal of ingenious figure treatment, and the chief figure used for development reminds one of the three-noted "Fate-movement" used by Wagner so prominently in his Trilogy.

There is an enormous amount of solid learning displayed in the first movement, but the result is music for the musician, not for the general public. Bulwer-Lytton once claimed that his better works were not intended for the "common herd;" we fancy that even the cultured herd may find difficulty in digesting this symphony. But it contains so many lofty thoughts that we believe that repeated hearing will cause, with some, the permanent fondness of an acquired taste. It is quite certain that the composition obliterates the firm of Vincent d'Indy et Cie.

That there is much of sadness in the work cannot be denied, but it is not of the Gummidge school of tearfulness on the one hand, nor of the moroseness of the modern school of musical dyspepsia on the other; there is dignity in every measure. The Allegretto is a slow and brooding one, like that used by Beethoven in his 7th symphony, and that instrument of dreamy melancholy, the English horn, is prominently employed in this part of the work, and was excellently played, too.

The finale is lofty in expression and the great contrapuntal skill of the composer enables him to bring back reminiscences of preceding movements without becoming monotonous, each treatment of old subject matter being new in either harmonic or rythmic effect.

A composer's bones may rest in peace when his work is performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and Mr. Gericke gives the reading! The interpretation of the symphony was masterly; nothing was muddy or unclear, and even the intricate contrapuntal passages unravelled themselves to the musician at the first hearing. But a second or even a third audition is necessary before the full scheme of such an earnest and learned work is grasped. We fear, however, that the symphony will be somewhat too melancholy and ascetic for the general taste at any time.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 1[illegible], 1899.

Symphony Concert.

The 22d rehearsal and concert of the Boston symphony orchestra was given in Music hall Friday afternoon and last evening, the usual large gatherings being present on each occasion. The program was of a very substantial character, and no doubt afforded much gratification to the more scholarly inclined members of the audience. The numbers were the overture to Cherubini's "Anacreon," three movements from sonatas by Bach for clavier and flute, arranged for orchestra by Mr Gericke; symphonic poem, "The Moldau," by Bedrich Smetana, and symphony in D minor by Cesar Franck.

The chiefly interesting features of the concert were Mr Gericke's arrangement of the Bach sonatas and the Franck symphony, the latter receiving its first performance here. Mr Gericke has treated his material in a thoroughly musicianly manner, preserving the simple dignity of the original themes in an orchestral setting that is as appropriate as it is agreeable to the ear and satisfying to the artistic sense. The composition was played with exquisite refinement, and the hearty demonstration of applause from the audience was well merited.

The Cesar Franck symphony is calculated to appeal more to the educated musician than to the average concert patron. It is a work of large proportions and scholarly construction, not notable for abundance of melody, but marked by distinct originality in development of thematic material and possessed of a wealth of artistically blended tonal color and harmonic effects quite out of the ordinary. The performance by the orchestra was, needless to state, admirable in every respect.

The "Anacreon" overture was heard with pleasure, and the several brilliant passages for the violins were played in a manner possible only to an orchestra of the highest attainments. Smetana's "The Moldau" is a descriptive composition of much charm and grace, and its manifold beauties were given full exemplification under Mr Gericke's intelligent direction.

The program for this week's symphony concert, the last but one of the season, will be as follows:

Symphony No. 3, in C major, Haydn; concerto for pianoforte in A major, Liszt; prelude to "Œdipus Tyrannus," Paine; "Kaisermarsch," Wagner; soloist, Mr Carl Baermann.

4
BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the twenty-second symphony concert was:

Overture, "Anacreon"........Cherubini
Three Sonata Movements....J. S. Bach
(Arranged for orchestra by Wilhelm Gericke.)
Symphonic Poem, "The Moldau"..
..........................Smetana
Symphony in D minor....Cesar Frank
(First time in Boston.)

The symphony orchestra seems to gain rather than lose in power and brilliancy as the end of an exacting season approaches, and the program was interpreted in the most brilliant manner. Mr. Gericke's arrangement of the Bach sonata movements is a most delightful work, the orchestration is charmingly piquant and original, and yet the Bach coloring is carefully retained, a feat that is not often successfully performed. The Smetana work was given with rare spirit, grace and fire and it does not lose anything by repetition.

Of the Franck symphony it would be a relief to say that the work cannot be judged at one hearing, but it is doubtful if any number of hearings would make it a lovable composition. It is clever and learned to prodigality, the workmanship is always of the best, suggesting the hand of a master; the intellect is always kept in full and pleasant activity, but one listens coldly and refuses to be convinced. It is undeniable that there are several delightful moments that lead one to look eagerly forward to an expected outburst of inspiration, but the hope is never realized. On the other hand there are not a few weary moments where the composer dwells on an idea, the fragment of an idea, or a shadow of an idea to monotony and exasperation. The thing is done, done again and then done over and repeated, and as the thing is, generally, not interesting in itself, is often trivial, the exasperation ends in despair. It is a brilliant but not a satisfying work, typical of an era that is groping about for originality at any expense, and finding it at a very great expense. On the theory that all great works have been misunderstood and adversely criticised on first hearing this symphony of Cesar Franck is a great work. The program for the next concert is: Symphony No. 3 in C major, revised by Franz Wullner, Haydn; concerto for pianoforte in A major, Liszt; prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus," Paine; "Kaisermarsch," Wagner. The soloist will be Mr. Carl Baermann.

[133]

NDAY HERALD.
LISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 113.
SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Baermann, the Soloist, Most Cordially Received.

His Playing of the Liszt Concerto in C Major for the Pianoforte Evoked Enthusiasm — Haydn's Fascinating Symphony in C Major Read and Played Delightfully.

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, was given with this programme:

Symphony in C major, Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3..................Haydn
Concert for pianoforte, No. 2, in A major..................Liszt
Prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus"......J. K. Paine
Kaisermarsch..................Wagner

Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist.

The Haydn symphony had not been played before at these concerts. It is not among the larger of the master's works in its class, but it abounds in beauty and is charming in its freshness, its easy, natural flow, its sunny melodiousness and the grace of its learning.

The score is without clarinets and trumpets, and there is but one flute in addition to the usual wood wind, but even with these limited means there is a wonderful variety of tone color, and when Haydn desired to make a noise it is surprising how solid the results are with no other brass than two horns. These old composers could achieve marvels with limited means.

Mr. Gericke is to be heartily thanked for having made a new departure in adding his fascinating symphony to the scant list that has for so long done service here in representing Haydn in this form of composition. It was read and played delightfully, and was listened to with a pleased attention that culminated in a vigorous outburst of applause at the close.

Prof. Paine's fine prelude repeated the strong impression it has always made by its dignity of utterance, its solid musicianship and the felicitous fitness with which it ushers in the noble tragedy for which it was written. The Liszt concerto is scarcely as showy and as spirited a work as its companion in E flat, and is less often performed, but in many essentials it is higher in inspiration and more poetic in sentiment, and though it it brilliant and effective enough, it is, perhaps, the most sincere of Liszt's larger compositions for the pianoforte in its paucity of virtuoso display, calculated merely to astonish by the agility with which the performer triumphs over the difficulties of finger gymnastics. And yet it is exceedingly exacting, but its exactions are not as obtrusive as they generally are in Liszt.

Mr. Baermann, who was received with great cordiality, played the concerto from beginning to end with perfact mastery in regard to beauty and finish of technique, nobility of style and chaste artistic sentiment.

It was a rare pleasure to listen to him again, to enjoy pianoforte playing that is free from the extravagances and the sensationalism that has been fastened on it of late, and to find relief from that method of art that is more concerned with [illegible]ishment at the rapidity and the noise with which the performer can manipulate his fingers than with manifesting respect for the composer and with attempting to do justice to the music for the music's sake. In both interpretation and performance he held his own firmly, and, if he refrained from trying to glorify his technique, he none the less showed that he had sufficient and to spare for all the demands that were made on it. He was listened to with deep interest, and at the close of the concerto was applauded with stirring enthusiasm and recalled four times.

For the closing concert of the season on next Saturday evening, the programme is to be devoted wholly to Beethoven, as follows: Overture, "Fidelio," and symphony No. 9. The soloists are to be Mme. De Vere-Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Evans Williams and Mr. Ericcson Bushnell. The chorus is to consist of members of the [illegible]

It was an immense pleasure to hear Mr. Baermann play with the Symphony orchestra Friday, a soul satisfying performance it was, too, where the listener did not have to trouble about finger fireworks and the mere virtuosity of the artist. It was music, such music as pianoforte players seldom give us nowadays. One heard the pearliest of runs and all the masterly singing of the instrument with a pure sense of enjoyment not experienced at any concert, no matter who the star performer, of this season. Boston feels very proud of having an artist of Mr. Baermann's superlative rank come forward, after the many famous players who have been heard here, and show what the art of piano playing really is. Once in a blue moon we get such a treat. It was an exquisite performance of the Lizst concerto, and Mr. Gericke conducted it like a perfect love!

[illegible]
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 24, 1899.

Prof. Carl Baermann's Success on the Symphonic Stage.

The programme began innocently enough with a new work (at least it was performed for the first time at these concerts) by a composer named Haydn. We fear that this composer will make an utter failure in the musical field; he has many very prominent defects; he has a distinct tendency to write melody; he has the absurd notion that music should be clear and intelligible; he absolutely resolves all his dissonances; we do not believe that there was a succession of consecutive fifths in the whole symphony.

Such simplicity, beauty and directness, are not to be tolerated; if such things were to be allowed we should have every concert-goer comprehending the music and much of the critic's occupation would hasten after Othello's!

Yet the audience seemed heartily to enjoy the Watteau-like symphony (in C) with its pastoral pipings, its drone bass, its display of flute and oboe, and other shepherd accessories. The variations of the second movement had a counterpoint as clear as crystal, an easy leading of the voices that the present does not give us. The flute obbligato in this was excellently played.

The minuet was more virile than the dance music of Haydn usually appears and the oboe work in its Trio was superlatively good. The chief theme of the final rondo was given without any of the "Papa Haydn" senility with which some conductors invest these works, and had a manly turbulence that made an excellent contrast with the suavity of the counterthemes.

Prof. Carl Baermann was the pianist of the concert, and was greeted with much cordiality when he made his appearance, the first for a few years on the symphonic stage.

He has owed us the Liszt Concerto in A major for some time, and on this occasion discharged the debt in full. Some may wonder that the pianist who is the personification of intellectuality and classicism in music should have chosen a Liszt work for his "rentree," but we may remind these that the Liszt concerto in A is a very different matter from the Liszt concerto in E flat; in this work the great Hungarian abnegates gipsy eccentricities and achieves a result in which romance and intellectuality are wonderfully blended.

The work is logical and coherent, its ideas are finely developed from tangible themes, and it steers clear of the bizarrerie that marks Liszt's rhapsodical piano compositions. Liszt's skill in scoring saves him from the orchestral shipwreck that came to Chopin in the concerto field, and prevents this work from becoming merely a piano piece with an obilging orchestra in the background, playing an accompaniment.

Yet the concerto abounds in very effective contrasts and its changes of mood are many and striking. All these changes were admirably caught up both by pianist and orchestra. The excellence of the performance made one imagine Liszt a greater composer than he has received the credit of being.

At the close of the performance Prof. Baermann was called to the platform again and again with the liveliest demonstrations of appreciation. It is always a delight to welcome this great pianist to the concert-platform; he has appeared far too seldom in recent days.

The Prelude to that great American composition, "Oedipus Tyrannus" by Prof. John K. Paine, came next, and, spite of an occasional roughness, received a very effective performance. The prelude is not the very strongest part of the work (some of the choruses are the noblest music that has yet been produced in our country) but its orotund phrases are big with fate and the shadows of coming events are in almost every measure of the composition.

Such a work seems to reconcile the old style with the new; it presents something of the modern style of endless melody combined with a clearness of harmonic treatment that we often miss in the works of the present.

This crumb from the banquet made us wish for the entire feast; we have had Schumann's "Manfred" as a symphonic concert, would it not be possible some day to give the whole of this native work with its proper orchestral support (which it has never yet received) in these concerts?

Now came Wagner's "Kaiser Marsch" and Mr. Gericke cried Havoc and let loose the trombones. Much as we love some of the Wagnerian operas we have never been able to come under the spell of the Wagnerian marches. There was a vein of bombast in Wagner which bursts forth fortissimo in each of these martial compositions.

They are not to be regarded as actual marching compositions, but rather as an apotheosis of warlike homage and glory. No military company, except possibly the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, returning from a banquet to the London company, could ever keep step with the irregular lar and capricious phrases.

One must pay the highest compliments to Mr. Gericke on the interpretation of this easily-spoiled work; he gave a thoroughly sensible performance of a composition which is often exaggerated, he made a painting out of what is too frequently presented as a chromo, in short he gave meaning to the tumult and led gradually [illegible] a story which Wilhelmj once ventured to tell to Wagner himself; a physician after having tried in every way to cure a deaf patient at last determined to try heroic measures and took him to hear a Wagner opera; after the third act the patient cried out in ecstasy—"Doctor! Doctor! I can hear! I hear it all!"—but alas, the doctor could no longer hear him! he had himself become totally deaf! Wagner laughed at the tale but sarcastically added—"Very good, Wilhelmj! but couldn't you just as well saddle that tale on 'The Huguenots'?"

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A Century-Old Work Was the Novelty of the Twenty-third Concert Last Evening in Music Hall—Mr. Baermann and Liszt's Second Concerto.

The program of the 23d Symphony Concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in C major (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3..................Haydn
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto for piano, No. 2, in A major..Liszt
Prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus"..........Paine
The Emperor's March..................Wagner

The feature of the concert was the performance of the old symphony by Haydn, which was played for the first time at these concerts. It is agreeable music, tuneful with tunes that are not too naive, spirited, without any pretence or affectation. And even the customary padding—the music that covered the clatter of knives, forks and dishes, as Wagner called it—has a go to it that makes it more than endurable. There are thankful passages for the flute and the first oboe, and they were played last night with uncommon skill and taste. Indeed, Mr. Longy, especially in the menuetto, displayed his art in its full splendor.

There is little to be said of the familiar works that followed the symphony except that the orchestral performance was one of marked excellence. Mr. Baermann's choice of a concerto was not a wise one. The work by Liszt demands a fiery, romantic, sensational pianist. Now Mr. Baermann is neither by nature nor by training the man to startle and amaze. His attainments are solid and dignified. He is not an athletic pianist; he is not a "formidable" pianist; he is neither cyclonic nor meteoric. His performance was marked by the qualities that have won applause and reputation for him when he played other works, but these very qualities count but little in a performance of Liszt's concerto. Last night, as ever, his ability was recognized warmly by the large audience. Mr. Paine's overture and the march by Wagner are too well known to require comment at this late day.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1899.

Symphony Concert.

The 23d symphony concert, in Music hall, introduced Mr Carl Baermann as the soloist, the program being as follows: Haydn's C major symphony, Liszt's A major pianoforte concerto, Prof J. K. Paine's prelude to "Edipus Tyrannus" and Wagner's "Emperor" march. The Haydn symphony was given for the first time at these concerts. The Liszt concerto is somewhat of a novelty also and Mr Baermann's interpretation showed a nice balance in consistency, free from exaggeration and given with a perfect understanding of the peculiar characteristics of the whimsical composition. The technical difficulties were met with satisfactory results and Mr Baermann gave every phrase of the somewhat chaotic work with admirable clarity of tone and finger dexterity. In the dramatic episodes of the first portion of the concerto the themes were developed in a splendid manner, the more dashing and passionate passages lacking somewhat in brilliancy of execution, but the tonal coloring being skilfully preserved. Liszt fairly riots in incoherent and dazzling music forms in this work and the composition appeals most vividly to the imagination; in short it is a picture in musical color of gorgeous splendor. A charming tribute to the pianist's popularity here was shown by the hearty and spontaneous plaudits with which Mr Baermann was greeted before and after his performance.

The program began with Haydn's C major symphony, a work well within the technical ability of our orchestra, and presenting no harmonic intricacies not easily surmounted by the players. Despite the prevailing tenor of the work, simplicity, Mr Gericke did not slight the reading of the score and a delightful performance resulted. The flute and oboe conversations in the first part possibly call for special commendation, although the whole movement was given in a manner almost flawless. The alternating themes of the second part were charmingly set forth, the balance of tonal shadings being perfectly preserved, and the dainty menuetto and the more lively dance theme of the last movement each seemed perfect in its way.

Prof Paine's "Edipus" prelude showed the wonderful ensemble skill of the orchestra, the sonorous number being presented with a precision and resonance which made the interpretation very effective. The turmoil of the "Emperor" march was given in the vein which doubtless would have suited Wagner. This should suit the auditor, of course, as the master's ideas received proper exploitation.

The symphony season will close with the rehearsal and concert this week. Mme de Vere-Sapio will be the principal soloist and the program will comprise Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and the ninth symphony, Mme Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr Evans Williams, Mr Ericcson Bushnell and a chorus from the Cecilia assisting in the last number.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 23, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY, MR. HENDERSON'S LECTURES, ETC.

Mr. Gericke set into the two hundred and twentieth Symphony programme the last of the few novelties of his season—unless we should count as such his own orchestration of three standard sonata movements by Bach, and Franz Wullner's revised version of Haydn's third symphony, to be included in the last programme but one. The really great and important new thing was Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor—a work which gave the listener even more pause than anything of his chamber music which had been heard, by almost as much as the scope and sweep of the orchestra exceed the compass and possibility of the quartette. It is indeed a work whose prevailing mood must be felt at once deeply and impressedly, but all whose purposes and declarations cannot be grasped at once. Indeed the best listeners confessed that while his spiritual feeling seemed unmistakable, the choice and purport of his terms and the flow of his expression were not always clear. One needed time to think, and yet the current of the music bore them ever on. Grave, noble, dignified, and not obscure so far as the mere rhetoric of music goes, the symphony is emphatic and individual in character, although the absolute proportions of the thought seem thus to elude the hearer sometimes. One would gladly often have a page repeated, as though it were a page of pure philosophy which needed re-considering. The temperamental quality is sad, almost to gloom or despondency; yet in this lugubriousness there is nothing bitter or morbid, and the general effect moves more to pathos than does that of many works which claim to be pathetic. The scoring is richly colored with deep and yet transparent tints, and there are shrewd but still stately devices in the orchestration.

Mr. Gericke's settings of the Bach andante, Siciliano and rondo were made almost twenty years ago but they sound fresh and modern in their use of instruments, and yet they are harmonious with the spirit of the old master, while they delight simply as bits of orchestral music.

Beside these things the programme held Cherubini's calm and classic "Anacreon" overture and Smetana's vigorous and fanciful poem, "The Moldau." All were well played in form and fashion and of the audience few left without hearing the new, strange symphony entire.

Mr. W. J. Henderson, who is perhaps the most discreet, wise, impartial and illuminating of the New York musical critics, is giving a short set of lectures upon epochs in composition, having already spoken upon French and German song. He has shown great knowledge and skill in selecting and presenting salient points along the line of each theme, and has frequently flashed a humorous light upon some phase of his subjects. The illustrative music has been delightfully sung by Mrs. Snelling, (also of New York) who is not only an agreeable and accomplished vocalist, but is possessed of the necessary intuition, sympathy and elasticity of style] to take the song according to its kind and present it in its true spirit.

HOWARD MALCOM TICKNOR.

THE MUSIC·TRADES
EDITED BY JOHN C. FREUND
ESTABLISHED 1890.
NEW YORK, APRIL 22, 1899.

MUSICAL BOSTON.

BOSTON, April 17, 1899.

The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the following programme: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; three sonata movements, Bach, orchestrated by Gericke; symphonic poem, "The Moldau," Smetana, and symphony in D minor, Cesar Franck.

The latter was given for the first time in Boston. It is a work that excites interest and requires more than one hearing before the listener can speak analytically of its value in symphonic art.

The impression that one gets after a first hearing is that of a serious, intense composer, deficient in sustained melodic form, one whose profound knowledge and marked individuality is displayed in interrupted and restless polyphony, repeated time and again with unsatisfactory results.

A pall of melancholy o'erspreads the entire work.

The orchestra played it splendidly, and Mr. Gericke is to be thanked for its exposition among the familiar works that have crowded this season's programmes.

The three Bach movements, skilfully and judiciously arranged for orchestra by Gericke, were agreeable numbers, delightfully played.

Both the Cherubini and Smetana selections were presented in the orchestra's best style.

In fact, all the readings and interpretation on this occasion reflected credit upon Gericke and the orchestra, compared with the previous general cast of the season's work.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 113.

SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Baermann, the Soloist, Most Cordially Received.

His Playing of the Liszt Concerto in C Major for the Pianoforte Evoked Enthusiasm — Haydn's Fascinating Symphony in C Major Read and Played Delightfully.

The 23d concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall last evening, was given with this programme:

Symphony in C major, Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3 .... Haydn
Concert for pianoforte, No. 2, in A major .... Liszt
Prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus" .... J. K. Paine
Kaisermarsch .... Wagner

Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist.

The Haydn symphony had not been played before at these concerts. It is not among the larger of the master's works in its class, but it abounds in beauty and is charming in its freshness, its easy, natural flow, its sunny melodiousness and the grace of its learning.

The score is without clarinets and trumpets, and there is but one flute in addition to the usual wood wind, but even with these limited means there is a wonderful variety of tone color, and when Haydn desired to make a noise it is surprising how solid the results are with no other brass than two horns. These old composers could achieve marvels with limited means.

Mr. Gericke is to be heartily thanked for having made a new departure in adding his fascinating symphony to the scant list that has for so long done service here in representing Haydn in this form of composition. It was read and played delightfully, and was listened to with a pleased attention that culminated in a vigorous outburst of applause at the close.

Prof. Paine's fine prelude repeated the strong impression it has always made by its dignity of utterance, its solid musicianship and the felicitous fitness with which it ushers in the noble tragedy for which it was written. The Liszt concerto is scarcely as showy and as spirited a work as its companion in E flat, and is less often performed, but in many essentials it is higher in inspiration and more poetic in sentiment, and though it it brilliant and effective enough, it is, perhaps, the most sincere of Liszt's larger compositions for the pianoforte in its paucity of virtuoso display, calculated merely to astonish by the agility with which the performer triumphs over the difficulties of finger gymnastics. And yet it is exceedingly exacting, but its exactions are not as obtrusive as they generally are in Liszt.

Mr. Baermann, who was received with great cordiality, played the concerto from beginning to end with perfact mastery in regard to beauty and finish of technique, nobility of style and chaste artistic sentiment.

It was a rare pleasure to listen to him again, to enjoy pianoforte playing that is free from the extravagances and the sensationalism that has been fastened on it of late, and to find relief from that method of art that is more concerned with arousing astonishment at the rapidity and the noise with which the performer can manipulate his fingers than with manifesting respect for the composer and with attempting to do justice to the music for the music's sake. In both interpretation and performance he held his own firmly, and, if he refrained from trying to glorify his technique, he none the less showed that he had sufficient and to spare for all the demands that were made on it. He was listened to with deep interest, and at the close of the concerto was applauded with stirring enthusiasm and recalled four times.

For the closing concert of the season on next Saturday evening, the programme is to be devoted wholly to Beethoven, as follows: Overture, "Fidelio," and symphony No. 9. The soloists are to be Mme. De Vere-Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Evans Williams and Mr. Ericcson Bushnell. The chorus is to consist of members of the Cecilia.

It was an immense pleasure to hear Mr. Baermann play with the Symphony orchestra Friday, a soul satisfying performance it was, too, where the listener did not have to trouble about finger fireworks and the mere virtuosity of the artist. It was music, such music as pianoforte players seldom give us nowadays. One heard the pearliest of runs and all the masterly singing of the instrument with a pure sense of enjoyment not experienced at any concert, no matter who the star performer, of this season. Boston feels very proud of having an artist of Mr. Baermann's superlative rank come forward, after the many famous players who have been heard here, and show what the art of piano playing really is. Once in a blue moon we get such a treat. It was an exquisite performance of the Lizst concerto, and Mr. Gericke conducted it like a perfect love!

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, APRIL 24, 1899.

Prof. Carl Baermann's Success on the Symphonic Stage.

The programme began innocently enough with a new work (at least it was performed for the first time at these concerts) by a composer named Haydn. We fear that this composer will make an utter failure in the musical field; he has many very prominent defects; he has a distinct tendency to write melody; he has the absurd notion that music should be clear and intelligible; he absolutely resolves all his dissonances; we do not believe that there was a succession of consecutive fifths in the whole symphony.

Such simplicity, beauty and directness, are not to be tolerated; if such things were to be allowed we should have every concert-goer comprehending the music and much of the critic's occupation would hasten after Othello's!

Yet the audience seemed heartily to enjoy the Watteau-like symphony (in C) with its pastoral pipings, its drone bass, its display of flute and oboe, and other shepherd accessories. The variations of the second movement had a counterpoint as clear as crystal, an easy leading of the voices that the present does not give us. The flute obbligato in this was excellently played.

The minuet was more virile than the dance music of Haydn usually appears and the oboe work in its Trio was superlatively good. The chief theme of the final rondo was given without any of the "Papa Haydn" senility with which some conductors invest these works, and had a manly turbulence that made an excellent contrast with the suavity of the counterthemes.

Prof. Carl Baermann was the pianist of the concert, and was greeted with much cordiality when he made his appearance, the first for a few years on the symphonic stage.

He has owed us the Liszt Concerto in A major for some time, and on this occasion discharged the debt in full. Some may wonder that the pianist who is the personification of intellectuality and classicism in music should have chosen a Liszt work for his "rentree," but we may remind these that the Liszt concerto in A is a very different matter from the Liszt concerto in E flat; in this work the great Hungarian abnegates gipsy eccentricities and achieves a result in which romance and intellectuality are wonderfully blended.

The work is logical and coherent, its ideas are finely developed from tangible themes, and it steers clear of the bizarrerrie that marks Liszt's rhapsodical piano compositions. Liszt's skill in scoring saves him from the orchestral shipwreck that came to Chopin in the concerto field, and prevents this work from becoming merely a piano piece with an obilging orchestra in the background, playing an accompaniment.

Yet the concerto abounds in very effective contrasts and its changes of mood are many and striking. All these changes were admirably caught up both by pianist and orchestra. The excellence of the performance made one imagine Liszt a greater composer than he has received the credit of being.

At the close of the performance Prof. Baermann was called to the platform again and again with the liveliest demonstrations of appreciation. It is always a delight to welcome this great pianist to the concert-platform; he has appeared far too seldom in recent days.

The Prelude to that great American composition, "Oedipus Tyrannus" by Prof. John K. Paine, came next, and, spite of an occasional roughness, received a very effective performance. The prelude is not the very strongest part of the work (some of the choruses are the noblest music that has yet been produced in our country) but its orotund phrases are big with fate and the shadows of coming events are in almost every measure of the composition.

Such a work seems to reconcile the old style with the new; it presents something of the modern style of endless melody combined with a clearness of harmonic treatment that we often miss in the works of the present.

This crumb from the banquet made us wish for the entire feast; we have had Schumann's "Manfred" as a symphonic concert, would it not be possible some day to give the whole of this native work with its proper orchestral support (which it has never yet received) in these concerts?

Now came Wagner's "Kaiser Marsch" and Mr. Gericke cried Havoc and let loose the trombones. Much as we love some of the Wagnerian operas we have never been able to come under the spell of the Wagnerian marches. There was a vein of bombast in Wagner which bursts forth fortissimo in each of these martial compositions.

They are not to be regarded as actual marching compositions, but rather as an apotheosis of warlike homage and glory. No military company, except possibly the Ancient and Honorable Artillery, returning from a banquet to the London company, could ever keep step with the irregular lar and capricious phrases.

One must pay the highest compliments to Mr. Gericke on the interpretation of this easily-spoiled work; he gave a thoroughly sensible performance of a composition which is often exaggerated, he made a painting out of what is too frequently presented as a chromo, in short he gave meaning to the tumult and led gradually up to an overwhelming climax.

not too much to say Wagner's "Kaiser-Marsch" has never received so good a performance in Boston as it had at this concert. But it is dynamite music at the best. Its din and clatter reminds of a story which Wilhelmj once ventured to tell to Wagner himself; a physician after having tried in every way to cure a deaf patient at last determined to try heroic measures and took him to hear a Wagner opera; after the third act the patient cried out in ecstasy—"Doctor! Doctor! I can hear! I hear it all!"—but alas, the doctor could no longer hear him! he had himself become totally deaf! Wagner laughed at the tale but sarcastically added—"Very good, Wilhelmj! but couldn't you just as well saddle that tale on 'The Huguenots'"?

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A Century-Old Work Was the Novelty of the Twenty-third Concert Last Evening in Music Hall—Mr. Baermann and Liszt's Second Concerto.

The program of the 23d Symphony Concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Symphony in C major (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3 .... Haydn
(First time at these concerts.)
Concerto for piano, No. 2, in A major .. Liszt
Prelude to "Oedipus Tyrannus" .... Paine
The Emperor's March .... Wagner

The feature of the concert was the performance of the old symphony by Haydn, which was played for the first time at these concerts. It is agreeable music, tuneful with tunes that are not too naive, spirited, without any pretence or affectation. And even the customary padding—the music that covered the clatter of knives, forks and dishes, as Wagner called it—has a go to it that makes it more than endurable. There are thankful passages for the flute and the first oboe, and they were played last night with uncommon skill and taste. Indeed, Mr. Longy, especially in the menuetto, displayed his art in its full splendor.

There is little to be said of the familiar works that followed the symphony except that the orchestral performance was one of marked excellence. Mr. Baermann's choice of a concerto was not a wise one. The work by Liszt demands a fiery, romantic, sensational pianist. Now Mr. Baermann is neither by nature nor by training the man to startle and amaze. His attainments are solid and dignified. He is not an athletic pianist; he is not a "formidable" pianist; he is neither cyclonic nor meteoric. His performance was marked by the qualities that have won applause and reputation for him when he played other works, but these very qualities count but little in a performance of Liszt's concerto. Last night, as ever, his ability was recognized warmly by the large audience. Mr. Paine's overture and the march by Wagner are too well known to require comment at this late day.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, APRIL 23, 1899.

Symphony Concert.

The 23d symphony concert, in Music hall, introduced Mr Carl Baermann as the soloist, the program being as follows: Haydn's C major symphony, Liszt's A major pianoforte concerto, Prof J. K. Paine's prelude to "Edipus Tyrannus" and Wagner's "Emperor" march. The Haydn symphony was given for the first time at these concerts. The Liszt concerto is somewhat of a novelty also and Mr Baermann's interpretation showed a nice balance in consistency, free from exaggeration and given with a perfect understanding of the peculiar characteristics of the whimsical composition. The technical difficulties were met with satisfactory results and Mr Baermann gave every phrase of the somewhat chaotic work with admirable clarity of tone and finger dexterity. In the dramatic episodes of the first portion of the concerto the themes were developed in a splendid manner, the more dashing and passionate passages lacking somewhat in brilliancy of execution, but the tonal coloring being skilfully preserved. Liszt fairly riots in incoherent and dazzling music forms in this work and the composition appeals most vividly to the imagination; in short it is a picture in musical color of gorgeous splendor. A charming tribute to the pianist's popularity here was shown by the hearty and spontaneous plaudits with which Mr Baermann was greeted before and after his performance.

The program began with Haydn's C major symphony, a work well within the technical ability of our orchestra, and presenting no harmonic intricacies not easily surmounted by the players. Despite the prevailing tenor of the work, simplicity, Mr Gericke did not slight the reading of the score and a delightful performance resulted. The flute and oboe conversations in the first part possibly call for special commendation, although the whole movement was given in a manner almost flawless. The alternating themes of the second part were charmingly set forth, the balance of tonal shadings being perfectly preserved, and the dainty menuetto and the more lively dance theme of the last movement each seemed perfect in its way.

Prof Paine's "Edipus" prelude showed the wonderful ensemble skill of the orchestra, the sonorous number being presented with a precision and resonance which made the interpretation very effective. The turmoil of the "Emperor" march was given in the vein which doubtless would have suited Wagner. This should suit the auditor, of course, as the master's ideas received proper exploitation.

The symphony season will close with the rehearsal and concert this week. Mme de Vere-Sapio will be the principal soloist and the program will comprise Beethoven's overture to "Fidelio" and the ninth symphony, Mme Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr Evans Williams, Mr Ericcson Bushnell and a chorus from the Cecilia assisting in the last number.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 23, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY, MR. HENDERSON'S LECTURES, ETC.

Mr. Gericke set into the two hundred and twentieth Symphony programme the last of the few novelties of his season—unless we should count as such his own orchestration of three standard sonata movements by Bach, and Franz Wullner's revised version of Haydn's third symphony, to be included in the last programme but one. The really great and important new thing was Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor—a work which gave the listener even more pause than anything of his chamber music which had been heard, by almost as much as the scope and sweep of the orchestra exceed the compass and possibility of the quartette. It is indeed a work whose prevailing mood must be felt at once deeply and impressedly, but all whose purposes and declarations cannot be grasped at once. Indeed the best listeners confessed that while his spiritual feeling seemed unmistakable, the choice and purport of his terms and the flow of his expression were not always clear. One needed time to think, and yet the current of the music bore them ever on. Grave, noble, dignified, and not obscure so far as the mere rhetoric of music goes, the symphony is emphatic and individual in character, although the absolute proportions of the thought seem thus to elude the hearer sometimes. One would gladly often have a page repeated, as though it were a page of pure philosophy which needed re-considering. The temperamental quality is sad, almost to gloom or despondency; yet in this lugubriousness there is nothing bitter or morbid, and the general effect moves more to pathos than does that of many works which claim to be pathetic. The scoring is richly colored with deep and yet transparent tints, and there are shrewd but still stately devices in the orchestration.

Mr. Gericke's settings of the Bach andante, Siciliano and rondo were made almost twenty years ago but they sound fresh and modern in their use of instruments, and yet they are harmonious with the spirit of the old master, while they delight simply as bits of orchestral music.

Beside these things the programme held Cherubini's calm and classic "Anacreon" overture and Smetana's vigorous and fanciful poem, "The Moldau." All were well played in form and fashion and of the audience few left without hearing the new, strange symphony entire.

Mr. W. J. Henderson, who is perhaps the most discreet, wise, impartial and illuminating of the New York musical critics, is giving a short set of lectures upon epochs in composition, having already spoken upon French and German song. He has shown great knowledge and skill in selecting and presenting salient points along the line of each theme, and has frequently flashed a humorous light upon some phase of his subjects. The illustrative music has been delightfully sung by Mrs. Snelling, (also of New York) who is not only an agreeable and accomplished vocalist, but is possessed of the necessary intuition, sympathy and elasticity of style to take the song according to its kind and present it in its true spirit.

Howard Malcom Ticknor.

THE MUSIC·TRADES
EDITED BY JOHN·C·FREUND
ESTABLISHED 1890.

NEW YORK, APRIL 22, 1899.

MUSICAL BOSTON.

Boston, April 17, 1899.

The twenty-second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the following programme: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; three sonata movements, Bach, orchestrated by Gericke; symphonic poem, "The Moldau," Smetana, and symphony in D minor, Cesar Franck.

The latter was given for the first time in Boston. It is a work that excites interest and requires more than one hearing before the listener can speak analytically of its value in symphonic art.

The impression that one gets after a first hearing is that of a serious, intense composer, deficient in sustained melodic form, one whose profound knowledge and marked individuality is displayed in interrupted and restless polyphony, repeated time and again with unsatisfactory results.

A pall of melancholy o'erspreads the entire work.

The orchestra played it splendidly, and Mr. Gericke is to be thanked for its exposition among the familiar works that have crowded this season's programmes.

The three Bach movements, skilfully and judiciously arranged for orchestra by Gericke, were agreeable numbers, delightfully played.

Both the Cherubini and Smetana selections were presented in the orchestra's best style.

In fact, all the readings and interpretation on this occasion reflected credit upon Gericke and the orchestra, compared with the previous general cast of the season's work.

THE MUSICAL COURIER

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 19, 1899.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the program of the Boston Symphony were: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; three sonata movements, Bach (arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke); symphonic poem, "The Moldau," Smetana; Symphony in D minor, César Franck.

The overture I heard through three thicknesses of wall, so that further comment is needless. Although absolutely antagonistic to arrangements, or rather disarrangements of any kind, I feel constrained to say that a happier result than that produced by Mr. Gericke in his orchestration of the Bach music would be impossible to conceive. In the first place, as conductor Mr. Gericke has established himself as pre-eminently master of the elegance and purity of the classic, and as orchestrator, he has carried out that same purity, that same respect for the composition, that same refinement which made the unity notable. In a word, it was exquisite, dignified and supremely enjoyable, certainly the most enjoyable number on the program.

The D minor Symphony of Franck was given its first presentation in Boston, and if I understand correctly, it was the first presentation of Franck in this class of work. We are all acquainted with his symphonic poems, his ensemble music, and much of his smaller work, but as a writer in the greater forms we heard him last night for the first time.

It would be impossible to give more than simply an impression of so profound a composition at first hearing, because to do one's duty to the composer and to the public requires an intimate acquaintance with a massive work. I suppose that this symphony may be termed a massive work; it is certainly dignified and sombre to a marked degree. The harmonies and modulations are what we have learned to look for from César Franck; in these lie much of the beauty of the composition.

It cannot be said that he never became monotonous, for the thematic matter seemed to have been worked and worked over. In the second movement in 3-4 time, the program and the weight of the first movement gave reason to hope for a lighter vein, which would have thrown a different aspect upon the whole composition, but this frivolity was denied, and gave increased ponderance to the third movement, which might not have been over-ponderous in itself had it not been for what had preceded it. In the last movement there were many bits reminiscent of the great violin sonata. The next program will present Carl Baermann as soloist.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 23, 1899.

23D SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-third Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall, with Mr. Carl Baermann as soloist. The first number was Haydn's symphony in C major (Rieter-Bredermann No. 3), a work new to these concerts, although composed about 1788. It is one of the best of the Haydn symphonies, heard here for some years.

Mr. Baermann gave an admirable performance of Liszt's second piano concerto in A, a work excessively brilliant, showy and not over artistic, although preferable in some respects to the E flat concerto, which is better known.

Other numbers were Professor J. K. Paine's prelude to the "Oedipus Tyrannus," which he composed for the Harvard performance of the Sophocles tragedy in 1881, and too seldom heard to become familiar, and Wagner's "Emperor's" march. Both compositions were admirably given.

The final rehearsal and concert this week will have for a programme, Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, and the ninth (choral) symphony complete. Mme. DeVere Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Messrs. Evan Williams and Ericcson Bushnell will be the soloists and there will be a chorus from the "Cecilia."

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 24, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought with it the following programme:

Haydn: Symphony in C major (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3).
(First time at these concerts.)
Liszt: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in A major.
Paine: Prelude to the "Oedipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles, opus 35.
Wagner: Kaiser-Marsch.

Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist.

The Haydn symphony, marked on the programme as given for the "first time at these concerts," had probably never been heard in Boston before; but, in cases of doubt, prudent statements are best. What makes us think that the work may be wholly a novelty here are these facts: this symphony is published in score only in the Rieter-Biedermann edition, in which it stands as "No. 3;" when the Harvard Musical Association gave up its symphony concerts, this edition of Haydn symphonies had only reached its "No. 2;" and the only organization likely to give the symphony since then has been the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But, whether an absolute, or only a comparative, novelty, the symphony is infinitely charming. It is not one of Haydn's greatest, but surely one of his most delightful and characteristic. It has all his freshness of melodic invention, all his fineness of workmanship, all his sparkling humor. There are moments in the Andante which reach the acme of ideal beauty—beauty of orchestral coloring as well as of line. The finale is a gem! The symphony was exquisitely played, and received with an enthusiasm that showed that our public has not lost all its naiveté.

Mr. Paine's "Œdipus" prelude wears well; with every successive hearing, it impresses one more and more as a work of genius. Here the composer shows himself perfectly at home in an absolutely free musical form, able to be free and musically coherent at the same time. The work is full of beauty, the composer's inventiveness never flags for a moment. And how admirably dramatic and tragic it all is! what a complete musical expression of its subject! Those uneasy, restless basses make a ground-tone of terror and horror, above which the sinister, ill-boding harmonies and the tragic pathos of the cantilena hover as if in dismayed awe. It is a perfect picture. The performance was grand.

Wagner's splendid Kaiser-Marsch was, thank heaven! not overdone. There was no mistaken attempt to get breadth and grandeur of impression at the expense of rhythmic life and vigor of accent. The work made a magnificent effect.

Liszt's A-major concerto is not so generally popular as his earlier one in E-flat; but, to us, it is the finer work of the two. It is more Liszt's own, more in his most individual vein. We like it better than the one in E-flat, as we like "Orpheus" and the "Faust-Symphony" better than "Les Préludes" or "Tasso." It is more essentially modern and subtile, with a measure in it that one has heard before. It is in no sense a profound work; it is brilliant, imaginative, magico-diabolical. As Heine said of Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable," it is a piece "voll Teufelslust und Liebe (full of devil's delight and love)!" It is a kaleidoscope, full of ever-changing splendors; in it we see Liszt the magician pure and simple. Mr. Baermann has played it here once before, and we feel about his playing now much as we did then. As a piece of pianoforte playing, his performance is admirable at every point; he plays it with virtuoso brilliancy and vigor. Yet we cannot help feeling that he brings to bear upon the composition certain high qualities that are wasted upon it, to the exclusion of others which are indispensable. The work itself is splendidly superficial, and he plays it with too profound a feeling, with too much interior warmth. He plays it too much as if it were Beethoven's "Emperor." For, with all this deep sincerity, the more magical diablerie is wanting; one can fancy the concerto flashed out by Boito's Mefistofelè, as he stands poised on the world's ball, with Mephistophelean humor, sarcasm, faith in nothing. Mr. Baermann's heartiness of feeling is all astray in this hollow, heartless, but infinitely gorgeous and "intellectual" concerto. It is a case of incompatibility of temperament! But there was so much that was superb in his playing that the audience could not but be enthusiastic. He was roundly applauded and recalled.

The next, and last, programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Fidelio," opus 72; Beethoven, scena and aria. "Abischeulicher!" from "Fidelio;" Beethoven, symphony No. 9, in D-minor, opus 125. The solo singers will be Mme. de Vère-Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Evan Williams and Ericcson Bushnell. The chorus will be made up of members of the Cecilia.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 26, 1899.

STEINERT HALL, BOSTON, Mass., April 23, 1899.

ONE more concert to be given by the Boston Symphony and then rest for the summer, but perhaps there will not be as much rest as appears on the surface, most of the men having summer engagements, some in bodies and some individually, and there is very seldom complete rest for the artist.

The man who stands pre-eminently deserving of all the credit that has crowned the Boston Symphony with success is certainly Fred R. Comee, who has had the entire business responsibility and who has discharged it nobly. Mr. Comee is one of the very skillful managers in this line of work in America to-day, because his orchestra has not been confined to Boston alone; it has made many trips to New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Washington and various points in Massachusetts, with never a hitch anywhere. Mr. Comee deserves congratulations, he deserves thanks and he deserves appreciation.

* * *

The program of last night was interesting to a remarkable extent. The Haydn Symphony was given an adequate presentation; in fact, one of those which seems to belong exclusively to Mr. Gericke, so pure in its classicality, so classical in its purity. It is not often that one has the opportunity to hear this composition, whether it be from the fact of its great simplicity or the difficulty of presenting such simplicity. However, it was received with an enthusiasm that was unfeigned and hearty.

Carl Baermann added his share to the excellence of this program by his well balanced and manly performance of Liszt's A major piano Concerto. Mr. Baermann played with an amplitude of technic for all purposes, and his interpretation was musical and intelligent. His playing was distinctly poetic and adequate from every point. He had five recalls at both performances.

What a superior composition is the prelude of John K. Paine's "Œdipus Tyrannus." The sombre beauty can scarcely be described; in all its tragic coloring it never becomes weighty or overburdened with sentimentality, never gloomy to irksomeness, yet it has probed the depth of tragedy, retaining its dignity, its sublimity, and its wholesomeness. One feels very proud of attributing this great work to an American pen. The Kaiser March had a spirited, noble presentation.

The next program will present the Beethoven Choral Symphony, as also the Beethoven "Fidelio" Overture. Madame De Vere will sing an aria, as also the soprano role in the Ninth Symphony. The other soloists are to be G. M. Stein, Evan Williams and Ericsson Bushnell. The chorus will consist of members of the Cecilia.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL, 30, 1899.

MR. BAERMANN AT THE SYMPHONY—"TRANSFIGURATION OF CHRIST" AT THE CECILIA—MME. CARRENO, ETC.

It was good to see and to hear Mr. Baermann again at a Symphony concert, and his appearance at the twenty-third of the now ended series was the signal for hearty and continued applause. There is so much mere virtuosity in the pianoforte playing of the time—so much perversion of difficult and highly developed, although really simple-souled, music into a vehicle for technical display—so much misrepresentation of the spirit of many compositions just because they can be made use of for exhibition purposes,—that there are a pure delight and a wholesome lesson in the performance of even a concerto by Liszt as a work of art and not as a compound of tests for digital proficiency. It was so that Mr. Baermaun played the concerto in A; and as he was really a student of Liszt for a long time and his friend ever after, it was only reasonable to suppose that his treatment of it was what the composer meant and wished. Liszt wrote things enough which demand little else than velocity, force, audacity and excited ardor, to satisfy all the pyrotechnic players and all the hearers who are avid of stimulation in the world. And, although he could not change his nature, reconstruct his style nor withhold himself from some extravagance, it is reasonable to think he intended this concerto to be something better in spirit, sentiment and manner. At any rate, thus Mr. Baermann played it—with a facility and fertility of technique which mastered easily all the huge difficulties that are no less in number and requisition because they need not be forced upon observation as primary essentials. His fine perception, his perspicuous statement, his sense of proportion, his natural sympathy and his four-square art have often been shown in his unsurpassed readings of Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms, and they now made manifest that he is competent to cope, whether as executant or interpreter, with the lighter authors as well as the classic masters. The compliment of the closest attention was paid him, and he was recalled again and again.

Mr. Gericke had provided other approved numbers in an interesting and genial, but unfamiliar, symphony by Haydn, Professor Paine's stately prelude to his "Edipus," and the "Kaisermarsch" of Wagner.

The season ended last night, as Mr. Gericke might have been expected to end it, with a performance of Beethoven's ninth symphony, about which we cannot speak until next week.

THE MUSICAL COURIER

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 19, 1899.

On Friday afternoon and Saturday evening the program of the Boston Symphony were: Overture, "Anacreon," Cherubini; three sonata movements, Bach (arranged for orchestra by W. Gericke); symphonic poem, "The Moldau," Smetana; Symphony in D minor, César Franck.

The overture I heard through three thicknesses of wall, so that further comment is needless. Although absolutely antagonistic to arrangements, or rather disarrangements of any kind, I feel constrained to say that a happier result than that produced by Mr. Gericke in his orchestration of the Bach music would be impossible to conceive. In the first place, as conductor Mr. Gericke has established himself as pre-eminently master of the elegance and purity of the classic, and as orchestrator, he has carried out that same purity, that same respect for the composition, that same refinement which made the unity notable. In a word, it was exquisite, dignified and supremely enjoyable, certainly the most enjoyable number on the program.

The D minor Symphony of Franck was given its first presentation in Boston, and if I understand correctly, it was the first presentation of Franck in this class of work. We are all acquainted with his symphonic poems, his ensemble music, and much of his smaller work, but as a writer in the greater forms we heard him last night for the first time.

It would be impossible to give more than simply an impression of so profound a composition at first hearing, because to do one's duty to the composer and to the public requires an intimate acquaintance with a massive work. I suppose that this symphony may be termed a massive work; it is certainly dignified and sombre to a marked degree. The harmonies and modulations are what we have learned to look for from César Franck; in these lie much of the beauty of the composition.

It cannot be said that he never became monotonous, for the thematic matter seemed to have been worked and worked over. In the second movement in 3-4 time, the program and the weight of the first movement gave reason to hope for a lighter vein, which would have thrown a different aspect upon the whole composition, but this frivolity was denied, and gave increased ponderance to the third movement, which might not have been over-ponderous in itself had it not been for what had preceded it. In the last movement there were many bits reminiscent of the great violin sonata. The next program will present Carl Baermann as soloist.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 23, 1899.

23D SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-third Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall, with Mr. Carl Baermann as soloist. The first number was Haydn's symphony in C major (Rieter-Bredermann No. 3), a work new to these concerts, although composed about 1788. It is one of the best of the Haydn symphonies, heard here for some years.

Mr. Baermann gave an admirable performance of Liszt's second piano concerto in A, a work excessively brilliant, showy and not over artistic, although preferable in some respects to the E flat concerto, which is better known.

Other numbers were Professor J. K. Paine's prelude to the "Oedipus Tyrannus," which he composed for the Harvard performance of the Sophocles tragedy in 1881, and too seldom heard to become familiar, and Wagner's "Emperor's" march. Both compositions were admirably given.

The final rehearsal and concert this week will have for a programme, Beethoven's "Fidelio" overture, and the ninth (choral) symphony complete. Mme. DeVere Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Messrs. Evan Williams and Ericcson Bushnell will be the soloists and there will be a chorus from the "Cecilia."

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, APRIL 24, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twenty-third symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, brought with it the following programme:

Haydn: Symphony in C major (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3).
(First time at these concerts.)
Liszt: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in A major.
Paine: Prelude to the "Oedipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles, opus 35.
Wagner: Kaiser-Marsch.
Mr. Carl Baermann was the pianist.

The Haydn symphony, marked on the programme as given for the "first time at these concerts," had probably never been heard in Boston before; but, in cases of doubt, prudent statements are best. What makes us think that the work may be wholly a novelty here are these facts: this symphony is published in score only in the Rieter-Biedermann edition, in which it stands as "No. 3;" when the Harvard Musical Association gave up its symphony concerts, this edition of Haydn symphonies had only reached its "No. 2;" and the only organization likely to give the symphony since then has been the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

But, whether an absolute, or only a comparative, novelty, the symphony is infinitely charming. It is not one of Haydn's greatest, but surely one of his most delightful and characteristic. It has all his freshness of melodic invention, all his fineness of workmanship, all his sparkling humor. There are moments in the Andante which reach the acme of ideal beauty—beauty of orchestral coloring as well as of line. The finale is a gem! The symphony was exquisitely played, and received with an enthusiasm that showed that our public has not lost all its naiveté.

Mr. Paine's "Œdipus" prelude wears well; with every successive hearing, it impresses one more and more as a work of genius. Here the composer shows himself perfectly at home in an absolutely free musical form, able to be free and musically coherent at the same time. The work is full of beauty, the composer's inventiveness never flags for a moment. And how admirably dramatic and tragic it all is! what a complete musical expression of its subject! Those uneasy, restless basses make a ground-tone of terror and horror, above which the sinister, ill-boding harmonies and the tragic pathos of the cantilena hover as if in dismayed awe. It is a perfect picture. The performance was grand.

Wagner's splendid Kaiser-Marsch was, thank heaven! not overdone. There was no mistaken attempt to get breadth and grandeur of impression at the expense of rhythmic life and vigor of accent. The work made a magnificent effect.

Liszt's A-major concerto is not so generally popular as his earlier one in E-flat; but, to us, it is the finer work of the two. It is more Liszt's own, more in his most individual vein. We like it better than the one in E-flat, as we like "Orpheus" and the "Faust-Symphony" better than "Les Préludes" or "Tasso." It is more essentially modern and subtile, with a measure in it that one has heard before. It is in no sense a profound work; it is brilliant, imaginative, magico-diabolical. As Heine said of Meyerbeer's "Robert le Diable," it is a piece "voll Teufelslust und Liebe (full of devil's delight and love)!" It is a kaleidoscope, full of ever-changing splendors; in it we see Liszt the magician pure and simple. Mr. Baermann has played it here once before, and we feel about his playing now much as we did then. As a piece of pianoforte playing, his performance is admirable at every point; he plays it with virtuoso brilliancy and vigor. Yet we cannot help feeling that he brings to bear upon the composition certain high qualities that are wasted upon it, to the exclusion of others which are indispensable. The work itself is splendidly superficial, and he plays it with too profound a feeling, with too much interior warmth. He plays it too much as if it were Beethoven's "Emperor." For, with all this deep sincerity, the more magical diablerie is wanting; one can fancy the concerto flashed out by Boito's Mefistofelè, as he stands poised on the world's ball, with Mephistophelean humor, sarcasm, faith in nothing. Mr. Baermann's heartiness of feeling is all astray in this hollow, heartless, but infinitely gorgeous and "intellectual" concerto. It is a case of incompatibility of temperament! But there was so much that was superb in his playing that the audience could not but be enthusiastic. He was roundly applauded and recalled.

The next, and last, programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Fidelio," opus 72; Beethoven, scena and aria. "Abischeulicher!" from "Fidelio;" Beethoven, symphony No. 9, in D-minor, opus 125. The solo singers will be Mme. de Vère-Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Evan Williams and Ericcson Bushnell. The chorus will be made up of members of the Cecilia.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, APRIL 26, 1899.

STEINERT HALL, BOSTON, Mass., April 23, 1899

ONE more concert to be given by the Boston Symphony and then rest for the summer, but perhaps there will not be as much rest as appears on the surface, most of the men having summer engagements, some in bodies and some individually, and there is very seldom complete rest for the artist.

The man who stands pre-eminently deserving of all the credit that has crowned the Boston Symphony with success is certainly Fred R. Comee, who has had the entire business responsibility and who has discharged it nobly. Mr. Comee is one of the very skillful managers in this line of work in America to-day, because his orchestra has not been confined to Boston alone; it has made many trips to New York, Brooklyn, Baltimore, Washington and various points in Massachusetts, with never a hitch anywhere. Mr. Comee deserves congratulations, he deserves thanks and he deserves appreciation.

* * *

The program of last night was interesting to a remarkable extent. The Haydn Symphony was given an adequate presentation; in fact, one of those which seems to belong exclusively to Mr. Gericke, so pure in its classicality, so classical in its purity. It is not often that one has the opportunity to hear this composition, whether it be from the fact of its great simplicity or the difficulty of presenting such simplicity. However, it was received with an enthusiasm that was unfeigned and hearty.

Carl Baermann added his share to the excellence of this program by his well balanced and manly performance of Liszt's A major piano Concerto. Mr. Baermann played with an amplitude of technic for all purposes, and his interpretation was musical and intelligent. His playing was distinctly poetic and adequate from every point. He had five recalls at both performances.

What a superior composition is the prelude of John K. Paine's "Œdipus Tyrannus." The sombre beauty can scarcely be described; in all its tragic coloring it never becomes weighty or overburdened with sentimentality, never gloomy to irksomeness, yet it has probed the depth of tragedy, retaining its dignity, its sublimity, and its wholesomeness. One feels very proud of attributing this great work to an American pen. The Kaiser March had a spirited, noble presentation.

The next program will present the Beethoven Choral Symphony, as also the Beethoven "Fidelio" Overture. Madame De Vere will sing an aria, as also the soprano role in the Ninth Symphony. The other soloists are to be G. M. Stein, Evan Williams and Ericsson Bushnell. The chorus will consist of members of the Cecilia.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL, 30, 1899.

MR. BAERMANN AT THE SYMPHONY—"TRANSFIGURATION OF CHRIST" AT THE CECILIA—MME. CARRENO, ETC.

It was good to see and to hear Mr. Baermann again at a Symphony concert, and his appearance at the twenty-third of the now ended series was the signal for hearty and continued applause. There is so much mere virtuosity in the pianoforte playing of the time—so much perversion of difficult and highly developed, although really simple-souled, music into a vehicle for technical display—so much misrepresentation of the spirit of many compositions just because they can be made use of for exhibition purposes,—that there are a pure delight and a wholesome lesson in the performance of even a concerto by Liszt as a work of art and not as a compound of tests for digital proficiency. It was so that Mr. Baermann played the concerto in A; and as he was really a student of Liszt for a long time and his friend ever after, it was only reasonable to suppose that his treatment of it was what the composer meant and wished. Liszt wrote things enough which demand little else than velocity, force, audacity and excited ardor, to satisfy all the pyrotechnic players and all the hearers who are avid of stimulation in the world. And, although he could not change his nature, reconstruct his style nor withhold himself from some extravagance, it is reasonable to think he intended this concerto to be something better in spirit, sentiment and manner. At any rate, thus Mr. Baermann played it—with a facility and fertility of technique which mastered easily all the huge difficulties that are no less in number and requisition because they need not be forced upon observation as primary essentials. His fine perception, his perspicuous statement, his sense of proportion, his natural sympathy and his four-square art have often been shown in his unsurpassed readings of Beethoven, Schumann and Brahms, and they now made manifest that he is competent to cope, whether as executant or interpreter, with the lighter authors as well as the classic masters. The compliment of the closest attention was paid him, and he was recalled again and again.

Mr. Gericke had provided other approved numbers in an interesting and genial, but unfamiliar, symphony by Haydn, Professor Paine's stately prelude to his "Edipus," and the "Kaisermarsch" of Wagner.

The season ended last night, as Mr. Gericke might have been expected to end it, with a performance of Beethoven's ninth symphony, about which we cannot speak until next week.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CV., NO. 120.
SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1899.

LAST SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Programme Was Devoted Wholly to Beethoven.

Mme. de Vere's Singing Was Intelligent and Artistic—Cordial Reception to Mr. Gericke—Performance of the Chorus Admirable—A Brilliant Season Over.

The 24th and closing concert of the 18th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening, the programme being devoted wholly to Beethoven, as follows:

Overture to "Fidelio," op. 72.
Recitative, "Abscheulicher," and aria, "Komm, Hoffnung," from "Fidelio."
Symphony No. 9, in D minor (choral), op. 125.

The soloists were Mme. Clementine de Vere, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Evan Williams, Mr. Ericcson Bushnell and a chorus of members of the Cecilia assisted.

The audience was very large. An exceptionally cordial and prolonged reception was given to Mr. Gericke when he first came forward to take his place at the conductor's stand, and there was much applause for him through the evening, the whole culminating in a hearty leave-taking.

The chief interest, of course, centred in the symphony, which had not been given complete for many seasons; but this did not prevent a full enjoyment and enthusiastic appreciation of the brilliant, solid and splendidly-colored performance of the overture.

Mme. de Vere, who was vigorously welcomed, sang the exacting recitative and aria intelligently in regard to understanding of theme and artistically in regard to phrasing and sentiment; but her voice is not sufficiently large nor her style broad enough to meet the demands that are essential to a wholly effective interpretation of the music. But how few singers, and admirable artists, at that, can do justice to it? Mme. de Vere gave a smooth, spirited and thoughtful rendering, and one in which purity of intonation was prominent.

There is absolutely nothing new to be said of the symphony. The glories of the work have been described over and over again, the unvocal character of the choruses and the solos has been lamented, defended and condemned until there is not a shadow of excuse for dwelling further on the subject. Nothing remains but to discuss the performance, and of this there is only praise to be set down.

Mr. Gericke gave a splendid reading of the work. It was loyal in every way to the composer, in the spirit that animated it; noble in character, deeply thoughtful in conception, pure in taste and of lofty aspiration throughout. There were some unfamiliarities in the tempi taken by him, but not any that were merely capricious, nor which could not be defended. The playing of the orchestra was incomparably fine. The wind instruments, both wood and brass, were never heard with more splendid results, and the unequalled body of strings was at its very best.

It may be justly said that the choruses were sung with a clearness, a precision and a steadiness, and also with an adherence to the proper pitch, that have rarely, if ever, marked their performance here before. The soloists are also to be commended for the admirable manner in which they acquitted themselves of their trying tasks. The quartet had the smoothest and most tuneful treatment that has attended the singing of it here within memory. It is true that they were no more effective than they have been in the past, but it is doubtful if it is within possibility to make them effective, written, as they are, without regard to the development of what is best in the singer's art.

This brilliant performance brought the season to a fitting end. In its course 90 works and 39 composers were represented on the programmes. Beethoven heads the list with nine works, and Wagner comes next with eight. There were six works by Brahms, five by Tschaikowsky, four by Schumann, as many by Liszt and by Saint-Saens. The works given for the first time in Boston were Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor, D'Indy's "Istar," Sinding's symphony No. 1, Bruckner's symphony No. 4, Chabrier's Bournee Fantastique, the first movement of symphony No. 1 by Frederick S. Converse and Tschaikowsky's "Mozartina."

The soloists were Mr. T. Adamowski, Mr. Carl Baermann, Mme. Margaret Boye-Jensen, Mr. Willy Burmester, Mme. Teresa Carreno, Mr. Frangcar Davies, Mme. Johanna Gadski, Lady Halle, Mme. Helen Hopekirk, Mr. Franz Kneisel, Miss Olive Mead, Miss Adele Aus der Ohe, Mr. Moriz Rosenthal, Mr. Emil Sauer, Mr. Alwin Schroeder, Mrs. Marian Titus, Mme. Clementine De Vere and Mr. Evan Williams.

The first concert of the 19th season will be given with Mr. Gericke as conductor on Saturday evening, Oct. 14.

The audience at the last Symphony rehearsal of the season, on Friday afternoon, was an exceptionally brilliant one, every seat being occupied and all available standing room taken. The great reception given Mr. Gericke upon his entrance showed how appreciative the audience was of his winter's work. He was recalled several times at the end of the rehearsal. Mme. De Vere looked superb in her white lace costume over pale yellow silk, with bodice of the same, and a large white hat with plumes. Miss Stein, who is noted for the fine taste shown in her costumes, wore gray, the bodice done in bolero effect, with black and white embroidery, and a large picture hat. In the audience were the Hon. and Mrs. Charles S. Hamlin, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mr. Charles T. White and Miss White, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Merrill, Mrs. William Endicott, Jr., Mrs. John Bryant, Mr. Henry W. Daniell, Mr. and Mrs. Boylston Beal, Mr. Charles A. Ellis, Mrs. A. Shuman, Mrs. Steinert, Mr. and Mrs. Francis H. Peabody, Miss May Kenney, Mr. George Proctor, Miss King, the Rev. Fr. Bodfish, Mrs. A. H. Hersey, Miss Ethel Stockton and many,

---

With the final note of the Ninth symphony, [illegible]usical season ended last night. Heigho! Are the several thousand patrons of the concerts glad or sorry to have them all over, I wonder? But what a wind-up it was! Mr. Gericke covered himself with glory, though, being a modest man, he, doubtless, says it was rather the reflected light of Beethoven's masterpiece that illuminated the performance and inspired his own masterly reading of it. But it was befitting this last and greatest musical utterance of genius should be given as the climax of these twenty-four memorable concerts. We could not endure to hear other works, however fine or new, after that slow movement, the superlative of beauty of which renders one oblivious, if not impatient, of all other musical expression. Those unmoved by the uplifting joy of this sublime work were few, I fancy, and the eyes that did not grow moist with its penetrating loveliness were the eyes of those incapable of tears. The most convincing evidence of human weakness was the rapidity with which the hearer returned to earth, and incidentally to the crammed subway, after an hour and a half of heaven. We cannot stand more than just so much of the sublime, but it does one good to reach the heights, if only for a moment, to be carried aloft on waves of sound as simple as majestic, as had filled grim old Music Hall to the brim. Well, girls, the next thing is the "Pops." Are you prepared to forget the classic for the popular, for the word is, Presto! and the first is a week from Monday?

MUSIC HALL SUBSCRIPTIONS.

Call by the Committee for a Full Payment of the Shares.

The committee on subscriptions for the new Music Hall have issued a circular to the subscribers, calling upon them for the full amount of their subscriptions, in view of the recent vote to go ahad with the building. There were originally, early in 1893, 406 subscribers for $402,500, and additional subscriptions from four new subscribers increased the sum to $407,900. When the committee, composed of Edward W. Hooper, Henry F. Sears and Henry L. Higginson, called for the payment of half the subscription as an initial instalment, 364 persons responded with $208,750. Stock has been issued and paid for to the amount of $361,200.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1899.

Last Symphony Concert.

Beethoven's works made up the last program of the symphony season, the master being represented by the overture, recitative and aria from "Fidelio" and the choral symphony. The soloists were Mme Clementine de Vere, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr Evan Williams and Mr Ericcson Bushnell, and the chorus was made up of members of the Cecilia club. The dignity of the program formed a fitting climax to the symphony season, whose termination marks the close of the more serious musical events and ushers in the lighter and more frivolous style of entertainments associated with the summer months. The "Fidelio" overture was given with a carefulness of detail and an evenness of balance that revealed all of the beauties of the music, the playing throughout being admirable and up to the standard of orchestra. Mme de Vere sang the recitative and aria with good effect. The aria was specially good in purity of tone and flexibility of execution. The audience was very enthusiastic over the artist's work and recalled her several times.

The grand choral symphony was splendidly played, the dynamic portions being given forth without undue exaggeration, and the delightful scherzo and beautiful adagio receiving the most graceful and spirited interpretations. The solemnity and vigor were artistically contrasted with the more joyous episodes, and the climaxes were given with thrilling effect. The ensemble singing was creditable, the vocal difficulties of the score being scaled with a fair degree of success by the chorus. The soloists sang commendably, performing their tasks in a painstaking manner. Those tasks are well known to be most formidable, and in the bass part only can a singer win special favor. Mr Bushnell sang his music admirably, and Mme de Vere, Miss Stein and Mr Williams acquitted themselves with a fair degree of credit. At the close of the concert Mr Gericke was given many hearty tributes of applause, and he was obliged to bow acknowledgment many times from the platform.

From the resume of the season, prepared by Mr Comee, it is shown that 90 works have been performed, of which 23 were symphonies. Thirty-nine composers have been represented, Beethoven heading the list with nine performances, followed by Wagner, eight; Brahms, six; Tchaikowsky, five, and Liszt, Saint-Saens and Schumann four each. Eighteen soloists have appeared, seven compositions have been played for the first time in Boston, and three for the first time at these concerts. The next season will begin Friday afternoon, Oct 13.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, MAY 1, 1899.

Closing Concert of Symphony Season—Joseffy Recital.

Friday and Saturday were days to be marked with a white stone by the music-lovers of Boston, for on these days of last week our symphony orchestra gave performances of Beethoven's 9th symphony that were memorable. This colossal work has not been heard here in its entirety since the reign of that King Arthur, who threw away his Excalibur baton soon after its performance, and it has never been performed here as it was on the present occasions.

1 may or may not be impressed with the grandeur of the work, 1 may readily find fault with the theme of the finale, which has been called a "Gassenhauer" (a street ditty) by an eminent German critic, and which certainly bears some kinship to our own "Yankee Doodle" (it has also become "Rise my soul and stretch thy wings" in our hymnals) in its simple, conjunct movement; but 1 cannot fail to be intensely interested in the largest existing example of the sonata form, the grandest pyramid of thematic development.

The vast work was preceded by the "Fidelio" overture, not the best of the 4 overtures to Beethoven's single opera, which received a very fine interpretation. Then came the great aria from the opera itself—"Abscheulicher! wo eil'st du hin?"—sung by Mme. Clementine De Vere, whose beautiful voice is not broad or declamatory enough for this emphatic style of work.

And then came the symphony, the "piece de resistance" of the concert. It has been imagined by many that the 9th symphony breaks the sonata-forms as boldly as the C sharp minor quartette or the last of Beethoven's piano sonatas, but this is not the case; the first movement brings in its subordinate theme in the key of the submediant, does not repeat its exposition before development, and has a peculiar introduction in quick tempo, but breaks no other important rule; the slow movement varies a double theme, but Beethoven had already established something like this in his 5th symphony slow movement; the finale varies a simple theme, but Beethoven had previously used the variation-form in the finale of his "Heroic Symphony."

The variations of a contra-bass theme by voices was, to be sure, a novelty, and 1 which will never be copied to any extent, for, brilliant as the result is, on paper, it is almost impossible to carry it out with human larynges. That it was perfectly done by the soloists, and by the Cecilia society chorus, must simply cover them and Mr. Gericke with glory; we do not expect ever to hear it so well sung again, we certainly have never heard it so smoothly interpreted before.

But we must begin at the beginning; the 1st movement started effectively enough; the tantalizing little 2-noted figure (the "Flying Dutchman" motive, upside down), which suggests A minor, A major, D minor, D major, and a half-dozen other keys, is a fine instance of the way in which the great composer loved to dally with tonality; the chief theme finally thunders in with a definite key at last—D minor.

But the glory of the first movement is in its ending; Beethoven managed to make his codas as important as a post-script to a feminine letter, and the great chromatic upheaval in this coda (we feel somewhat hyper-critical in wishing it to have been a little louder in the basses) forms a mighty ending to the movement.

The Scherzo is grotesque rather than humorous, and there is always a little of the ferocity of Aristophanes in Beethoven at play; but the fierce contrasts, the sudden caprices, were superbly given, and the kettle-drum in its unusual octave tuning shone forth resplendent. This was the chief orchestral triumph of the 1st 3 movements.

The slow movement, with its 2 tempi, its beautiful beginning and its intricate variations was well caught up, but now all was on the tiptoe of expectation for the climax of the work. (

At last, with a hideous dissonance, the great finale began! Some commentators who allow Richard Strauss to picture metaphysical strife by shaking up C major and B major together (in "Zarathustra") wonder why Beethoven should so discordantly begin his celebration of the millennium.

Beethoven was tremendously in earnest on 2 topics—universal freedom, which led to the Heroic symphony and the "Egmont" music, and universal brotherhood, which found its expression here. He did not practice these ideals in his daily life, unfortunately, but was 1 of that very large class which may be denominated as "illiberal liberals."

Before singing of the happiness of the reunion of the human race, however, he gives a forcible sketch of earthly misery, contention and strife in the opening dissonance and the wild cries of agony that succeed it.

The grandest dialogue in instrumental music follows, as the contrabasses (both these and the violoncellos deserve ecstatic praise for their work) rebuke the tumult and afterwards bid the reminiscences of the preceding movements, which enter 1 by 1, to cease.

But there is a practical, as well as an aesthetic purpose in this employment of the deep strings here; to allow the voices to enter as Liszt does in his "Faust" symphony would be an impotent attempt to mix oil and water; with Beethoven the contrabass unites the 2 dissimilar forces; the instrument is from the 1st the embodiment of a voice without words and when the baritone enters with the addition of definite language it seems only a natural transition.

In the same manner [illegible] enters first as a song without words and subsequently, to the same notes, the basses add Schiller's poem. Mr. Ericcson Bushnell sang the opening bass phrases with dignity and clearness, and in the later work the voice of Miss De Vere was gloriously effective. When the names of Miss Gertrude May Stein and Mr. Evan Williams are added to the list of soloists it will be seen that the vocal quartette was sure to be effective.

But the work of the chorus calls for more superlatives than we dare print; the basses gave their "kiss to all the world" with splendid breadth, the sopranos wandered "high among the star pavilions" with a steadiness and lack of squeaking that almost persuaded 1 that the finale was a singable work, the parts blended exquisitely, even the final prestissimo, in which Mr. Gericke was merciless (a delirium of Joy like that at the end of "Fidelio") was not blurred. It was wonderful.

The use of voices in this finale is said to have sent Wagner into the operatic field, convinced that Beethoven had confessed that the limits of instrumental power had been reached; but, as Beethoven uses the voices in a purely instrumental manner, and chiefly employs them in order to attach Schiller's poem and a definite meaning to his work, the argument is not a very logical one.

The great performance ended a most successful orchestral season, the enthusiastic applause which greeted Mr. Gericke at his entrance showed that the general work of the eminent conductor was appreciated; the still greater applause at the end was a tribute to a performance that in itself gives Mr. Gericke a right to be classed with the very leading lights of orchestral conducting.

Louis C. Elson.

New Music Hall Subscriptions Are Now Due in Full.

The total subscription for a new music hall, made in 1893, amounted to $402,500, from 406 subscribers. Additional subscriptions from old subscribers, and from 4 new subscribers, have increased the total to $407,900.

By circular letter the committee asked each subscriber to pay ½ or more of his subscription, as a first instalment. In accordance with this request, 364 persons paid a total of $208,750.

The stockholders of the new music hall have recently voted that a new hall, in substantial accordance with plans submitted to them, shall be built as soon as possible, on their Mass. ave. and Huntington ave. lot, and the committee now asks each subscriber to make full payment of his subscription, in order that stock may be issued therefor before the building contracts are to be signed.

Stock has already been paid for and issued to the amount of $361,200.

The original plan was for a capital stock of not exceeding $500,000; and it is to be hoped that some additional subscriptions may bring the capital stock up to the maximum amount, so as to provide for the best possible building on the large and valuable lot already paid for.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, APRIL 30, 1899.

(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twenty-fourth Symphony concert, the last of the present season, was given last evening in Music Hall. It was a Beethoven night, so to speak, the numbers of the programme being made up exclusively of works of this composer.

The first number was the overture to "Fidelio." The performance was admirable. Mme. Clementine Devere Sapio sang the great scene and aria from "Fidelio," "Abscheulicher" and "Komm Hoffnung" with excellent effect. The remainder of the concert was given to a performance of the ninth (choral) symphony, op. 125. The members of the Cecilia who sang the trying choruses are deserving of all praise for their excellent work, and the soloists, Mme. DeVere Sapio, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Messrs. Evan Williams and Ericcson Bushnell, made the various quartets and solos as effective as possible. The orchestra did wonders in the scherzo and adagio movements, and on the whole the symphony had as good a performance as one expects to hear anywhere. Mr. Gericke had a great ovation at the close of the concert, which was a fitting tribute to the excellent work he has done the past season, which is now a thing of the past.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1899.

th and Last Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

A Spirited Performance of Beethoven's Ninth.

The program of the 24th and last concert of the Symphony Orchestra this season, Mr. Gericke conductor, last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "Fidelio"..................Beethoven
Recitative and aria from "Fidelio"....Beethoven
Clementine de Vere-Sapio.
Symphony No. 9.........................Beethoven

The quartet was made up of Mrs. de Vere-Sapio, Miss Stein, Evan Williams and Ericsson Bushnell. The chorus was made up of members of the Cecilia.

Mr. Gericke may well be proud of his reception by the great audience. The tribute before and after the concert was to the man as well as the musician. The arduous task of preparing Beethoven's colossal work was crowned with success, and the performance brought a fitting close to the series of concerts led by Mr. Gericke this season.

Of course the chief difficulty of many difficulties in the performance of this colossal work—I believe "colossal" is best appropriate word—is due to Beethoven's defiance of vocal limitations. Last night the quartet was one of unusual excellence. Mrs. de Vere-Sapio, whose voice is not wholly suited to the aria from "Fidelio"—and yet she sang it with great skill and marked purity of style—was incredibly at her ease in the appalling quartet passages of the finale. I have heard many sopranos here and in Europe essay the task. Never have I heard one achieve it with such success or with so little apparent physical exertion. Mr. Williams was at his best, and Miss Stein and Mr. Bushnell completed an admirable whole. The chorus, which at first seemed a little weak, showed unexpected strength and staying power in the very passages where they might be readily excused for any sort of a noise or hysterical expostulation.

Do you really find the 9th symphony as great a work of art as the symphony in C minor? I mean, from beginning to end. The Adagio is indisputably a miracle of wondrous song. But do you not think a condensed [illegible] would be more to the purpose? And were you not reminded once or twice in the finale of the music that is so dear to the Chinese? Do you really think that the tune which tells of "Freude, Freude, schoener Goetterfunken, Tochter aus Elysium" is a good tune? There are many vocal passages in this finale that would no doubt be wonderful if only they could be performed just as the defiant Beethoven heard them with his deaf ears. But I am not prepared to admit that music which canot be performed is therefore the greatest.

Mr. Gericke gave a thoughtful and careful reading of the symphony. The first movement was not as clear as on former occasions, and the andante in the adagio movement might have been taken slower with advantage. Indeed, the whole movement was a little formal and precise. But on the whole the performance of this difficult work was far above the average.

Philip Hale.

The eighteenth season of the Symphony Orchestra concerts is now over and Mr. Gericke is through the first year of his re-engagement.

Novelties produced were as follows:

SYMPHONIES: Bruckner's "Romantic," No. 4; Franck's in D minor; Haydn's in C major (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 8); Mozart's No. 34; Sinding's in D minor; and the first movement of F. S. Converse's symphony No. 1, in D minor.
SUITES: Tschaikowsky's Mozartiana (at public rehearsal only), and suite No. 1, in D minor.
OVERTURES, etc.: d'Indy's "Istar"; Gilson's "La Mer" (as a whole.)
MISCELLANEOUS: Chabrier-Mottl, Bourrée fantasque.

Beethoven led with 9 performances. Then came Wagner with 8; Brahms with 6; Tschaikowsky with 5; Schumann, Liszt, Saint-Saëns with 4 each, Bach, Berlioz, Dvorak, Goldmark, Mozart and Weber with three each; Handel, Haydn, MacDowell, Mendelssohn, Smetana, Richard Strauss with two each, and these composers were each represented once, Bruch, Bruckner, Chabrier, Chadwick, Cherubini, Converse, Cornelius, Delibes, Franck, Gilson, Gounod, Henselt, d'Indy, Paine, X. Scharwenka, Schubert, Sinding, Spohr, Vieuxtemps, Volkmann.

American composers represented were Chadwick, F. S. Converse, MacDowell, Paine.

Only three members of the orchestra appeared as soloists: Messrs. Kneisel, Adamowski, Schroeder.

Visiting violinists were Burmester, Lady Hallé, Olive Mead. The pianists were Baermann, Teresa Carreno, Helen Hopekirk, Adele aus der Ohe, Rosenthal, Sauer.

The singers were Margaret Boye-Jensen, Johanna Gadski, Marian Titus, Clementine de Vere, Evan Williams.

And Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies made an unfortunate appearance as the reader of Byron's "Manfred" at the performance of Schumann's music.

⁂

The first concert of the 19th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Oct. 14. The auction sale of season tickets will be as follows:

Friday afternoon public rehearsals—$12 tickets, Monday, September 25, 1899, at 10 A. M.; $7 50 tickets, Tuesday, September 26, 1899, at 10 A. M. Saturday evening concerts—$12 tickets, Thursday, September 28, 1899, at 10 A. M.; $7 50 tickets, Friday, September 29, 1899, at 10 A. M.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The symphony season came to a glorious wind-up with the twenty-fourth concert on Saturday evening. The house was packed by an audience which had plainly come for the programme. This was:

Beethoven: Overture to "Fidelio," in E major, opus 72.
Beethoven: Recitative, "Abscheulicher!" and aria, "Komm', Hoffnung," from "Fidelio."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, in D minor (Choral), opus 125.

The solo singers were Mme. Clementine de Vere, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Evan Williams and Mr. Ericsson F. Bushnell. The chorus was made up of members of the Cecilia.

The "Fidelio" overture was played to perfection. Mme. de Vere sang the great scena and aria very beautifully, with not quite the volume of voice that is associated with it, but with such completeness of comprehension, so much fire and pathos, and withal in so admirable a style, that the music made its full impression. The thing was beautifully accompanied.

The ninth symphony had not been given here entire since Mr. Nikisch's last year. Last Saturday evening it had what we will venture to call the finest performance ever heard in this city. Mr. Gericke was well warmed up to his task; never have we heard him conduct with more fire, with larger emotional force. The playing of the first three movements was technically about as perfect as could be imagined; in the higher artistic sense, too, nothing was left to be desired. Finer tempi we have never heard; there was no mock-gigantic dragging-out of the first movement, trying to make it still bigger than it was! The theme had its true rhythmic vigor. Neither was the Adagio overdone; everything was in its true proportion, had its true value.

Equally fine was the playing of the orchestral introduction to the finale; never have we heard the 'celli and basses give out their recitatives so dramatically, with such speaking expression. We think both solo-quartet and chorus the best, all in all, that have yet been had here for the symphony. Mr. Bushnell began with a slight slip in the opening recitative, but immediately recovered himself and sang admirably. Mme. de Vere's high soprano was fully up to its superhuman task; Mr. Williams was more nearly audible in the march than most tenors are; the four-part cadenza went firmly and with admirable effect. We do not like Wagner's emendation of the tenor part, but that is a matter of opinion. Upon the whole, the quartet parts were really sung—which is saying a great deal. The chorus was superb throughout, singing with splendid vigor, security, and bringing out all the effects of light and shade. The famous high A rang out with not a waver! Indeed, we had not deemed it possible for the inordinately difficult music to be so well sung. To us this finale has always seemed the greatest thing in the whole symphony—greatest because absolutely unique besides being great. We know of no other instance in all music of a composer daring to push dithyrambic jubilation to its farthest possible pitch; there is no reserve here, Beethoven lets himself go completely; he lets his joy get him by the head, he is not ashamed to shout and yell, he allows himself to get entirely drunk with joy—and orchestra and chorus are drunk with him. Only a genius of the highest native distinction could afford to dare so much; but Beethoven comes out of it with his artistic dignity quite unsullied, he has spoken not an ignoble word, has committed not a single act of vulgarity. In all his rabid intoxication, he is godlike to the finger-tips! In fine, a grand close to a grand season!

NEW MUSIC HALL FUNDS

Committee Appointed to Receive Them Issues a Circular to Subscribers

Edward W. Hooper, Henry F. Sears and Henry L. Higginson, the committee appointed to receive funds for the new Boston Music Hall, have issued the following circular to subscribers under date of April 17, 1899:

"The undersigned committee have the honor to remind you that the total subscription for a new music hall in the city of Boston, made in 1893, amounted to $402,500, from 406 subscribers. Additional subscriptions from old subscribers, and from four new subscribers, have increased the total to $407,900. By circular letter of Oct. 30, 1893, the committee asked each subscriber to pay one-half or more of his subscription as a first instalment. In accordance with this request, 364 persons paid a total of $208,750. The stockholders of the New Music Hall have recently voted that a new hall, in substantial accordance with plans submitted to them, shall be built as soon as possible, on their Massachusetts avenue and Huntington avenue lot, and your committee now ask each subscriber to make full payment of his subscription, in order that stock may be issued therefor before the building contracts are to be signed.

"The number of original subscribers, for more than one share each, who have made no payment is now fourteen, and the number of such subscribers who have paid only a part of their subscription is now thirty-two. Stock has already been paid for and issued to the amount of $361,200. The original plan was for a capital stock of not exceeding $500,000; and it is to be hoped that, with the improved conditions of business since 1893, some additional subscriptions, either from the old subscribers or others, may bring the capital stock up to the maximum amount, so as to provide for the best possible building on the large and valuable lot already paid for."

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING Gazette

ESTABLISHED 1813.

PHILIP WOOLF, M. D............Editor

Apr 29

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the twenty-fourth concert of the Symphony orchestra was:

Overture, "Fidelio," op 72....Beethoven
Recitative, "Abschenlicher" and Aria "Komm, Hoffnung," "Fidelio" ....Beethoven
Symphony, No. 9, D minor, op 125... ....Beethoven

The soloists were: Mme. Clementine De Vere, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Evan Williams, Mr. Ericcson Bushnell. Chorus of members of the Cecilia.

As will be seen, it was a Beethoven concert, and it was a worthy ending of a most satisfactory season. Of the work of the orchestra, nothing but the highest praise can be given; Mr. Gericke was in his most impressive mood, and he led his forces with the rarest taste and skill. The "Fidelio" overture was given with the most effective brilliancy, and the symphony with a large dignity, the most loving devotion to details and with the finest finish. The delightful manner in which the third movement was given stirred the audience into a startling outburst of enthusiasm. The chorus work, while occasionally rough and uneven, was, on the whole, deserving of praise, and it was under a masterly guidance from which it could not escape. The quartet-soloists had little to do, and this little might have been done in a more artistic manner.

Mme. Clementine de Vere was not at her best in the "Fidelio" selections; there was no character or spirit in her singing; she seemed to have reserved her forces for the high notes which were pitched out in a spasmodic manner. Her voice sounded as if it were tired, and in its weakness it not infrequently wailed out of tune.

Mr. Gericke is to be congratulated on the work of the season; he has steadily maintained his orchestra at its high level; he has once again vindicated his reputation as a model conductor of catholic taste and high musicianly skill, and with him on the conductor's stand the artistic success of the next musical season is assured. In this briefest of retrospects it is only justice to recall the good work done by Mr. Franz Kneisel during the illness of his chief.

MUSICAL AMERICA

EDITED BY JOHN C FREUND

PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

For Publishers' Announcements, see Page 24.

New York, April 29, 1899.

MUSICAL BOSTON.

BOSTON, April 24, 1899.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the following programme: Symphony in C major, Haydn; concerto for piano, No. 2, Liszt; prelude to "Œdipus Tyrannus," J. K. Paine; and Kaisermarsch, Wagner.

Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist.

The Haydn symphony was as fresh and delightful as a balmy day in Spring, and it was played in a manner that brought forth the grace and beauty of its melodious measures.

Mr. Gericke read the composition with surprising regard for its dynamic demands.

The attack and precision of the orchestra and the clean definition of every passage, contrapuntal or otherwise, was simply delightful.

It was Gericke and his orchestra of former days, redivivus.

It gives me great pleasure to note this radical departure from the coarse, boisterous manner that has afflicted the interpretations of about every composition performed during the season now about closed.

I shall wait in anxious anticipation that this refined and highly artistic mode may be the manner of performance the listeners will experience next season.

The noble, tragic prelude of Prof. Paine's immortal "Œdipus" is music that stands upon the highest plane of classic writing, its composer being, without any manner of doubt, the most eminent musician to-day in the world.

It was Mr. Gericke's intention to have played Prof. Paine's "Spring" symphony at this concert, but finding it a more profound and difficult work than he had anticipated, he was obliged to defer its performance until next season, when sufficient time could be taken for its preparation.

The prelude was played with masterly effect.

We have always looked upon Mr. Baermann as an exponent of piano classics, so his selection of a Liszt concerto rather surprised his admirers.

Nevertheless, it was gatifying to hear a Liszt composition treated in the pure, unsentimental manner identified with Mr. Baermann's style of performance.

His technic was ample to meet with ease all the difficulties presented, and he imbued the work with a lofty sentiment unknown in any previous performance I have heard.

The orchestra was over-loud in the accompaniment.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 3, 1899.

The last symphony concert of the season was given last night to a house crowded to suffocation. There was not even standing room in the enormous hall, which, in addition to bespeaking popularity for the Boston Symphony, is significant of the fact that Beethoven still means something to the people, as the program was given over entirely to this great master. The numbers presented were:

Overture, "Fidelio"; recitative and aria from "Fidelio," Mme. Clementine de Vere; choral symphony. The soloists were Madame de Vere, G. M. Stein, Evan Williams and Ericsson Bushnell. The chorus consisted of members of the Cecilia.

Madame De Vere sang with most delicious purity of voice and intonation the heavy aria, for which her beautiful voice is somewhat light, notwithstanding which fact it was the most satisfactory singing heard for a long time.

The symphony did not give opportunity to hear Evan Williams' voice to advantage, for one never gets enough of it, even in solo parts, let alone in concerted music.

The rest which Mr. Gericke will take now is one which is both needed and deserved. He will go with his family to Blue Hills, Me., in June.

The popular concerts by members of the Symphony Orchestra will begin on Monday night, May 8, with Max Zach as conductor for four weeks, to be succeeded by Mr. Strube.

* * *

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, APRIL 30, 1899.

24th and Last Concert of the Symphony Orchestra.

A Spirited Performance of Beethoven's Ninth.

The program of the 24th and last concert of the Symphony Orchestra this season, Mr. Gericke conductor, last evening in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "Fidelio"..............Beethoven
Recitative and aria from "Fidelio"....
Beethoven
Clementine de Vere-Sapio.
Symphony No. 9......................Beethoven

The quartet was made up of Mrs. de Vere-Sapio, Miss Stein, Evan Williams and Ericsson Bushnell. The chorus was made up of members of the Cecilia.

Mr. Gericke may well be proud of his reception by the great audience. The tribute before and after the concert was to the man as well as the musician. The arduous task of preparing Beethoven's colossal work was crowned with success, and the performance brought a fitting close to the series of concerts led by Mr. Gericke this season.

Of course the chief difficulty of many difficulties in the performance of this colossal work—I believe "colossal" is the appropriate word—is due to Beethoven's defiance of vocal limitations. Last night the quartet was one of unusual excellence. Mrs. de Vere-Sapio, whose voice is not wholly suited to the aria from "Fidelio"—and yet she sang it with great skill and marked purity of style—was incredibly at her ease in the appalling quartet passages of the finale. I have heard many sopranos here and in Europe essay the task. Never have I heard one achieve it with such success or with so little apparent physical exertion. Mr. Williams was at his best, and Miss Stein and Mr. Bushnell completed an admirable whole. The chorus, which at first seemed a little weak, showed unexpected strength and staying power in the very passages where they might be readily excused for any sort of a noise or hysterical expostulation.

Do you really find the 9th symphony as great a work of art as the symphony in C minor? I mean, from beginning to end. The Adagio is indisputably a miracle of wondrous song. But do you not think a condensed [illegible] would be more to the purpose? And were you not reminded once or twice in the finale of the music that is so dear to the Chinese? Do you really think that the tune which tells of "Freude, Freude, schoener Goetterfunken, Tochter aus Elysium" is a good tune? There are many vocal passages in this finale that would no doubt be wonderful if only they could be performed just as the defiant Beethoven heard them with his deaf ears. But I am not prepared to admit that music which canot be performed is therefore the greatest.

Mr. Gericke gave a thoughtful and careful reading of the symphony. The first movement was not as clear as on former occasions, and the andante in the adagio movement might have been taken slower with advantage. Indeed, the whole movement was a little formal and precise. But on the whole the performance of this difficult work was far above the average.

Philip Hale.

The eighteenth season of the Symphony Orchestra concerts is now over and Mr. Gericke is through the first year of his re-engagement.

Novelties produced were as follows:

SYMPHONIES: Bruckner's "Romantic," No. 4; Franck's in D minor; Haydn's in C major (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3); Mozart's No. 34; Sinding's in D minor; and the first movement of F. S. Converse's symphony No. 1, in D minor.
SUITES: Tschaikowsky's Mozartiana (at public rehearsal only), and suite No. 1, in D minor.
OVERTURES, etc.: d'Indy's "Istar"; Gilson's "La Mer" (as a whole.)
MISCELLANEOUS: Chabrier-Mottl, Bourrée fantasque.

Beethoven led with 9 performances. Then came Wagner with 8; Brahms with 6; Tschaikowsky with 5; Schumann, Liszt, Saint-Saëns with 4 each, Bach, Berlioz, Dvorak, Goldmark, Mozart and Weber with three each; Handel, Haydn, MacDowell, Mendelssohn, Smetana, Richard Strauss with two each, and these composers were each represented once, Bruch, Bruckner, Chabrier, Chadwick, Cherubini, Converse, Cornelius, Delibes, Franck, Gilson, Gounod, Henselt, d'Indy, Paine, X. Scharwenka, Schubert, Sinding, Spohr, Vieuxtemps, Volkmann.

American composers represented were Chadwick, F. S. Converse, MacDowell, Paine.

Only three members of the orchestra appeared as soloists: Messrs. Kneisel, Adamowski, Schroeder.

Visiting violinists were Burmester, Lady Hallé, Olive Mead. The pianists were Baermann, Teresa Carreno, Helen Hopekirk, Adele aus der Ohe, Rosenthal, Sauer.

The singers were Margaret Boye-Jensen, Johanna Gadski, Marian Titus, Clementine de Vere, Evan Williams.

And Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies made an unfortunate appearance as the reader of Byron's "Manfred" at the performance of Schumann's music.

⁂

The first concert of the 19th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be Oct. 14. The auction sale of season tickets will be as follows:

Friday afternoon public rehearsals—$12 tickets, Monday, September 25, 1899, at 10 A. M.; $7 50 tickets, Tuesday, September 26, 1899, at 10 A. M. Saturday evening concerts—$12 tickets, Thursday, September 28, 1899, at 10 A. M.; $7 50 tickets, Friday, September 29, 1899, at 10 A. M.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, MAY 1, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The symphony season came to a glorious wind-up with the twenty-fourth concert on Saturday evening. The house was packed by an audience which had plainly come for the programme. This was:

Beethoven: Overture to "Fidelio," in E major, opus 72.
Beethoven: Recitative, "Abscheulicher!" and aria, "Komm', Hoffnung," from "Fidelio."
Beethoven: Symphony No. 9, in D minor (Choral), opus 125.

The solo singers were Mme. Clementine de Vere, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Evan Williams and Mr. Ericsson F. Bushnell. The chorus was made up of members of the Cecilia.

The "Fidelio" overture was played to perfection. Mme. de Vere sang the great scena and aria very beautifully; with not quite the volume of voice that is associated with it, but with such completeness of comprehension, so much fire and pathos, and withal in so admirable a style, that the music made its full impression. The thing was beautifully accompanied.

The ninth symphony had not been given here entire since Mr. Nikisch's last year. Last Saturday evening it had what we will venture to call the finest performance ever heard in this city. Mr. Gericke was well warmed up to his task; never have we heard him conduct with more fire, with larger emotional force. The playing of the first three movements was technically about as perfect as could be imagined; in the higher artistic sense, too, nothing was left to be desired. Finer tempi we have never heard; there was no mock-gigantic dragging-out of the first movement, trying to make it still bigger than it was! The theme had its true rhythmic vigor. Neither was the Adagio overdone; everything was in its true proportion, had its true value.

Equally fine was the playing of the orchestral introduction to the finale; never have we heard the 'celli and basses give out their recitatives so dramatically, with such speaking expression. We think both solo-quartet and chorus the best, all in all, that have yet been had here for the symphony. Mr. Bushnell began with a slight slip in the opening recitative, but immediately recovered himself and sang admirably. Mme. de Vere's high soprano was fully up to its superhuman task; Mr. Williams was more nearly audible in the march than most tenors are; the four-part cadenza went firmly and with admirable effect. We do not like Wagner's emendation of the tenor part, but that is a matter of opinion. Upon the whole, the quartet parts were really sung—which is saying a great deal. The chorus was superb throughout, singing with splendid vigor, security, and bringing out all the effects of light and shade. The famous high A rang out with not a waver! Indeed, we had not deemed it possible for the inordinately difficult music to be so well sung. To us this finale has always seemed the greatest thing in the whole symphony—greatest because absolutely unique besides being great. We know of no other instance in all music of a composer daring to push dithyrambic jubilation to its farthest possible pitch; there is no reserve here, Beethoven lets himself go completely; he lets his joy get him by the head, he is not ashamed to shout and yell, he allows himself to get entirely drunk with joy—and orchestra and chorus are drunk with him. Only a genius of the highest native distinction could afford to dare so much; but Beethoven comes out of it with his artistic dignity quite unsullied, he has spoken not an ignoble word, has committed not a single act of vulgarity. In all his rabid intoxication, he is godlike to the finger-tips! In fine, a grand close to a grand season!

NEW MUSIC HALL FUNDS

Committee Appointed to Receive Them Issues a Circular to Subscribers

Edward W. Hooper, Henry F. Sears and Henry L. Higginson, the committee appointed to receive funds for the new Boston Music Hall, have issued the following circular to subscribers under date of April 17, 1899:

"The undersigned committee have the honor to remind you that the total subscription for a new music hall in the city of Boston, made in 1893, amounted to $402,500, from 406 subscribers. Additional subscriptions from old subscribers, and from four new subscribers, have increased the total to $407,900. By circular letter of Oct. 30, 1893, the committee asked each subscriber to pay one-half or more of his subscription as a first instalment. In accordance with this request, 364 persons paid a total of $208,750. The stockholders of the New Music Hall have recently voted that a new hall, in substantial accordance with plans submitted to them, shall be built as soon as possible, on their Massachusetts avenue and Huntington avenue lot, and your committee now ask each subscriber to make full payment of his subscription, in order that stock may be issued therefor before the building contracts are to be signed.

"The number of original subscribers, for more than one share each, who have made no payment is now fourteen, and the number of such subscribers who have paid only a part of their subscription is now thirty-two. Stock has already been paid for and issued to the amount of $361,200. The original plan was for a capital stock of not exceeding $500,000; and it is to be hoped that, with the improved conditions of business since 1893, some additional subscriptions, either from the old subscribers or others, may bring the capital stock up to the maximum amount, so as to provide for the best possible building on the large and valuable lot already paid for."

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING Gazette 29

ESTABLISHED 1813.

PHILIP WOOLF, M. D.............Editor

The Symphony Concert.

The program for the twenty-fourth concert of the Symphony orchestra was:

Overture, "Fidelio," op 72....Beethoven
Recitative, "Abschenlicher" and Aria "Komm, Hoffnung," "Fidelio"
........................Beethoven
Symphony, No. 9, D minor, op 125...
........................Beethoven

The soloists were: Mme. Clementine De Vere, Miss Gertrude May Stein, Mr. Evan Williams, Mr. Ericeson Bushnell. Chorus of members of the Cecilia.

As will be seen, it was a Beethoven concert, and it was a worthy ending of a most satisfactory season. Of the work of the orchestra, nothing but the highest praise can be given; Mr. Gericke was in his most impressive mood, and he led his forces with the rarest taste and skill. The "Fidelio" overture was given with the most effective brilliancy, and the symphony with a large dignity, the most loving devotion to details and with the finest finish. The delightful manner in which the third movement was given stirred the audience into a startling outburst of enthusiasm. The chorus work, while occasionally rough and uneven, was, on the whole, deserving of praise, and it was under a masterly guidance from which it could not escape. The quartet-soloists had little to do, and this little might have been done in a more artistic manner.

Mme. Clementine de Vere was not at her best in the "Fidelio" selections; there was no character or spirit in her singing; she seemed to have reserved her forces for the high notes which were pitched out in a spasmodic manner. Her voice sounded as if it were tired, and in its weakness it not infrequently wailed out of tune.

Mr. Gericke is to be congratulated on the work of the season; he has steadily maintained his orchestra at its high level; he has once again vindicated his reputation as a model conductor of catholic taste and high musicianly skill, and with him on the conductor's stand the artistic success of the next musical season is assured. In this briefest of retrospects it is only justice to recall the good work done by Mr. Franz Kneisel during the illness of his chief.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, MAY 3, 1899.

The last symphony concert of the season was given last night to a house crowded to suffocation. There was not even standing room in the enormous hall, which, in addition to bespeaking popularity for the Boston Symphony, is significant of the fact that Beethoven still means something to the people, as the program was given over entirely to this great master. The numbers presented were:

Overture, "Fidelio"; recitative and aria from "Fidelio," Mme. Clementine de Vere; choral symphony. The soloists were Madame de Vere, G. M. Stein, Evan Williams and Ericsson Bushnell. The chorus consisted of members of the Cecilia.

Madame De Vere sang with most delicious purity of voice and intonation the heavy aria, for which her beautiful voice is somewhat light, notwithstanding which fact it was the most satisfactory singing heard for a long time.

The symphony did not give opportunity to hear Evan Williams' voice to advantage, for one never gets enough of it, even in solo parts, let alone in concerted music.

The rest which Mr. Gericke will take now is one which is both needed and deserved. He will go with his family to Blue Hills, Me., in June.

The popular concerts by members of the Symphony Orchestra will begin on Monday night, May 8, with Max Zach as conductor for four weeks, to be succeeded by Mr. Strube.

* * *

MUSICAL AMERICA

EDITED BY JOHN C. FREUND

PUBLISHED AT 27 UNION SQUARE NEW YORK

For Publishers' Announcements, see Page 24.

New York, April 29, 1899.

MUSICAL BOSTON.

BOSTON, April 2[illegible], 1899.

The twenty-third concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented the following programme: Symphony in C major, Haydn; concerto for piano, No. 2, Liszt; prelude to "Œdipus Tyrannus," J. K. Paine; and Kaisermarsch, Wagner.

Mr. Carl Baermann was the soloist.

The Haydn symphony was as fresh and delightful as a balmy day in Spring, and it was played in a manner that brought forth the grace and beauty of its melodious measures.

Mr. Gericke read the composition with surprising regard for its dynamic demands.

The attack and precision of the orchestra and the clean definition of every passage, contrapuntal or otherwise, was simply delightful.

It was Gericke and his orchestra of former [illegible] us.

It gives me great pleasure to note this radical [illegible] from the coarse, boisterous manner that has [illegible] the interpretations of about every composition performed during the season now about closed.

I shall wait in anxious anticipation that this refined and highly artistic [illegible] may be the manner of performance the listeners will experience next season.

The noble [illegible] prelude of Prof. Paine's [illegible] "Œdipus" is music that stands upon the highest plane of classic writing, the composer being, without any manner of doubt, the most [illegible] musician to-day in the world.

It was Mr. Gericke's intention to have played Prof. Paine's "Spring" symphony at this concert but finding it a more profound and difficult work than he had anticipated, he was obliged to defer its performance until next season, when sufficient time could be taken for its preparation.

The prelude was played with masterly effect.

We have always looked upon Mr. Baermann as an exponent of piano classics, so his selection of a Liszt concerto rather surprised his admirers.

Nevertheless, it was gratifying to hear a Liszt composition treated in the pure, unsentimental manner identified with Mr. Baermann's style of performance.

His technic was ample to meet with ease all the difficulties presented, and he imbued the work with [illegible] sentiment unknown in any previous performance I [illegible] heard.

The orchestra was over-loud in the accompaniment

- COVER ONLY -
CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, April 19, at 8 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

8

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 6, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72.
GOUNOD.	ARIA, "Les Stances de Sapho."
ANDERSEN.	CONCERTSTUCK, for FLUTE and ORCHESTRA.
	SONGS with ORCHESTRA.
a) LISZT.	"DIE LORELEY."
b) V. STANFORD.	"THE BOWER OF ROSES."
BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 73. I. Allegro non troppo. II. Adagio non troppo. III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi Andantino. IV. Allegro con spirito.

Soloists:

Mme. BLANCHE MARCHESI.
Mr. A. MAQUARRE.

Tuesday, April 11. Ninth Harvard University Chamber Concert. The Kneisel Quartet and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, Soloist. Programme: Chadwick, Quartet; Bach, Sonata for Violoncello, No. 3, (unaccompanied); Beethoven, Quartet in B flat, op. 120.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

THURSDAY, APRIL 27, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

JOSEF HAYDN.	SYMPHONY, in C major, (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3). I. Adagio.—Allegro assai. II. Andante. III. Menuetto.—Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro assai.
FRANZ LISZT.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, in A major.
JOHN K. PAINE.	PRELUDE to the "Œdipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles.
BEDŘICH SMETANA.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Moldau."

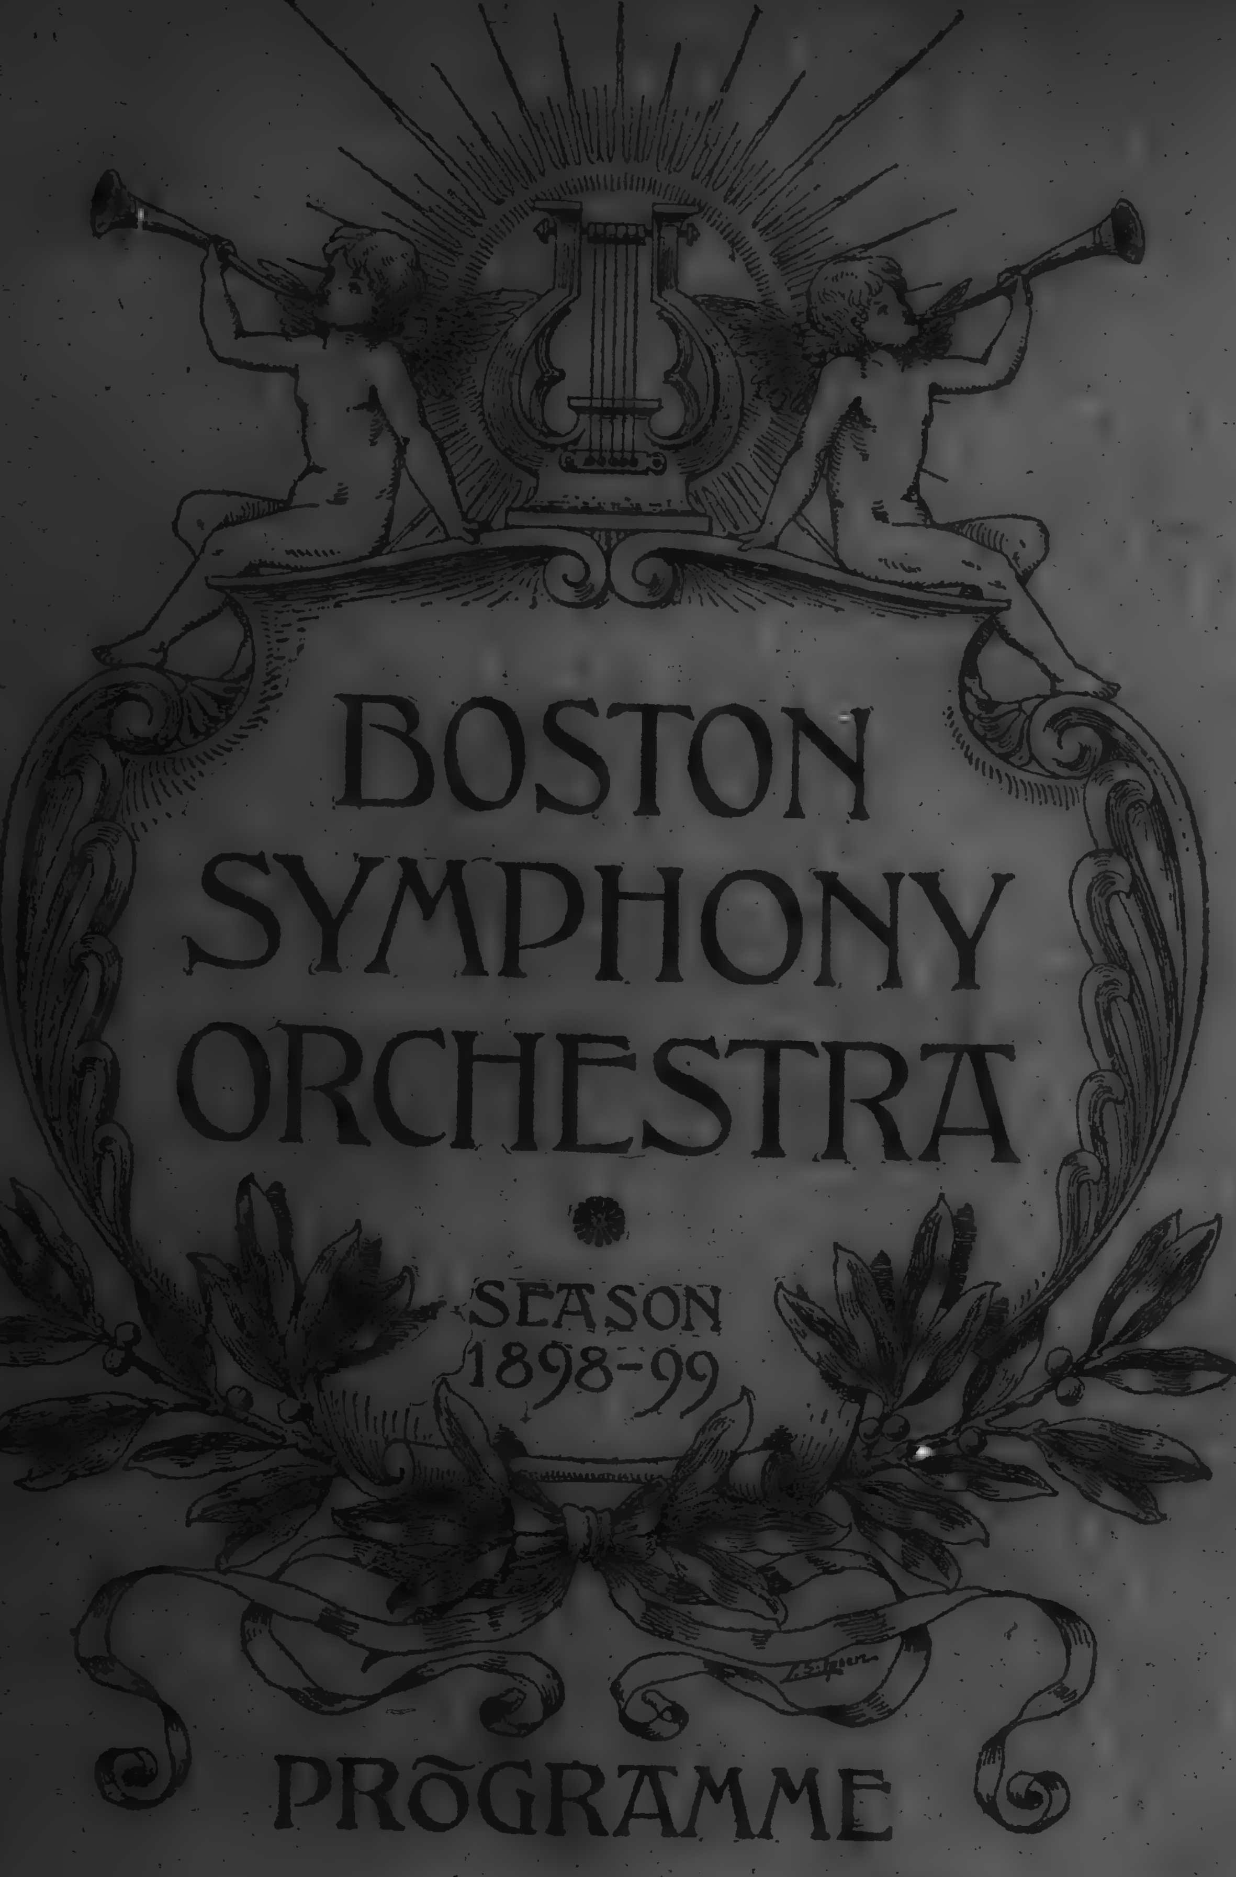
Soloist:

Mr. CARL BAERMANN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, April 19, at 8 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

8

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 6, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72.
GOUNOD.	ARIA, "Les Stances de Sapho."
ANDERSEN.	CONCERTSTUCK, for FLUTE and ORCHESTRA.
	SONGS with ORCHESTRA.
a) LISZT.	"DIE LORELEY."
b) V. STANFORD.	"THE BOWER OF ROSES."
BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 73. I. Allegro non troppo. II. Adagio non troppo. III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi Andantino. IV. Allegro con spirito.

Soloists:

Mme. BLANCHE MARCHESI.
Mr. A. MAQUARRE.

Tuesday, April 11. Ninth Harvard University Chamber Concert. The Kneisel Quartet and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, Soloist. Programme: Chadwick, Quartet; Bach, Sonata for Violoncello, No. 3, (unaccompanied); Beethoven, Quartet in B flat, op. 120.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

THURSDAY, APRIL 27, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

JOSEF HAYDN.	SYMPHONY, in C major, (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3). I. Adagio. — Allegro assai. II. Andante. III. Menuetto. — Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro assai.
FRANZ LISZT.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, in A major.
JOHN K. PAINE.	PRELUDE to the "Œdipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles.
BEDŘICH SMETANA.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Moldau."

Soloist:

Mr. CARL BAERMANN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway

[138]

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, April 19, at 8 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

8

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IX. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, APRIL 6, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BEETHOVEN.	OVERTURE to "Leonore," No. 3, op. 72.
GOUNOD.	ARIA, "Les Stances de Sapho."
ANDERSEN.	CONCERTSTUCK, for FLUTE and ORCHESTRA.
	SONGS with ORCHESTRA.
a) LISZT.	"DIE LORELEY."
b) V. STANFORD.	"THE BOWER OF ROSES."
BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 2, in D major, op. 73. I. Allegro non troppo. II. Adagio non troppo. III. Allegretto grazioso, quasi Andantino. IV. Allegro con spirito.

Soloists:

Mme. BLANCHE MARCHESI.
Mr. A. MAQUARRE.

Tuesday, April 11. Ninth Harvard University Chamber Concert. The Kneisel Quartet and Mr. Alwin Schroeder, Soloist. Programme: Chadwick, Quartet; Bach, Sonata for Violoncello, No. 3, (unaccompanied); Beethoven, Quartet in B flat, op. 120.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

X. CONCERT.

[Last of the Season.]

THURSDAY, APRIL 27, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

JOSEF HAYDN.	SYMPHONY, in C major, (Rieter-Biedermann, No. 3). I. Adagio. — Allegro assai. II. Andante. III. Menuetto. — Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro assai.
FRANZ LISZT.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 2, in A major.
JOHN K. PAINE.	PRELUDE to the "Œdipus Tyrannus" of Sophocles.
BEDŘICH SMETANA.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "The Moldau."

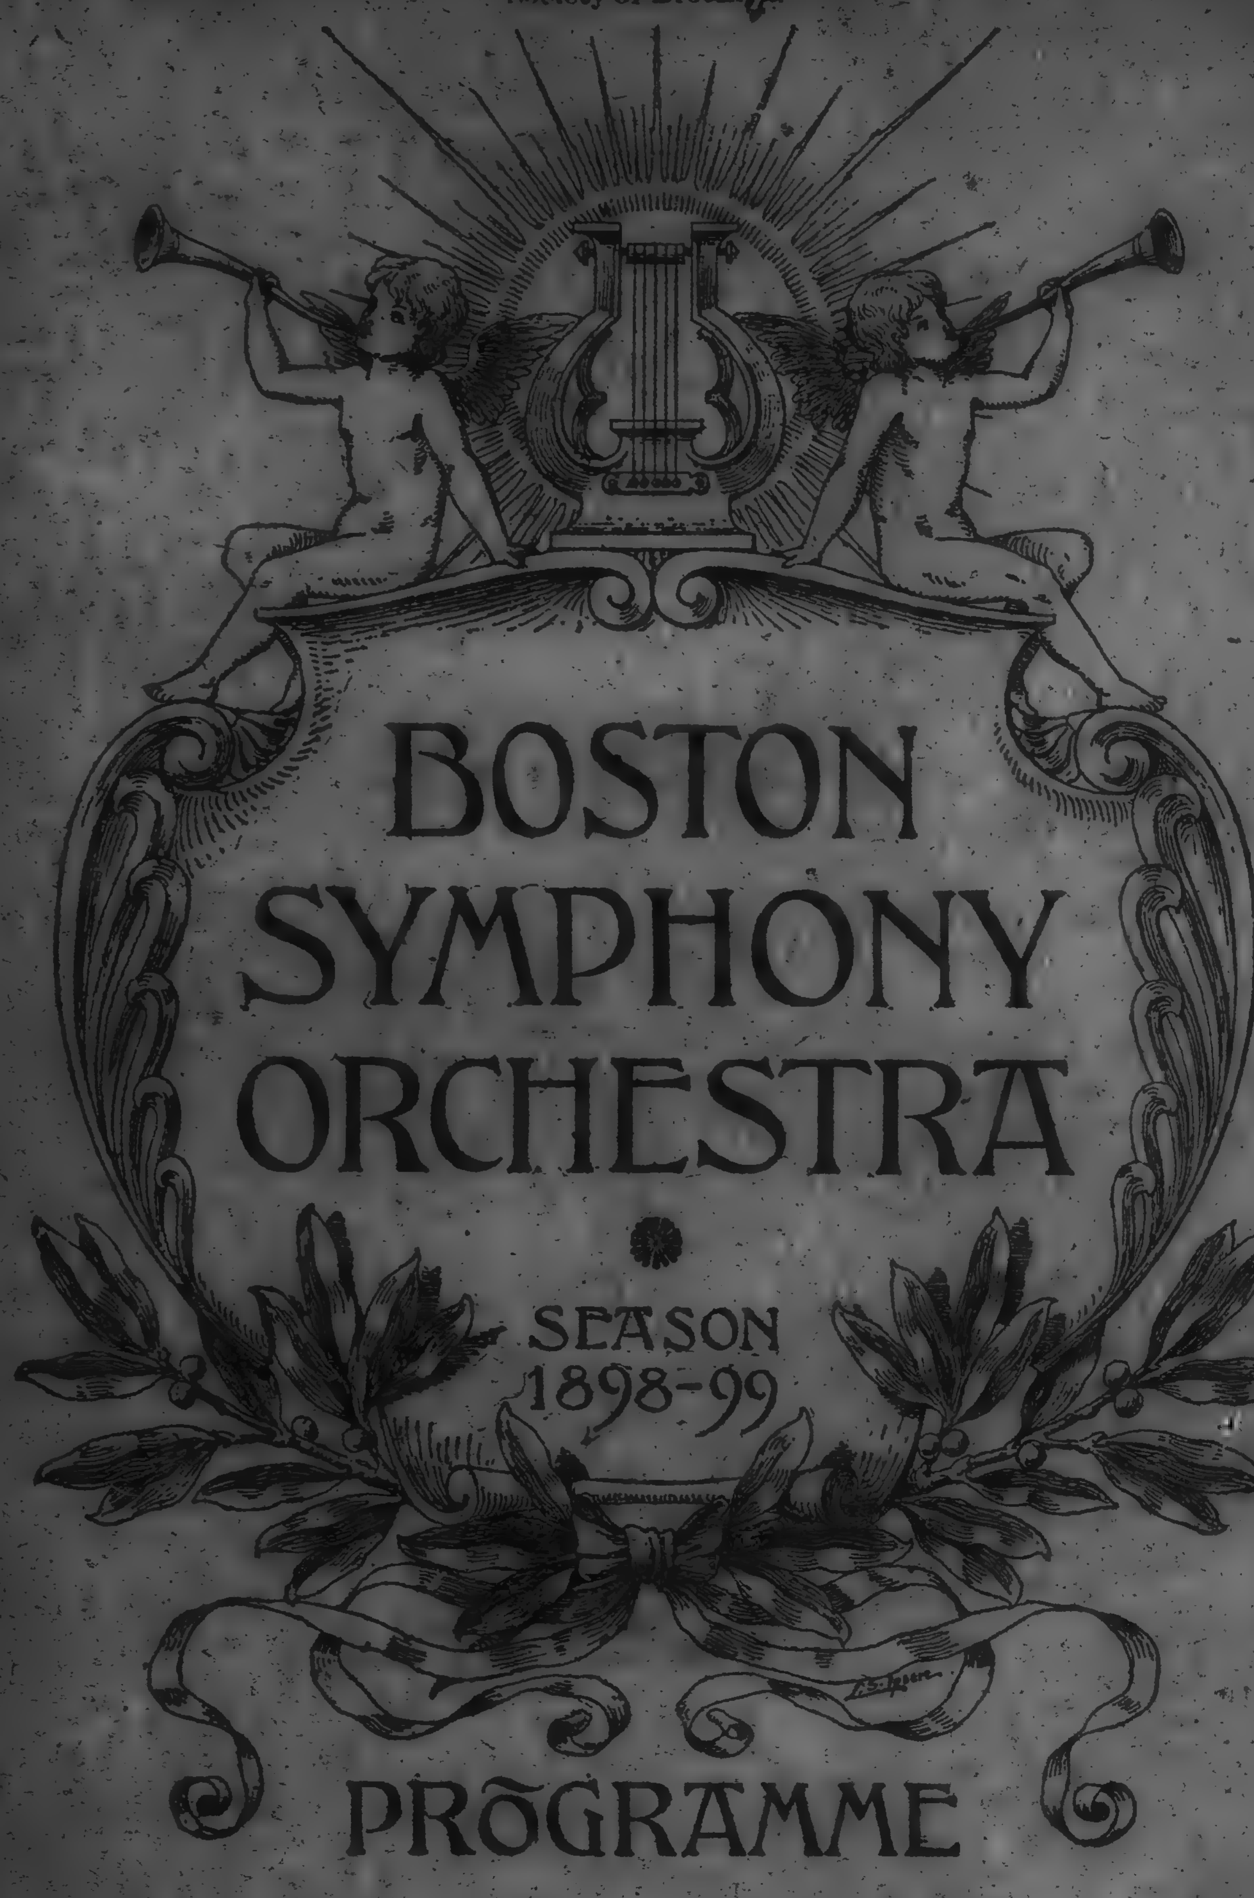
Soloist:

Mr. CARL BAERMANN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . BROOKLYN.
Friday Afternoon, March 24, at 3.30 precisely.
Saturday Evening, March 25, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.

CARNEGIE HALL, - - - - NEW Y
Wednesday Afternoon, March 22, at 2 precisely.
Thursday Evening, March 23, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

5

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN. SYMPHONY, in D major, "La Chasse."
- I. Adagio.—Allegro.
- II. Andante.
- III. Menuetto. Allegretto.—Trio.
- IV. La Chasse.

ROSSINI. ARIA, "Una Voce," from "Il Barbiere."

CHABRIER. BOURRÉE FANTASQUE.
(Scored for ORCHESTRA by FELIX MOTTL.)

(a) DELIBES. "POURQUOI," from "Lakmé."
(b) DELL' ACQUA. "VILLANELLE."

GOLDMARK. OVERTURE to "Sakuntala." op. 13.

Soloist:

Miss ROSE STEWART.

Tuesday Evening, March 28. Eighth Harvard University Chamber Concert. The Adamowski Quartet and Mme. Szumowska, Pianist. The programme: Statkowski, Quartet in F major. Chopin, Nocturne in G major; Etude in F minor: Impromptu No. 2. Rubinstein, Valse Caprice. Schumann, Piano Quintet in E flat major.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, March 29, at 8 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

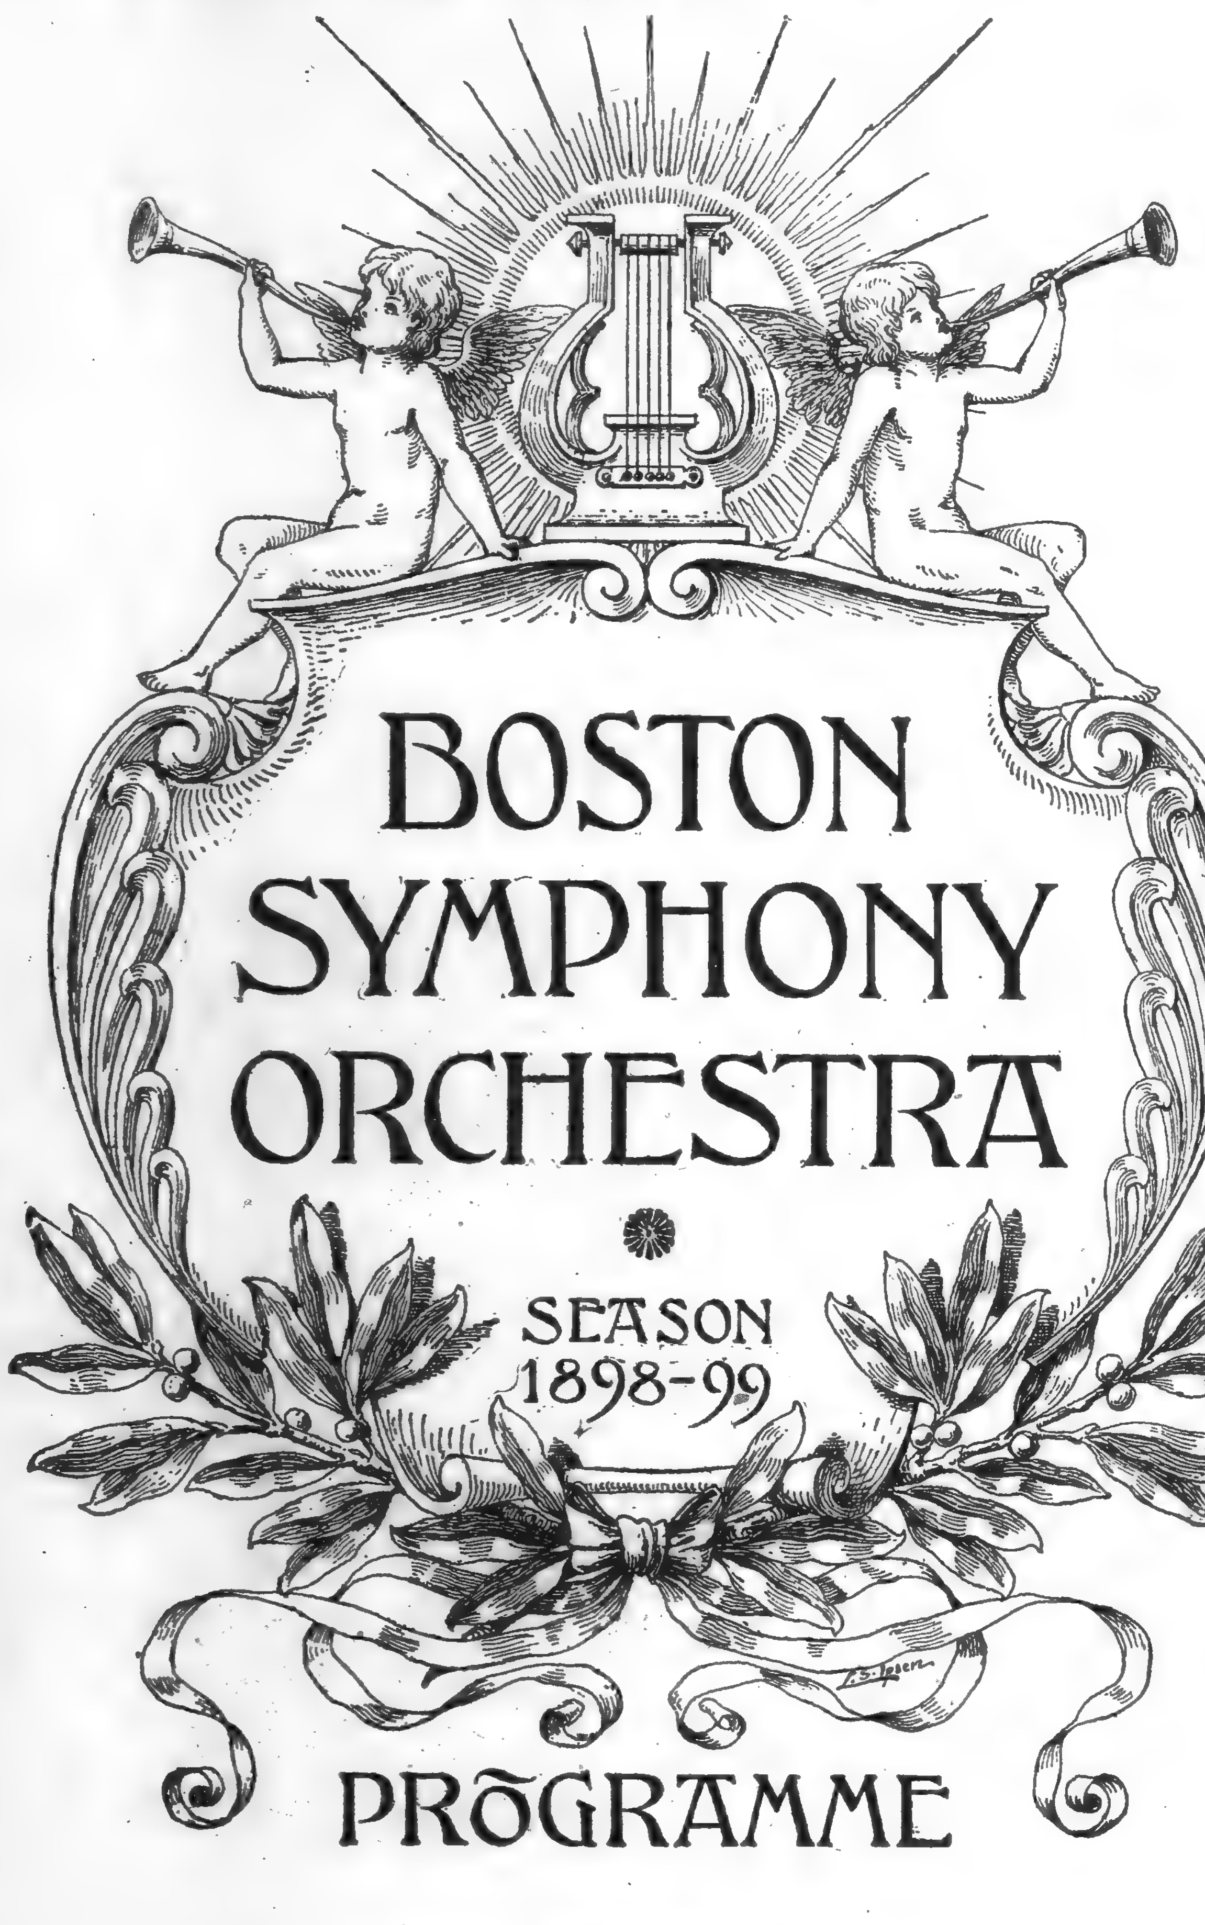
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

7

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... BROOKLYN.
Friday Afternoon, March 24, at 3.30 precisely.
Saturday Evening, March 25, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.

CARNEGIE HALL, - - - - NEW Y
Wednesday Afternoon, March 22, at 2 precisely.
Thursday Evening, March 23, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

5

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VIII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 16, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

HAYDN.	SYMPHONY, in D major, "La Chasse." I. Adagio. — Allegro. II. Andante. III. Menuetto. Allegretto. — Trio. IV. La Chasse.
ROSSINI.	ARIA, "Una Voce," from "Il Barbiere."
CHABRIER.	BOURRÉE FANTASQUE. (Scored for ORCHESTRA by FELIX MOTTL.)
(a) DELIBES.	"POURQUOI," from "Lakmé."
(b) DELL' ACQUA.	"VILLANELLE."
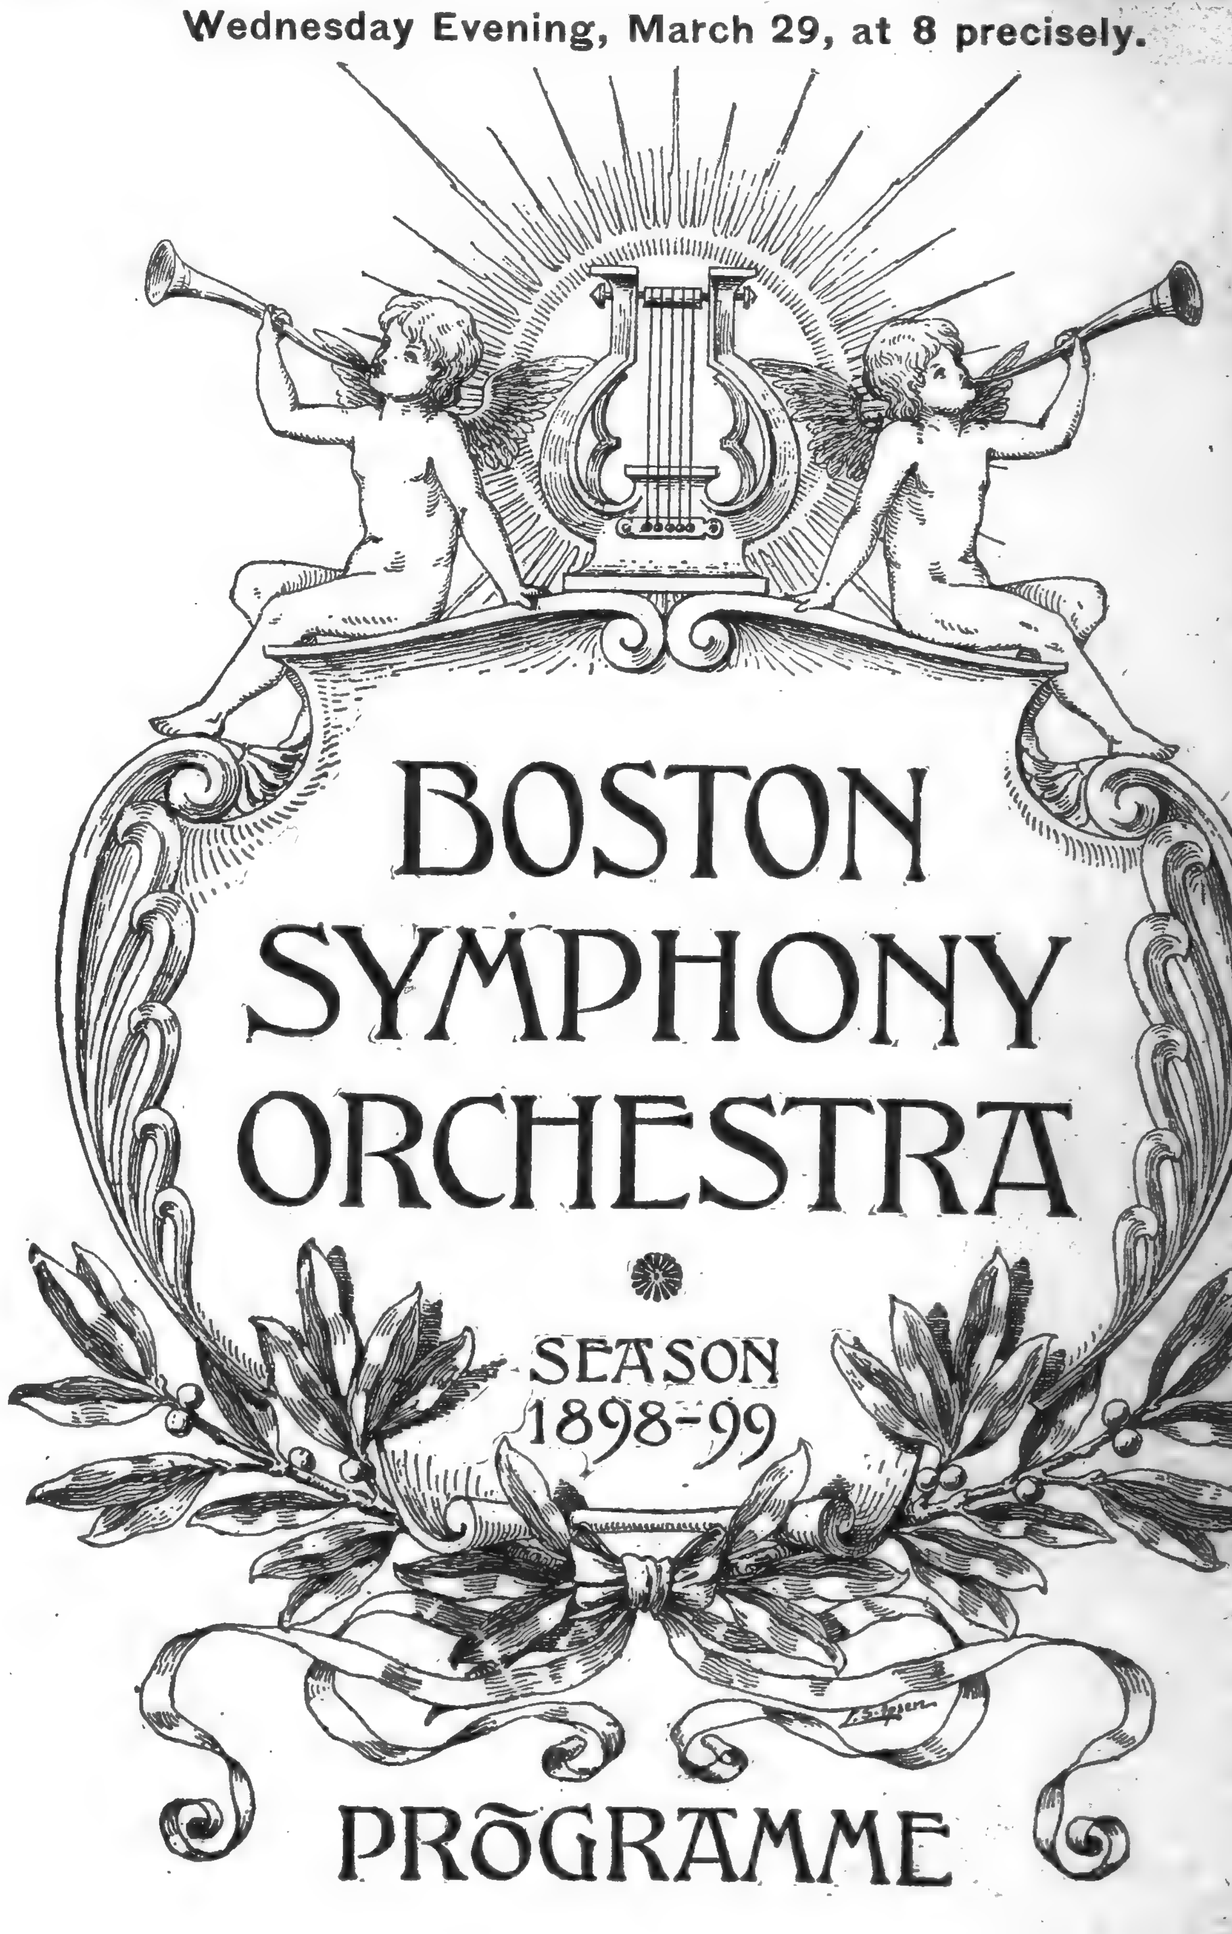
GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE to "Sakuntala," op. 13.

Soloist:

Miss ROSE STEWART.

Tuesday Evening, March 28. Eighth Harvard University Chamber Concert. The Adamowski Quartet and Mme. Szumowska, Pianist. The programme: Statkowski, Quartet in F major. Chopin, Nocturne in G major; Etude in F minor; Impromptu No. 2. Rubinstein, Valse Caprice. Schumann, Piano Quintet in E flat major.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, March 29, at 8 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

7

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

[1-9]

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, March 8, at 8 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

WEBER.	OVERTURE to "Der Freischütz."
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D major, op. 61. I. Allegro, ma non troppo. II. Larghetto. III. Rondo.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish," op. 97. I. Lebhaft. II. Scherzo: Sehr mässig. III. Nicht schnell. IV. Feierlich. V. Lebhaft.

Soloist:

LADY HALLÉ (Norman Neruda).

Tuesday Evening, March 14. Seventh Harvard University Chamber Concert, by the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. The programme is: Tschaikowski, Quartet, in E-flat minor; Beach, Sonata for Piano and Violin, in G minor; Schumann, Quartet, in F major.

MUSIC HALL, - - - - - BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, March 21, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

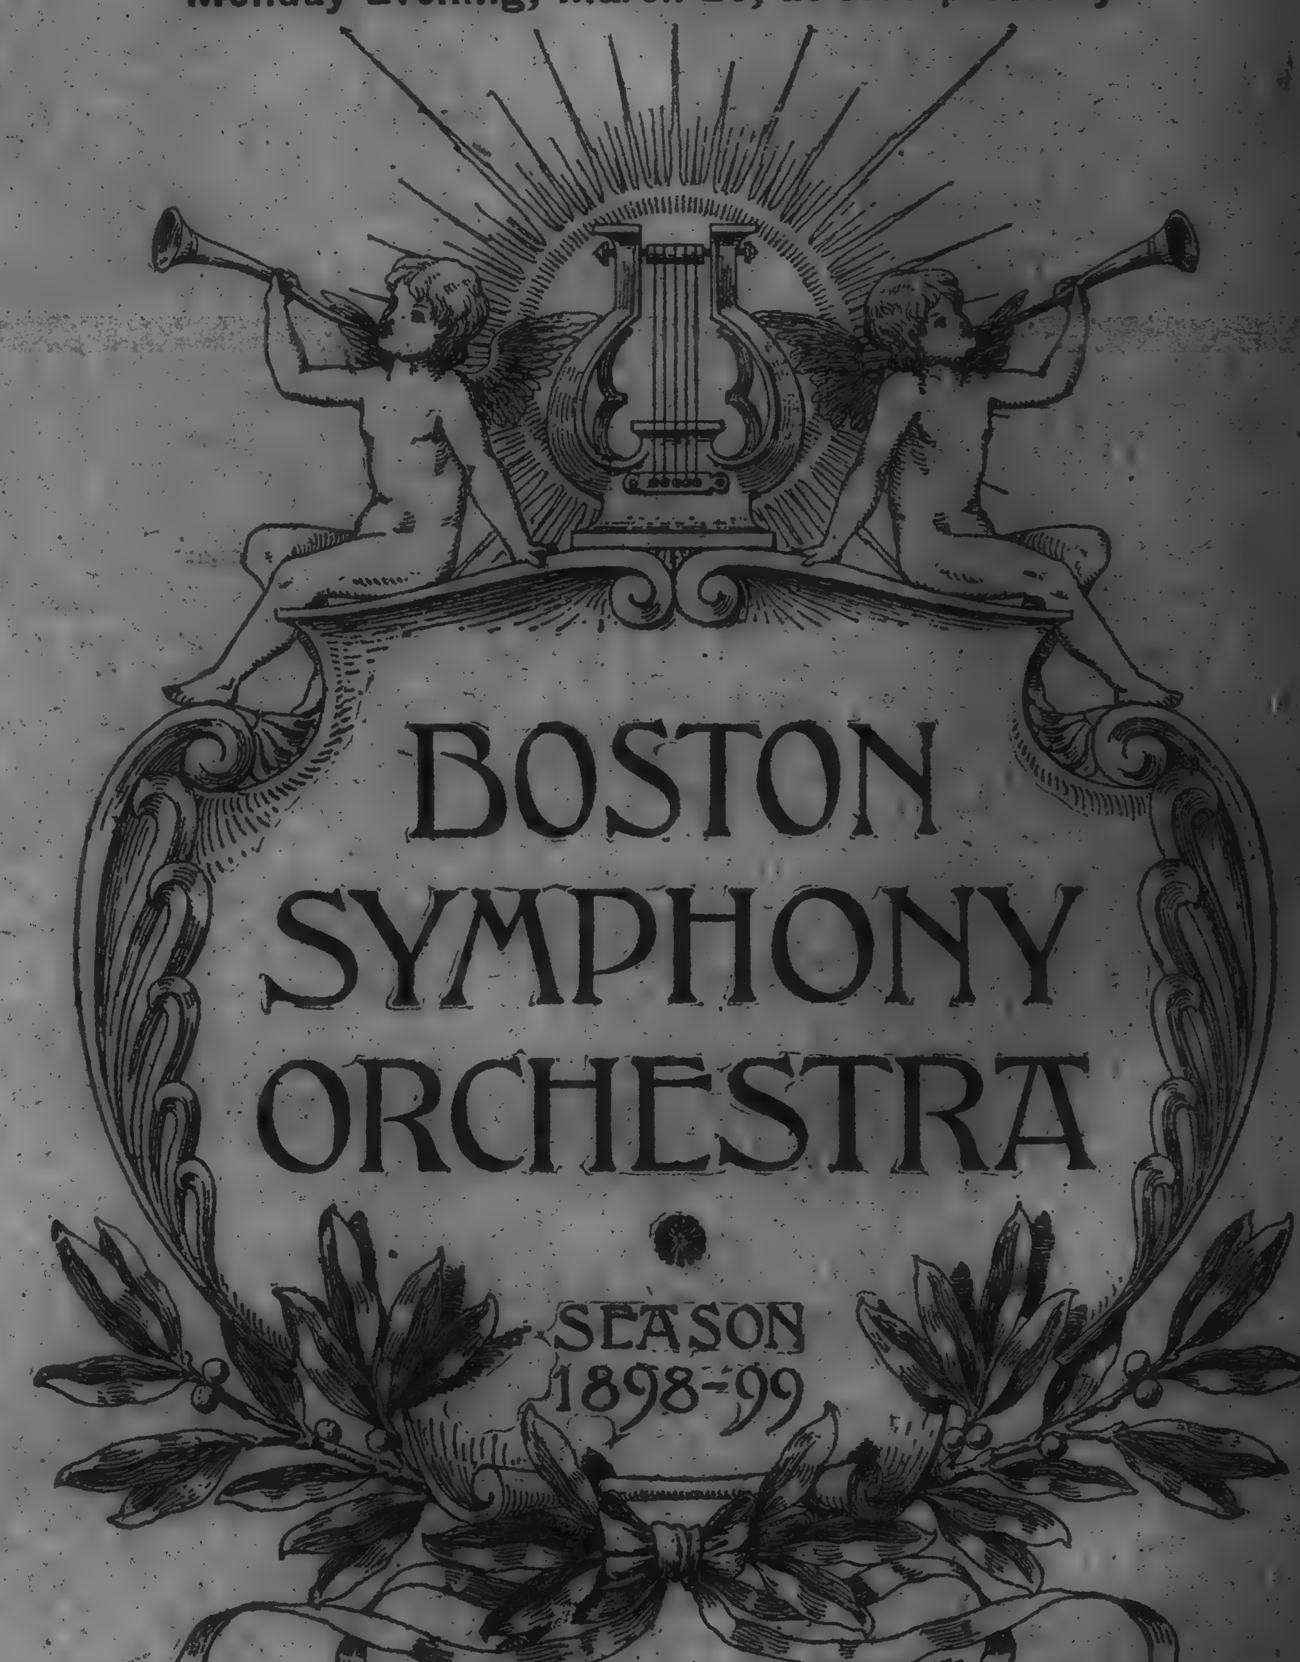
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 13 North Charles Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, March 20, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

[140]

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, admission only, on sale at Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, March 8, at 8 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

6

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VII. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, MARCH 2, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

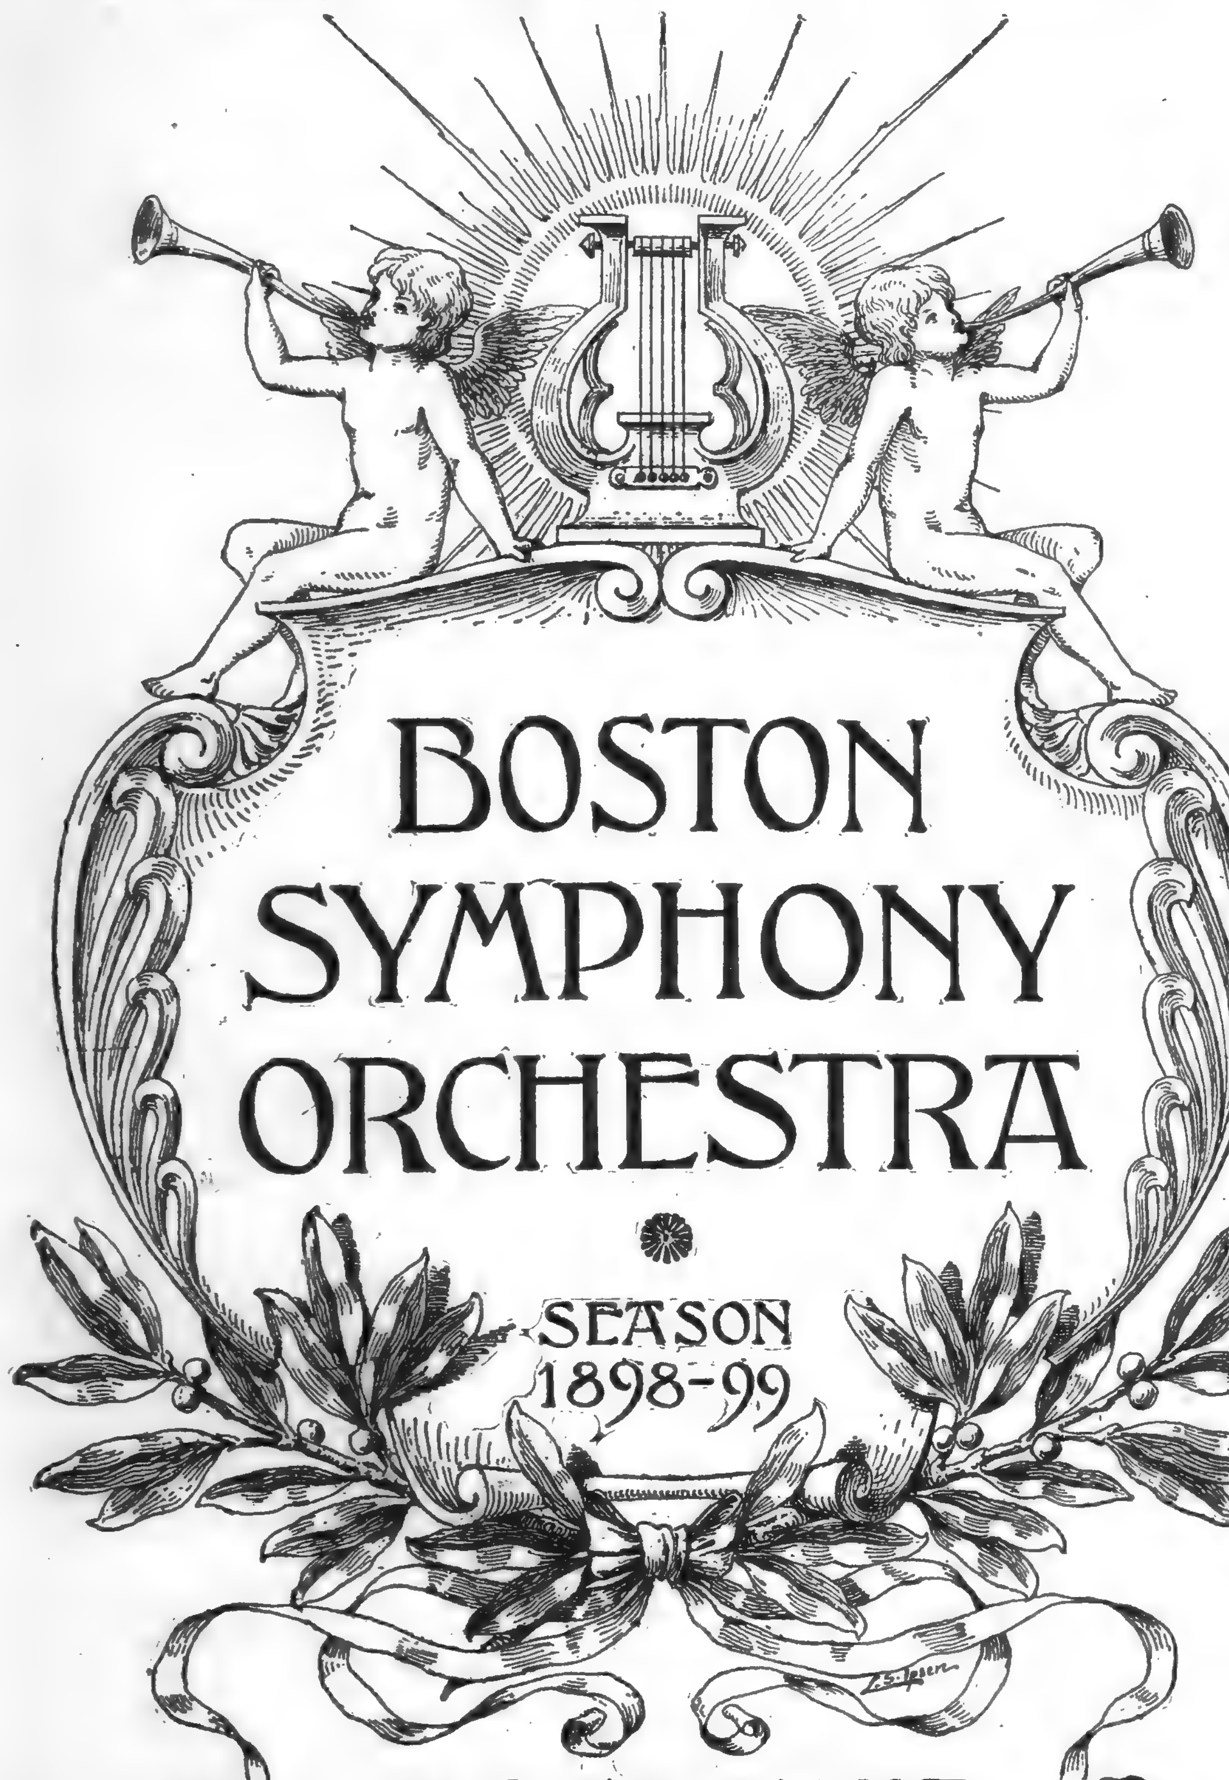
WEBER.	OVERTURE to "Der Freischütz."
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for VIOLIN, in D major, op. 61. I. Allegro, ma non troppo. II. Larghetto. III Rondo.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in E-flat major, "Rhenish," op. 97. I. Lebhaft. II. Scherzo: Sehr mässig. III. Nicht schnell. IV. Feierlich. V. Lebhaft.

Soloist:

LADY HALLÉ (Norman Neruda).

Tuesday Evening, March 14. Seventh Harvard University Chamber Concert, by the Kneisel Quartet, assisted by Mrs. H. H. A. Beach. The programme is: Tschaikowski, Quartet, in E-flat minor; Beach, Sonata for Piano and Violin, in G minor; Schumann, Quartet, in F major.

MUSIC HALL, - - - - - BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, March 21, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 13 North Charles Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, March 20, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

[140]

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

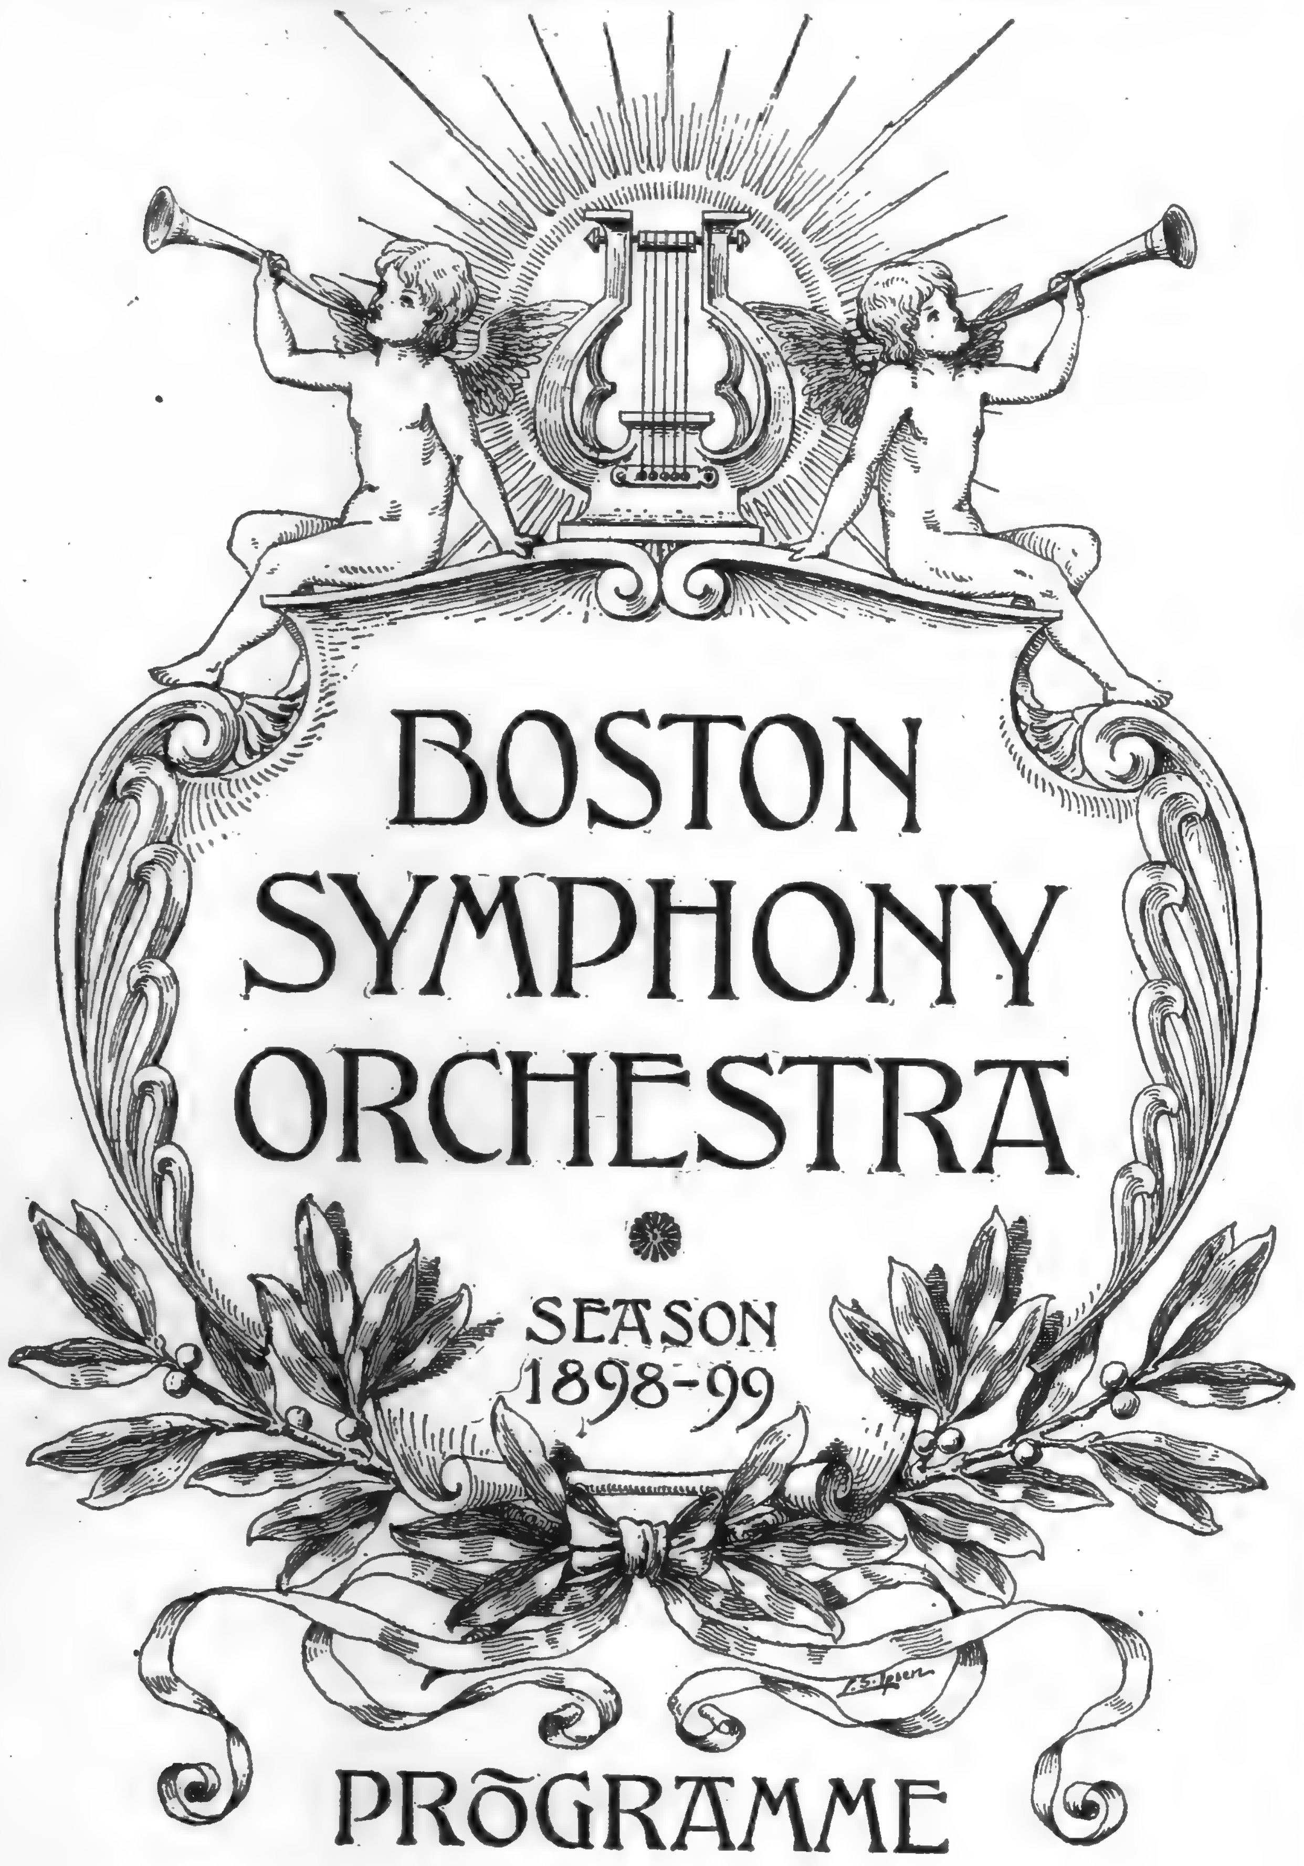
5

Tickets, admission only, on sale at Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, - - - - - BALTIMORE.

Tuesday Evening, February 21, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at 13 North Charles Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA.

Monday Evening, February 20, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC. . . . BROOKLYN.

Friday Afternoon, February 24, at 3.30 precisely.
Saturday Evening, February 25, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1898-99

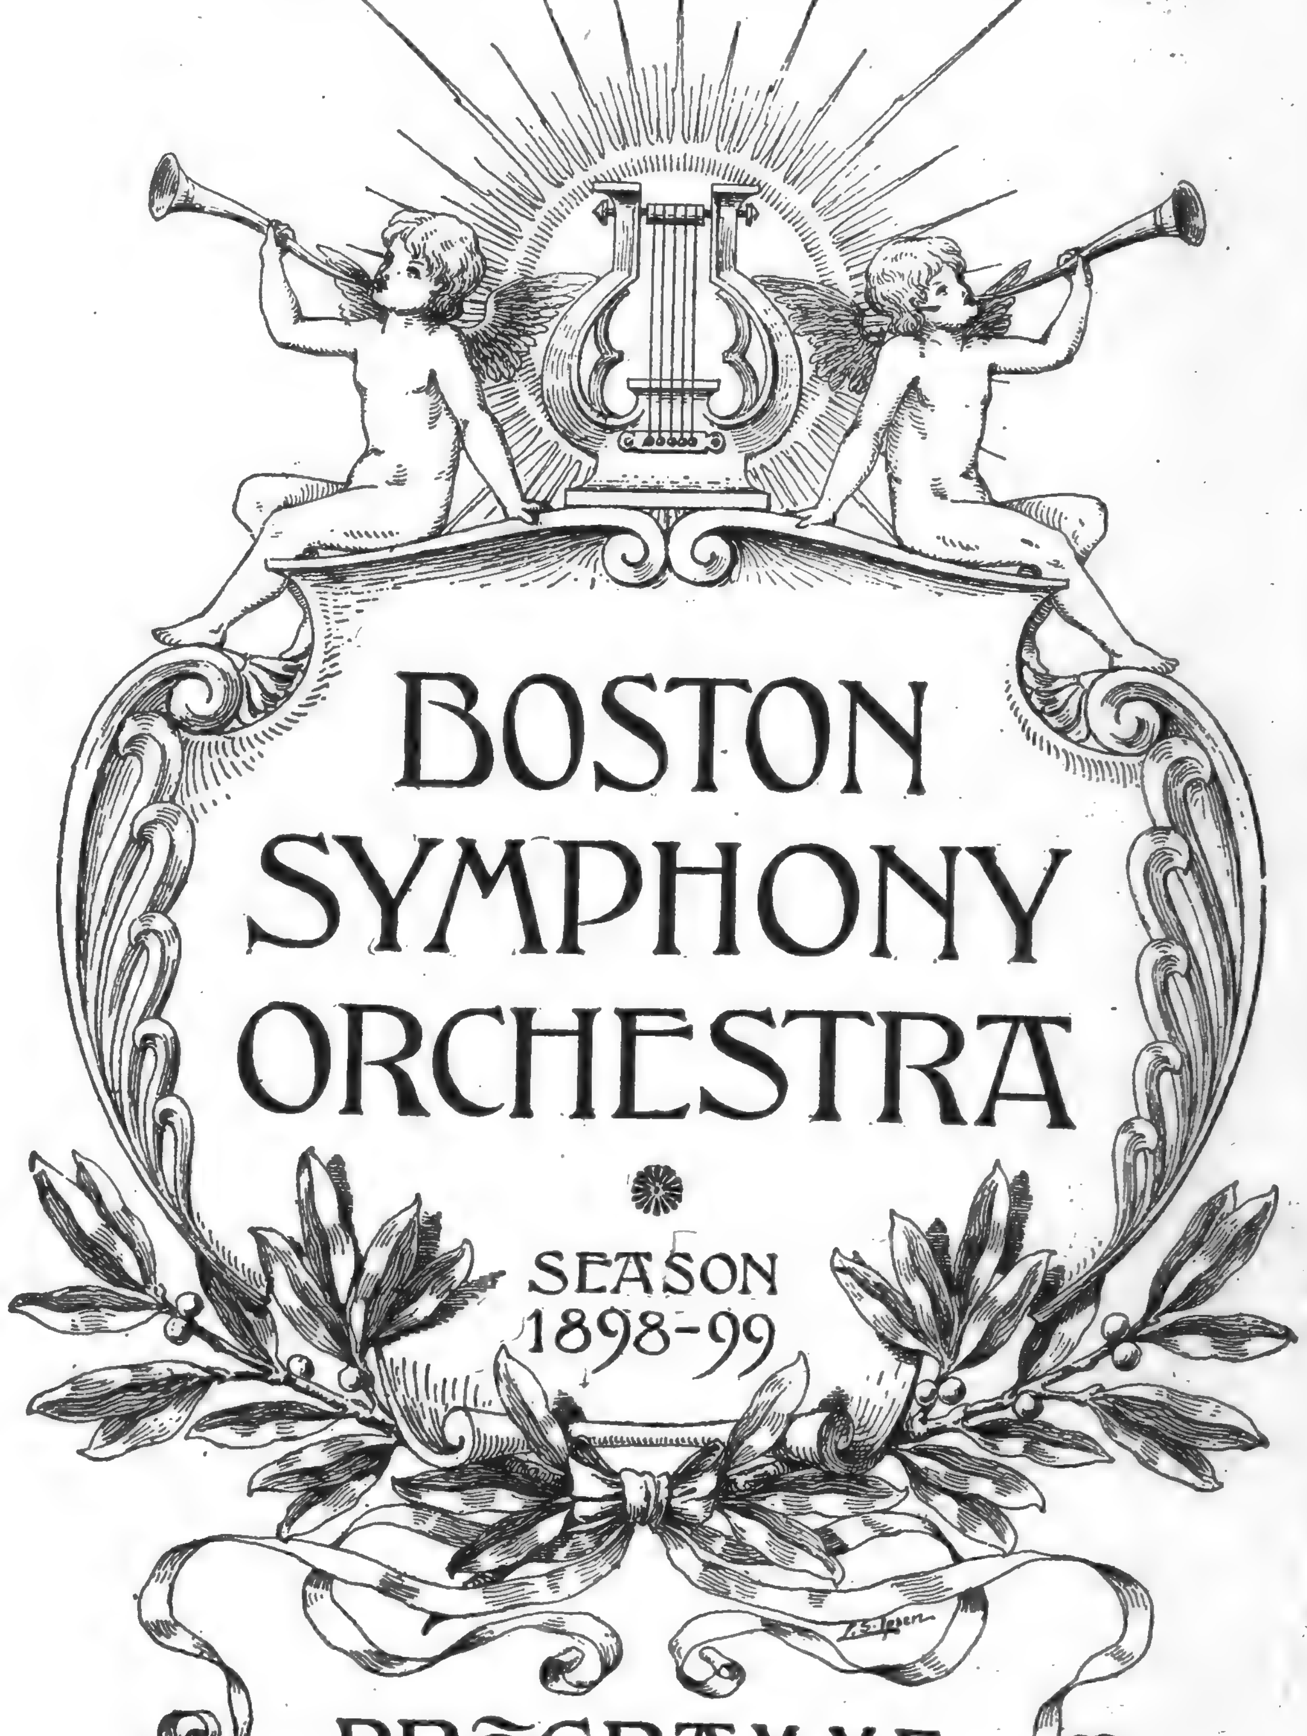
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute

CARNEGIE HALL, - - - - NEW YORK.

Wednesday Afternoon, February 22, at 2 precisely.
Thursday Evening, February 23, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON 1898-99

PROGRAMME

141

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

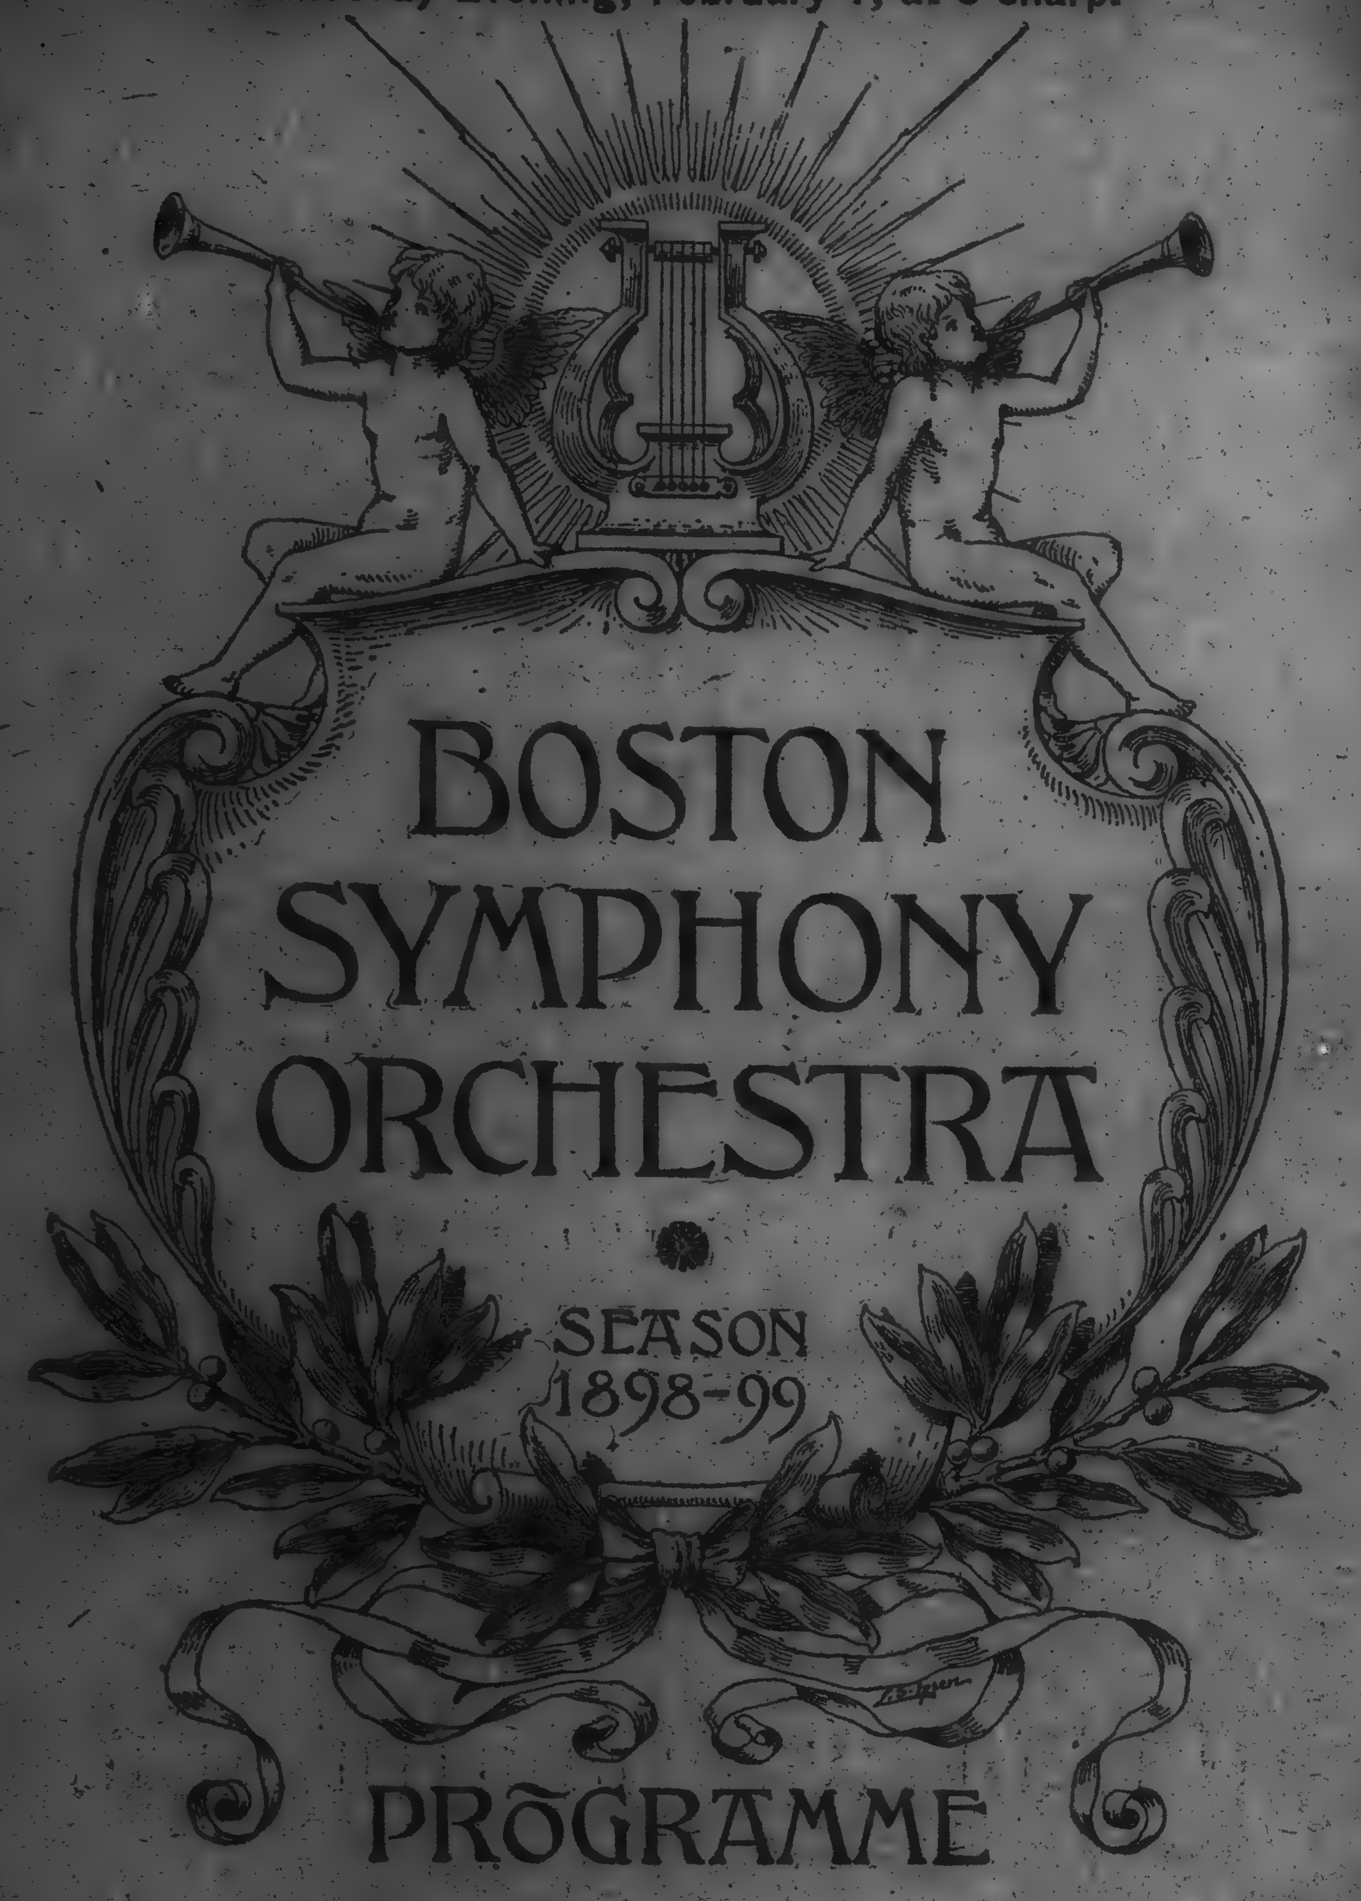
4

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.

Wednesday Evening, February 1, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 26, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS.	AKADEMISCHE FEST-OUVERTURE, op. 80.
HANDEL.	RECITATIVE, "Deeper and deeper still," and ARIA, "Waft her, angels," from "Jephthah."
BERLIOZ.	a. MENUET des Feu-Follets, } from "La Damnation de b. VALSE des Sylphes, } Faust," op. 24.
DVOŘÁK.	SYMPHONIC VARIATIONS on an Original Theme, op. 78.
GOUNOD.	ARIA, "Lend me your aid," from "The Queen of Sheba."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No, 4, in B-flat major, op. 60. I. Adagio.—Allegro vivace. II. Adagio. III. Allegro vivace.—Trio: Un poco meno allegro. IV. Allegro ma non troppo.

Soloist:

Mr. EVAN WILLIAMS.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN,	OVERTURE, "Fingal's Cave." op. 26.
TCHAIKOVSKY.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23. I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso. Allegro con spirito. II. Andantino semplice. — Allegro vivace assai. III. Allegro con fuoco.
BRAHMS.	WALTZES, op 39. (Scored for Orchestra by WILHELM GERICKE).
VOLKMANN,	SYMPHONY No. 1, in D minor, op. 44. I. Allegro patetico. II. Andante. III. Scherzo; Allegro non troppo. Trio: Meno mosso, quasi Andantino. IV. Finale; Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 9, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN, OVERTURE, "Fingal's Cave." op. 26.
TCHAIKOVSKY. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23.
I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso. Allegro con spirito.
II. Andantino semplice. — Allegro vivace assai.
III. Allegro con fuoco.
BRAHMS. WALTZES, op 39. (Scored for Orchestra by WILHELM GERICKE).
VOLKMANN, SYMPHONY No. 1, in D minor, op. 44.
I. Allegro patetico.
II. Andante.
III. Scherzo; Allegro non troppo. Trio: Meno mosso, quasi Andantino.
IV. Finale; Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, February 1, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

5

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

V. CONCERT.

THURSDAY. JANUARY 26, AT 7.45. P. M.

Programme.

BRAHMS.	AKADEMISCHE FEST-OUVERTURE, op. 80.
HANDEL.	RECITATIVE, "Deeper and deeper still," and ARIA, "Waft her, angels," from "Jephthah."
BERLIOZ.	a. MENUET des Feu-Follets, b. VALSE des Sylphes, from "La Damnation de Faust," op. 24.
DVOŘÁK.	SYMPHONIC VARIATIONS on an Original Theme, op. 78.
GOUNOD.	ARIA, "Lend me your aid," from "The Queen of Sheba."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No, 4, in B-flat major, op. 60. I. Adagio.—Allegro vivace. II. Adagio. III. Allegro vivace.—Trio: Un poco meno allegro. IV. Allegro ma non troppo.

Soloist:

Mr. EVAN WILLIAMS.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY. FEBRUARY 9, AT 7.45. P. M.

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN.	OVERTURE, "Fingal's Cave." op. 26
TCHAIKOVSKY.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in B-flat minor, op. 23. I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso Allegro con spirito. II. Andantino semplice. — Allegro vivace assai. III. Allegro con fuoco.
BRAHMS.	WALTZES, op 39. (Scored for Orchestra by WILHELM GERICKE).
VOLKMANN,	SYMPHONY No. 1, in D minor, op. 11. I. Allegro patetico. II. Andante. III. Scherzo; Allegro non troppo. Trio: Meno mosso, quasi Andantino. IV. Finale; Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

VI. CONCERT.

THURSDAY. FEBRUARY 9. AT 7.45. P. M

Programme.

MENDELSSOHN. OVERTURE, "Fingal's Cave." op. 26
TCHAIKOVSKY. CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 1, in B-flat minor op. 23.
I. Andante non troppo e molto maestoso.
Allegro con spirito.
II. Andantino semplice. — Allegro vivace assai.
III. Allegro con fuoco.
BRAHMS. WALTZES, op 39.
(Scored for Orchestra by WILHELM GERICKE).
VOLKMANN. SYMPHONY No. 1, in D minor, op. 11.
I. Allegro patetico.
II. Andante.
III. Scherzo; Allegro non troppo.
Trio: Meno mosso, quasi Andantino.
IV. Finale; Allegro molto.

Soloist:

Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, - - - - - BALTIMO
Tuesday Evening, January 17, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

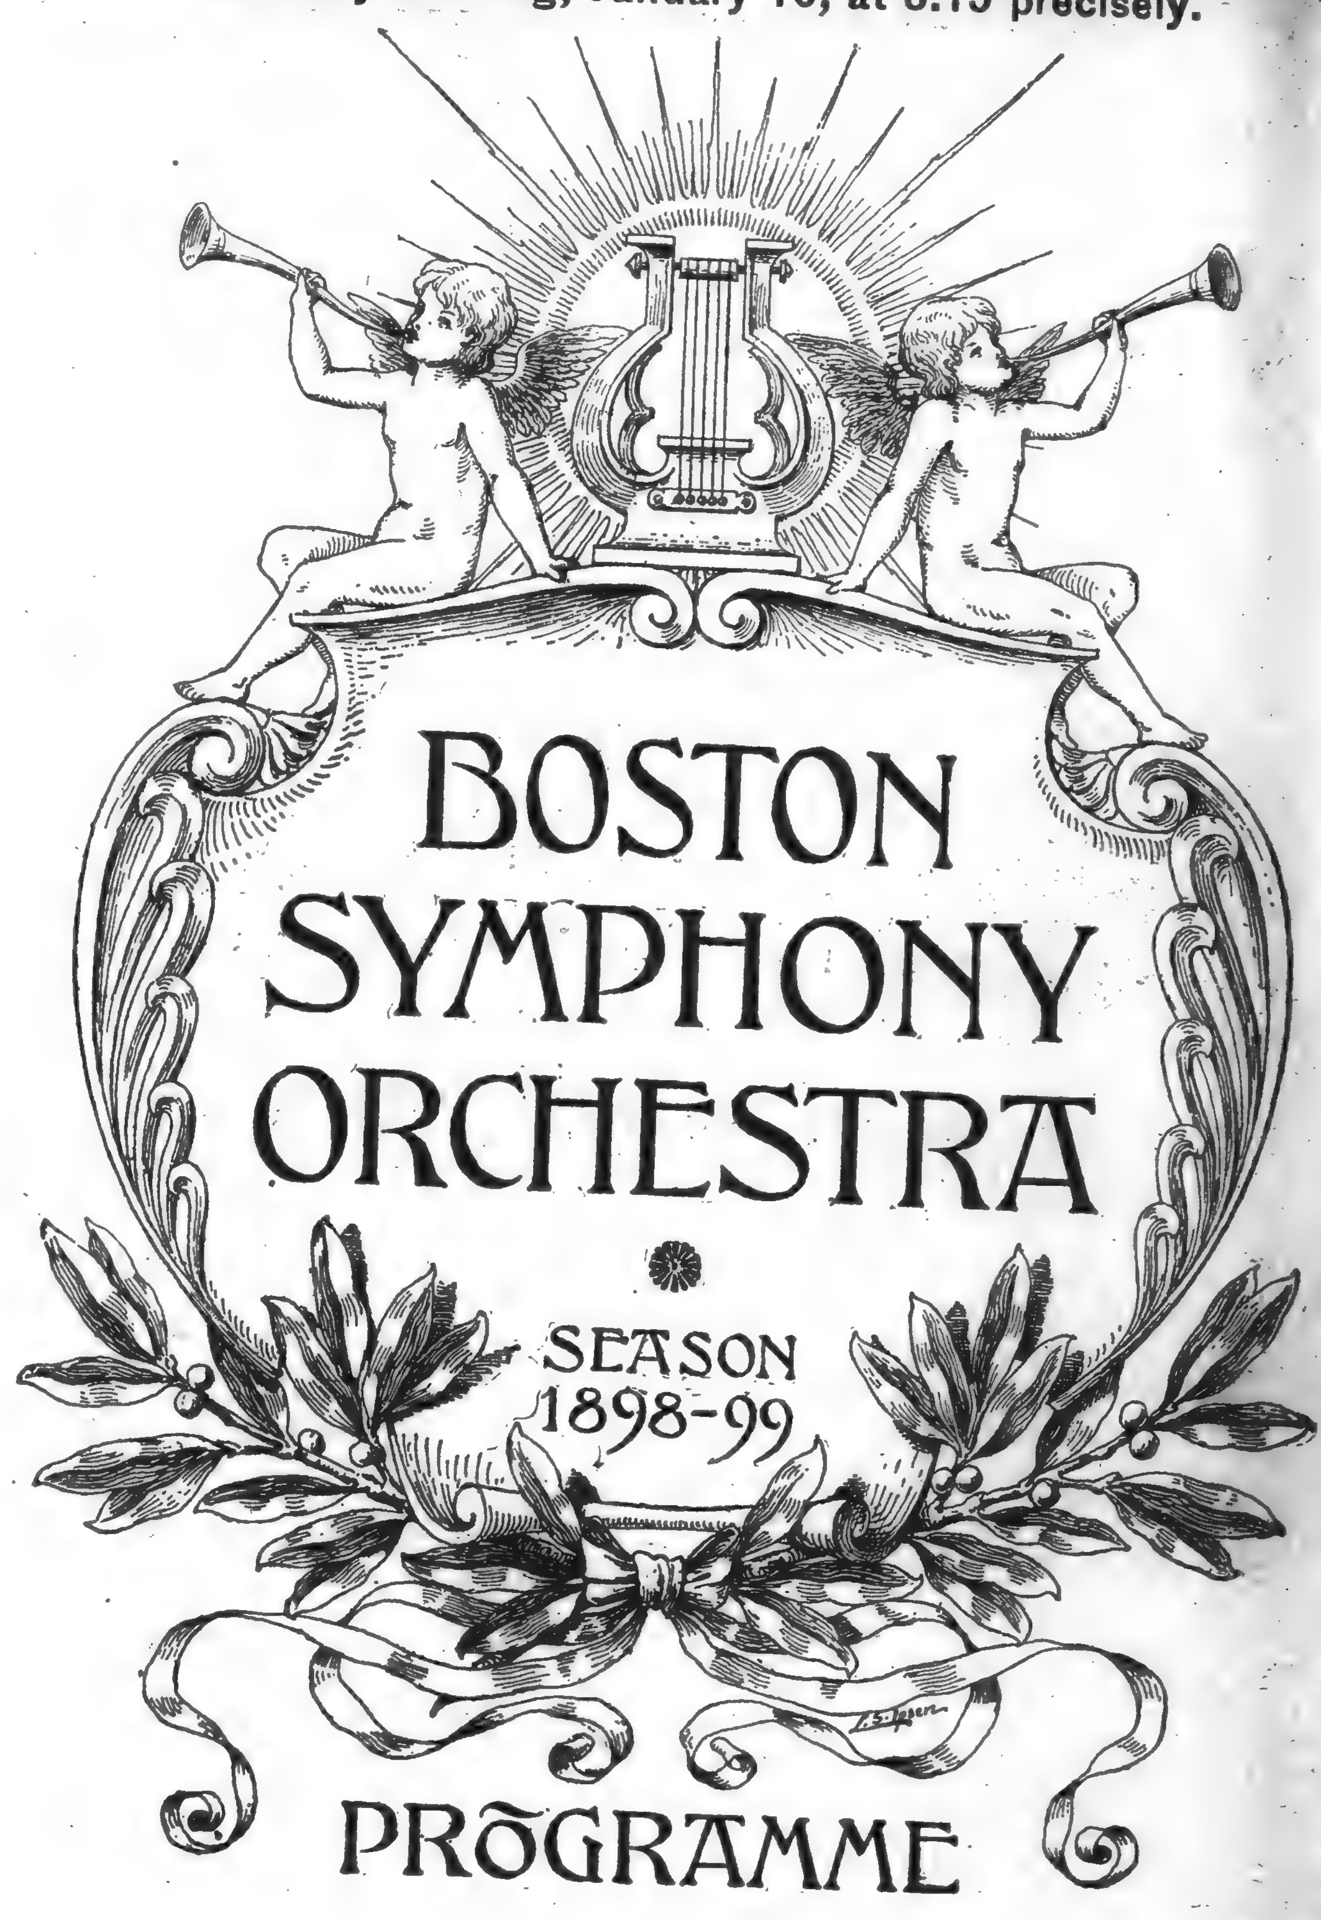
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, January 16, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC. . . . BROOKLYN.
Friday Afternoon, January 20, at 3.30 precisely.
Saturday Evening, January 21, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute and at Chandler's Music Store, 300 Fulton Street.

CARNEGIE HALL, - - - - NEW YORK.
Wednesday Afternoon, January 18, at 2 precisely.
Thursday Evening, January 19, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

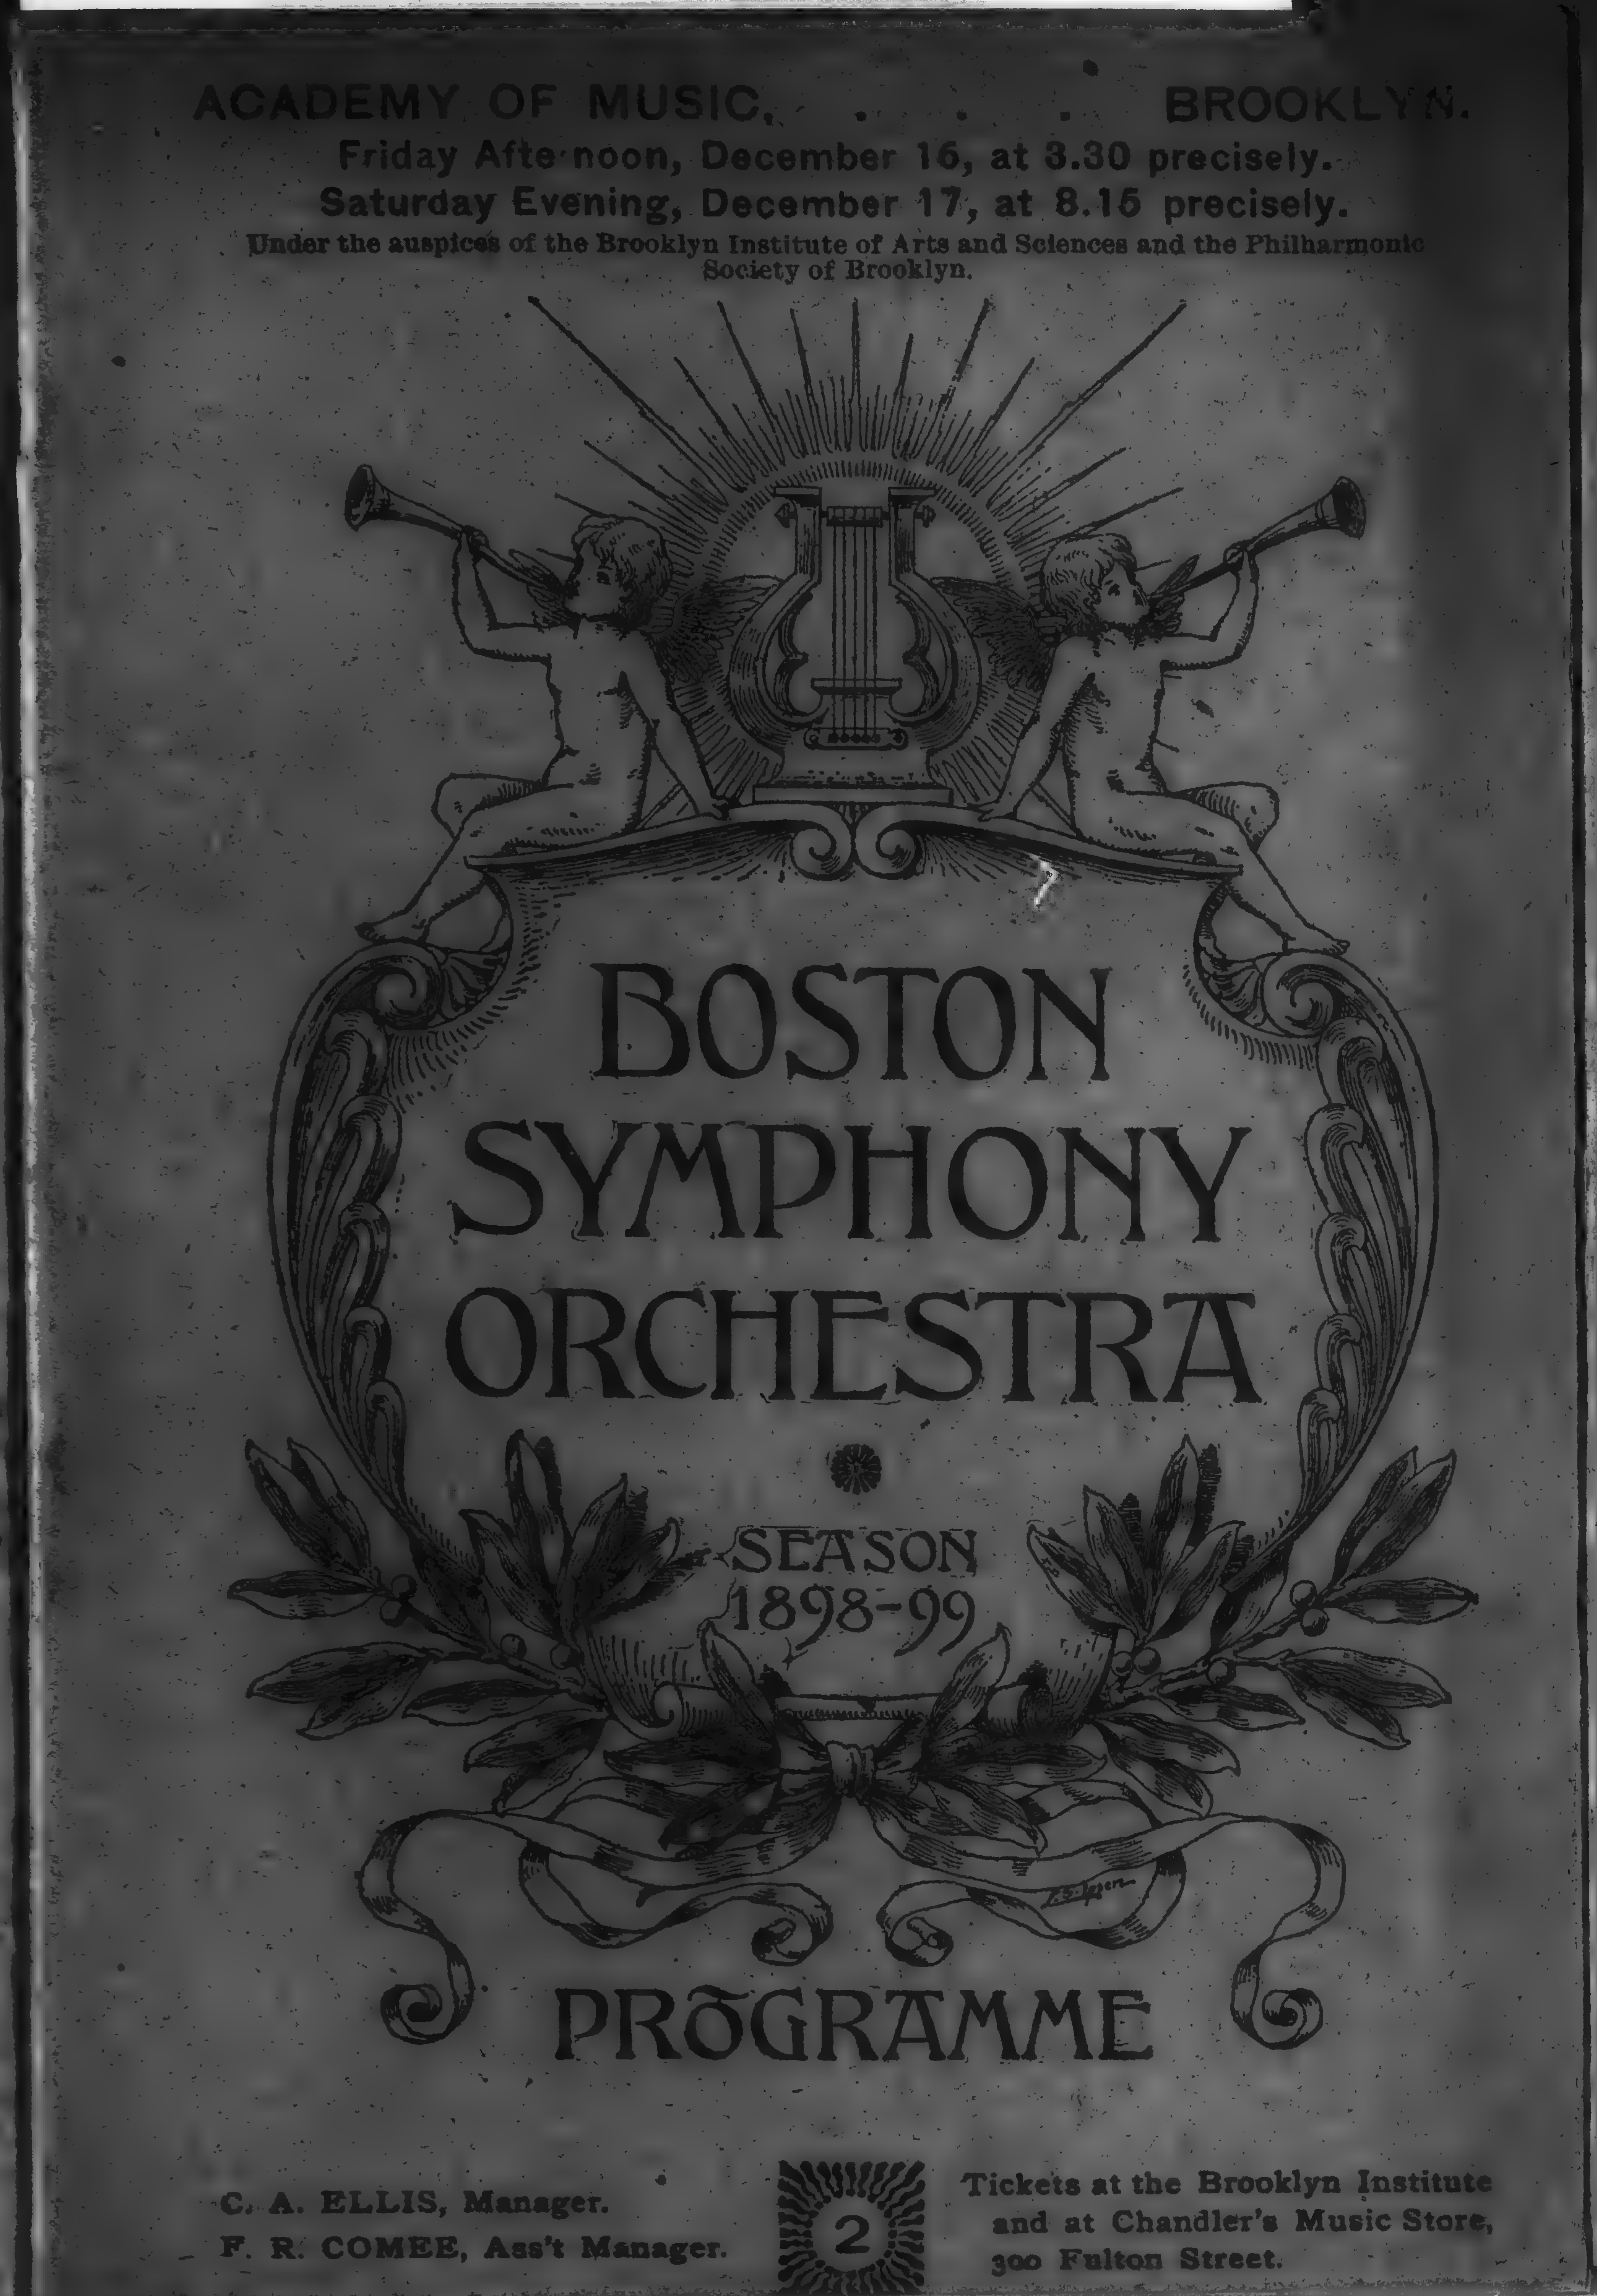
3

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

[143]

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES



ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... BROOKLYN.
Friday Afternoon, December 16, at 3.30 precisely.
Saturday Evening, December 17, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

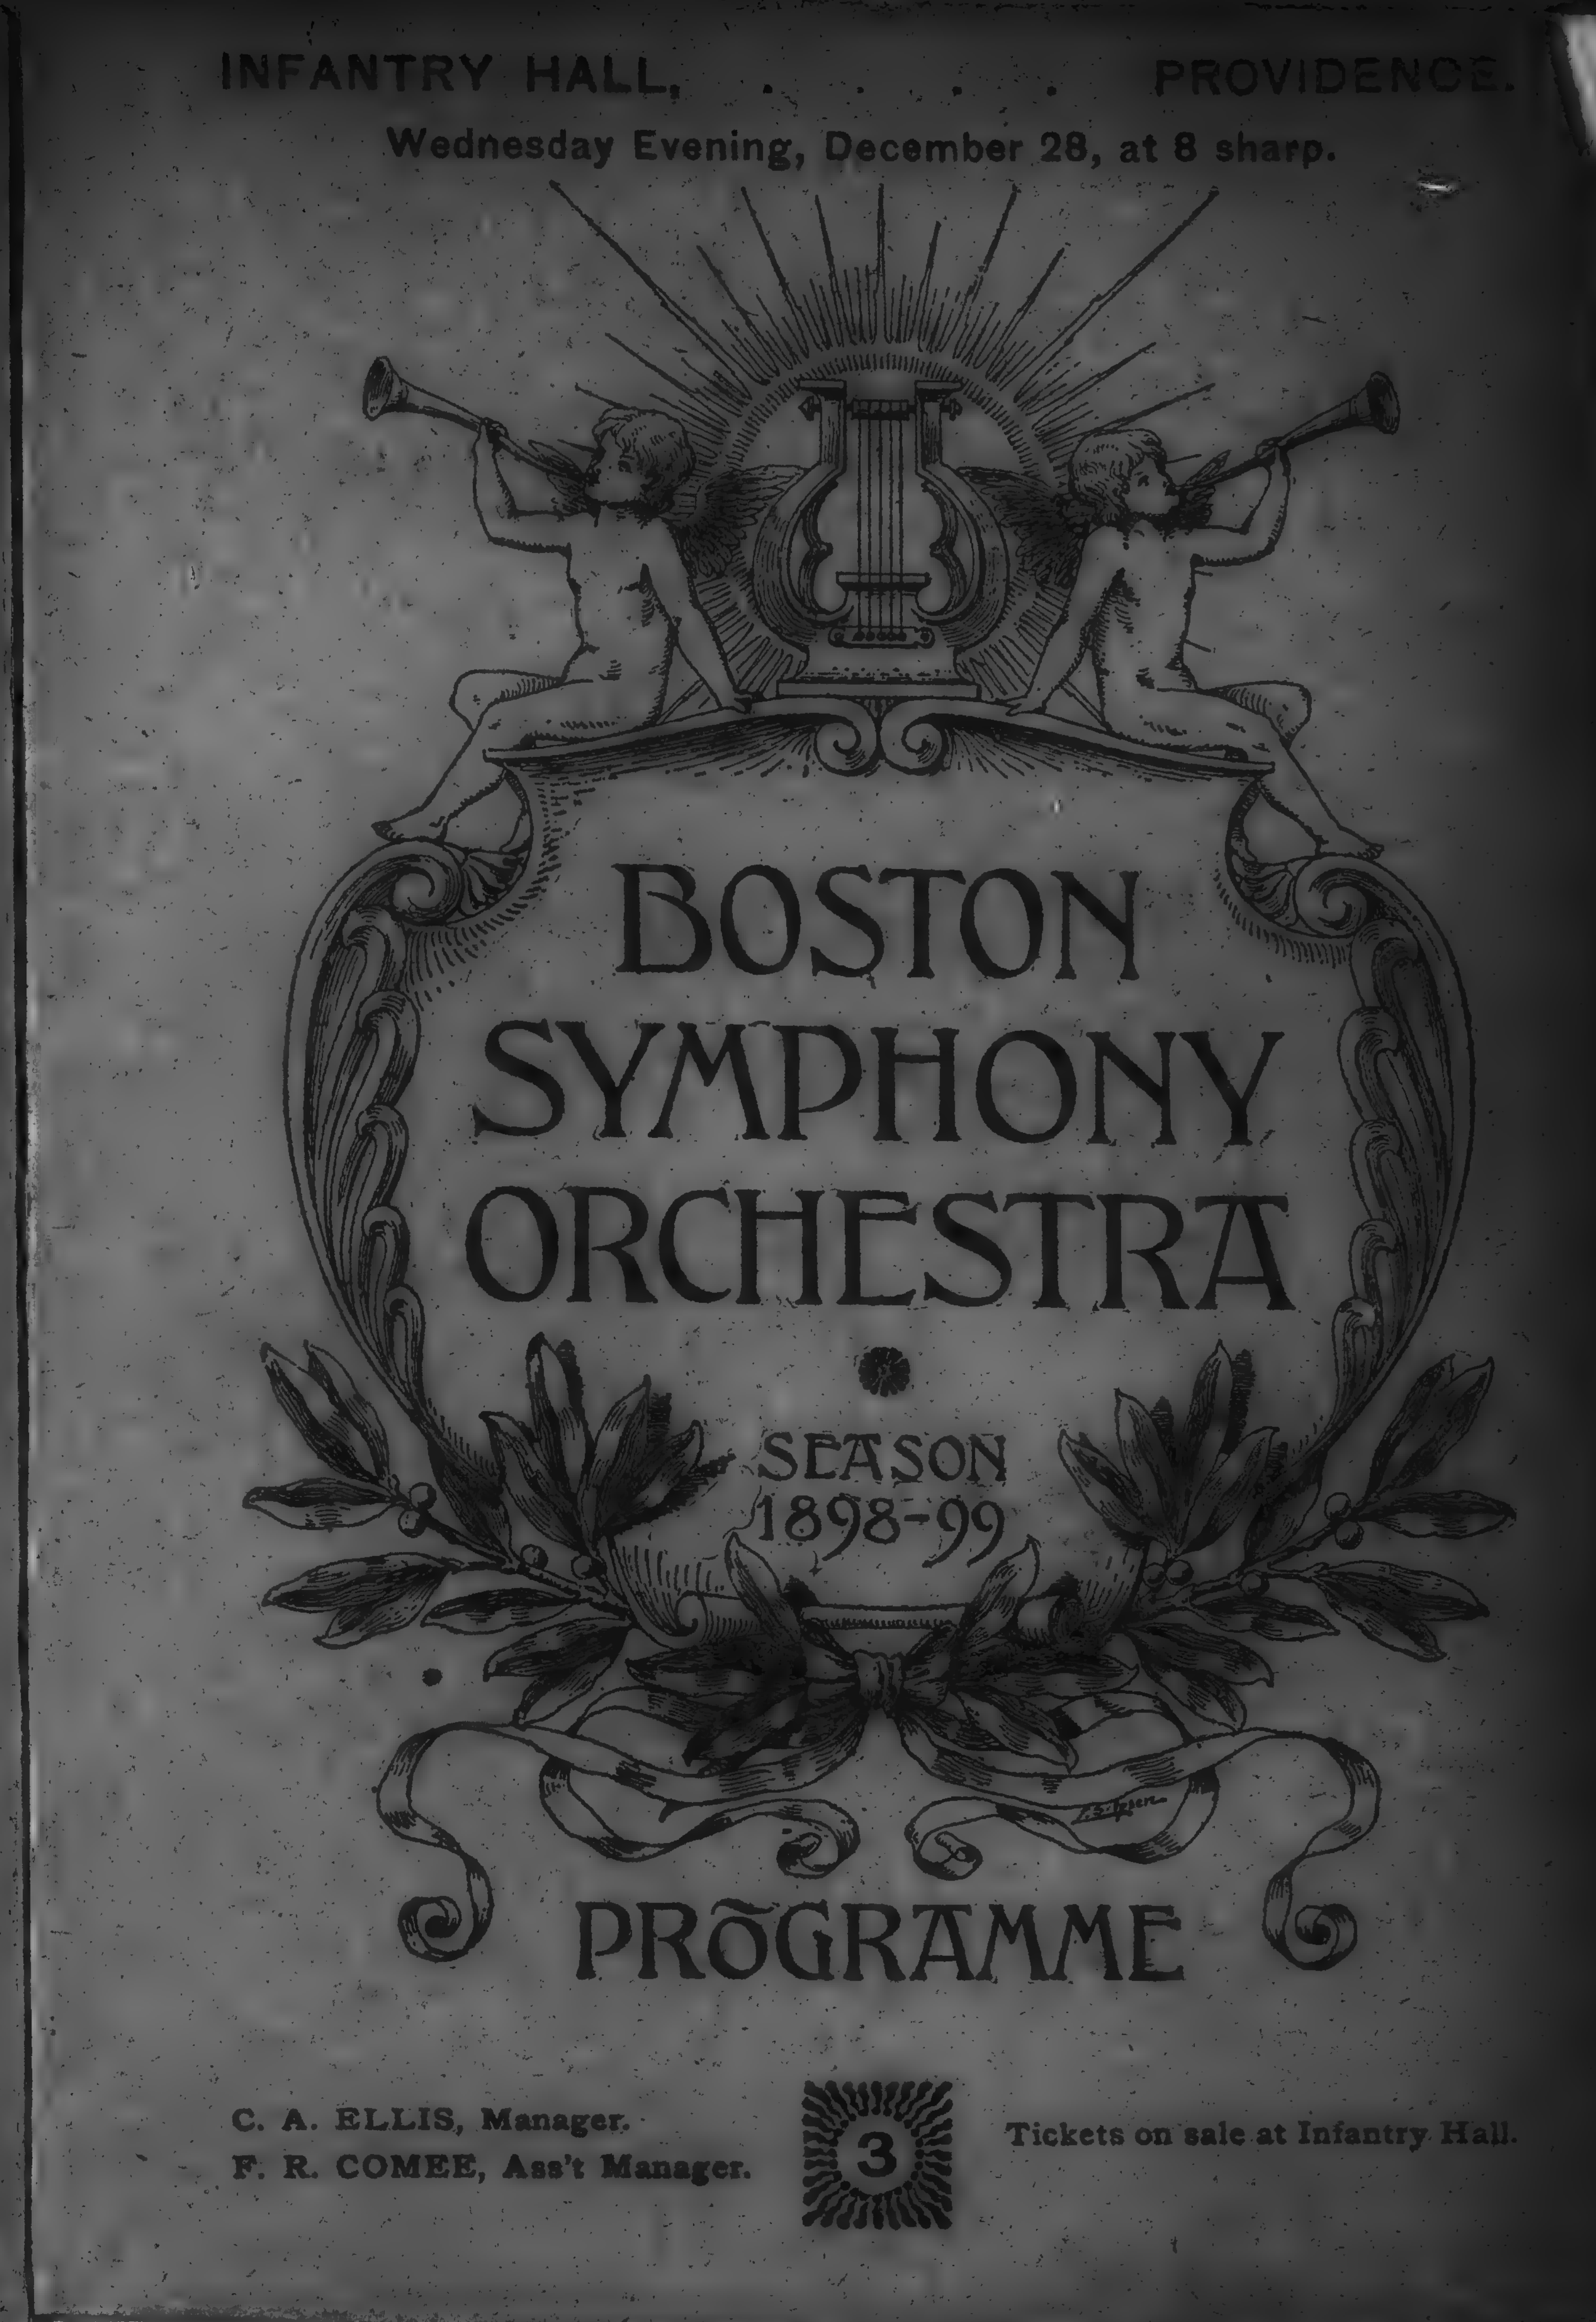
SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.



INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, December 28, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, AT 7.45, P. M.

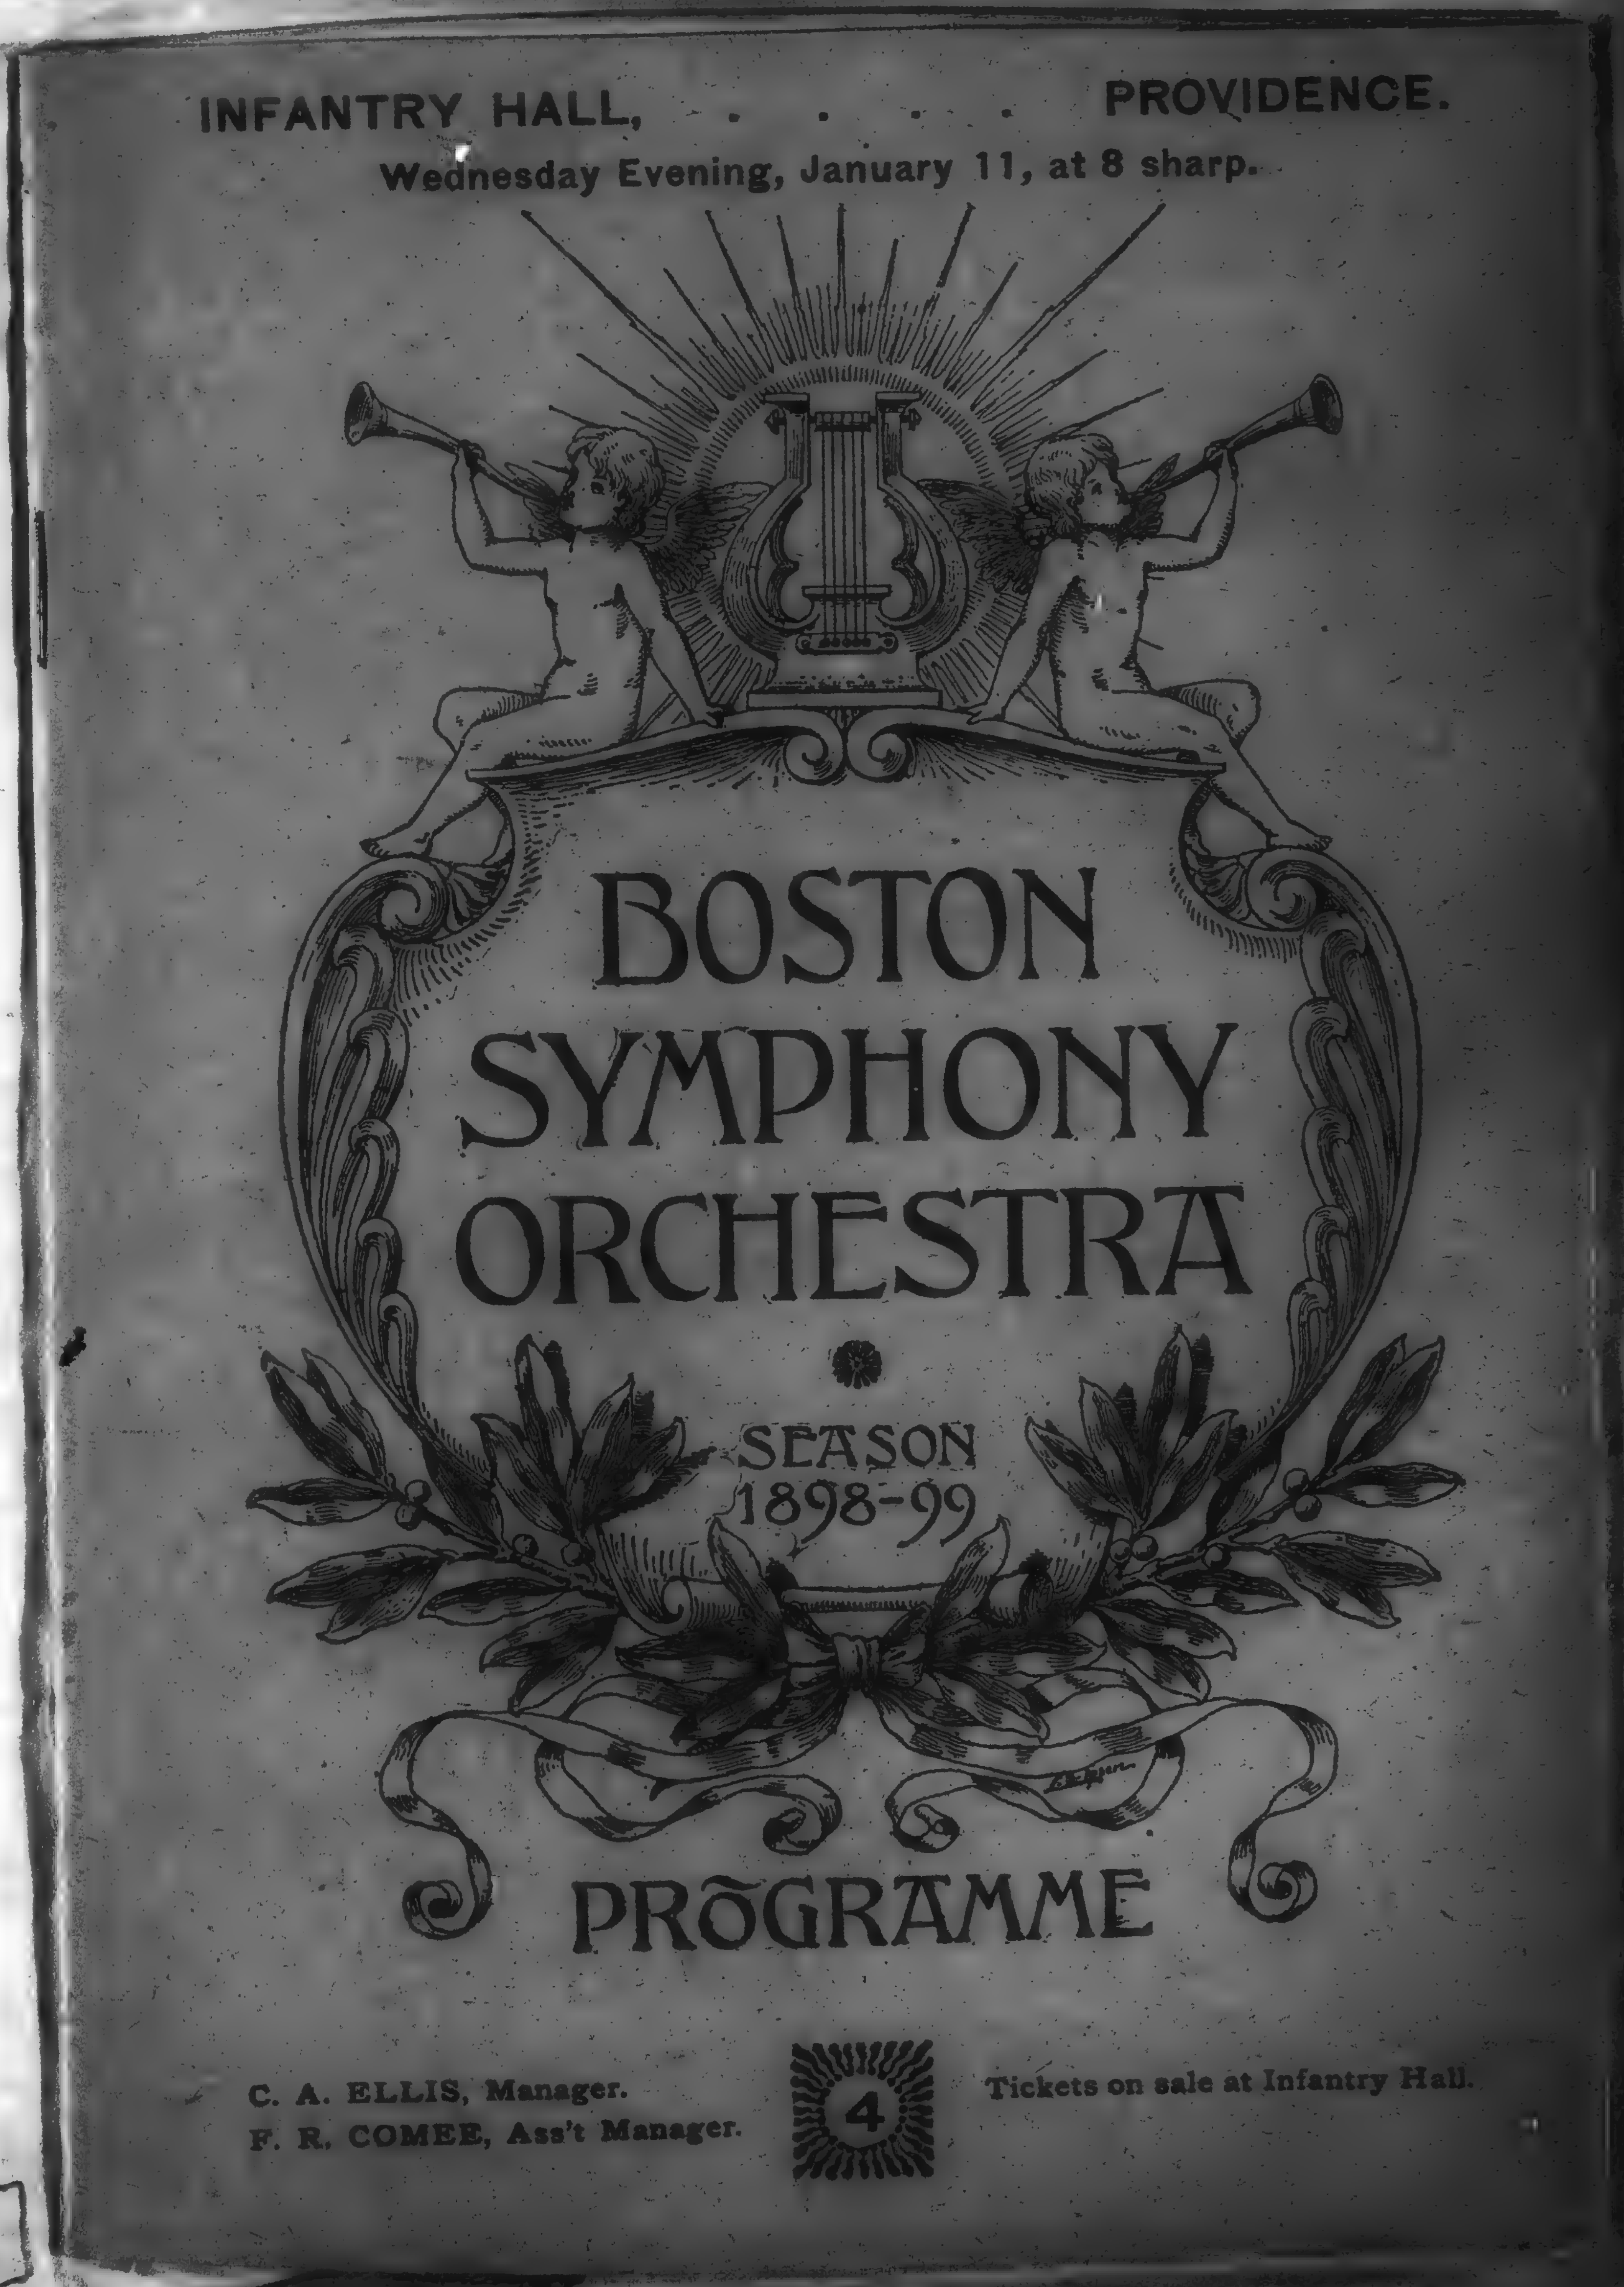
Programme.

PETER CORNELIUS.	OVERTURE to "The Barber of Bagdad."
HENRI VIEUXTEMPS.	CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, No. 5, in A minor, op. 37. Allegro non troppo. Adagio. Allegro con fuoco.
JOHANNES BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major, op. 90. I. Allegro con brio. II. Andante. III. Poco Allegretto. IV. Allegro.
RICHARD WAGNER.	VORSPIEL to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

Soloist:

Miss OLIVE MEAD.

Fifth Concert, Thursday Evening, January 26, 1899.



INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, January 11, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

[144]

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... BROOKLYN.
Friday Afternoon, December 16, at 3.30 precisely.
Saturday Evening, December 17, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

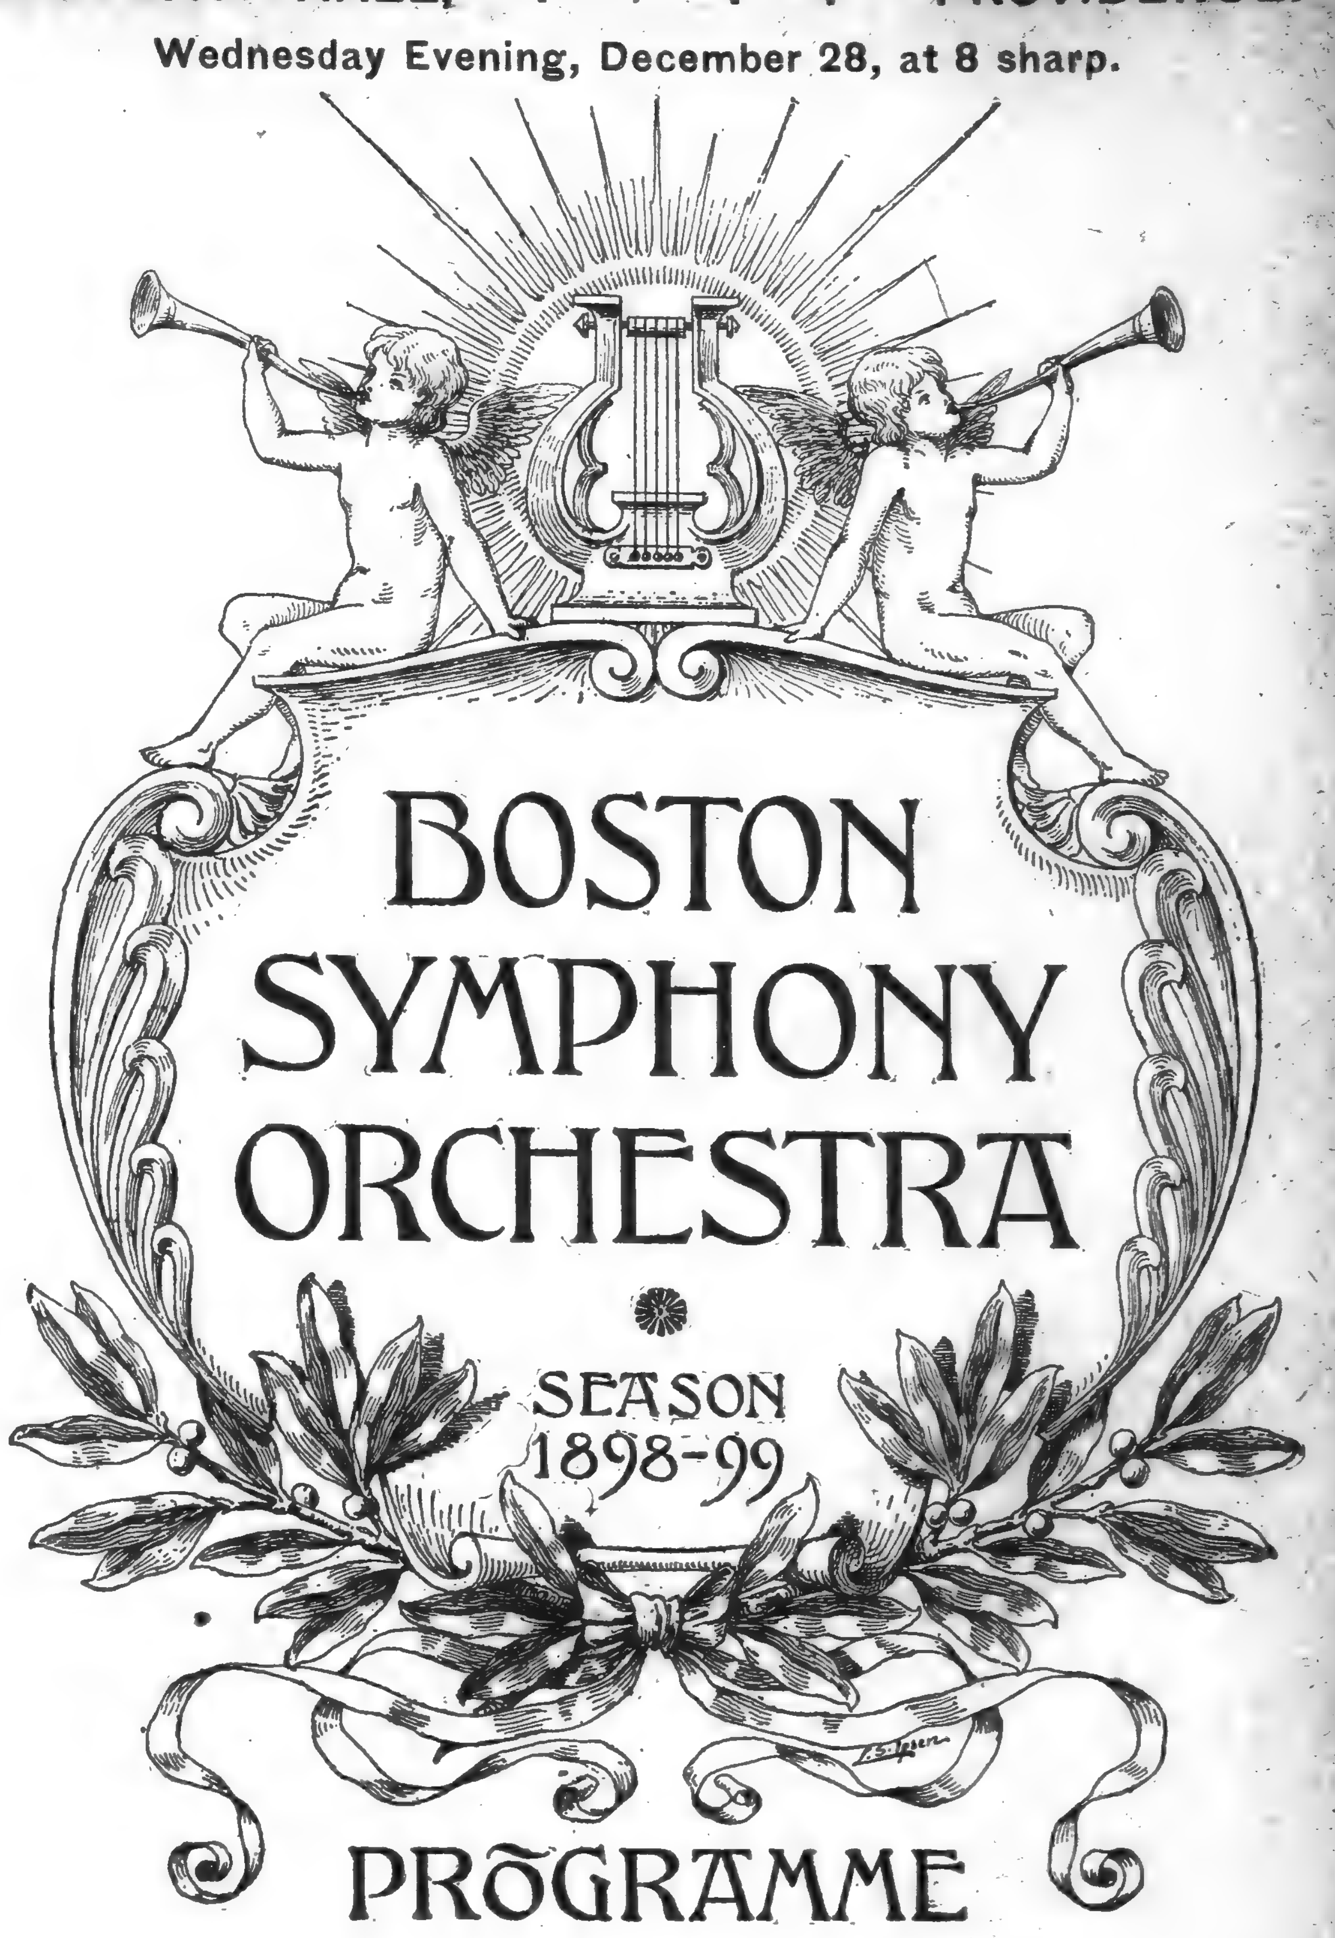
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, December 28, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

3

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

IV. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 5, AT 7.45, P. M.

Programme.

PETER CORNELIUS. OVERTURE to "The Barber of Bagdad."

HENRI VIEUXTEMPS. CONCERTO FOR VIOLIN, No. 5, in A minor, op. 37.
Allegro non troppo.
Adagio.
Allegro con fuoco.

JOHANNES BRAHMS. SYMPHONY No. 3, in F major, op. 90.
I. Allegro con brio.
II. Andante.
III. Poco Allegretto.
IV. Allegro.

RICHARD WAGNER. VORSPIEL to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."

Soloist:

Miss OLIVE MEAD.

Fifth Concert, Thursday Evening, January 26, 1899.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, January 11, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

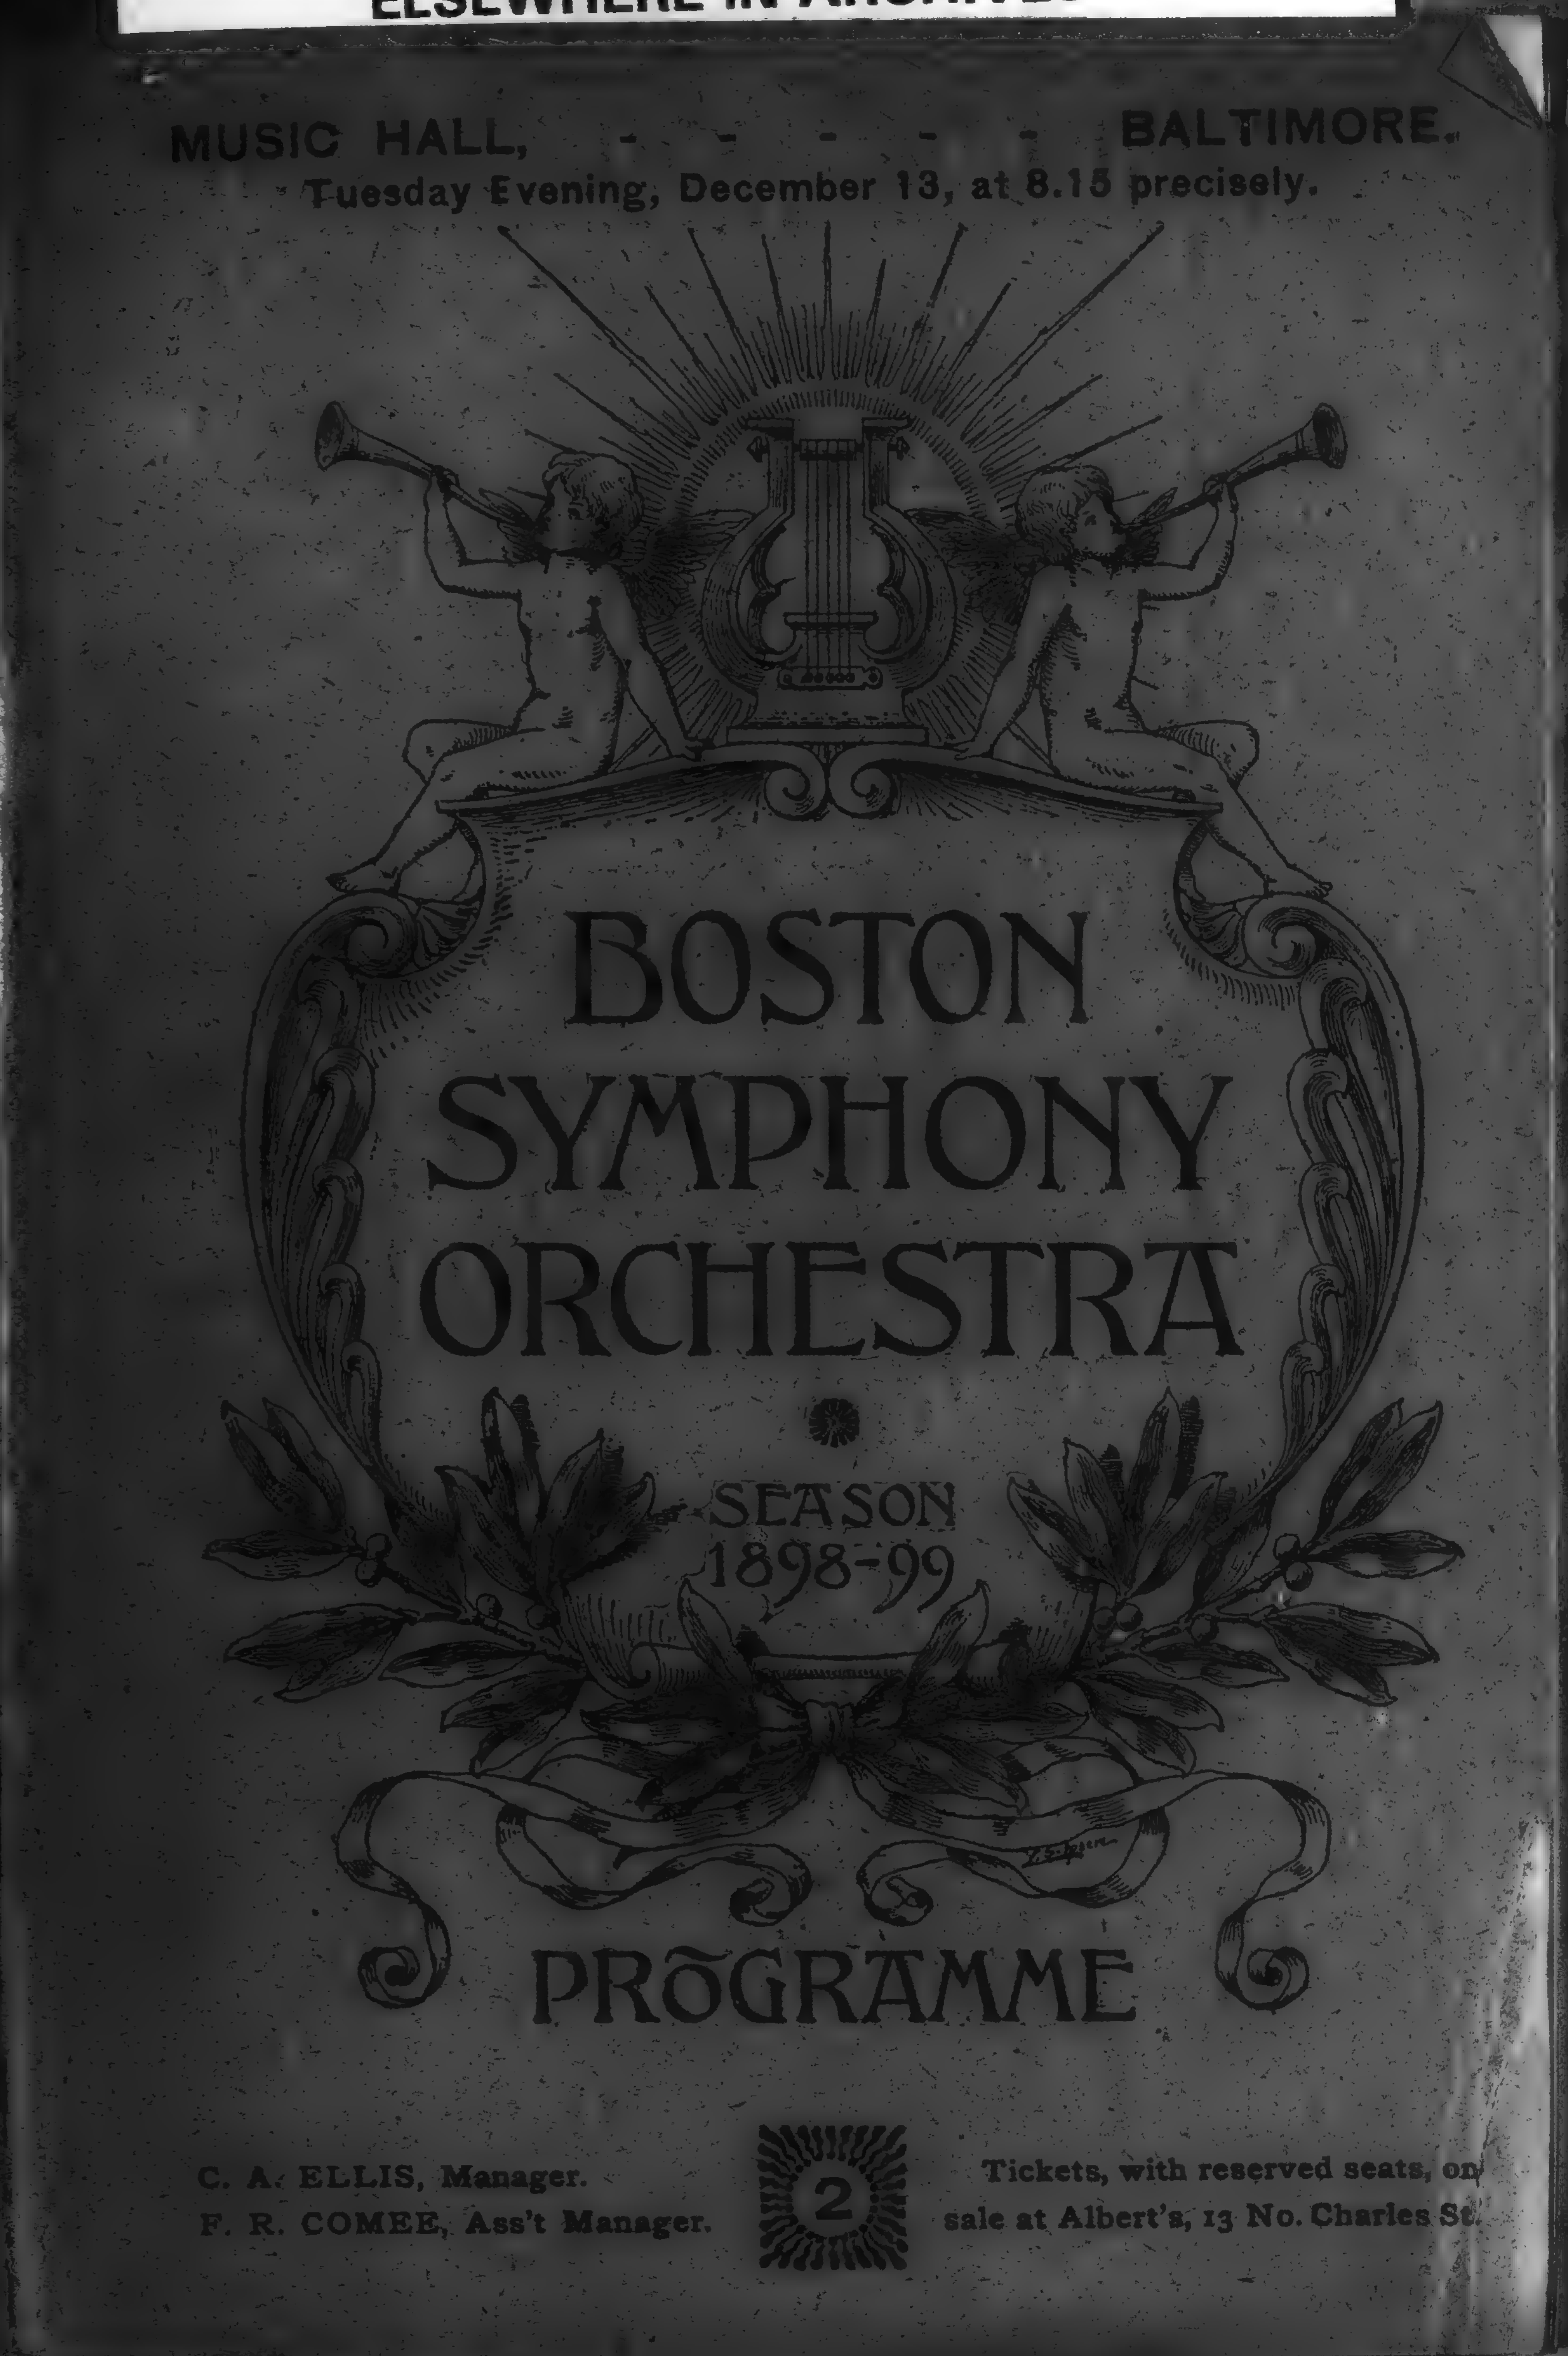
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

4

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES



MUSIC HALL, - - - - - BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, December 13, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

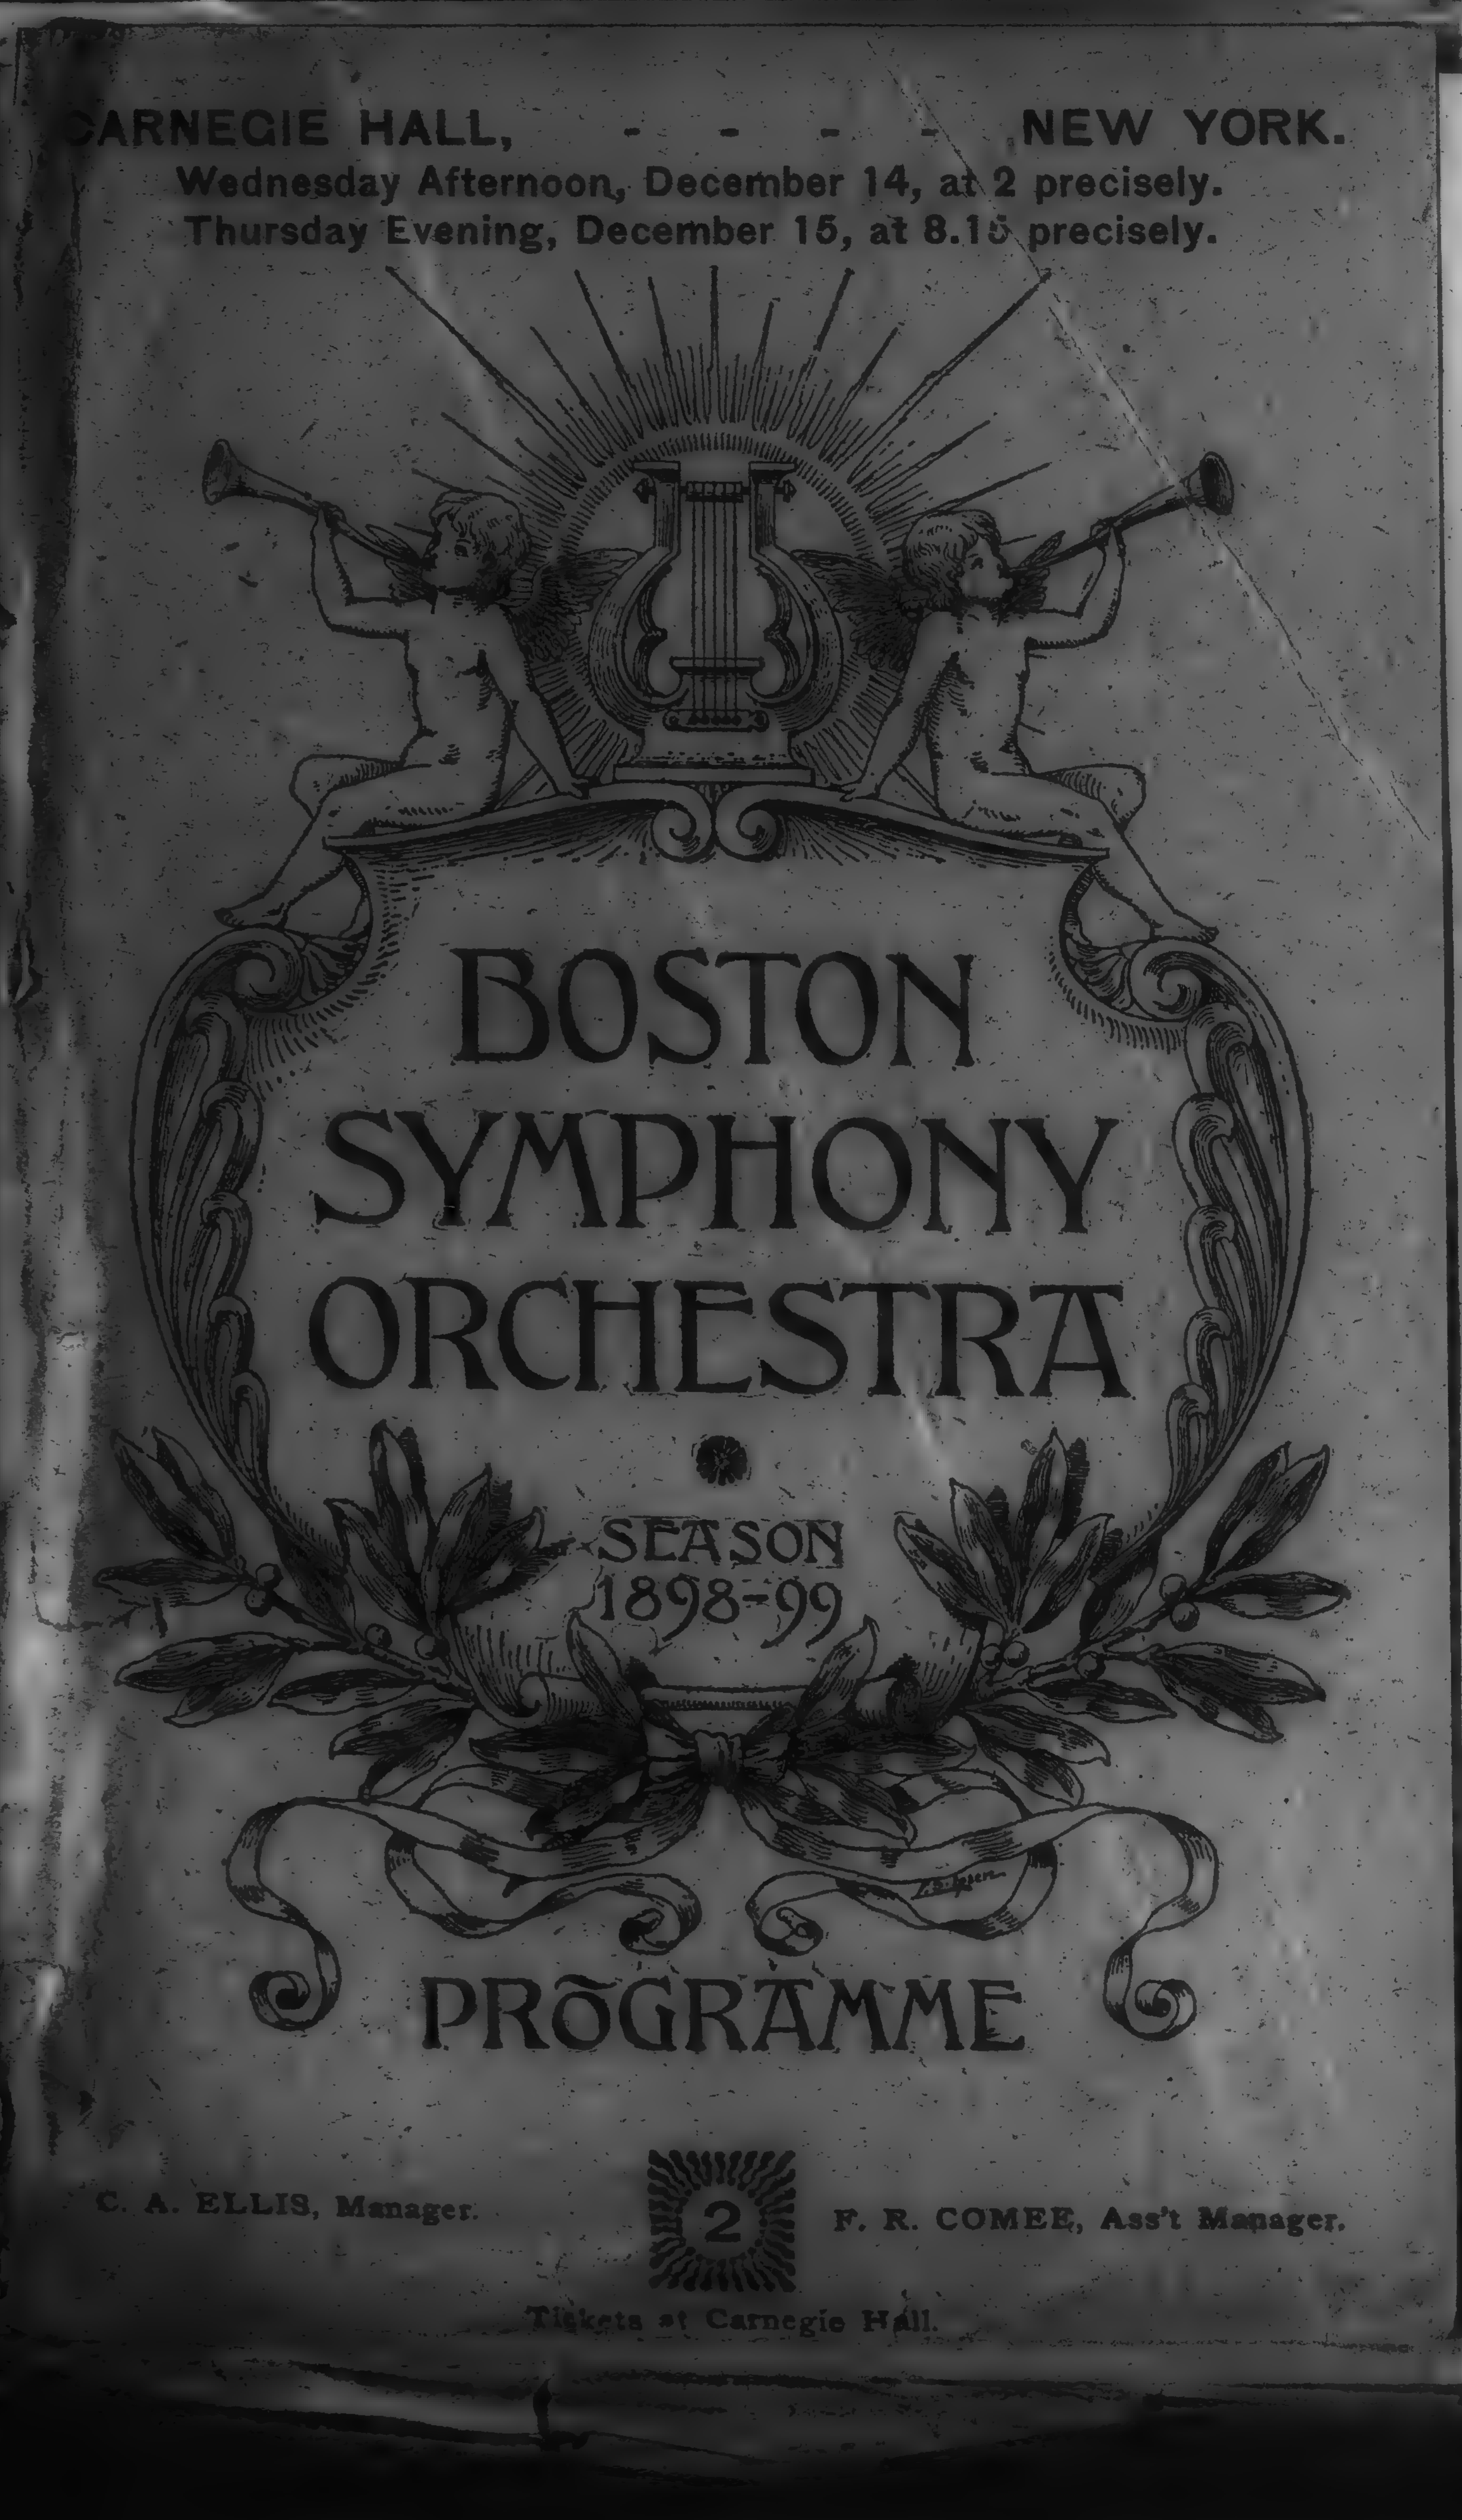
SCHUBERT.	SYMPHONY No. 9, in C major. I. Andante. — Allegro, ma non troppo. II. Andante con moto. III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. — Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.
MASSENET.	AIR, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade."
SAINT-SAËNS.	SYMPHONIC POEM No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31.
	SONGS with PIANOFORTE.
a) ROBERT FRANZ.	"MARIE."
b) PETER CORNELIUS.	"EIN TON."
c) GABRIEL FAURÉ.	"RENCONTRE."
d) HATTON.	"TO ANTHEA."
LISZT.	SYMPHONIC POEM. "Les Preludes."

Soloist:

Mr. THEODORE BYARD.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

Mr. Gericke is convalescent, but to insure his absolute and early recovery the performance will be under the direction of Mr. Franz Kneisel.



ARNEGIE HALL, - - - - NEW YORK.
Wednesday Afternoon, December 14, at 2 precisely.
Thursday Evening, December 15, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

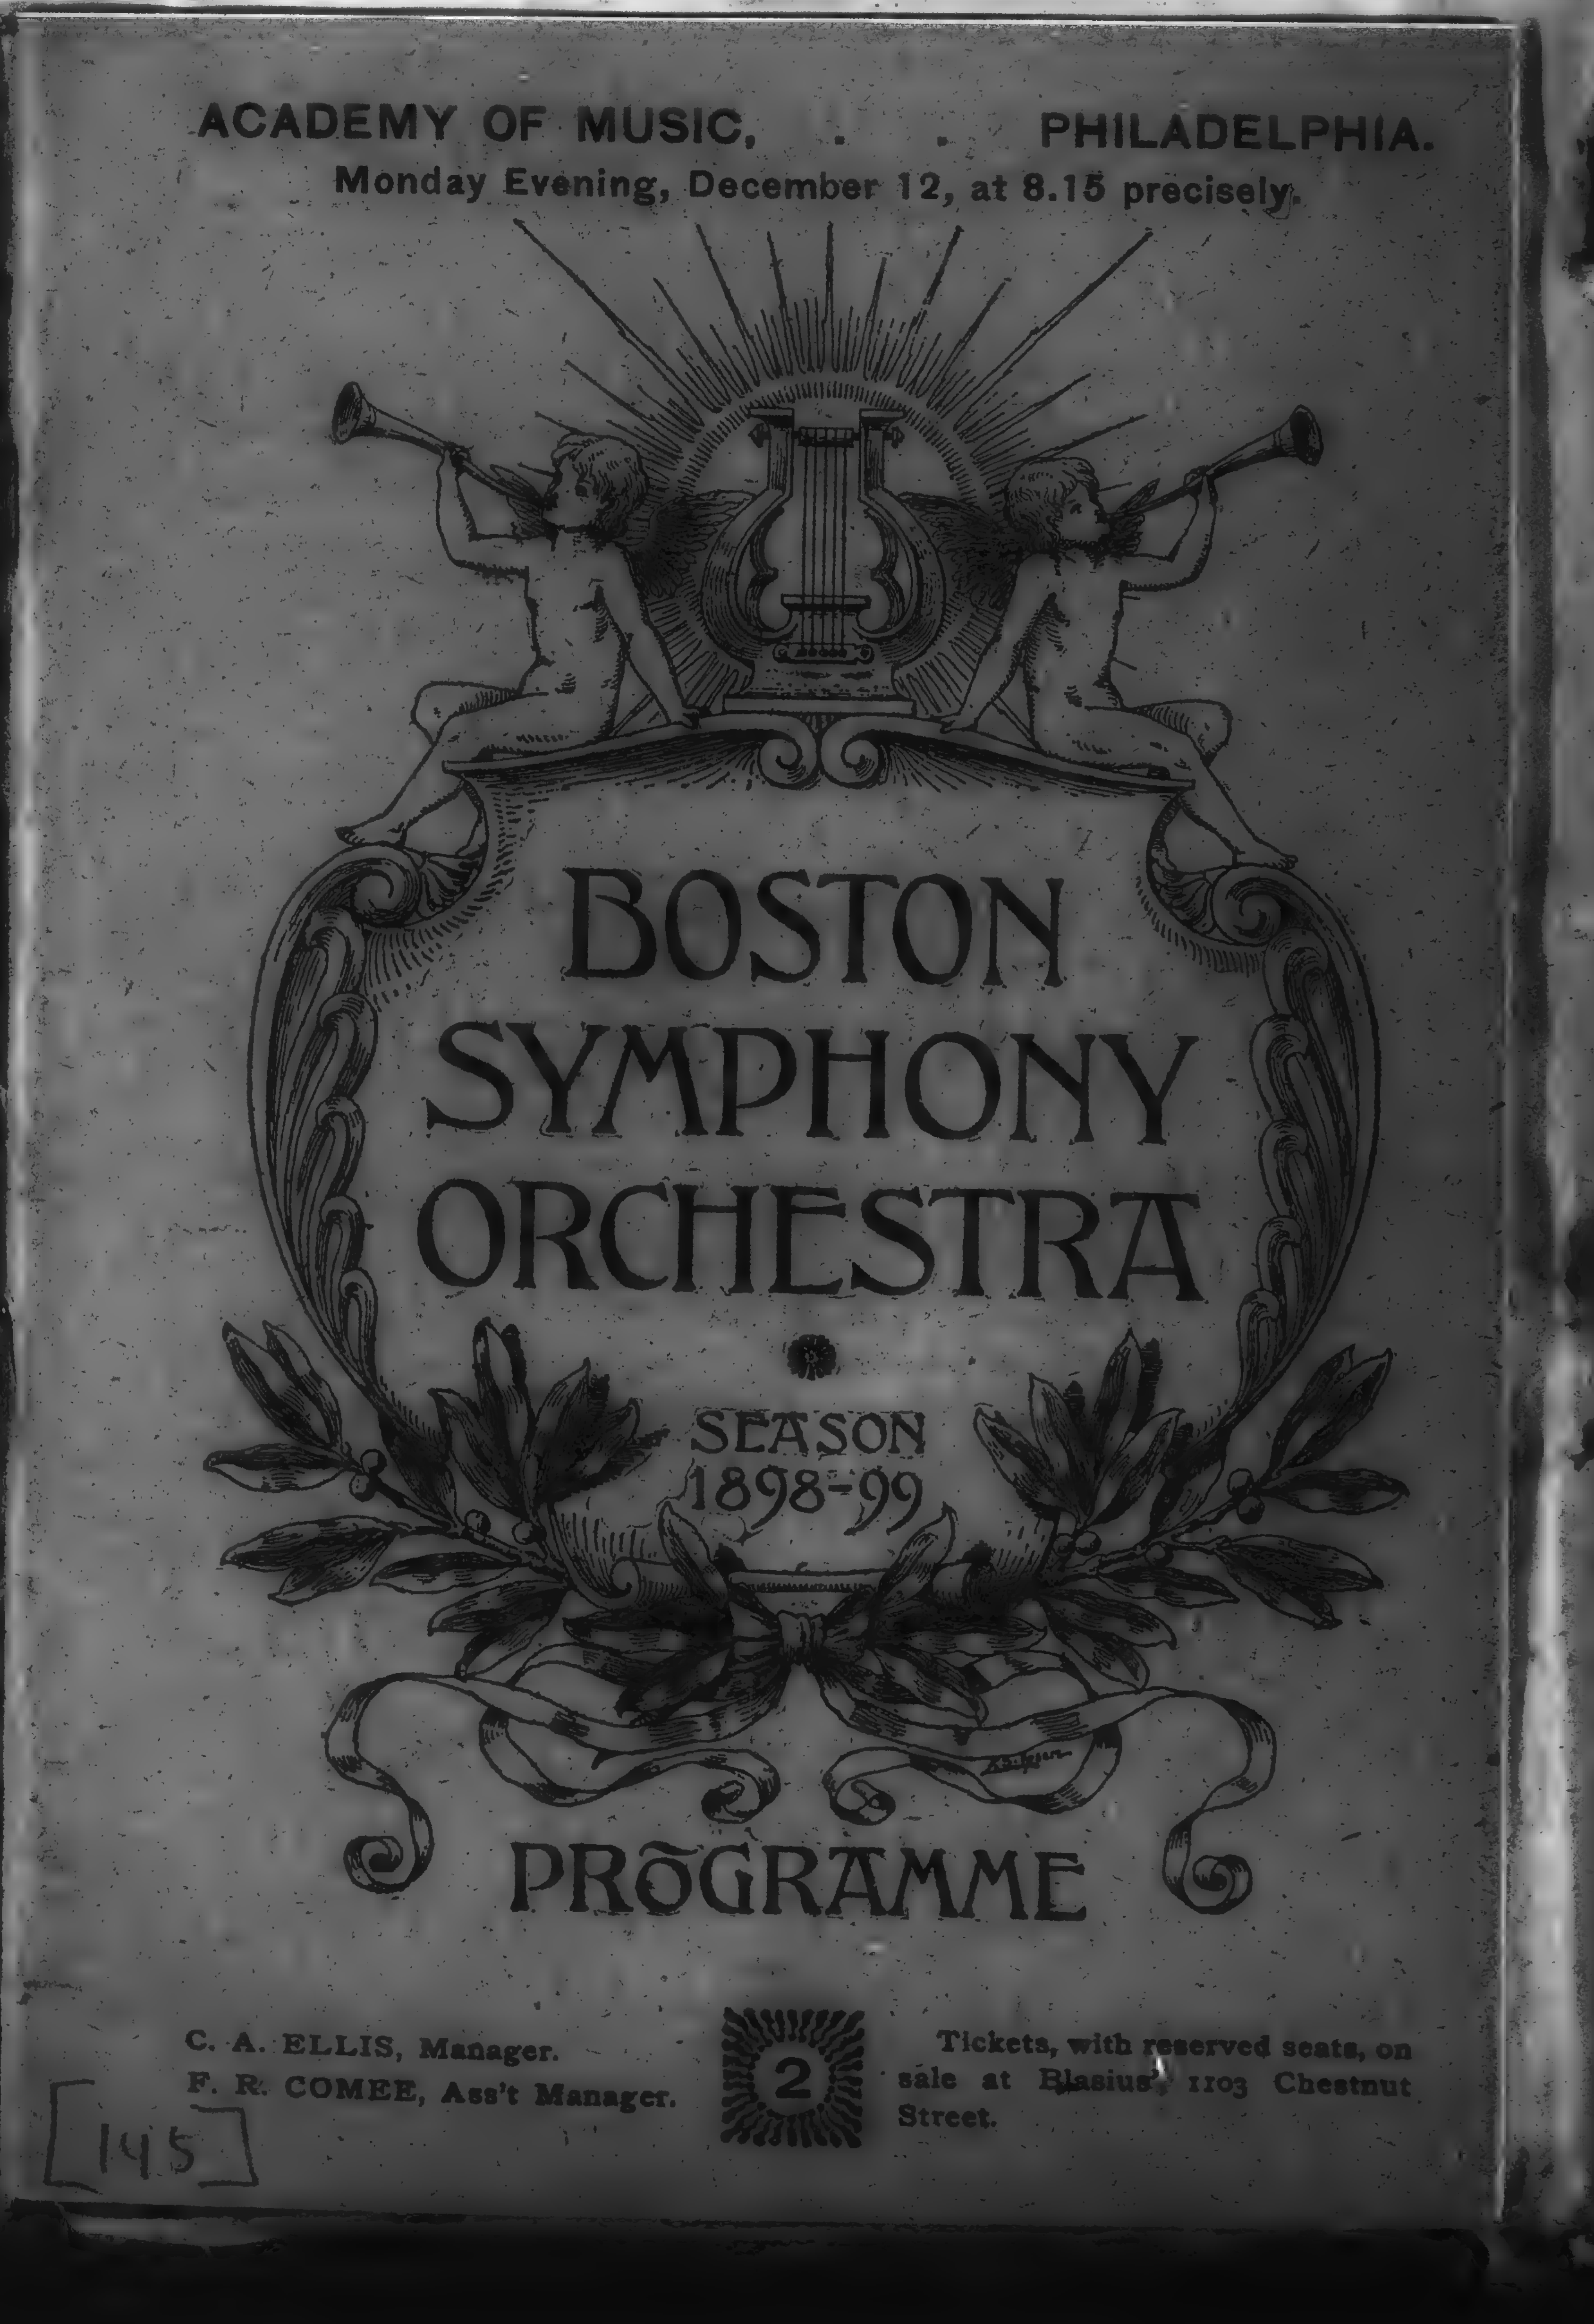
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.



ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, December 12, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

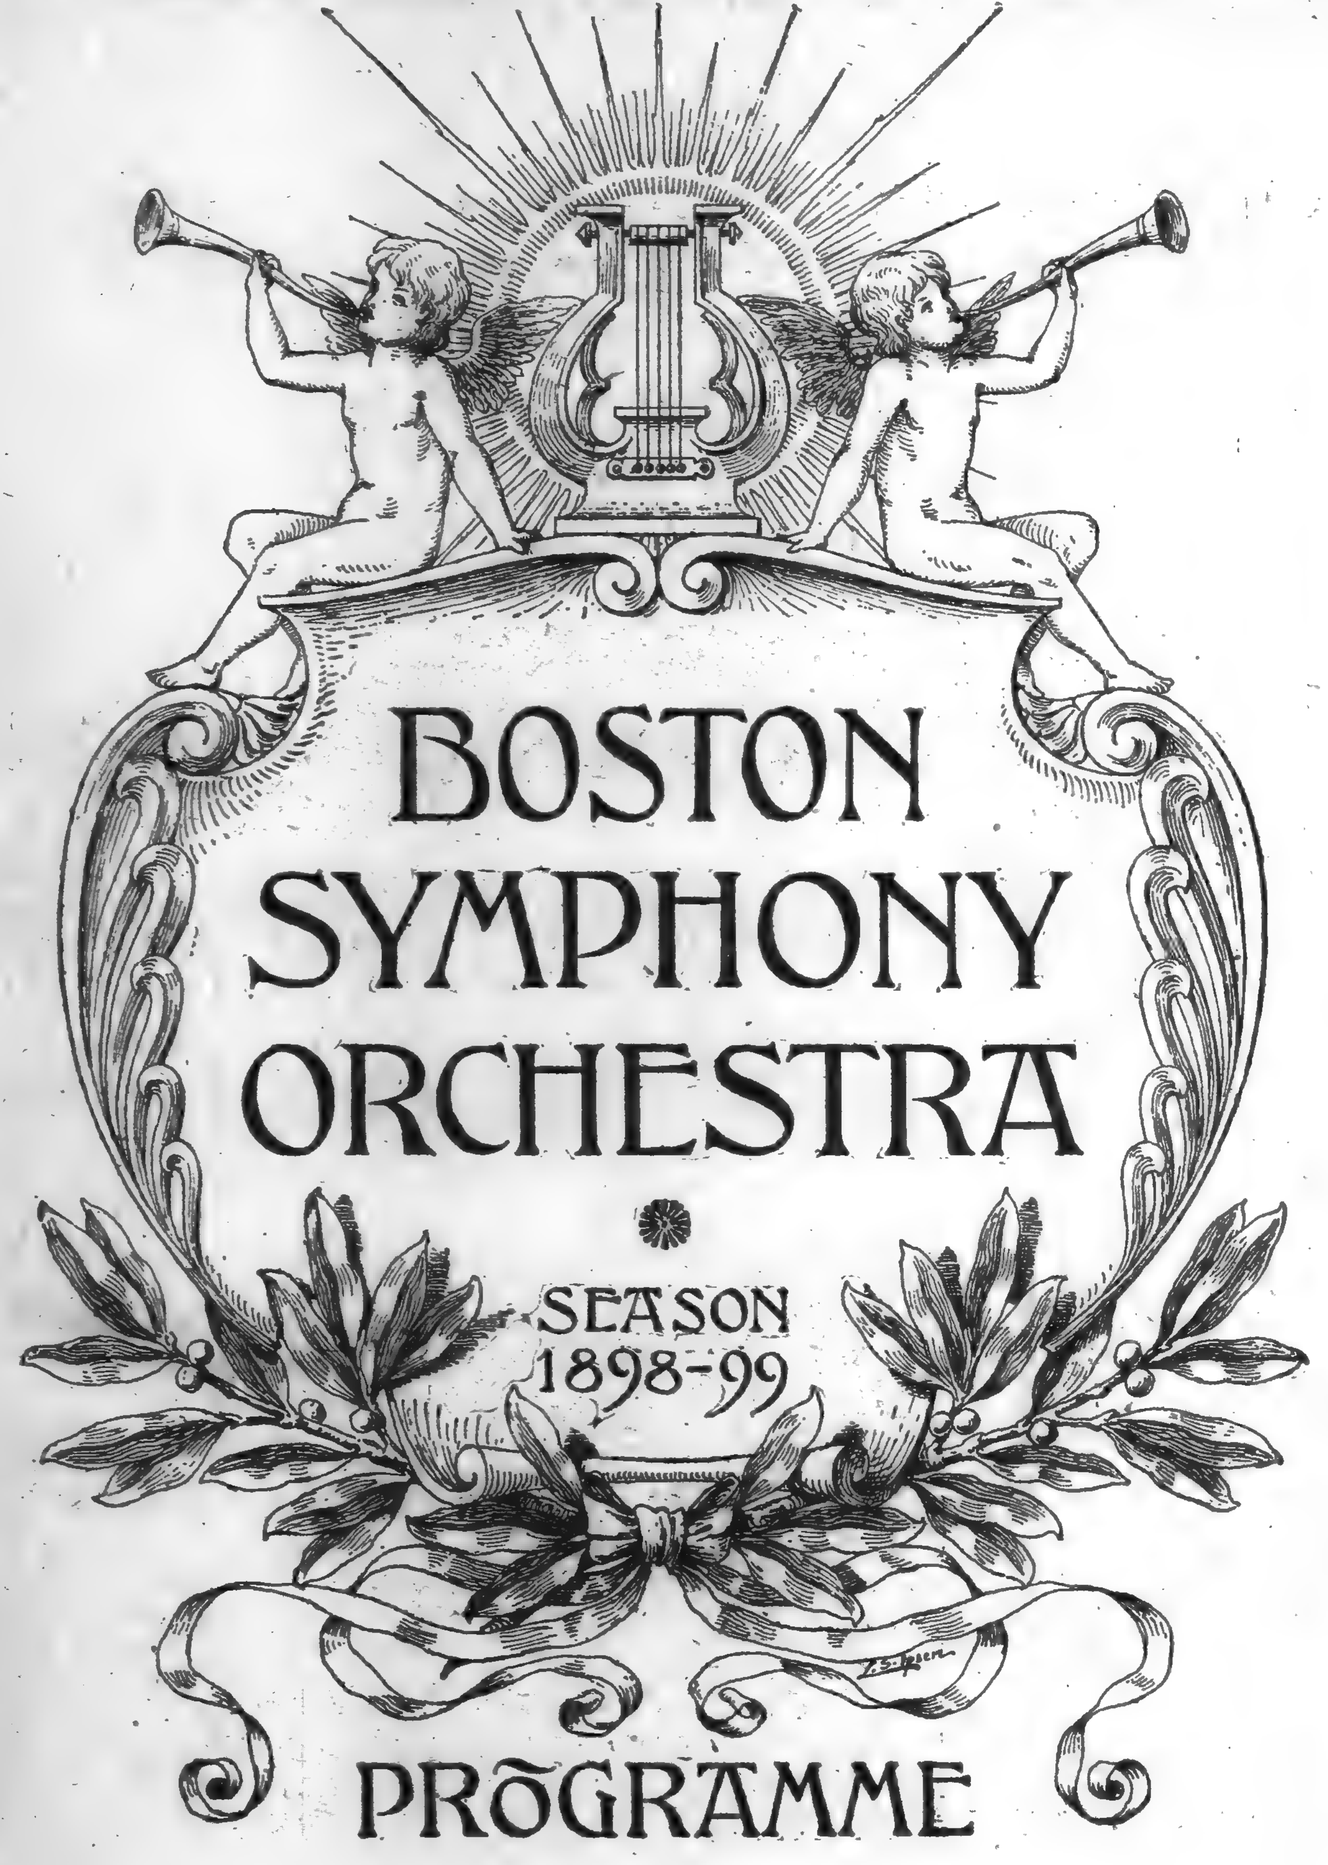
2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

[145]

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

MUSIC HALL, - - - - - BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, December 13, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

III. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 8, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

SCHUBERT.	SYMPHONY No. 9, in C major. I. Andante. — Allegro, ma non troppo. II. Andante con moto. III. Scherzo: Allegro vivace. — Trio. IV. Finale: Allegro vivace.
MASSENET.	AIR, "Vision Fugitive," from "Herodiade."
SAINT-SAENS.	SYMPHONIC POEM No. 1, "Omphale's Spinning Wheel," op. 31.
	SONGS with PIANOFORTE.
a) ROBERT FRANZ.	"MARIE."
b) PETER CORNELIUS.	"EIN TON."
c) GABRIEL FAURÉ.	"RENCONTRE."
d) HATTON.	"TO ANTHEA."
LISZT.	SYMPHONIC POEM. "Les Preludes."

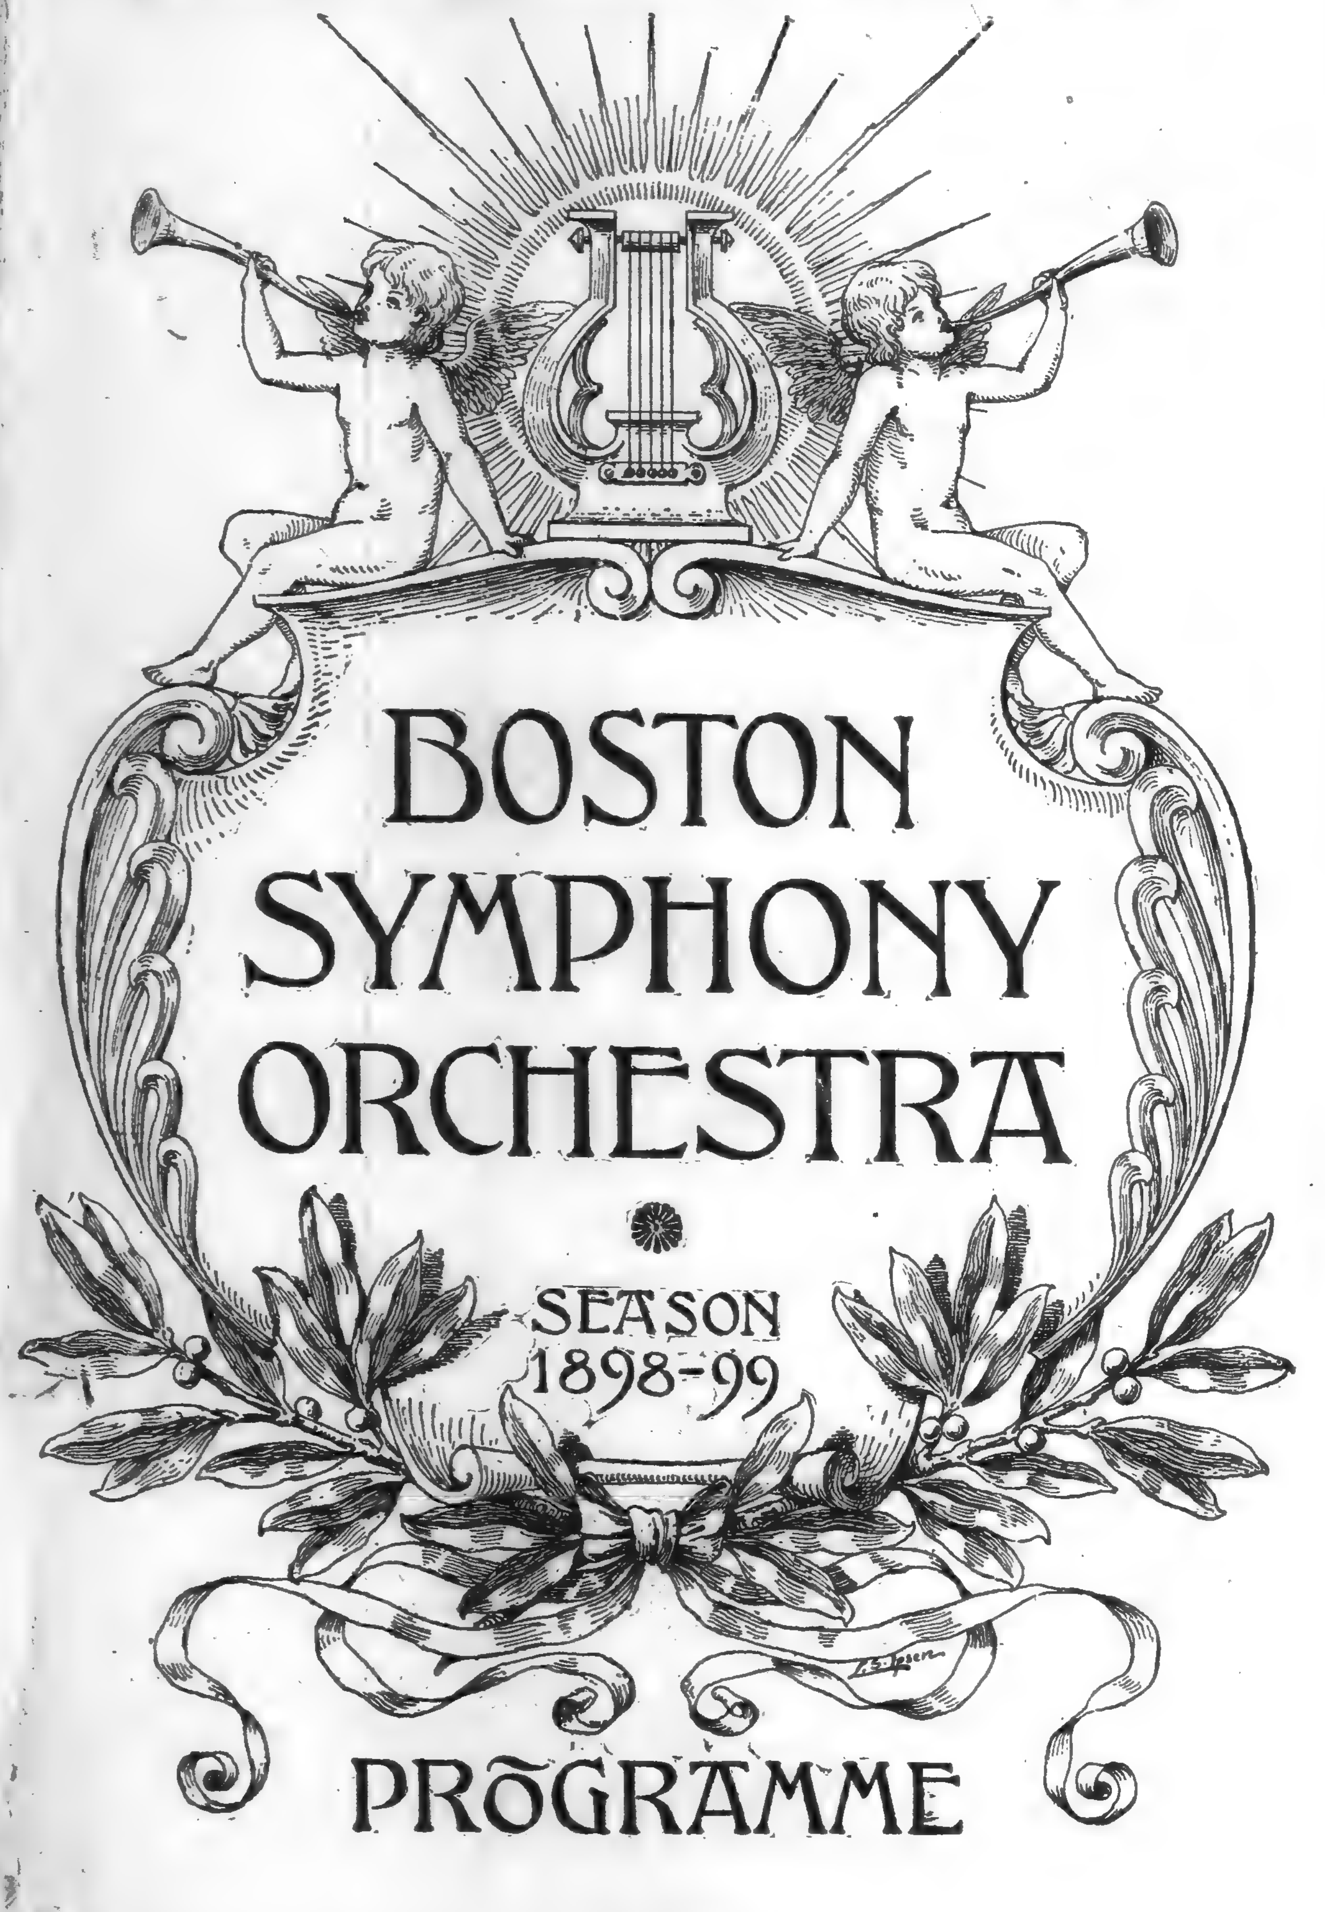
Soloist:

Mr. THEODORE BYARD.

The Pianoforte is a Mason & Hamlin.

Mr. Gericke is convalescent, but to insure his absolute and early recovery the performance will be under the direction of Mr. Franz Kneisel.

CARNEGIE HALL, - - - - NEW YORK.
Wednesday Afternoon, December 14, at 2 precisely.
Thursday Evening, December 15, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

2

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, December 12, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

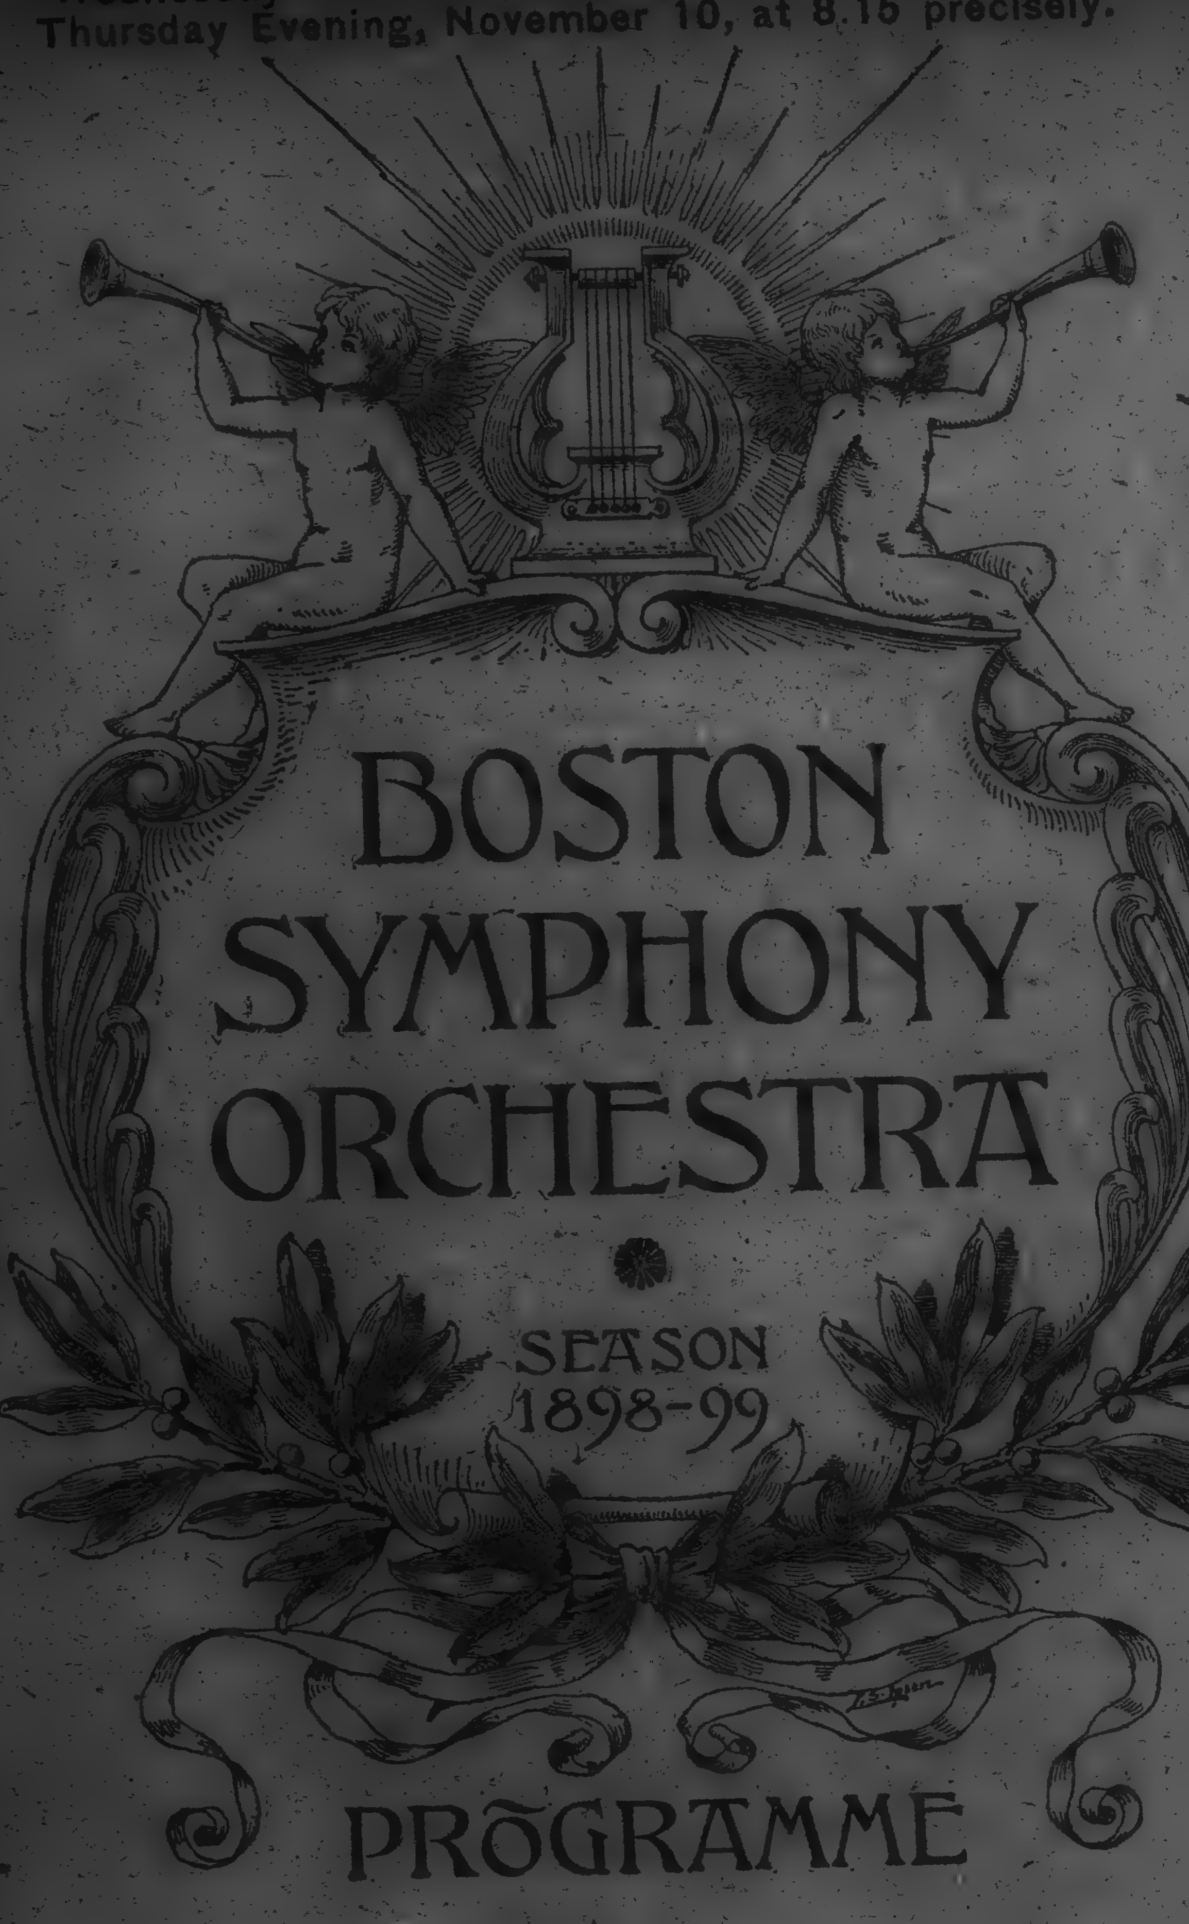
2

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

[145]

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CARNEGIE HALL, ... NEW YORK.
Wednesday Afternoon, November 9, at 2 precisely.
Thursday Evening, November 10, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

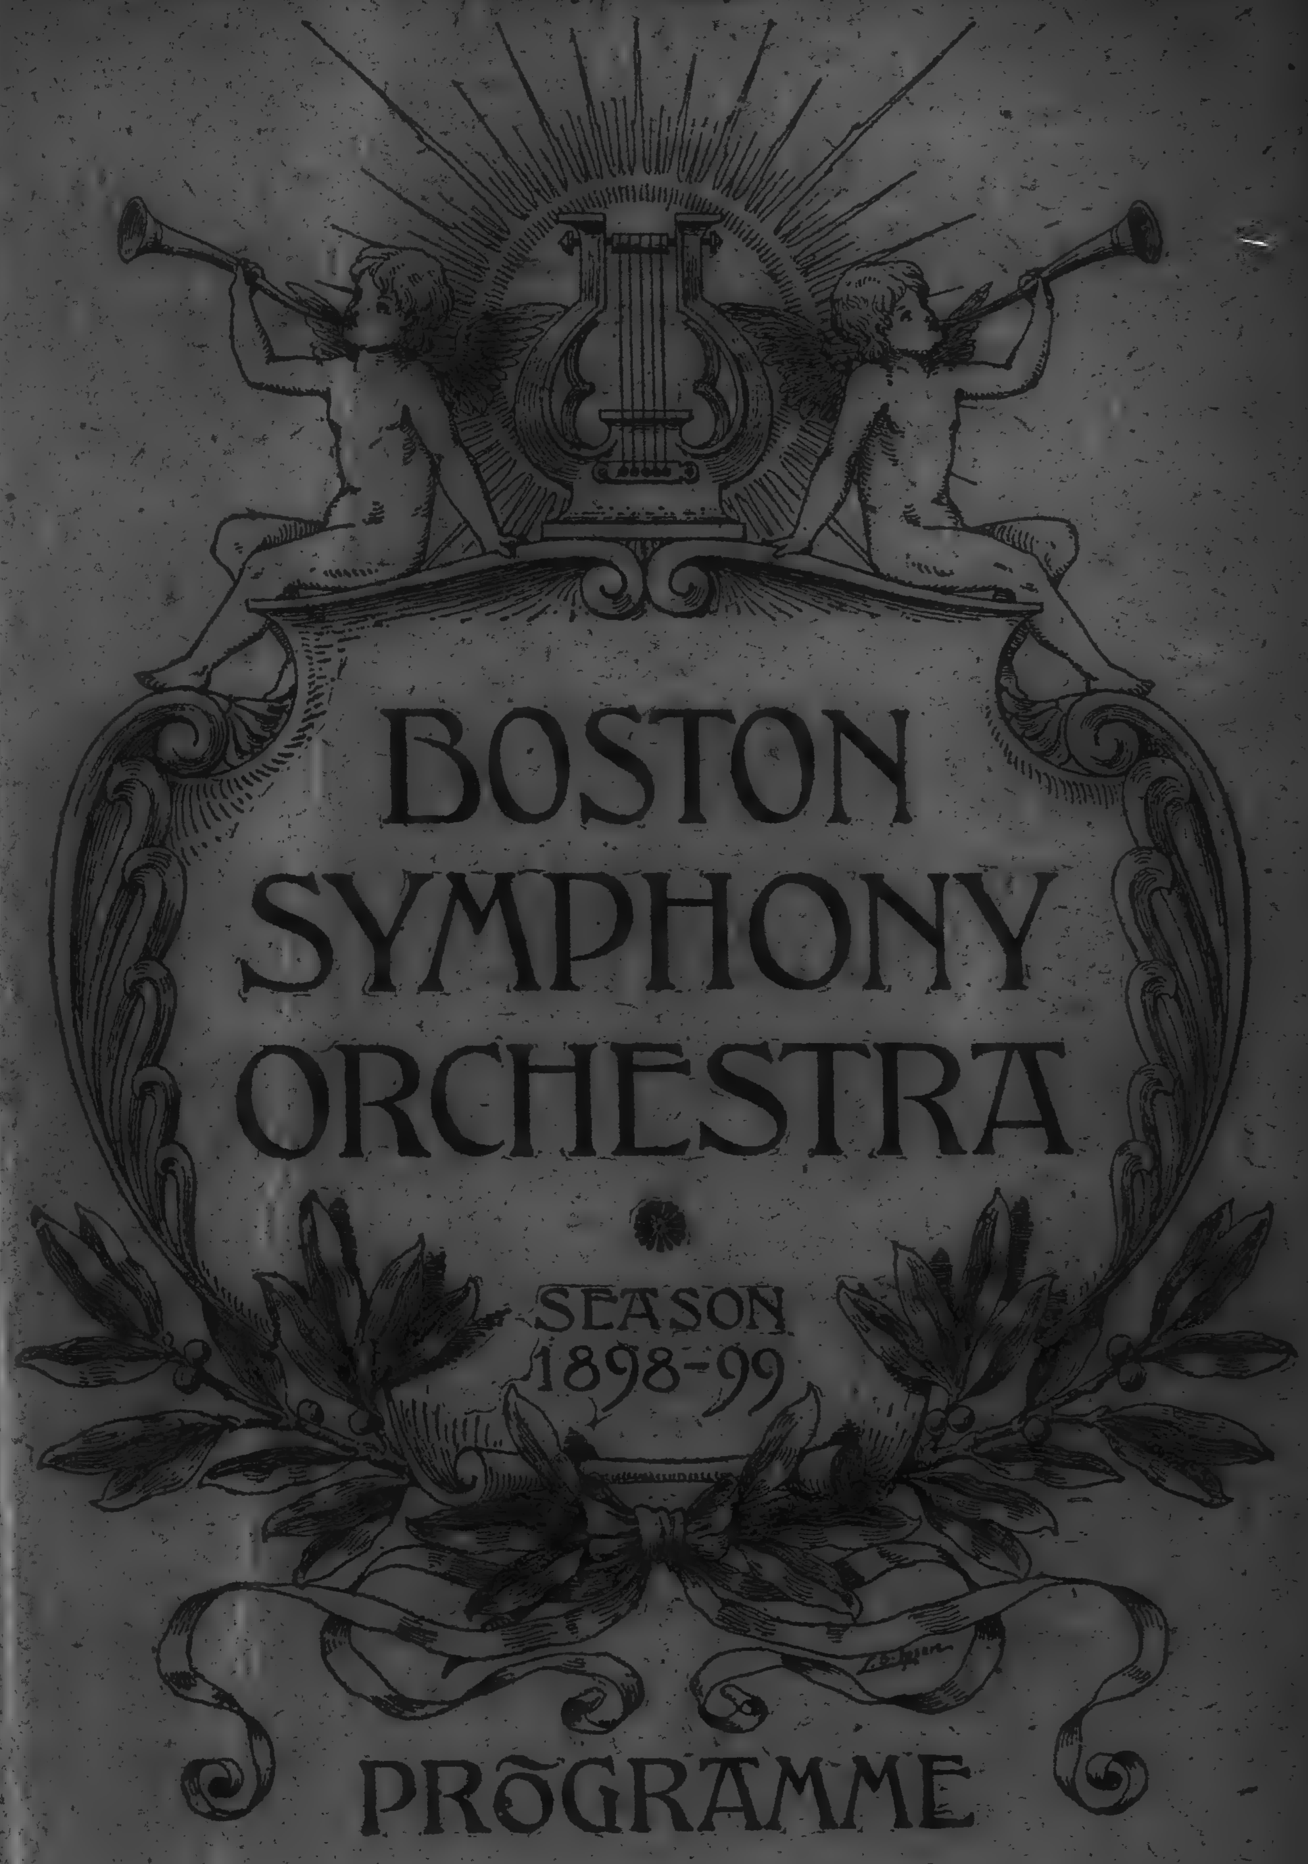
SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... BROOKLYN.
Friday Afternoon, November 11, at 3.30 precisely.
Saturday Evening, November 12, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.
1
Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

CHADWICK.	OVERTURE to "Melpomene."
MOZART.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 26 (Koechel), in D major. Allegro. Larghetto. Allegretto.
SMETANA.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Vyšehrad." (No. 1 in the Cyclus "Má Vlast.")
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major, op. 61. I. Sostenuto assai.—Allegro ma non troppo. II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace.—Trio I.—Trio II. III. Adagio espressivo. IV. Allegro molto vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. GEORGE W. PROCTOR.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

[146]

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, November 30, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY
ORCHESTRA

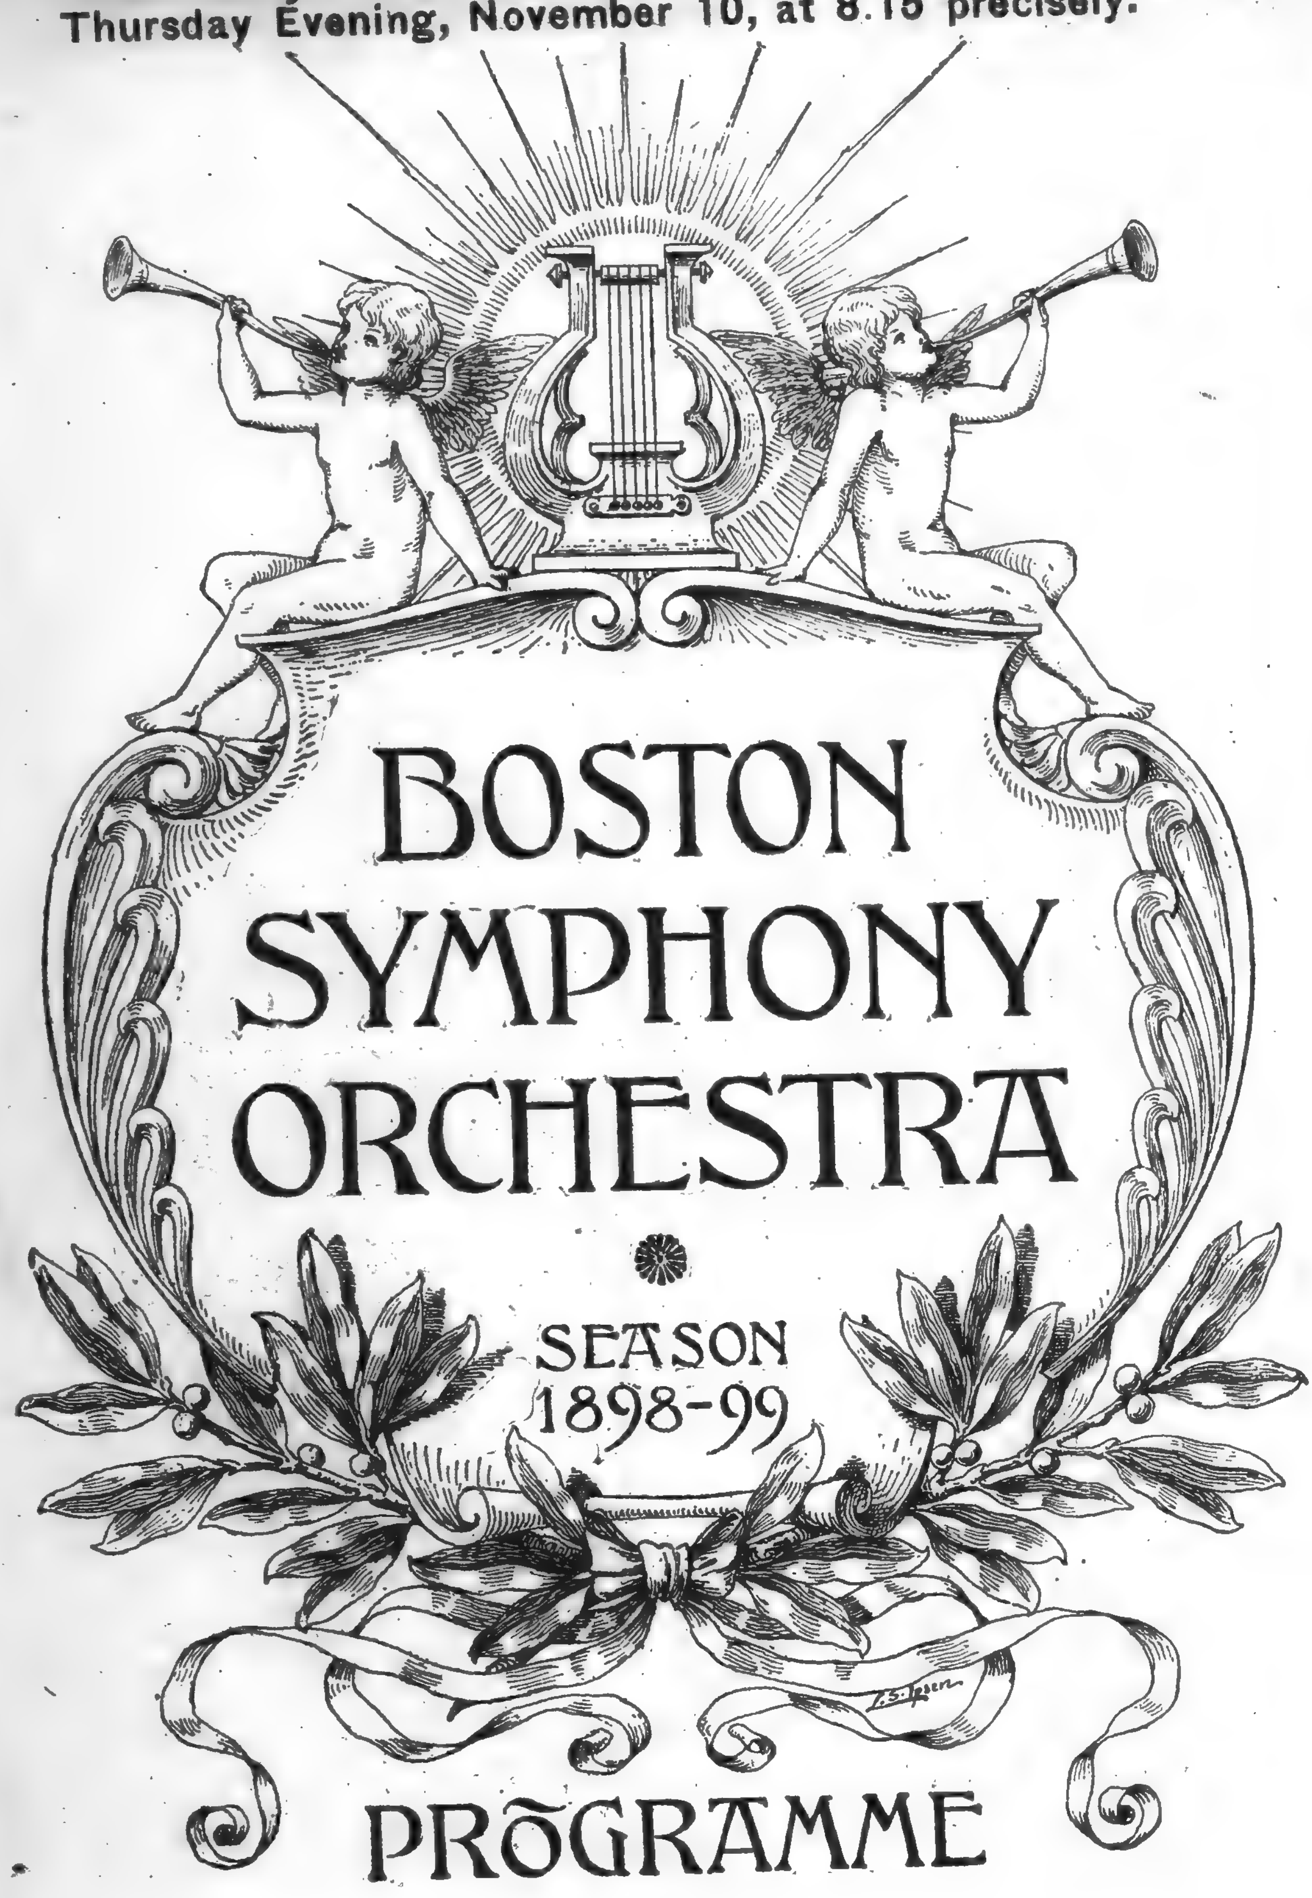
SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.
2
Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

CARNEGIE HALL, ... NEW YORK.
Wednesday Afternoon, November 9, at 2 precisely.
Thursday Evening, November 10, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

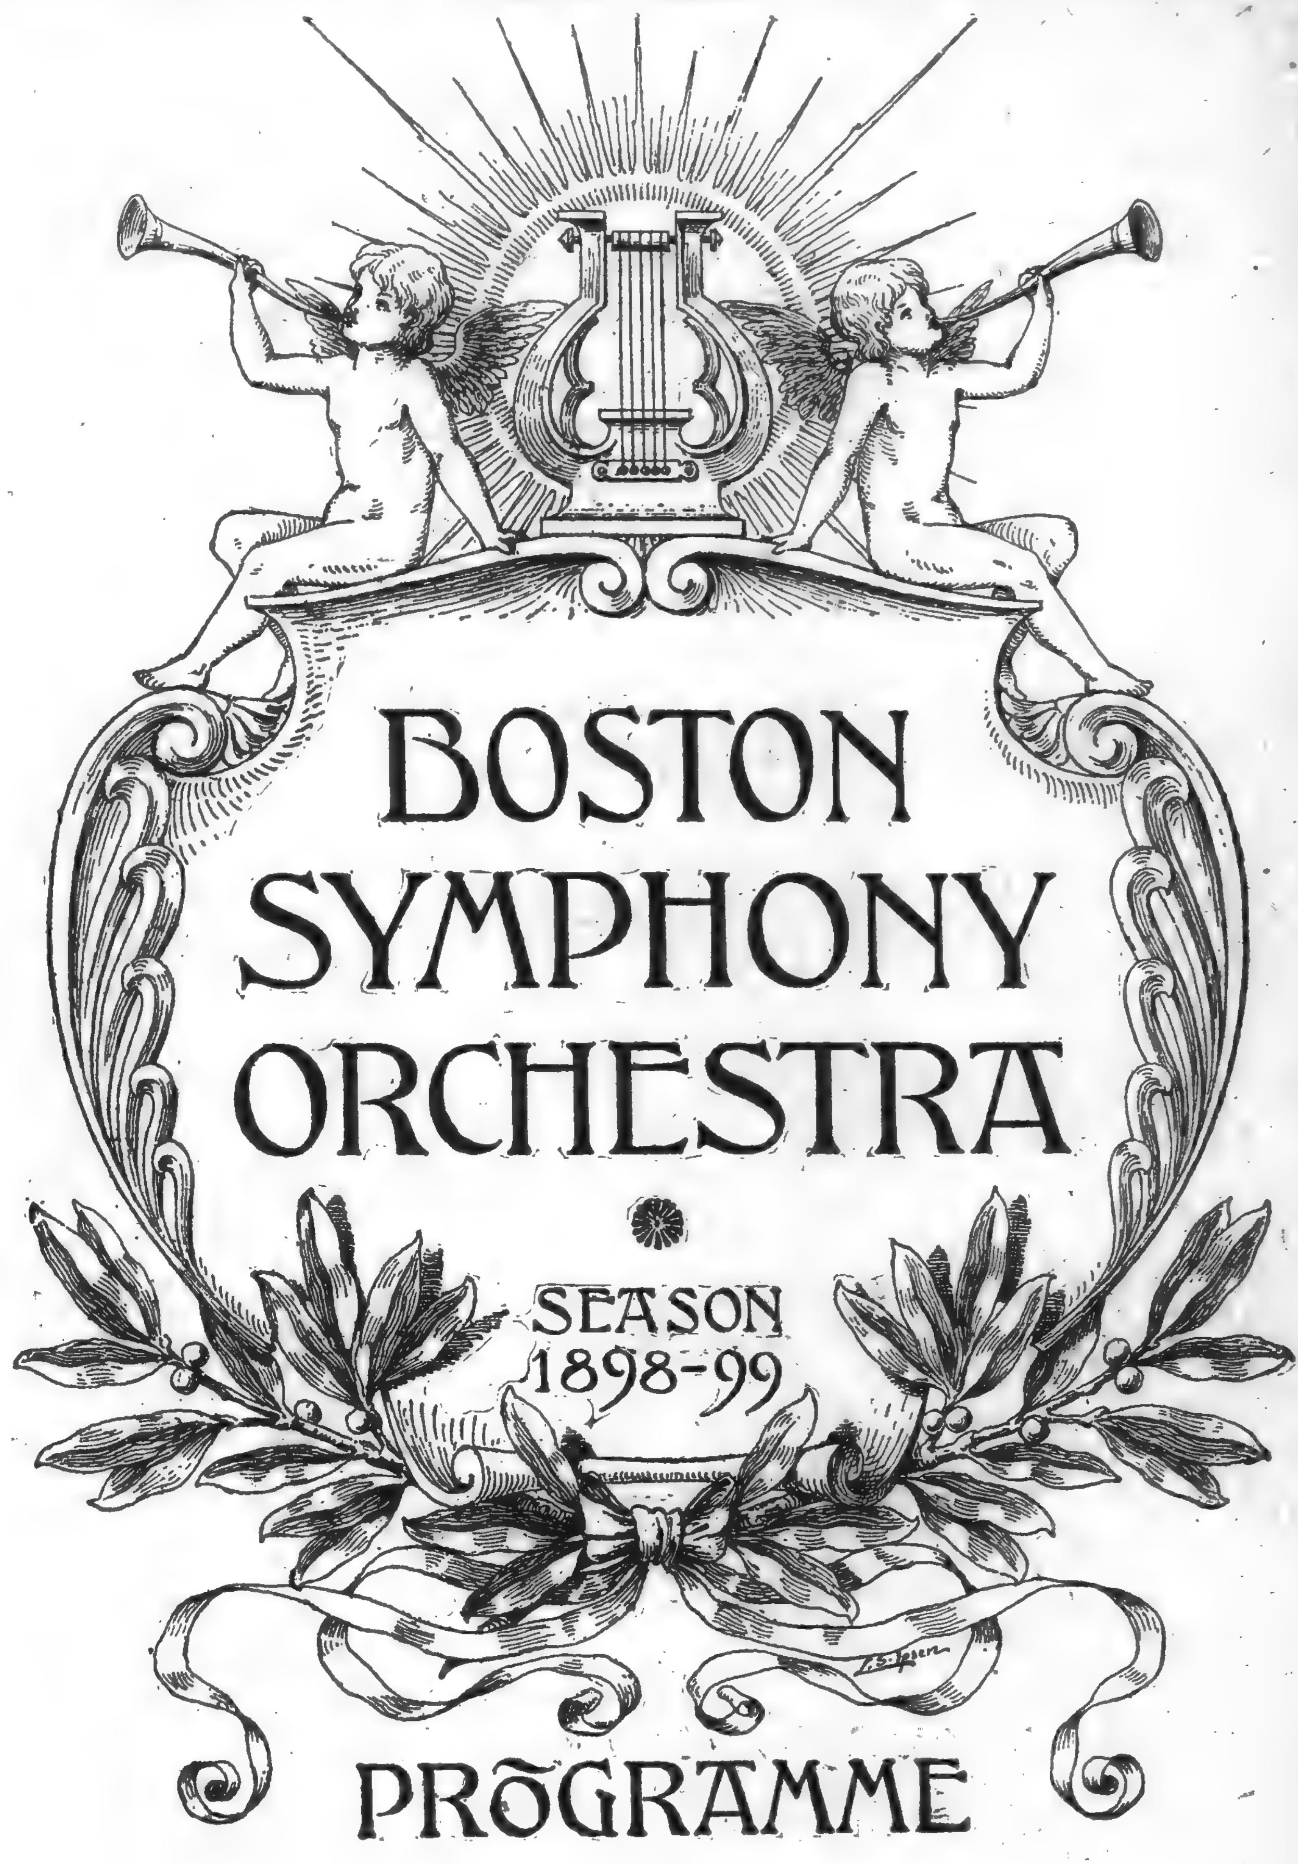
SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager. 1 F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

Tickets at Carnegie Hall.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... BROOKLYN.
Friday Afternoon, November 11, at 3.30 precisely.
Saturday Evening, November 12, at 8.15 precisely.
Under the auspices of the Brooklyn Institute of Arts and Sciences and the Philharmonic Society of Brooklyn.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets at the Brooklyn Institute
and at Chandler's Music Store,
300 Fulton Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 17, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

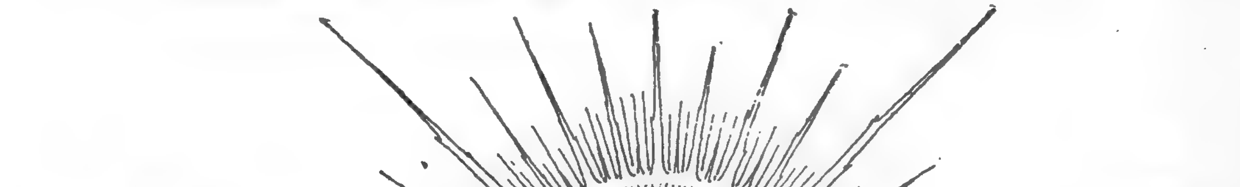
CHADWICK.	OVERTURE to "Melpomene."
MOZART.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 26 (Koechel), in D major. Allegro. Larghetto. Allegretto.
SMETANA.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Vyšehrad." (No. 1 in the Cyclus "Má Vlast.")
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 2, in C major, op. 61. I. Sostenuto assai.—Allegro ma non troppo. II. Scherzo: Allegro vivace.—Trio I.—Trio II. III. Adagio espressivo. IV. Allegro molto vivace.

Soloist:

Mr. GEORGE W. PROCTOR.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, November 30, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

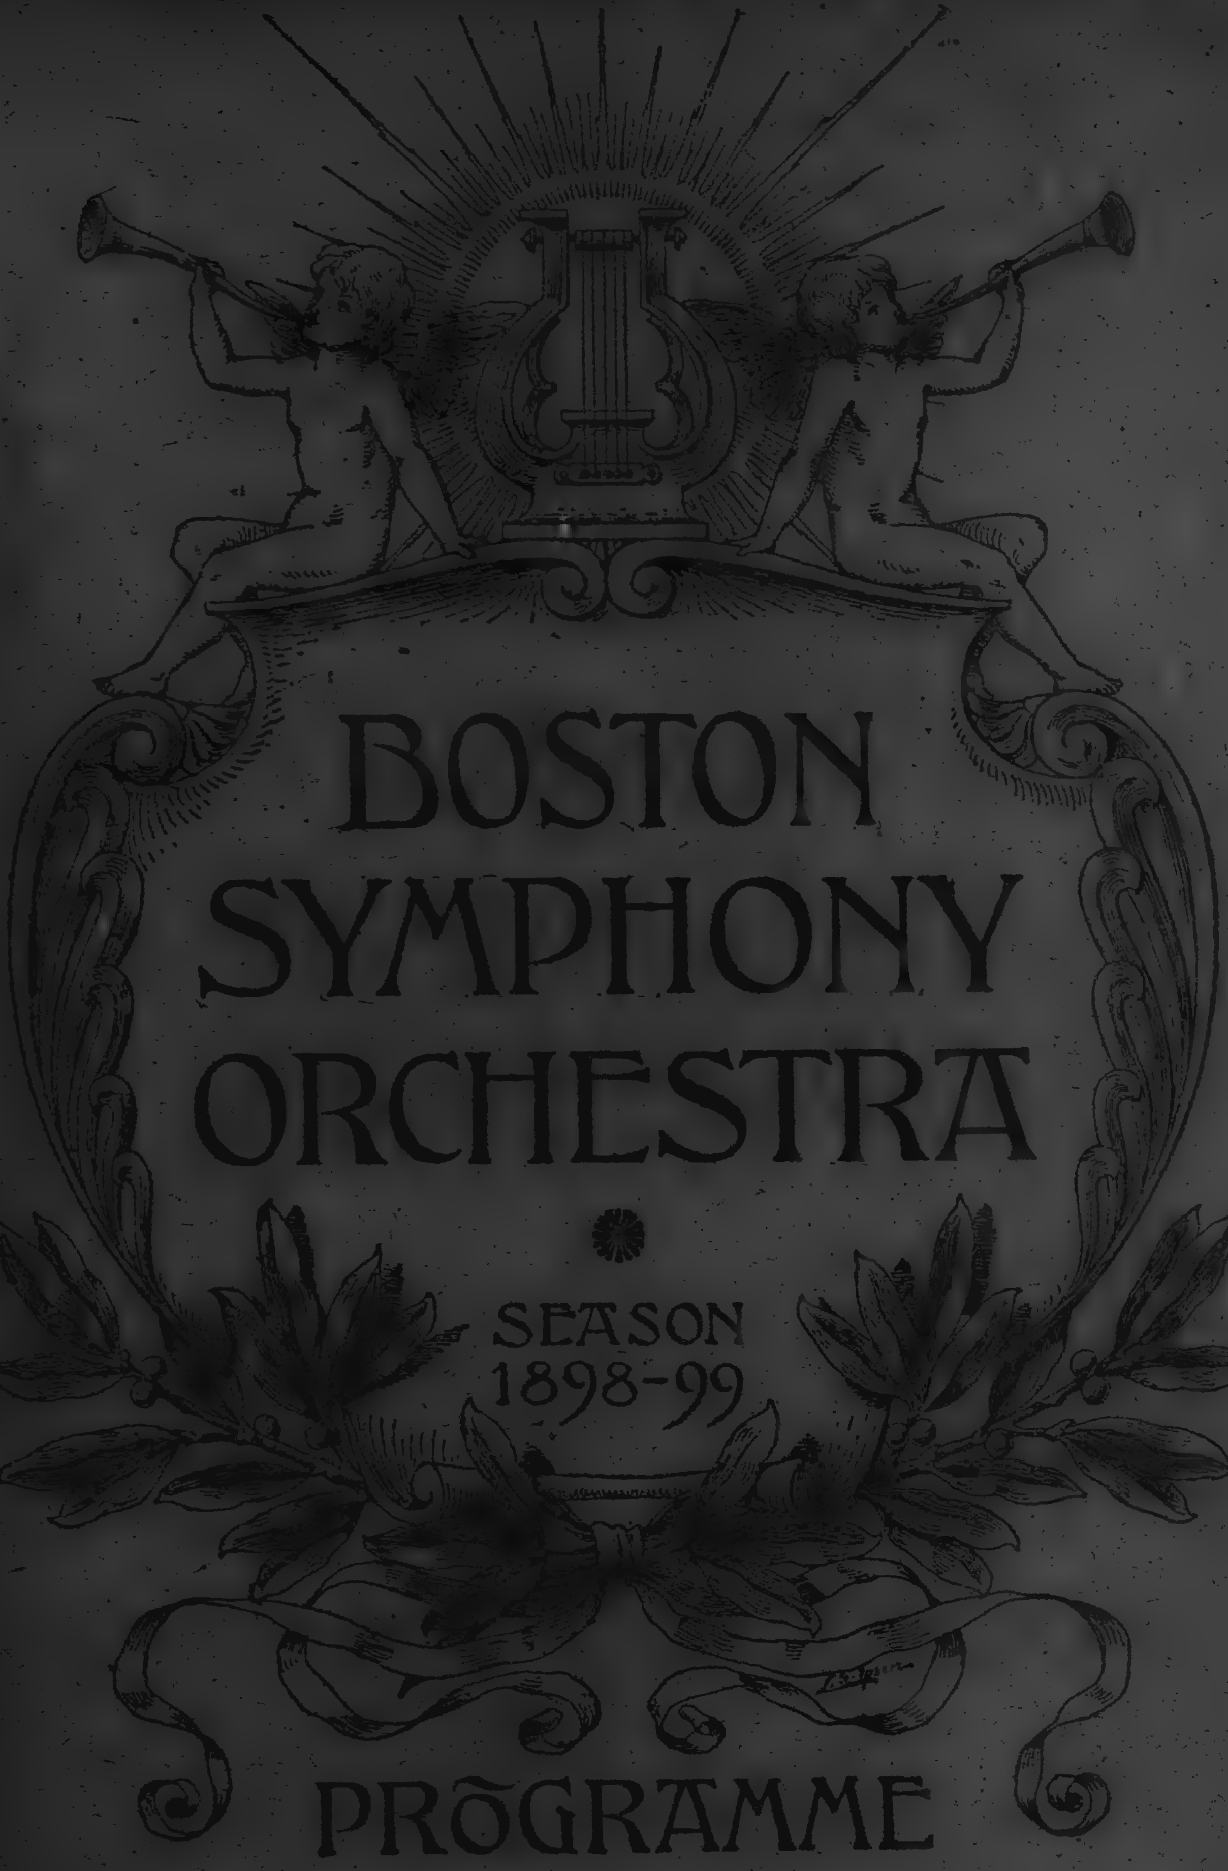
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

2

Tickets on sale at Infantry Hall.

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, November 7, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 27, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

WEBER.	OVERTURE to "Euryanthe."
WAGNER.	ELIZABETH'S ARIA, Act II., "Tannhäuser."
BACH.	PRELUDE, ADAGIO, AND GAVOTTE. (Arranged for STRING ORCHESTRA by SIGISMUND BACHRICH.)
WEBER.	ARIA, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67. I. Allegro con brio. II. Andante con moto. III. Allegro. — Trio. IV. Allegro.

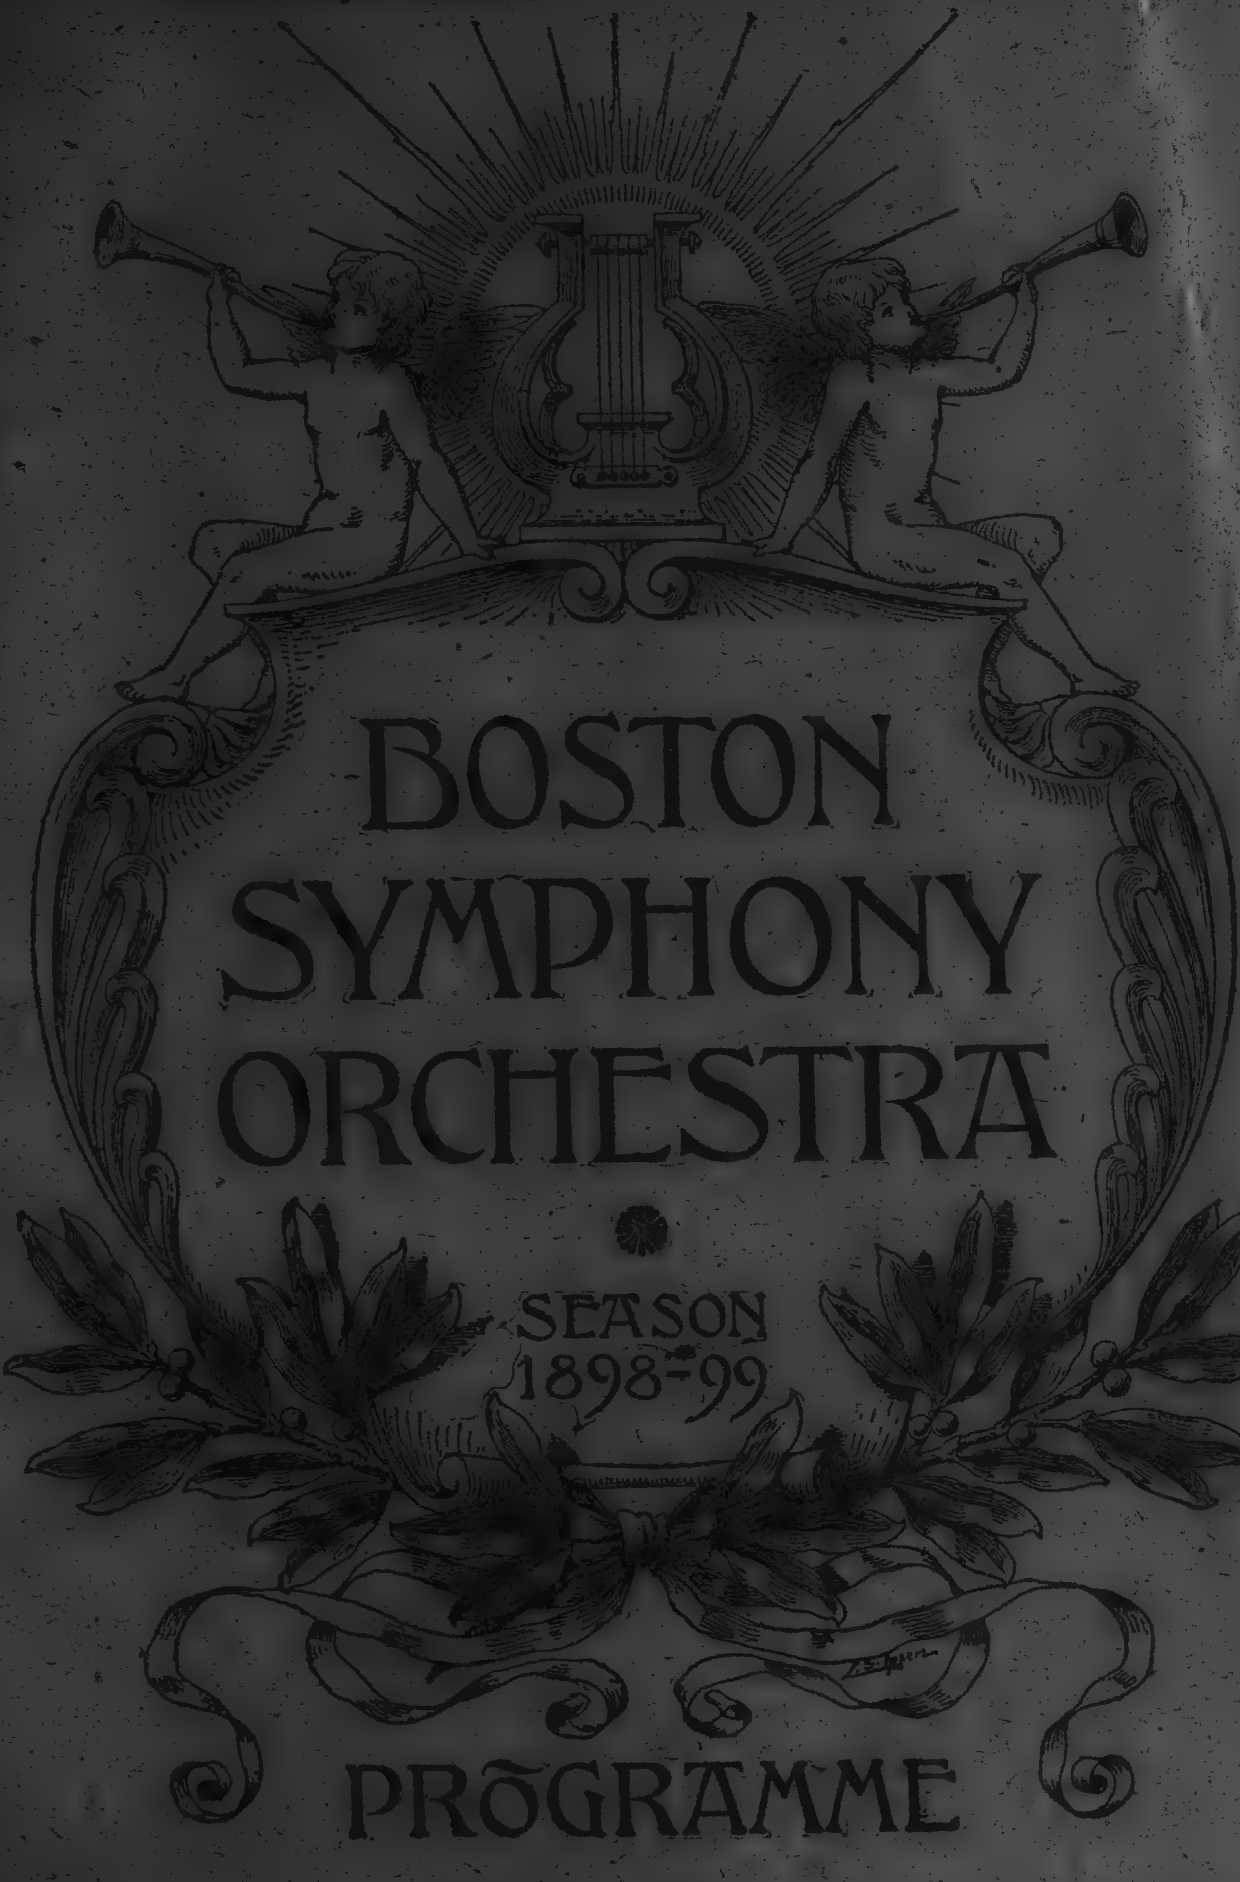
Soloist:

Mme. GADSKI

The substitution of the Bach Selection for the Brahms Variation was imperative, because of the illness of a member of the Orchestra.

Second Concert, November 17. The Orchestral Selections will include the Overture to "Melpomene," by Chadwick; the Symphonic Poem "Vysehrad" (My Country), by Smetana, and the Schumann Symphony No. 2. The Soloist will be Mr. George W. Proctor, who will play the Mozart Concerto for Pianoforte, in D major.

INFANTRY HALL, - - - - PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, November 2, at 8 sharp.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

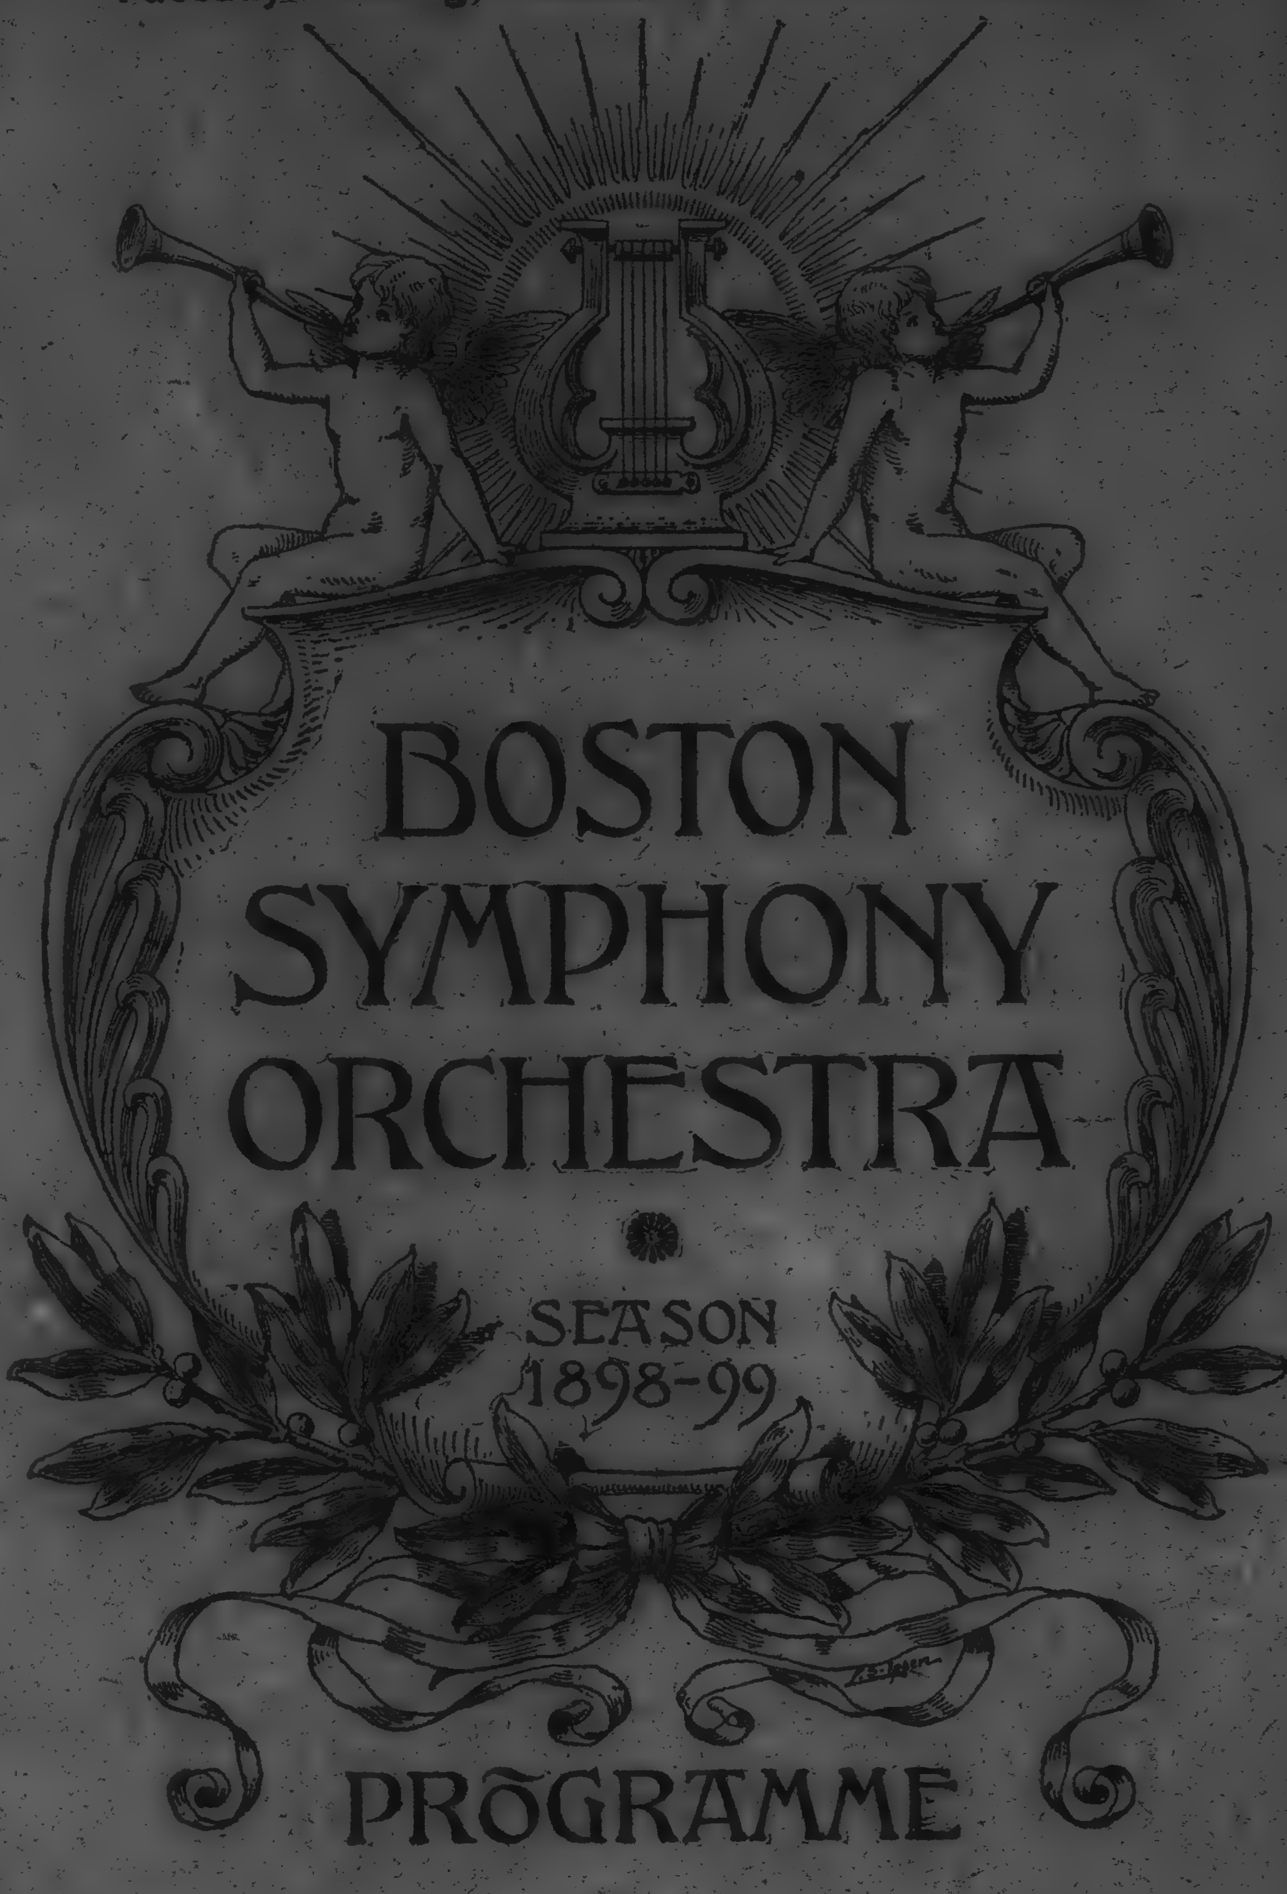
PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Season tickets, at $7 for the eight concerts, and single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

MUSIC HALL, - - - - - BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, November 8, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

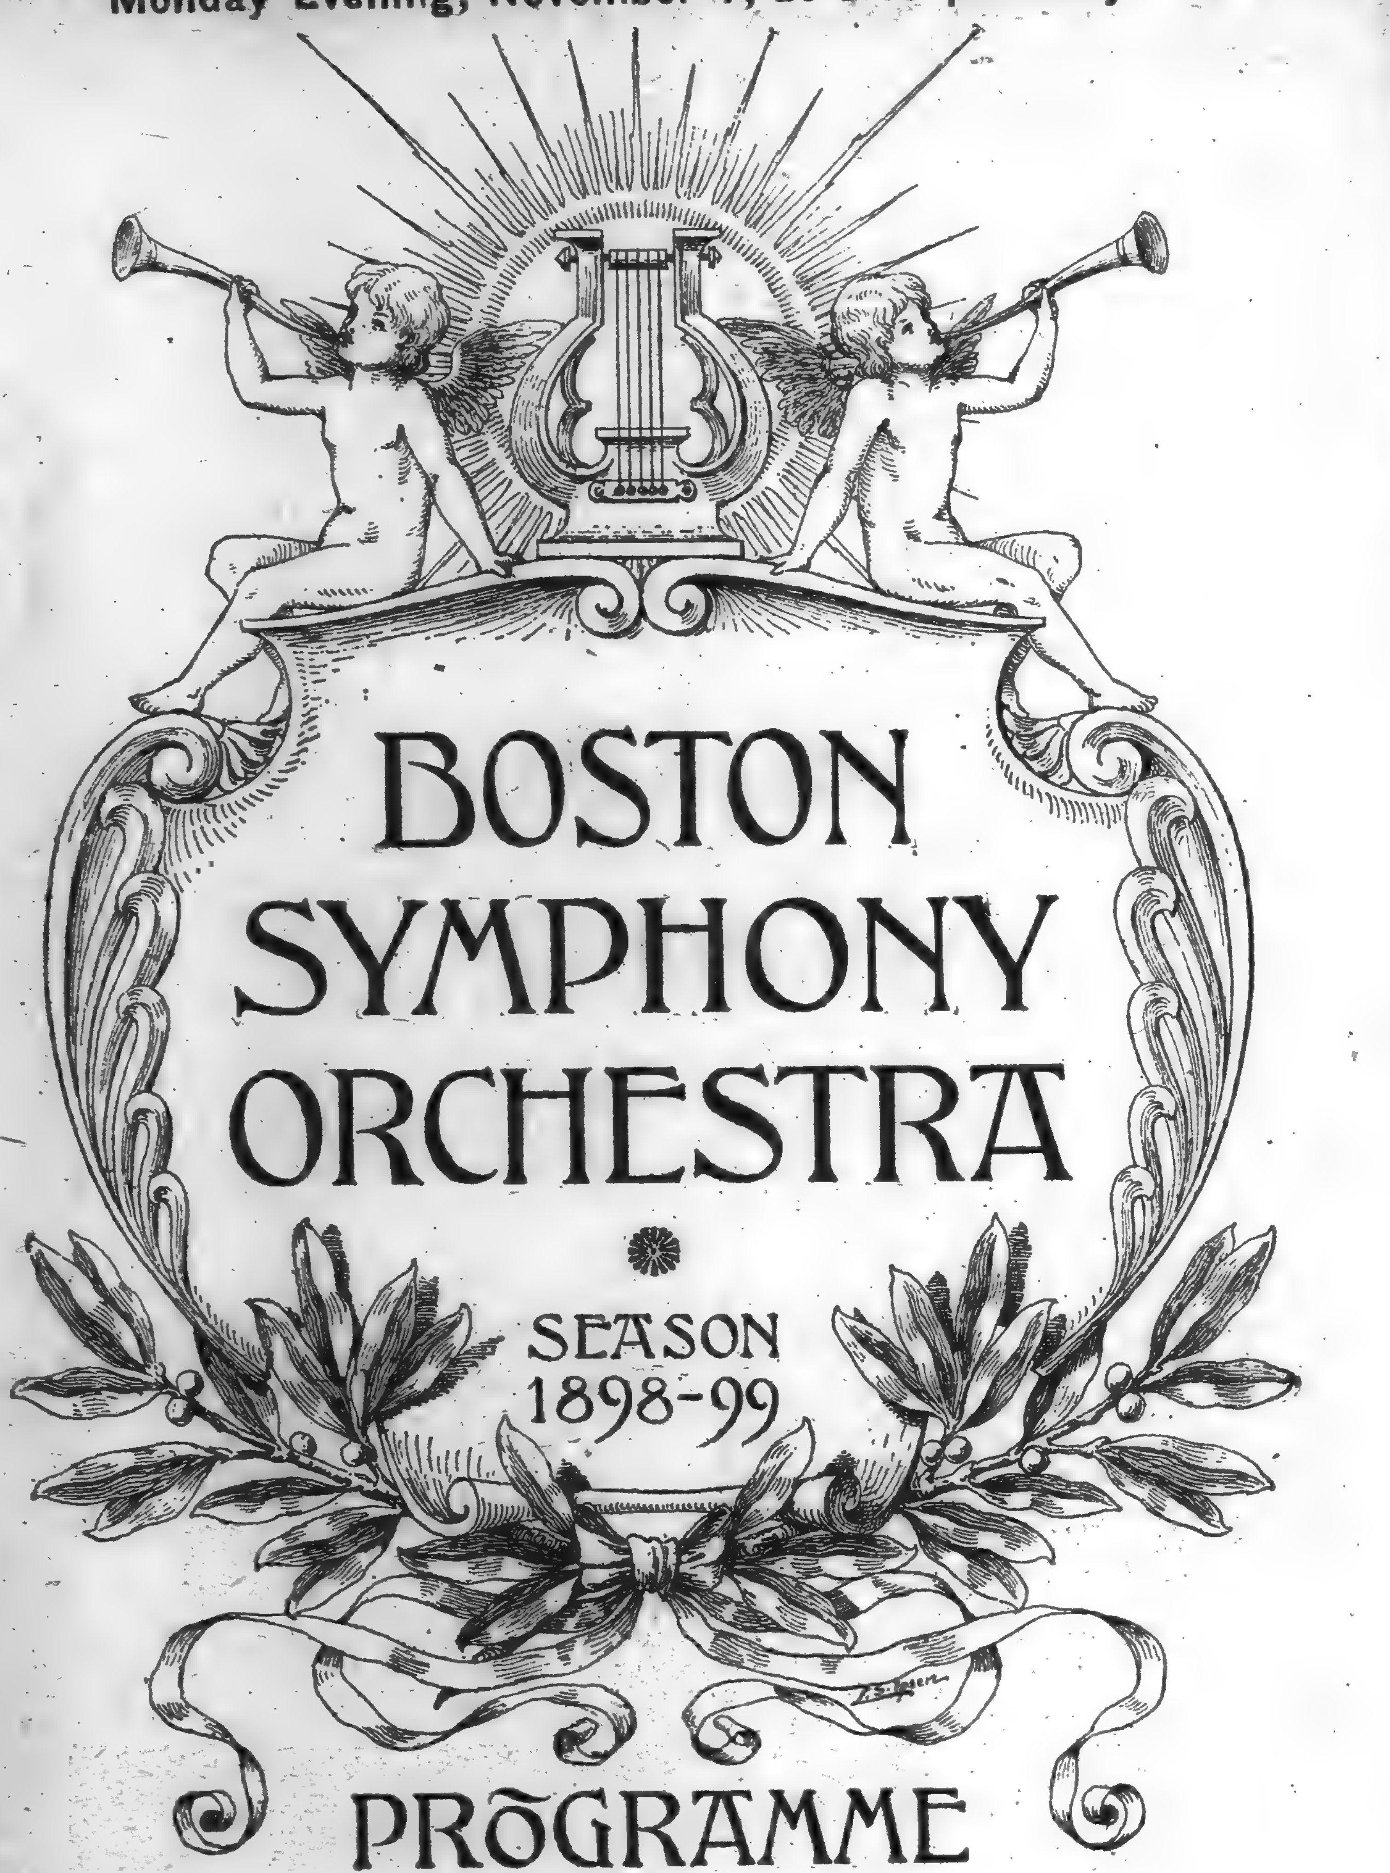
1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

[147]

- COVER ONLY - CONTENTS AVAILABLE
ELSEWHERE IN ARCHIVES

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, - - PHILADELPHIA.
Monday Evening, November 7, at 8.15 precisely.



BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Blasius', 1103 Chestnut Street.

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1898-99.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 27, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

WEBER.	OVERTURE to "Euryanthe."
WAGNER.	ELIZABETH'S ARIA, Act II., "Tannhäuser."
BACH.	PRELUDE, ADAGIO, AND GAVOTTE. (Arranged for STRING ORCHESTRA by SIGISMUND BACHRICH.)
WEBER.	ARIA, "Ocean, thou mighty monster," from "Oberon."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 5, in C minor, op. 67. I. Allegro con brio. II. Andante con moto. III. Allegro. — Trio. IV. Allegro.

Soloist:

Mme. GADSKI

The substitution of the Bach Selection for the Brahms Variation was imperative, because of the illness of a member of the Orchestra.

Second Concert, November 17. The Orchestral Selections will include the Overture to "Melpomene," by Chadwick; the Symphonic Poem "Vysehrad" (My Country), by Smetana, and the Schumann Symphony No. 2. The Soloist will be Mr. George W. Proctor, who will play the Mozart Concerto for Pianoforte, in D major.

INFANTRY HALL, ... PROVIDENCE.
Wednesday Evening, November 2, at 8 sharp.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Season tickets, at $7 for the eight concerts, and single tickets, at $1.25 each, on sale at Infantry Hall.

MUSIC HALL, - - - - - BALTIMORE.
Tuesday Evening, November 8, at 8.15 precisely.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

SEASON
1898-99

PROGRAMME

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Manager.

1

Tickets, with reserved seats, on sale at Albert's, 13 No. Charles St.

END OF VOLUME

VOLUME 14

BSO

1899 - 1900

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

1719th to 1724th CONCERT.

DECEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, December 10, at 7, P. M. South Terminal Station, Track 16.

Arrive Philadelphia, Broad Street Station Penna. R. R., Monday, December 11, at 7, A. M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, December 12, Baltimore & Ohio R. R., Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 12.45, P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Tuesday, December 12, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P. M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Wednesday, December 13, at 7, A. M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, CARNEGIE HALL.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, December 13, at 2.30.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday Evening, December 14, at 8, P. M.

Leave New York, Depot Central Railroad of New Jersey, Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Friday, December 15, at 1 P. M.

Arrive Philadelphia, Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Streets, 3, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, at 8.15, P. M.

Leave Philadelphia, Reading Terminal, Twelfth and Market Streets, at 10.30, P. M., sharp.

Arrive New York, Depot Central Railroad of N. J., 12.30, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 16, at 8, P. M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Station, Saturday, at midnight.

Arrive Boston, South Terminal Station, Sunday, December 17, at 7, A. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, December 9, 1899.

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

1769th to 1774th CONCERT.

MARCH ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 18, at 7, P. M. South Terminal Station, Track 16.

Arrive Philadelphia, Broad Street Station Penna. R. R., Monday, March 19, at 7, A.M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 20, Baltimore & Ohio R.R., Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 12.45, P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., at 8.15, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R R., Tuesday, March 20, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P. M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Wednesday, March 21, at 7, A.M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, CARNEGIE HALL.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, March 21, at 2.30.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday Evening, March 22, at 8.15, P.M.

Leave New York, Depot Central Railroad of New Jersey, Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Friday, March 23, at 1 P. M.

Arrive Philadelphia, Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Streets, 3, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, at 8.15, P. M.

Leave Philadelphia, Reading Terminal, Twelfth and Market Streets, at 10.30, P. M., sharp.

Arrive New York, Depot Central Railroad of N. J., 12.30, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 24, at 8.15, P. M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Station, Saturday, at midnight.

Arrive Boston, South Terminal Station, Sunday, March 25, at 7, A. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 17, 1900. [OVER.]

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-1900

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

Eighteenth Season in Providence

Eight Concerts.

Wednesday Evening, Oct. 25,	Wednesday Evening, March 7,
Wednesday Evening, Nov. 15,	Wednesday Evening, March 28,
Wednesday Evening, Dec. 20,	Wednesday Evening, April 11.
Wednesday Evening, Jan. 31,	Wednesday Evening, April 25.

AT 8 O'CLOCK, SHARP.

Solo Artists.

MISS CLARA BUTT, the famous English Contralto.
(First Appearance in Providence.)

MISS GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.

MISS LEONORA JACKSON, Violinist.
(First Appearance in Providence.)

MISS ELSA RUEGGER, Violoncellist.
(First Appearance in Providence.)

MR. ERNST DOHNANYI, Pianist.
(First Appearance in Providence.)

AND OTHERS, to be announced.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of eight concerts, $7.00.

Season ticket holders of last season will be allowed to re[illegible] same seats. Applications, with check or money order, should be sent to C. A. Ellis, Music Hall, Boston, Mass.

The public sale of season tickets opens at INFANTRY HALL on MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 16, at 9 o'clock.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.
C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

1702d to 1707th CONCERT.

NOVEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, November 5, at 7, P. M. South Terminal Station, Track 16.

Arrive Philadelphia, Broad Street Station Penna. R. R., Monday, November 6, at 7, A. M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, November 7, Baltimore & Ohio R. R., Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 12.45, P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Tuesday, November 7, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P. M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Wednesday, November 8, at 7, A. M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, CARNEGIE HALL.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, November 8, at 2.30.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday Evening, November 9, at 8, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, November 10, at 8, P. M.

Leave New York, Depot Central Railroad of New Jersey, Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Saturday, November 11, at 1 P. M.

Arrive Philadelphia, Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Streets, 3, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, at 8.15, P. M.

Leave Philadelphia, Reading Terminal, Twelfth and Market Streets, at 12.05, midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10 30, P. M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Station, Sunday, November 12, at 10.03, A. M.

Arrive Boston, South Terminal Station, Sunday, November 12, at 4.30, P. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, November 4, 1899.

☞ Special attention is called to the change in the hour of the New York Matinee, from 2 to 2.30.

SHIPM
Invoice
BC

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

1719th to 1724th CONCERT.

DECEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, December 10, at 7, P. M. South Terminal Station, Track 16.

Arrive Philadelphia, Broad Street Station Penna. R. R., Monday, December 11, at 7, A. M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, December 12, Baltimore & Ohio R. R., Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 12.45, P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Tuesday, December 12, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P. M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Wednesday, December 13, at 7, A. M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, CARNEGIE HALL.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, December 13, at 2.30.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday Evening, December 14, at 8, P. M.

Leave New York, Depot Central Railroad of New Jersey, Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Friday, December 15, at 1 P. M.

Arrive Philadelphia, Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Streets, 3, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, at 8.15, P. M.

Leave Philadelphia, Reading Terminal, Twelfth and Market Streets, at 10.30, P. M., sharp.

Arrive New York, Depot Central Railroad of N. J., 12.30, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 16, at 8, P. M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Station, Saturday, at midnight.

Arrive Boston, South Terminal Station, Sunday, December 17, at 7, A. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, December 9, 1899.

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

1769th to 1774th CONCERT.

MARCH ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, March 18, at 7, P. M. South Terminal Station, Track 16.

Arrive Philadelphia, Broad Street Station Penna. R. R., Monday, March 19, at 7, A.M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, March 20, Baltimore & Ohio R.R., Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 12.45, P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., at 8.15, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R R., Tuesday, March 20, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P. M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Wednesday, March 21, at 7, A.M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, CARNEGIE HALL.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, March 21, at 2.30.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday Evening, March 22, at 8.15, P.M.

Leave New York, Depot Central Railroad of New Jersey, Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Friday, March 23, at 1 P. M.

Arrive Philadelphia, Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Streets, 3, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, at 8.15, P. M.

Leave Philadelphia, Reading Terminal, Twelfth and Market Streets, at 10.30, P. M., sharp.

Arrive New York, Depot Central Railroad of N. J., 12.30, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, March 24, at 8.15, P. M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Station, Saturday, at midnight.

Arrive Boston, South Terminal Station, Sunday, March 25, at 7, A. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, March 17, 1900. [OVER.]

INFANTRY HALL.
NEWS.

Providence, Rhode Island.
MONDAY, OCTOBER 9, 1899.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

Nineteenth
Season,
1899-1900

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA
MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

Eighteenth Season in Providence

Eight Concerts.

Wednesday Evening, Oct. 25,
Wednesday Evening, Nov. 15,
Wednesday Evening, Dec. 20,
Wednesday Evening, Jan. 31,
Wednesday Evening, March 7,
Wednesday Evening, March 28,
Wednesday Evening, April 11
Wednesday Evening, April 25,

AT 8 O'CLOCK, SHARP.

Solo Artists.

MISS CLARA BUTT, the famous English Contralto.
(First Appearance in Providence.)
MISS GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.
MISS LEONORA JACKSON, Violinist.
(First Appearance in Providence.)
MISS ELSA RUEGGER, Violoncellist.
(First Appearance in Providence.)
MR. ERNST DOHNANYI, Pianist.
(First Appearance in Providence.)
AND OTHERS, to be announced.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of eight concerts, $7.00.

Season ticket holders of last season will be allowed to reta[illegible] same seats. Applications, with check or money order, should be sent to C. A. Ellis, Music Hall, Boston, Mass.

The public sale of season tickets opens at INFANTRY HALL on MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 16, at 9 o'clock.

F. R. COMEE,
Assistant Manager.

C. A. ELLIS,
Manager.

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

1702d to 1707th CONCERT.

NOVEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, November 5, at 7, P. M. South Terminal Station, Track 16.

Arrive Philadelphia, Broad Street Station Penna. R. R., Monday, November 6, at 7, A. M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, November 7, Baltimore & Ohio R. R., Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 12.45, P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Tuesday, November 7, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P. M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Wednesday, November 8, at 7, A. M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, CARNEGIE HALL.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, November 8, at 2.30.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday Evening, November 9, at 8, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, November 10, at 8, P. M.

Leave New York, Depot Central Railroad of New Jersey, Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Saturday, November 11, at 1 P. M.

Arrive Philadelphia, Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Streets, 3, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, at 8.15, P. M.

Leave Philadelphia, Reading Terminal, Twelfth and Market Streets, at 12.05, midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10 30, P. M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Station, Sunday, November 12, at 10.03, A. M.

Arrive Boston, South Terminal Station, Sunday, November 12, at 4.30, P. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, November 4, 1899.

☞ Special attention is called to the change in the hour of the New York Matinee, from 2 to 2.30.

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

1719th to 1724th CONCERT.

DECEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, December 10, at 7, P. M. South Terminal Station, Track 16.

Arrive Philadelphia, Broad Street Station Penna. R. R., Monday, December 11, at 7, A. M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, December 12, Baltimore & Ohio R. R., Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 12.45, P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St., at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved at owner's expense.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Tuesday, December 12, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P. M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Wednesday, December 13, at 7, A. M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, CARNEGIE HALL.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall. Wednesday, December 13, at 2.30.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday Evening, December 14, at 8, P. M.

Leave New York, Depot Central Railroad of New Jersey, Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Friday, December 15, at 1 P. M.

Arrive Philadelphia, Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Streets, 3, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, at 8.15, P. M.

Leave Philadelphia, Reading Terminal, Twelfth and Market Streets, at 10.30, P. M., sharp.

Arrive New York, Depot Central Railroad of N. J., 12.30, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 16, at 8, P. M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Station, Saturday, at midnight.

Arrive Boston, South Terminal Station, Sunday, December 17, at 7, A. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGER.

SATURDAY, December 9, 1899.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-1900

A PERMANENT ORCHESTRA MAINTAINED SOLELY FOR CONCERT PERFORMANCES.

Eighteenth Season in Providence

Eight Concerts.

Wednesday Evening, Oct. 25,
Wednesday Evening, Nov. 15,
Wednesday Evening, Dec. 20,
Wednesday Evening, Jan. 31,
Wednesday Evening, March 7,
Wednesday Evening, March 28,
Wednesday Evening, April 11
Wednesday Evening, April 25.

AT 8 O'CLOCK, SHARP.

Solo Artists.

MISS CLARA BUTT, the famous English Contralto.
(First Appearance in Providence.)

MISS GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.

MISS LEONORA JACKSON, Violinist.
(First Appearance in Providence.)

MISS ELSA RUEGGER, Violoncellist.
(First Appearance in Providence.)

MR. ERNST DOHNANYI, Pianist.
(First Appearance in Providence.)

AND OTHERS, to be announced.

Programme books with descriptive notes on the works to be performed will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Subscription tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of eight concerts, $7.00.

Season ticket holders of last season will be allowed to [illegible] same seats. Applications, with check or money order, should be sent to C. A. Ellis, Music Hall, Boston, Mass.

The public sale of season tickets opens at INFANTRY HALL on MONDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 16, at 9 o'clock.

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

PROGRAMMES.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... PHILADELPHIA,
MONDAY EVENING, MARCH 19, AT 8.15

WEBER.	OVERTURE to "Oberon."
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE. No. 4.
TCHAIKOVSKY.	FANTASY–OVERTURE, "Hamlet."
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 4.

Soloist, Mr. ERNST VON DOHNANYI.

MUSIC HALL, ... BALTIMORE,
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20, AT 8.15.

SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 4.
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANFORTE, No. 4.
TCHAIKOVSKY.	FANTASY–OVERTURE, "Hamlet."
SMETANA.	OVERTURE, "The Bartered Bride."

Soloist, Mr. ERNST VON DOHNANYI.

CARNEGIE HALL, ... NEW YORK,
WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 21, AT 2.30.

SMETANA.	OVERTURE, "The Bartered Bride."
LALO.	SYMPHONIE ESPAGNOLE, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA.
TCHAIKOVSKY.	FANTASY–OVERTURE, "Hamlet."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 7.

Soloist, Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

CARNEGIE HALL, ... NEW YORK,
THURSDAY EVENING, MARCH 22, AT 8.15.

MOZART.	SYMPHONY in C major.
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, No. 4.
RICHARD STRAUSS.	SYMPHONIC POEM, "Thus Spake Zarathustra."
WEBER.	OVERTURE to "Oberon."

Soloist, Mr. ERNST VON DOHNANYI.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, . . . PHILADELPHIA,
FRIDAY EVENING, MARCH 23, AT 8.15.

SMETANA.	OVERTURE, "The Bartered Bride."
LALO.	SYMPHONIE ESPAGNOLE, for VIOLIN and ORCHESTRA.
PAINE.	"MOORISH DANCES."
BRAHMS.	SYMPHONY No. 2.

Soloist, Mr. T. ADAMOWSKI.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, ... BROOKLYN,
SATURDAY EVENING, MARCH 24, AT 8.15.

WEBER.	OVERTURE to "Oberon."
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE. No. 4.
PAINE.	"MOORISH DANCES."
BEETHOVEN.	SYMPHONY No. 7.

Soloist, Mr. ERNST VON DOHNANYI.

[OVER.]

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

1702d to 1707th CONCERT.

NOVEMBER ITINERARY.

Leave Boston Sunday, November 5, at 7, P. M. South Termina Station, Track 16.

Arrive Philadelphia, Broad Street Station Penna. R. R., Monday November 6, at 7, A. M.

CONTINENTAL HOTEL.

Concert at Academy of Music at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved a owner's expense.

Leave Philadelphia, Tuesday, November 7, Baltimore & Ohio R. R. Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Sts., at 10.22, A.M.

Arrive Baltimore, at 12.45, P. M.

Concert at Music Hall, Mount Royal Avenue and Cathedral St. at 8, P.M.

Hotel baggage not ready directly after the concert will be moved a owner's expense.

Leave Baltimore, Camden Street Station, B. & O. R. R., Tuesday November 7, at midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10, P. M.

Arrive New York, Depot Central R. R. of N. J., Wednesday, November 8, at 7, A. M.

NEW YORK ADDRESS, CARNEGIE HALL.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, November 8, at 2.30.

Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday Evening, November 9, at 8, P. M

Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, November 10, a 8, P. M.

Leave New York, Depot Central Railroad of New Jersey, Ferry foot of Liberty Street, Saturday, November 11, at 1 P. M.

Arrive Philadelphia, Twenty-fourth and Chestnut Streets, 3, P. M.

Concert at Academy of Music, at 8.15, P. M.

Leave Philadelphia, Reading Terminal, Twelfth and Market Streets, at 12.05, midnight. Sleeping cars ready at 10 30, P. M.

Leave New York, Grand Central Station, Sunday, November 12, at 10.03, A. M.

Arrive Boston, South Terminal Station, Sunday, November 12, at 4.30, P. M.

Instruments must be ready and marked to-night (Saturday), after the Concert.

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
F. R. COMEE, ASS'T MANAGE

SATURDAY, November 4, 1899.

☞ Special attention is called to the change in the hour of the New York Matinee, from 2 to 2.30.

THE SUNDAY HERALD — BOSTON, SEPTEMBER 17.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL.

NINETEENTH SEASON—1899-1900.

* *

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

* *

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR,

WILL GIVE A SERIES OF

24 CONCERTS,

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 14, 1899, to April 28, 1900, Omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1899, Jan. 20, Feb. 24 and March 24, 1900, and

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS,

On Consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1899, to April 27, 1900, Omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1899, Jan. 19, Feb. 23 and March 23, 1900.

Soloists: Mme. TERNINA, Miss AUS DER OHE, Mme. BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER, Miss HEYMAN, Miss LEONORA JACKSON, Miss RUEGGER, Messrs. PADEREWSKI, DOHNANYI, PETSCHNIKOFF, HAMBOURG, KNEISEL, SCHROEDER, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI and Others.

TICKETS for the Series of Concerts and for the Series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Monday, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Tuesday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.
Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets Will Be Delivered in the Hall, and Must be Paid for as Soon as Bought or They Will Be Resold.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVI., NO. 80.

MONDAY, SEPT. 18, 1899.

MUSIC HALL. | BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

19th Season 1899-1900.

24 CONCERTS,

On Consecutive Saturday Evenings, from Oct. 14, 1899, to April 28, 1900, omitting Nov. 11, Dec. 16, 1899, Jan. 20, Feb. 24 and March 24, 1900, and

24 PUBLIC REHEARSALS

On Consecutive Friday Afternoons, from Oct. 13, 1899, to April 27, 1900, omitting Nov. 10, Dec. 15, 1899, Jan. 19, Feb. 23 and March 23, 1900.

Soloists: Mmes. SEMBRICH, TERNINA, Miss AUS DER OHE, Mme. BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER, Miss HEYMAN, Miss LEONORA JACKSON, Miss RUEGGER, Messrs. PADEREWSKI, DOHNANYI, PETSCHNIKOFF, HAMBOURG, KNEISEL, SCHROEDER, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI and others.

Tickets for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12 and $7.50, according to location.

The $12 Seats for Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, Sept. 25, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall, TUESDAY, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.

The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, THURSDAY, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner, at the same place, on FRIDAY, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought or they will be resold.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

NINETEENTH SEASON

AUCTION SALE OF $12.00 SEATS FOR SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS AT MUSIC HALL, THURSDAY, SEPT. 28, AT 10 O'CLOCK

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Concerts FRIDAY, Sept. 29. [A]

TRANSCRIPT,

SEPTEMBER 23,

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900

SOLO ARTISTS

Mesdames SEMBRICH, TERNINA, AUS DER OHE, BLOOMFIELD-ZEISLER, HEYMAN, LEONORA JACKSON, RUEGGER. Messrs. PADEREWSKI, DOHNANYI, HAMBOURG, PETSCHNIKOFF, KNEISEL, LOEFFLER, ADAMOWSKI, SCHROEDER and others.

Auction Sale of $12 Seats for the Friday Afternoon Public Rehearsals at Music Hall, Next Monday Beginning at 10 o'clock

Auction Sale of $7.50 Seats for Rehearsals, Tuesday, Sept. 26, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 12.00 Seats for Concerts, Thursday, Sept. 28, at 10 A. M.
Auction Sale of 7.50 Seats for Concerts, Friday, Sept. 29, at 10 A. M.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC, PHILADELPHIA.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-1900.

Special Announcement.

THE Boston Symphony Orchestra will give two series of five concerts each in Philadelphia during the coming season of 1899-1900 in the Academy of Music. Both series will be the same in character and equally attractive, but with different programmes and soloists. The same scale of prices as in the past will prevail for both series.

There will be a separate sale of season tickets for each series. The sale of season tickets for the Monday evening series will open on Monday, October 16, 1899. In just and grateful recognition of their generous and steadfast patronage for so many years, season ticket holders of last season will be allowed to retain their seats for Monday evening series of next season, payment for the same to be made on or before Saturday, October 21, by cash or check made payable to Miss H. Harris, to whom all renewals of seats should be sent at 1103 Chestnut street, (office open October 2)

On the following Monday, October 23, the season tickets for the Friday evening series will be offered for sale, absolutely "first come, first served," in deference to the steadily increasing patronage unable for several seasons past to secure seats of any description. For the Friday evening series, personal application for seats will of course receive first attention, after which mail orders accompanied by cash or check will be filled in the order in which they are received. Judging from frequent experiences in Boston, New York, and Brooklyn, the management hopes that Philadelphia patrons will find each series sufficiently attractive to induce them to attend both.

CHARLES A. ELLIS, Manager.
FREDERIC R. COMEE, Assistant Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
FOUNDED 1881.
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

CHARLES A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
FREDERIC R. COMEE, ASSISTANT MANAGER.

October 9, 1899.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October fifteenth, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,
C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
FOUNDED 1881.
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

CHARLES A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
FREDERIC R. COMEE, ASSISTANT MANAGER.

September 20, 1899.

DEAR MADAM:

We beg to call your attention to the announcement of the two series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall.

Should you desire to subscribe, please sign and mail enclosed order, indicating the location of seats preferred.

Yours respectfully,
C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

BOSTON
MUSIC HALL

NINETEENTH SEASON
1899–1900

Winter Street and Hamilton Place.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

❧

Twenty-four Concerts

On consecutive SATURDAY EVENINGS, from October 14, 1899, to April 28, 1900, omitting November 11, December 16, 1899, January 20, February 24, and March 24, 1900, and

Twenty-four Public Rehearsals

On consecutive FRIDAY AFTERNOONS, from October 13, 1899, to April 27, 1900, omitting November 10, December 15, 1899, January 19, February 23, and March 23, 1900.

TICKETS for the series of Concerts and for the series of Rehearsals, $12.00 and $7.50 according to location.

The $12 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 26, at 10 A.M.

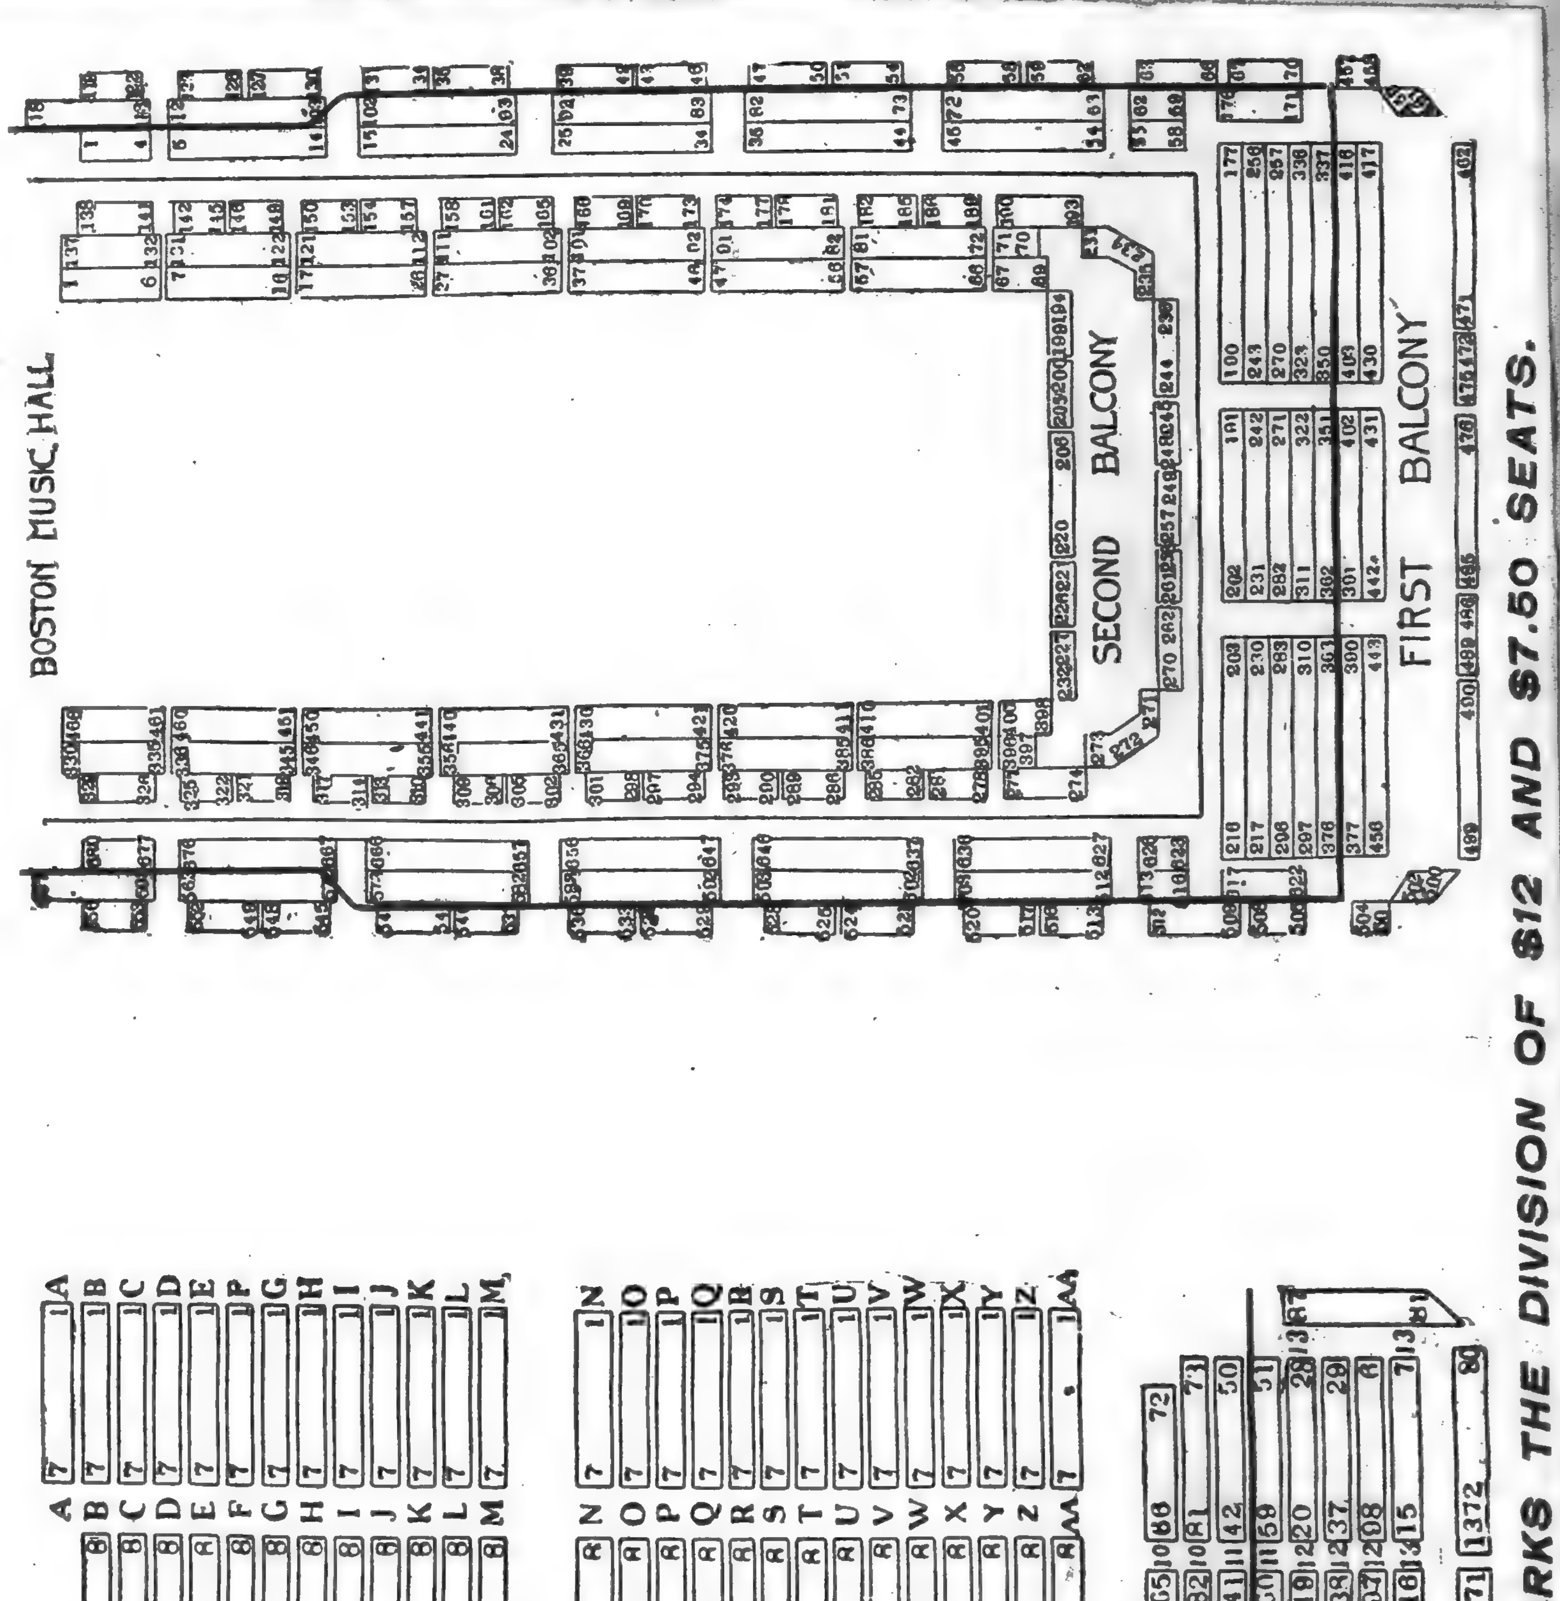
The $12 Seats for the Concerts will be sold at auction, at Music Hall, on THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, at 10 A.M.

The $7.50 Seats for the Concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, at 10 A.M.

Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a diagram, and will be marked off as sold.

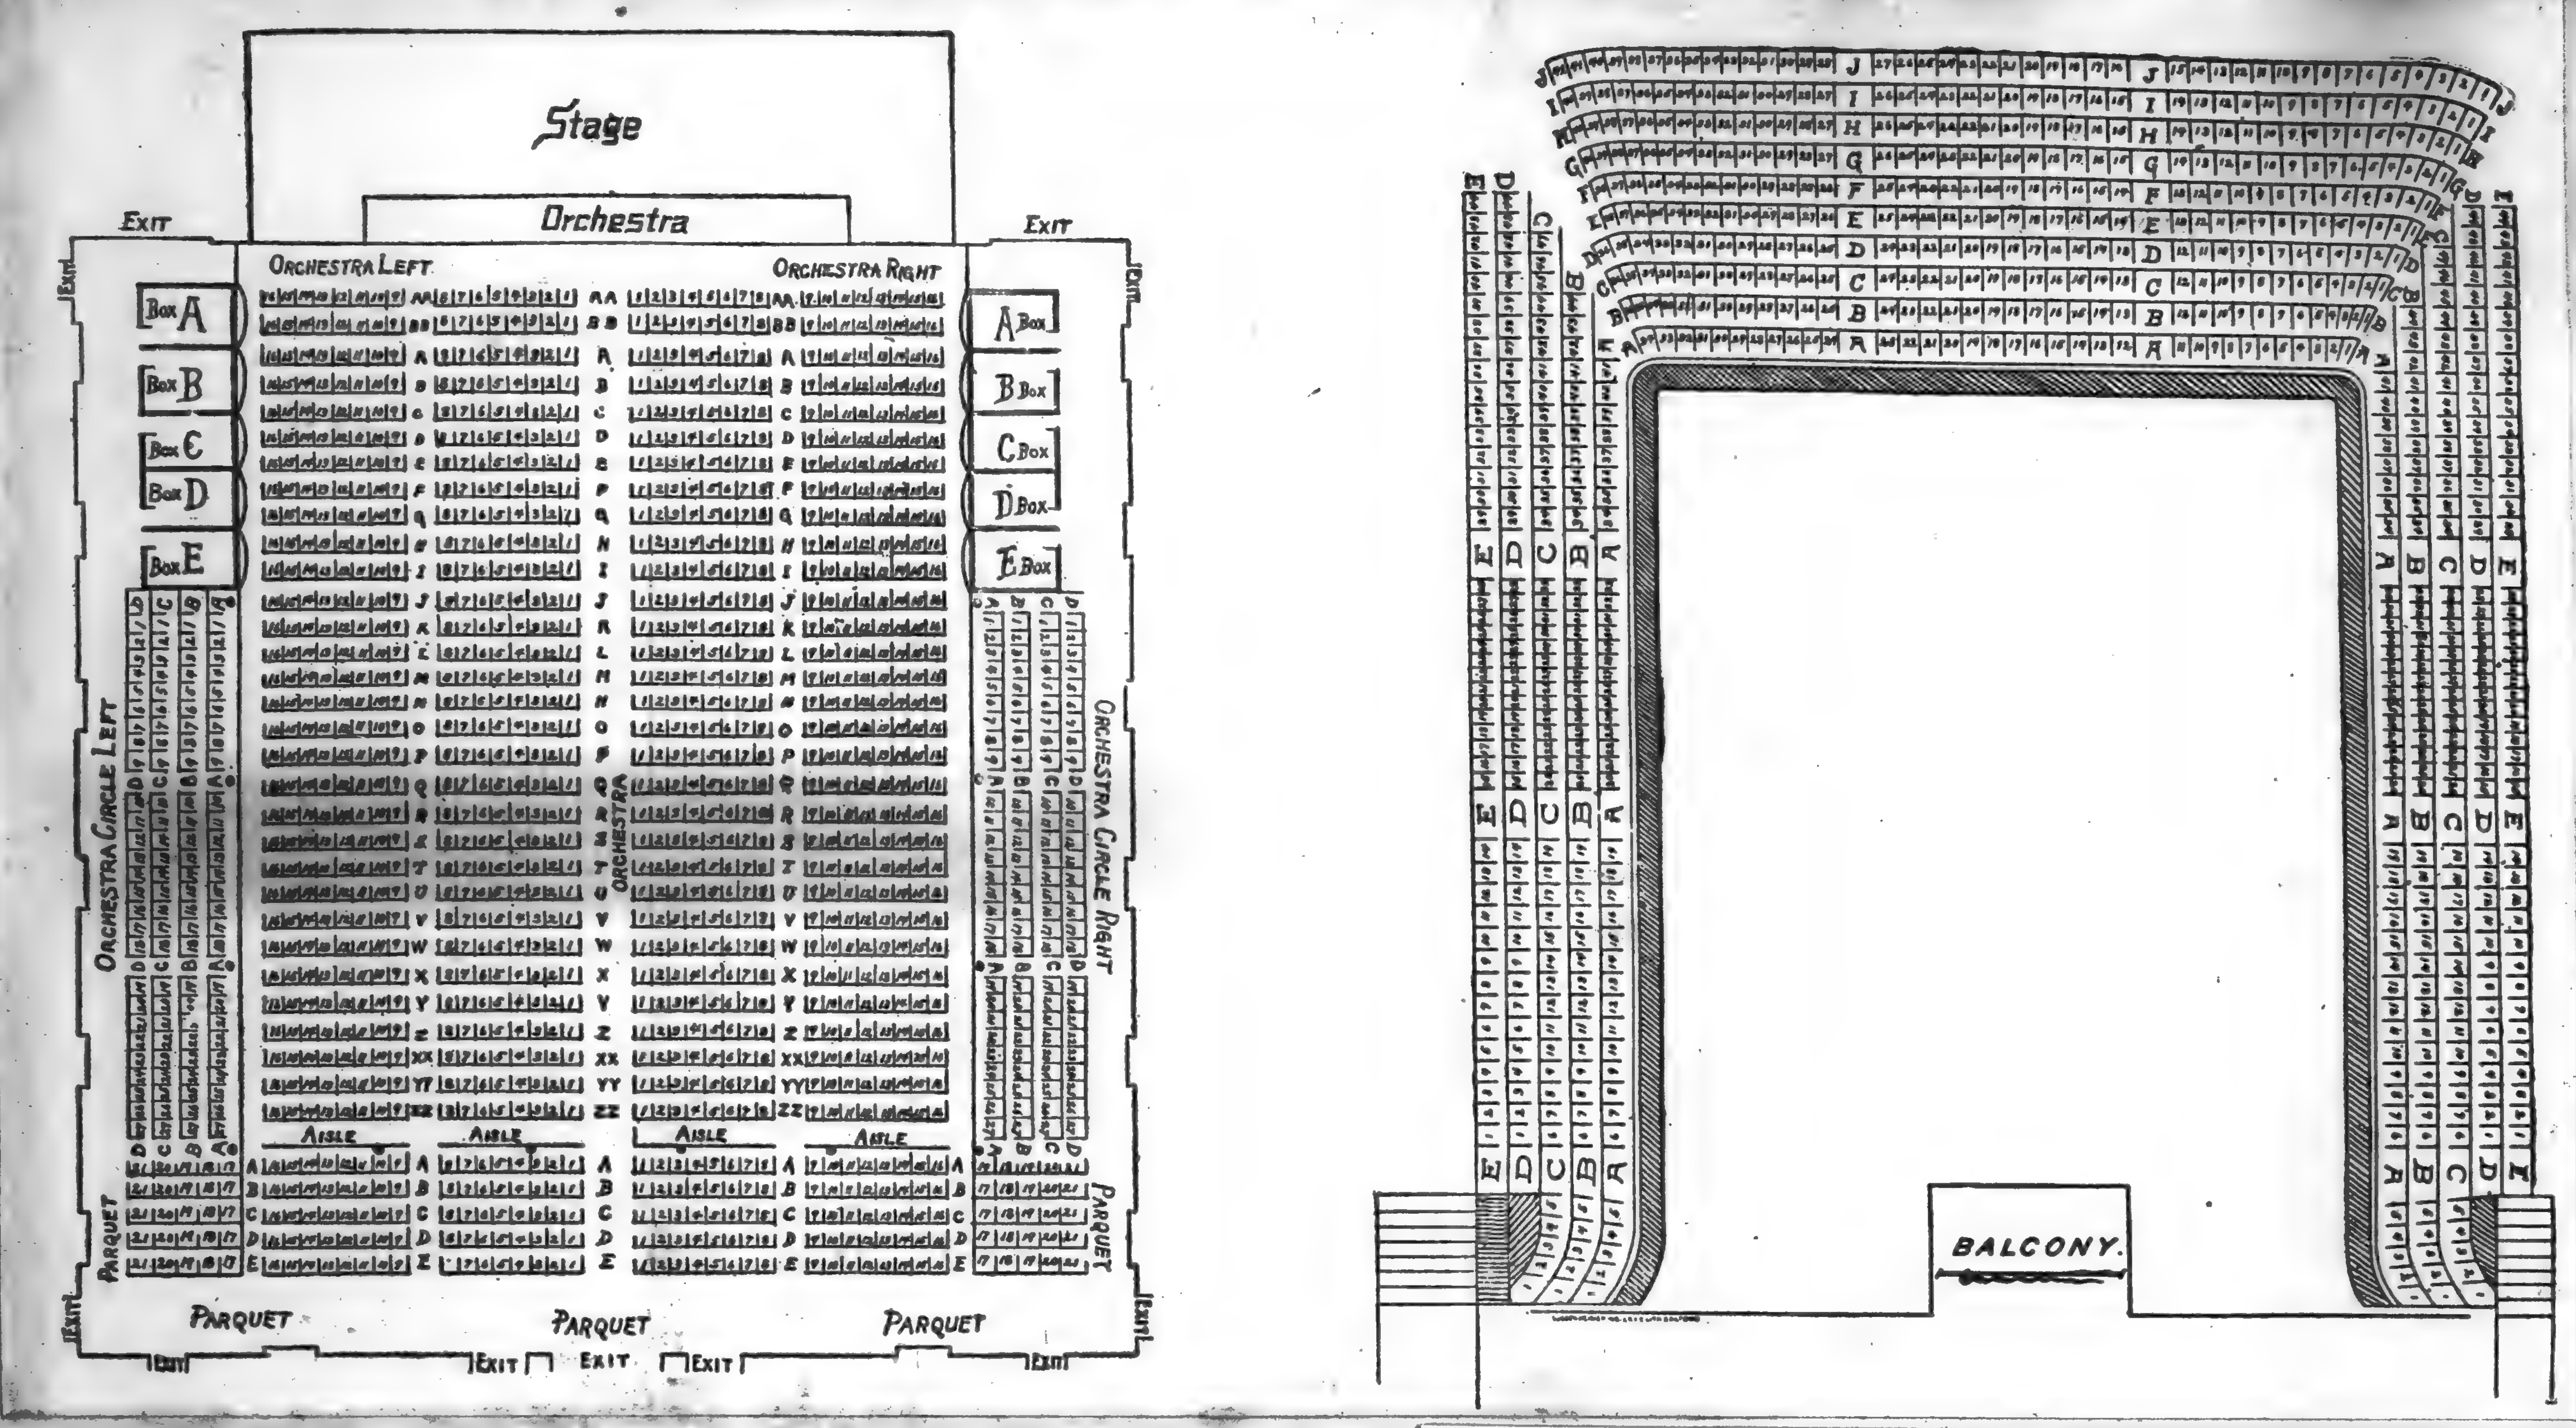
Tickets will be delivered in the Hall, and must be paid for as soon as bought, or they will be immediately resold.

(OVER.)



THE RED LINE MARKS THE DIVISION OF $12 AND $7.50 SEATS.

MUSIC HALL, BATIMORE.



Stage
Orchestra
Exit
Orchestra Left
Orchestra Right
Box A
Box B
Box C
Box D
Box E
A Box
B Box
C Box
D Box
E Box
Orchestra Circle Left
Orchestra Circle Right
Orchestra
Aisle
Parquet
Exit
Balcony

Baltimore, September 20, 1899.

I hereby subscribe for......................season tickets for the series of five Tuesday Evening Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

....

....

Location desired, as near as possible......................

....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
FOUNDED 1881.
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.
MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

CHARLES A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
FREDERIC R. COMEE, ASSISTANT MANAGER.

September 30, 1899.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the Tuesday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 10, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

Philadelphia, September 20, 1899.

I hereby subscribe for......................season tickets for the series of five Monday Evening Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

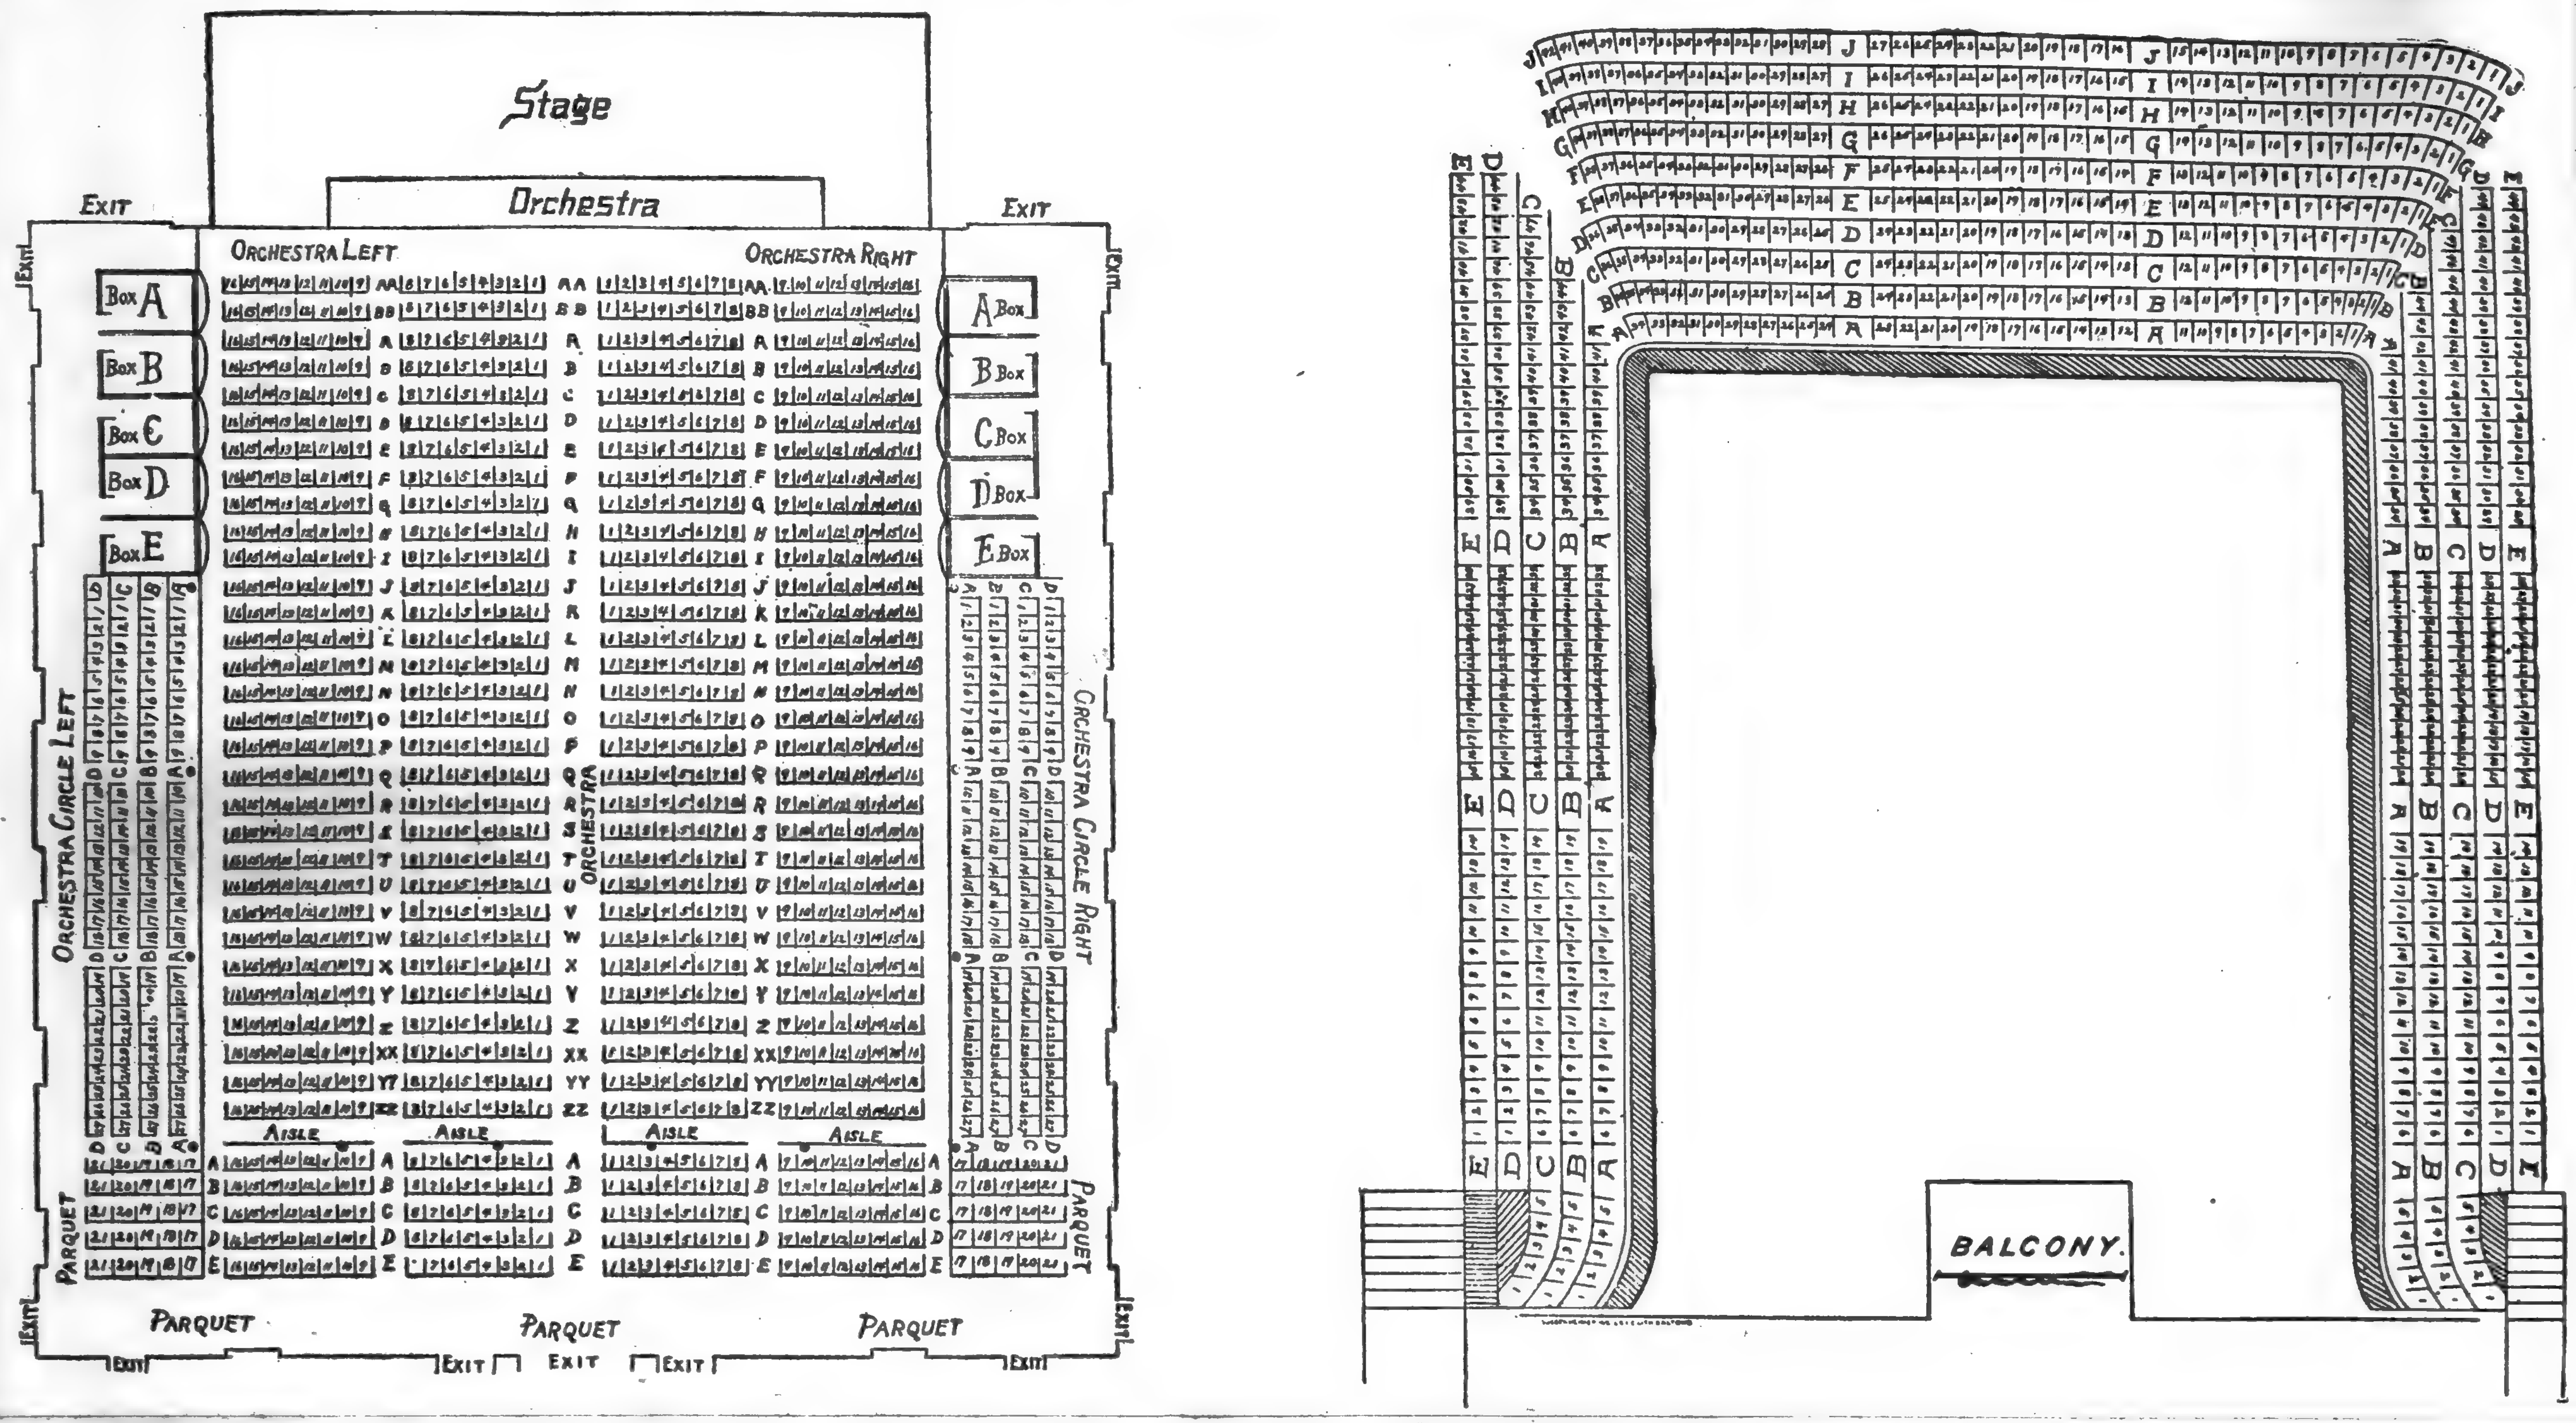
....

....

Location of seats last season......................

....

MUSIC HALL, BATIMORE.



Stage
Orchestra
Exit
Exit
Orchestra Left
Orchestra Right
Box A
Box B
Box C
Box D
Box E
A Box
B Box
C Box
D Box
E Box
Orchestra Circle Left
Orchestra
Orchestra Circle Right
Aisle
Aisle
Aisle
Aisle
Parquet
Parquet
Parquet
Parquet
Parquet
Exit
Exit
Exit
Exit
Exit
Balcony

Baltimore, September 20, 1899.

I hereby subscribe for.................................season tickets for the series of five Tuesday Evening Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall.

....

....

Location desired, as near as possible.............................

....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
FOUNDED 1881.
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.
MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.
CHARLES A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
FREDERIC R. COMEE, ASSISTANT MANAGER.

September 30, 1899.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the Tuesday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Music Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 10, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

Philadelphia, September 20, 1899.

I hereby subscribe for.................................season tickets for the series of five Monday Evening Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music.

....

....

Location of seats last season

COLORED PAPER

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, September 25, 1899.

Auction Sale of $12 Season Tickets for the FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS, at Music Hall, this (MONDAY) morning, at TEN o'clock.

POSTAL CARD - ONE CENT.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

THIS SIDE IS FOR THE ADDRESS ONLY.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, September 28, 1899.

Auction Sale of $12 Season Tickets for the SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, at Music Hall, this (THURSDAY) morning, at TEN o'clock.

POSTAL CARD - ONE CENT.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

THIS SIDE IS FOR THE ADDRESS ONLY.

Philadelphia, October , 1899.

Dear Sir:

Your subscription for .... Season Tickets, location ....

for the five Monday Evening Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, has been received. The tickets will be ready for delivery on Monday, October 16, at 1103 Chestnut Street, and must be paid for on or before Saturday, October 21.

Miss H. HARRIS.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
Founded 1881.
Wilhelm Gericke, Conductor.
Music Hall, Boston.
Charles A. Ellis, Manager.
Frederic R. Comee, Assistant Manager.

September 20, 1899.

Dear Sir:

As a subscriber to the Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October first, indicating the location of seats. ✓

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

[illegible] SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1899-1900.

$12 CONCERTS.

No. ....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

899.

[illegible]

SEASON 1899-1900.

$12 REHEARSALS.

No. ....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

COLORED PAPER

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, September 25, 1899.

Auction Sale of $12 Season Tickets for the FRIDAY AFTERNOON PUBLIC REHEARSALS, at Music Hall, this (MONDAY) morning, at TEN o'clock.

POSTAL CARD - ONE CENT.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

THIS SIDE IS FOR THE ADDRESS ONLY.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Boston, September 28, 1899.

Auction Sale of $12 Season Tickets for the SATURDAY EVENING CONCERTS, at Music Hall, this (THURSDAY) morning, at TEN o'clock.

POSTAL CARD - ONE CENT.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA.

THIS SIDE IS FOR THE ADDRESS ONLY.

Philadelphia, October , 1899.

Dear Sir:

Your subscription for .... Season Tickets, location .... for the five Monday Evening Concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music, has been received. The tickets will be ready for delivery on Monday, October 16, at 1103 Chestnut Street, and must be paid for on or before Saturday, October 21.

Miss H. Harris.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.
Founded 1881.
Wilhelm Gericke, Conductor.
Music Hall, Boston.
Charles A. Ellis, Manager.
Frederic R. Comee, Assistant Manager.

September 20, 1899.

Dear Sir:

As a subscriber to the Monday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October first, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. Ellis, Manager.

999.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1899-1900.

$12 CONCERTS.

No. ....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

999.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1899-1900.

$12 REHEARSALS.

No. ....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

599.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1899-1900.

$7.50 CONCERTS.

No. ....

Premium, ...

Name, ...

599.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

SEASON 1899-1900.

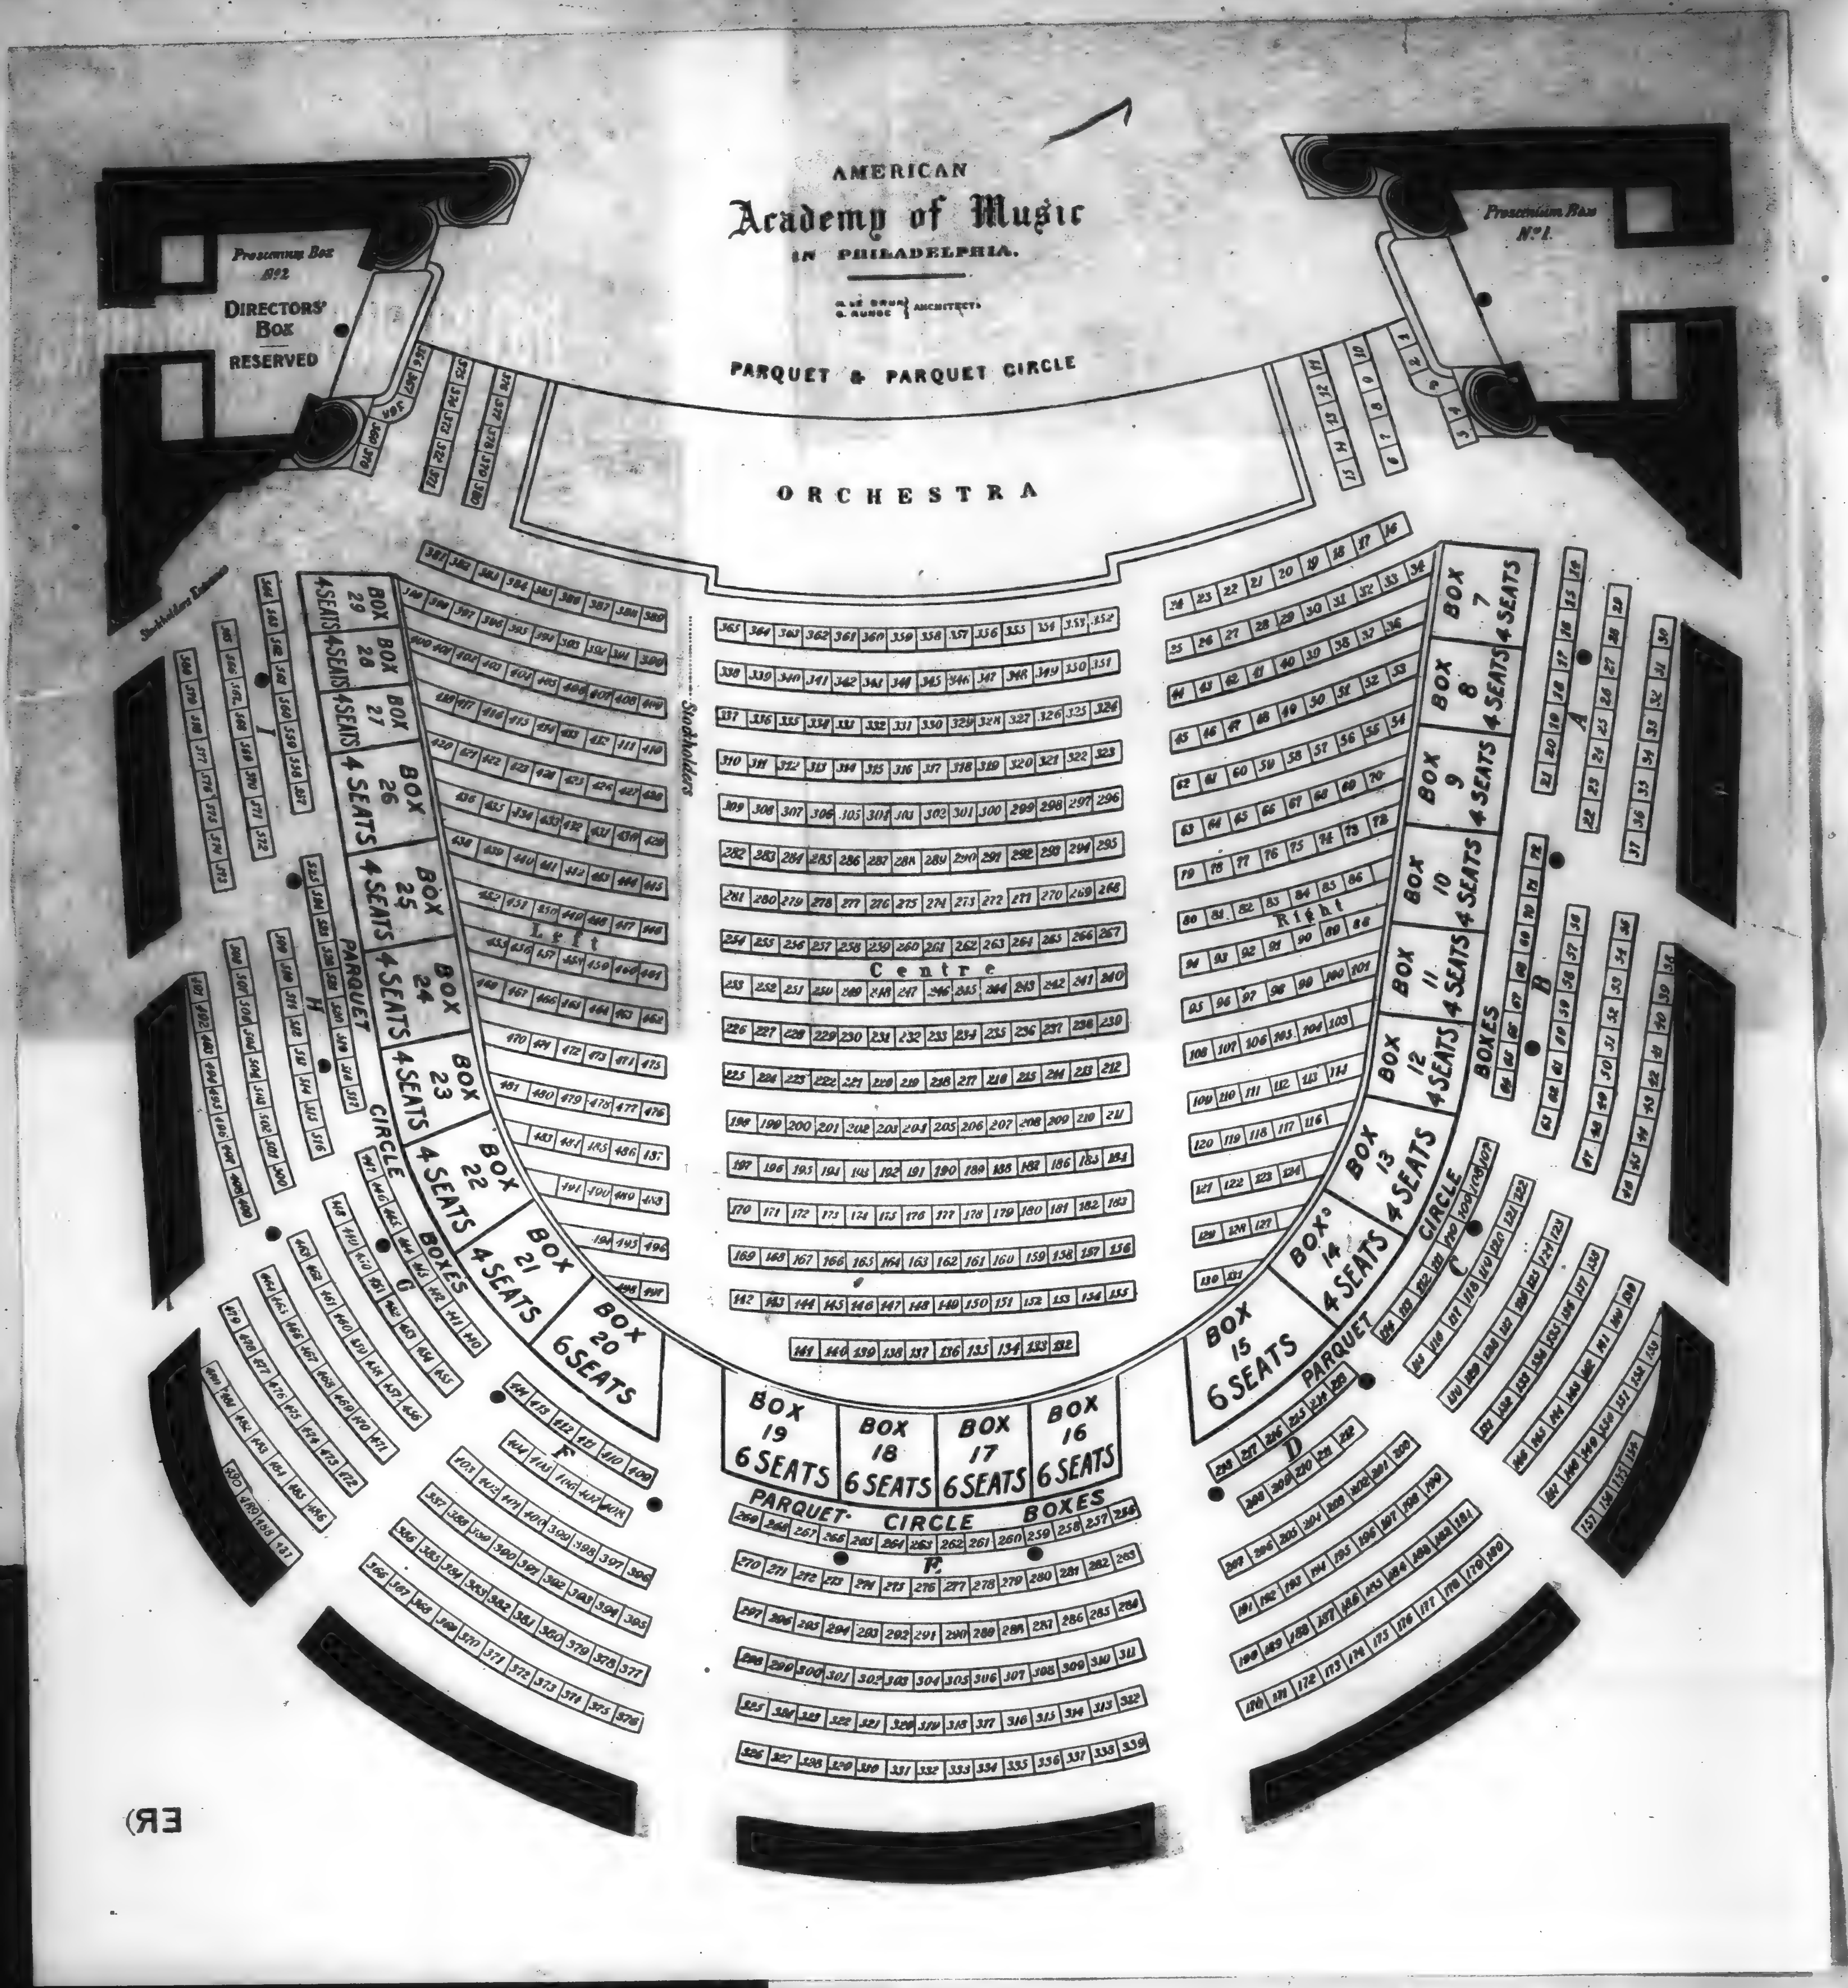
$7.50 REHEARSALS.

No. ....

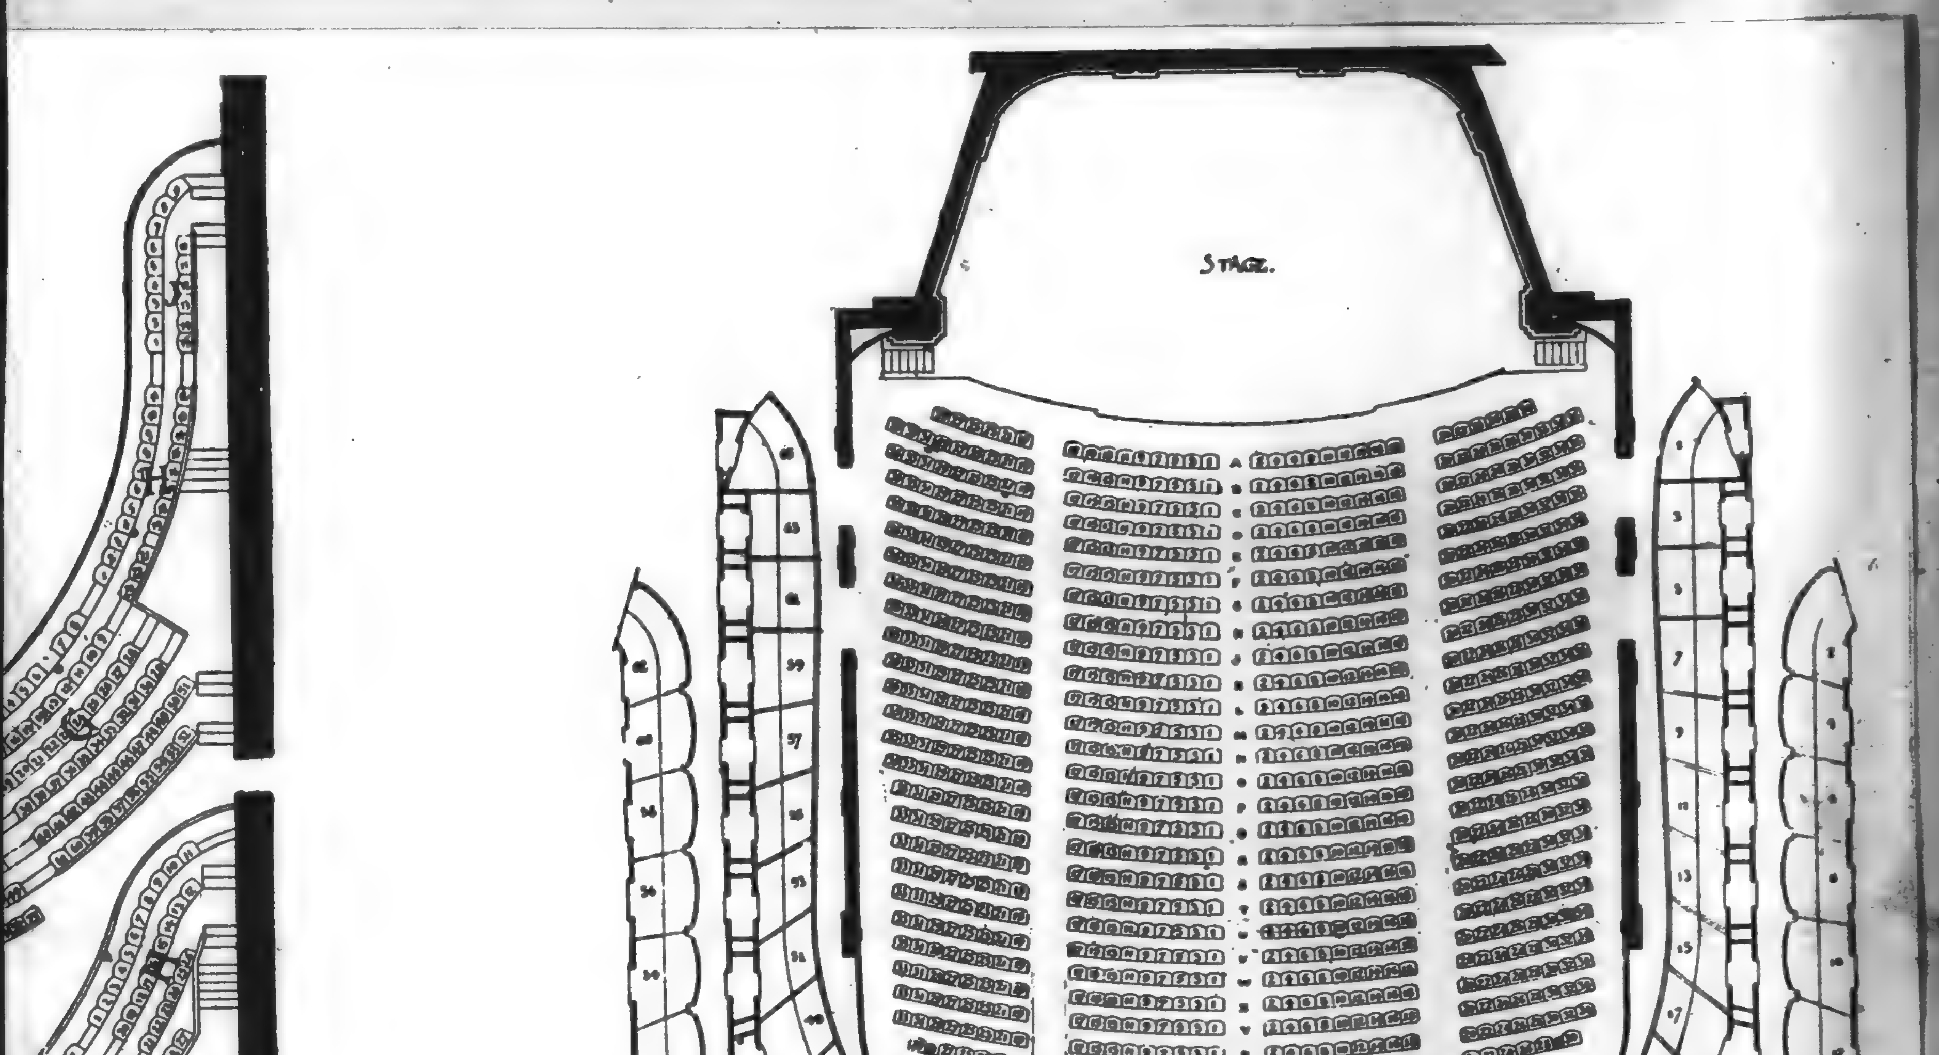
Premium, ...

Name, ...

[9]



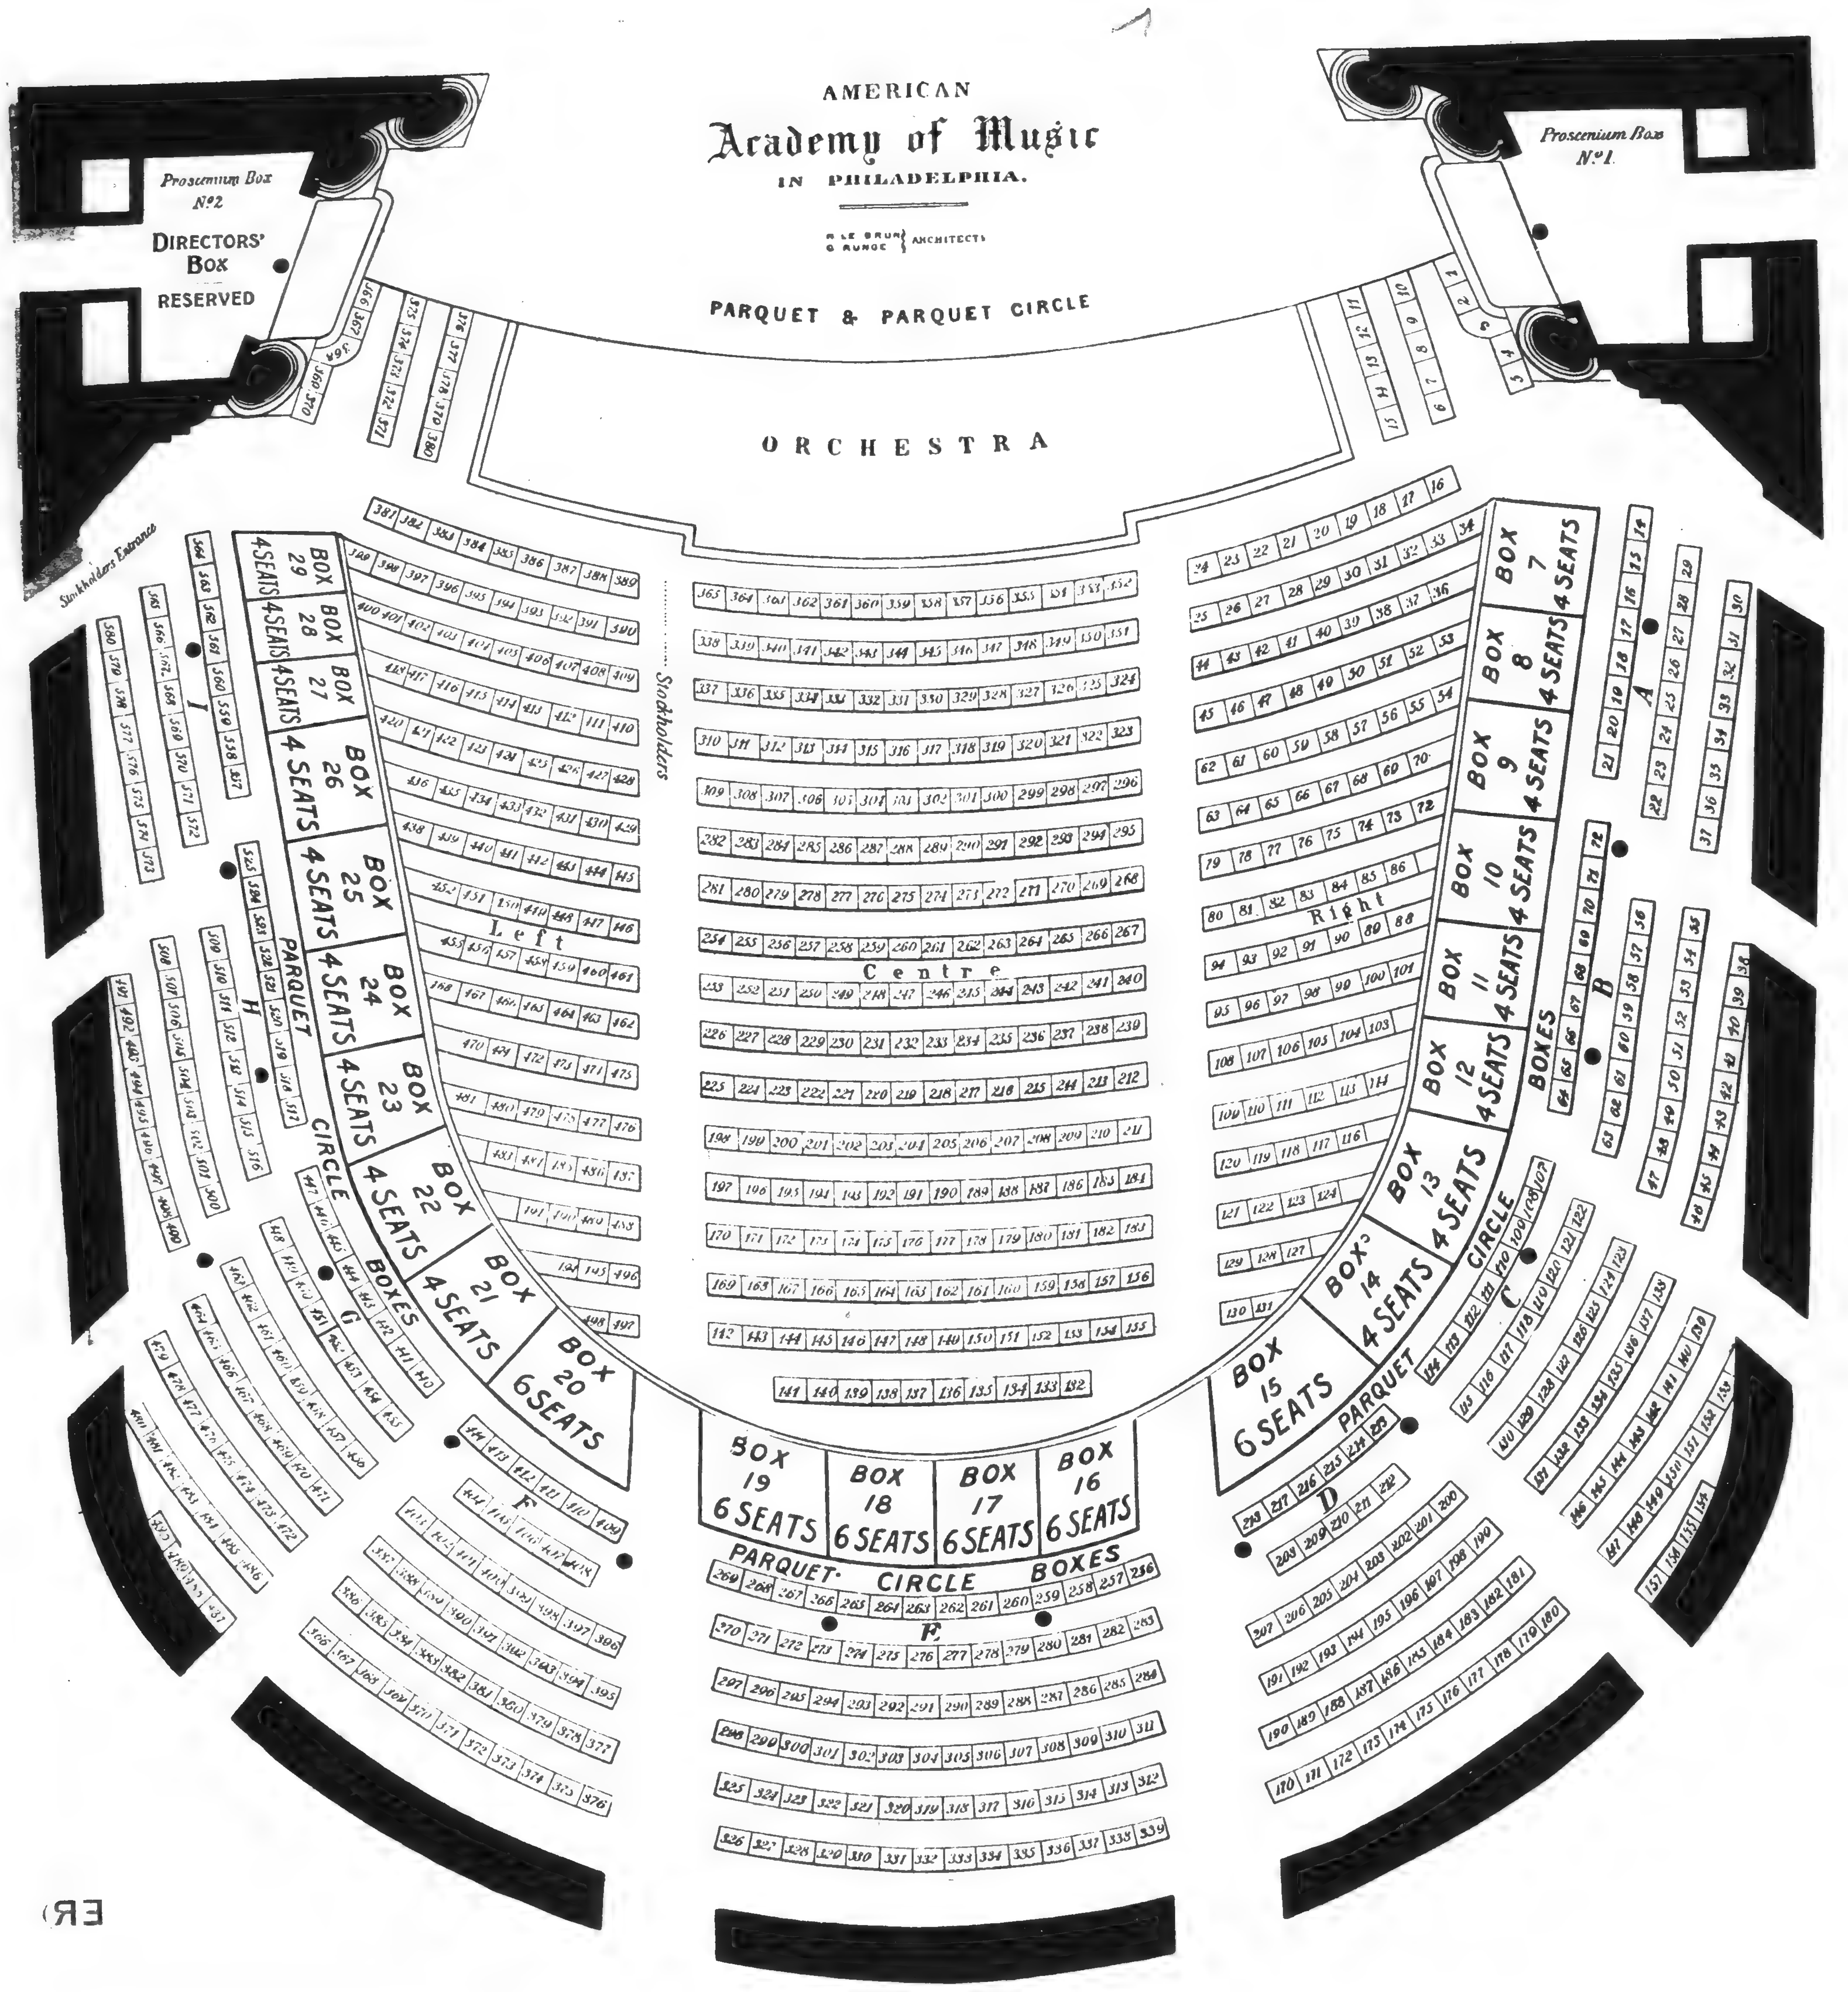
AMERICAN
Academy of Music
IN PHILADELPHIA.
N. LE BRUN
G. RUNGE
ARCHITECTS
PARQUET & PARQUET CIRCLE
ORCHESTRA
Proscenium Box No 2
DIRECTORS' BOX RESERVED
Proscenium Box No 1
Stockholders Entrance
Stockholders
Left
Centre
Right
BOX 29 4 SEATS
BOX 28 4 SEATS
BOX 27 4 SEATS
BOX 26 4 SEATS
BOX 25 4 SEATS
BOX 24 4 SEATS
BOX 23 4 SEATS
BOX 22 4 SEATS
BOX 21 4 SEATS
BOX 20 6 SEATS
BOX 19 6 SEATS
BOX 18 6 SEATS
BOX 17 6 SEATS
BOX 16 6 SEATS
BOX 15 6 SEATS
BOX 14 4 SEATS
BOX 13 4 SEATS
BOX 12 4 SEATS
BOX 11 4 SEATS
BOX 10 4 SEATS
BOX 9 4 SEATS
BOX 8 4 SEATS
BOX 7 4 SEATS
PARQUET CIRCLE BOXES
A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I



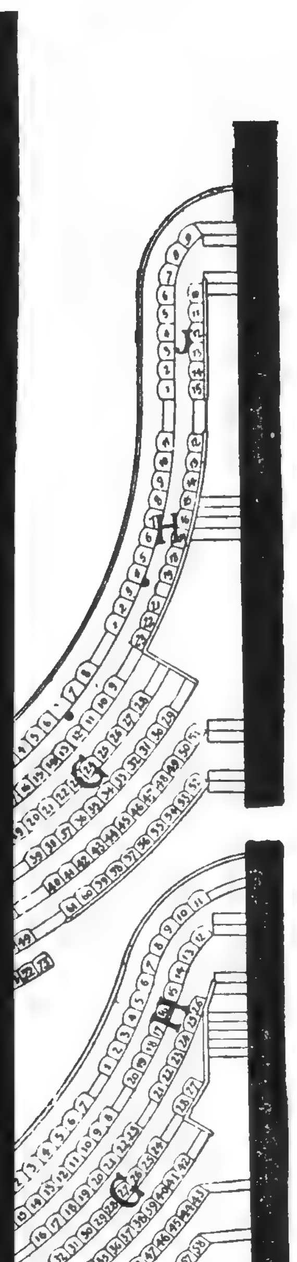
STAGE
PARQUET

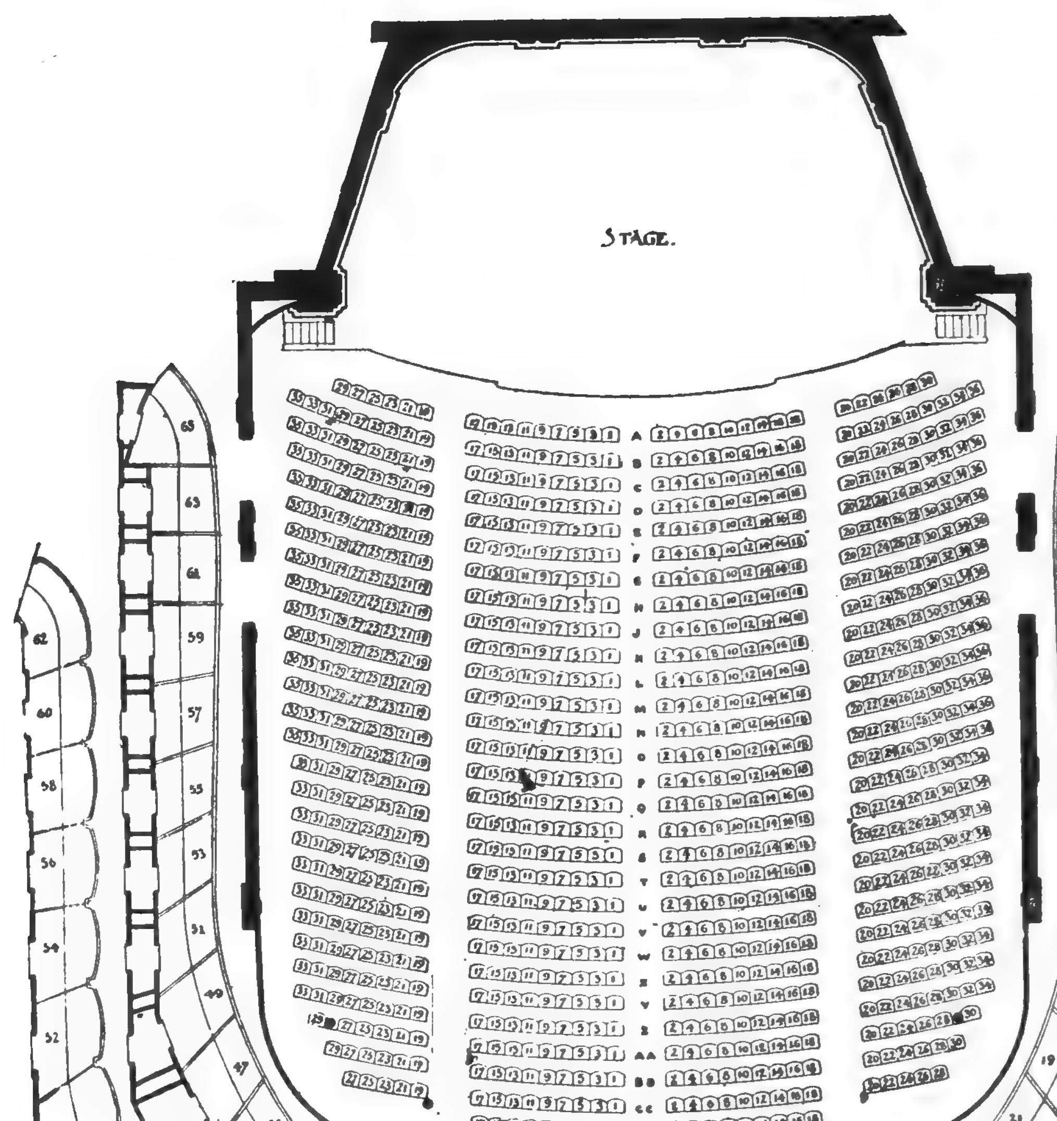
"Music Hall"
7th Ave and 57th St
New York
Diagram

[9]



AMERICAN
Academy of Music
IN PHILADELPHIA.
N. LE BRUN, G. RUNGE, ARCHITECTS
Proscenium Box No 2
DIRECTORS' Box RESERVED
Proscenium Box No 1
PARQUET & PARQUET CIRCLE
ORCHESTRA
Stockholders Entrance
Stockholders
Left
Centre
Right
PARQUET CIRCLE BOXES
BOX 7 4 SEATS
BOX 8 4 SEATS
BOX 9 4 SEATS
BOX 10 4 SEATS
BOX 11 4 SEATS
BOX 12 4 SEATS
BOX 13 4 SEATS
BOX 14 4 SEATS
BOX 15 6 SEATS
BOX 16 6 SEATS
BOX 17 6 SEATS
BOX 18 6 SEATS
BOX 19 6 SEATS
BOX 20 6 SEATS
BOX 21 4 SEATS
BOX 22 4 SEATS
BOX 23 4 SEATS
BOX 24 4 SEATS
BOX 25 4 SEATS
BOX 26 4 SEATS
BOX 27 4 SEATS
BOX 28 4 SEATS
BOX 29 4 SEATS
A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I

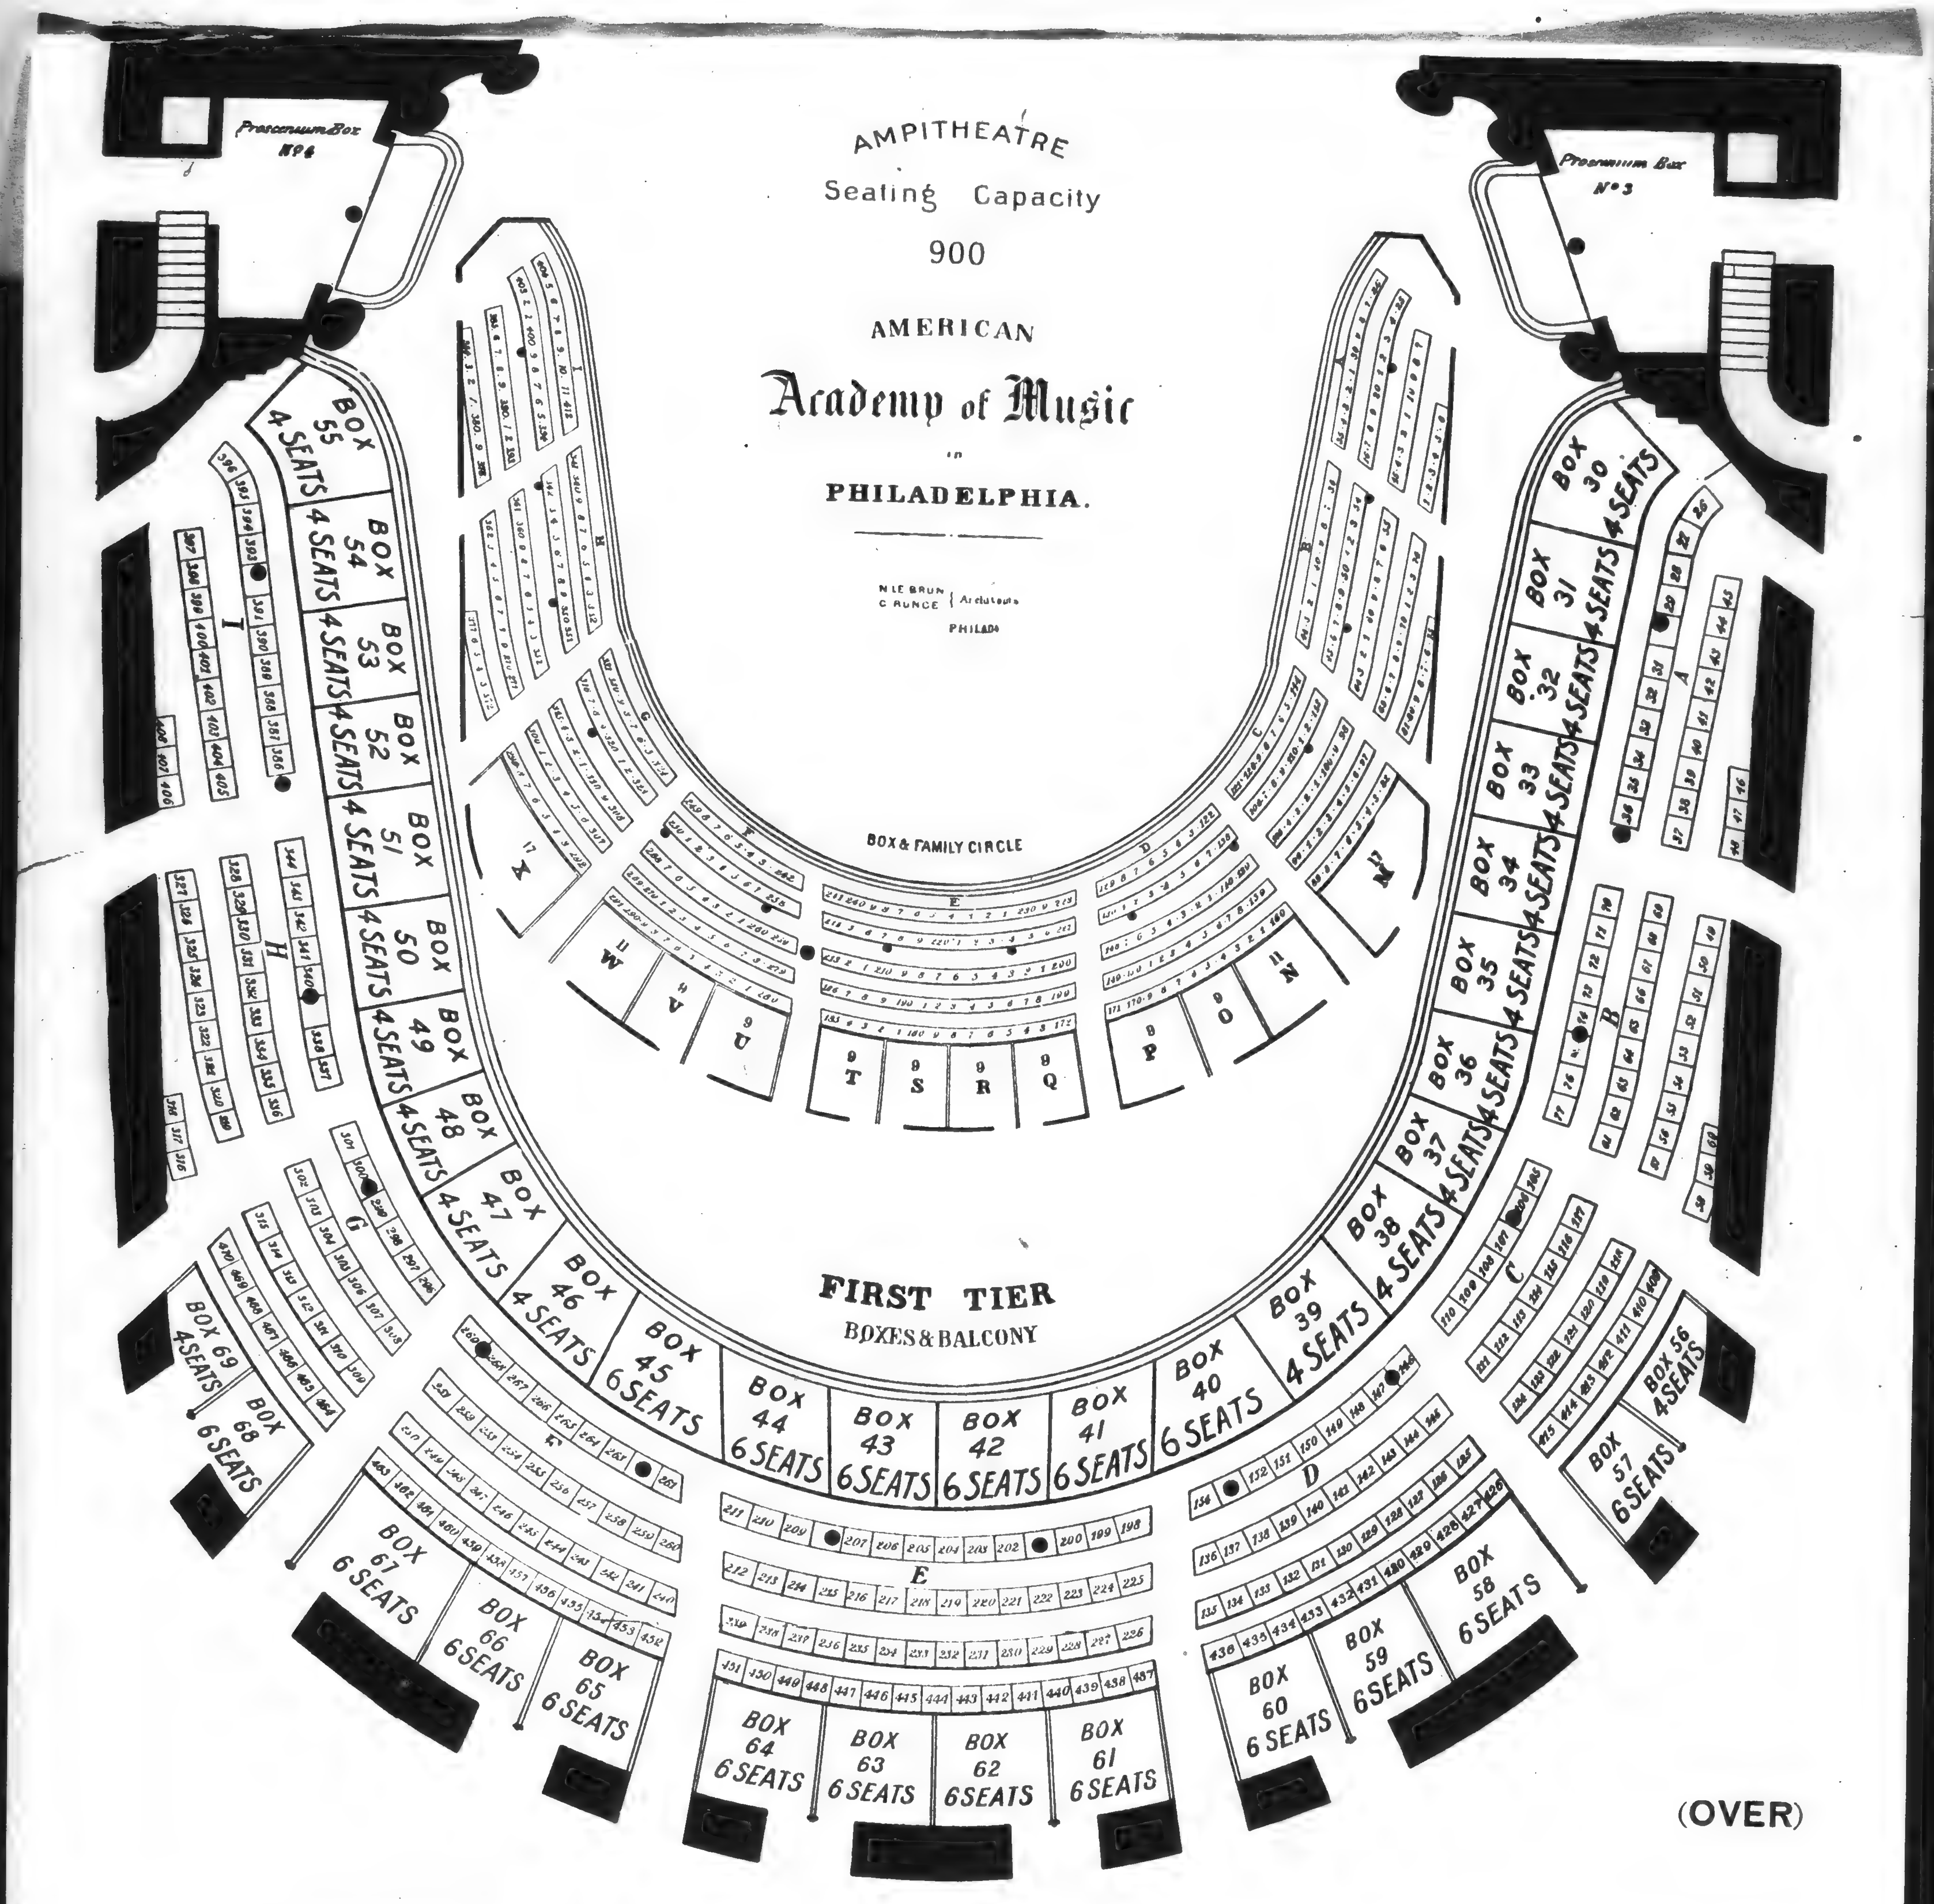




STAGE.
PARQUET
MGR'S BOX

"MUSIC HALL"
7TH AVE AND 57TH ST
NEW YORK

DIAGRAM.



AMPITHEATRE

Seating Capacity

900

AMERICAN

Academy of Music

in PHILADELPHIA.

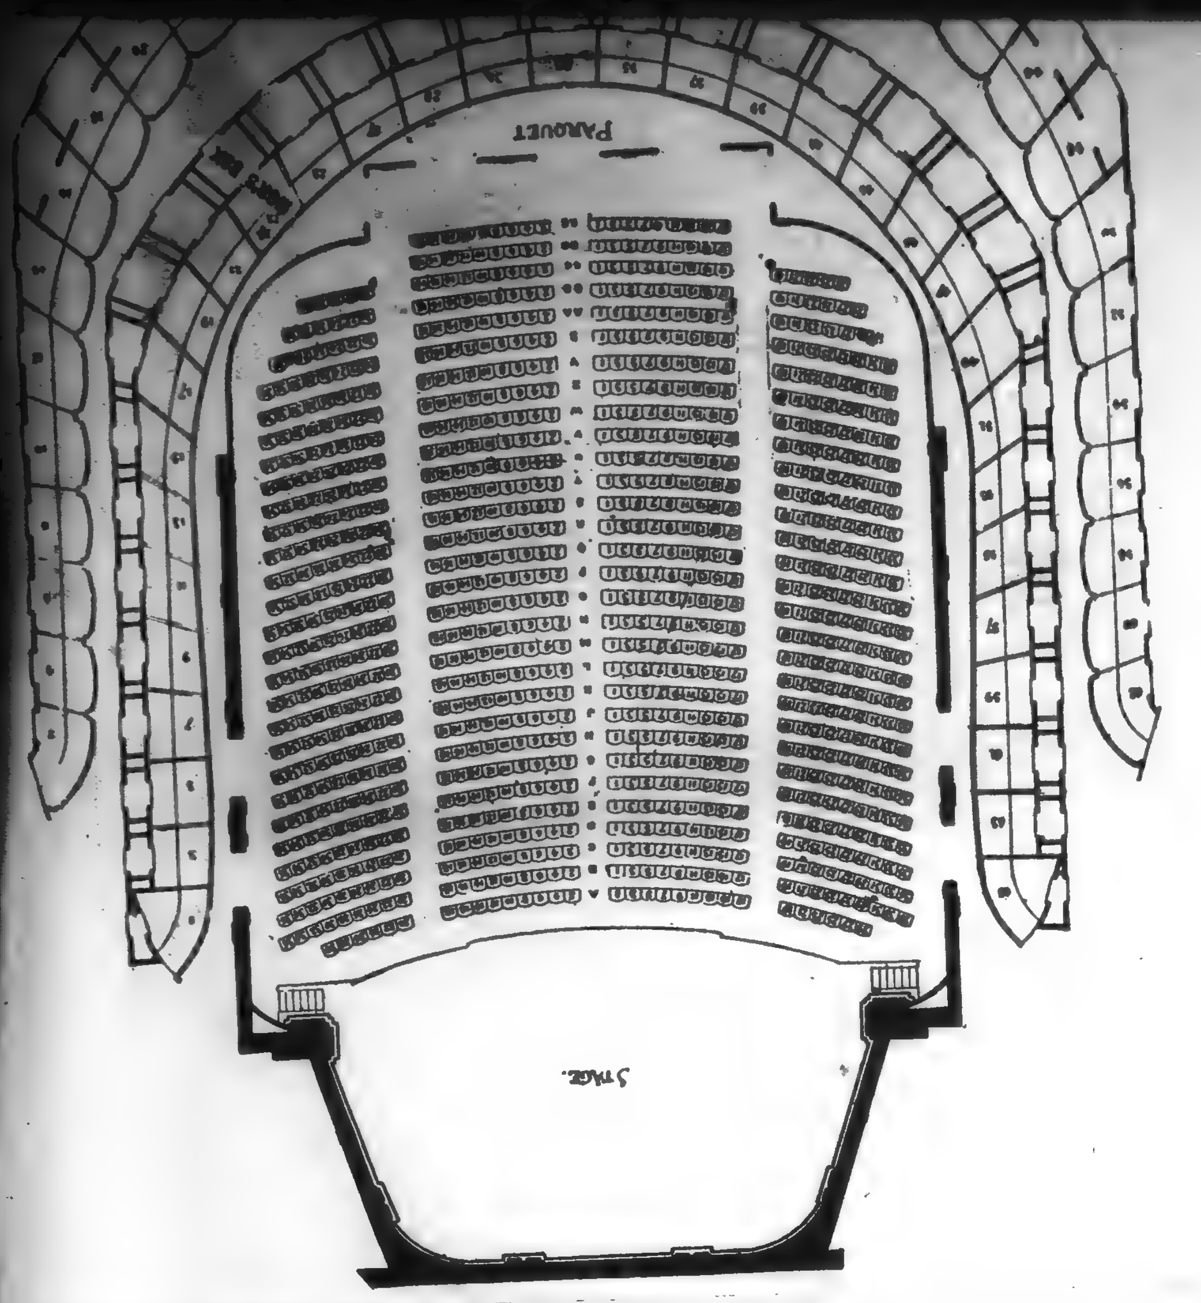
N. LE BRUN
G. RUNGE } Architects

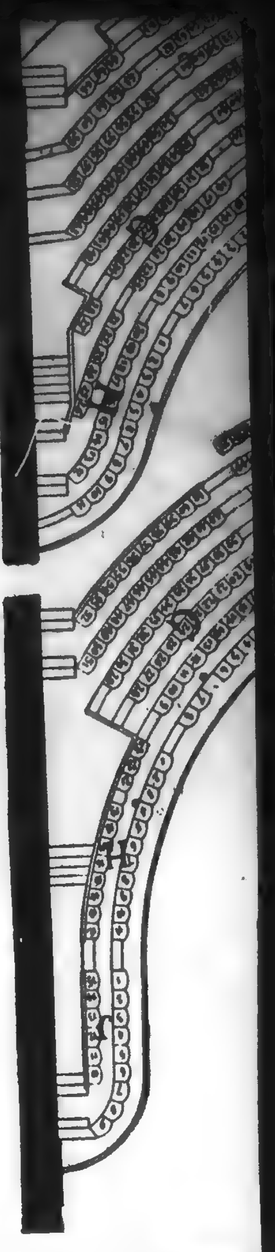
PHILADA

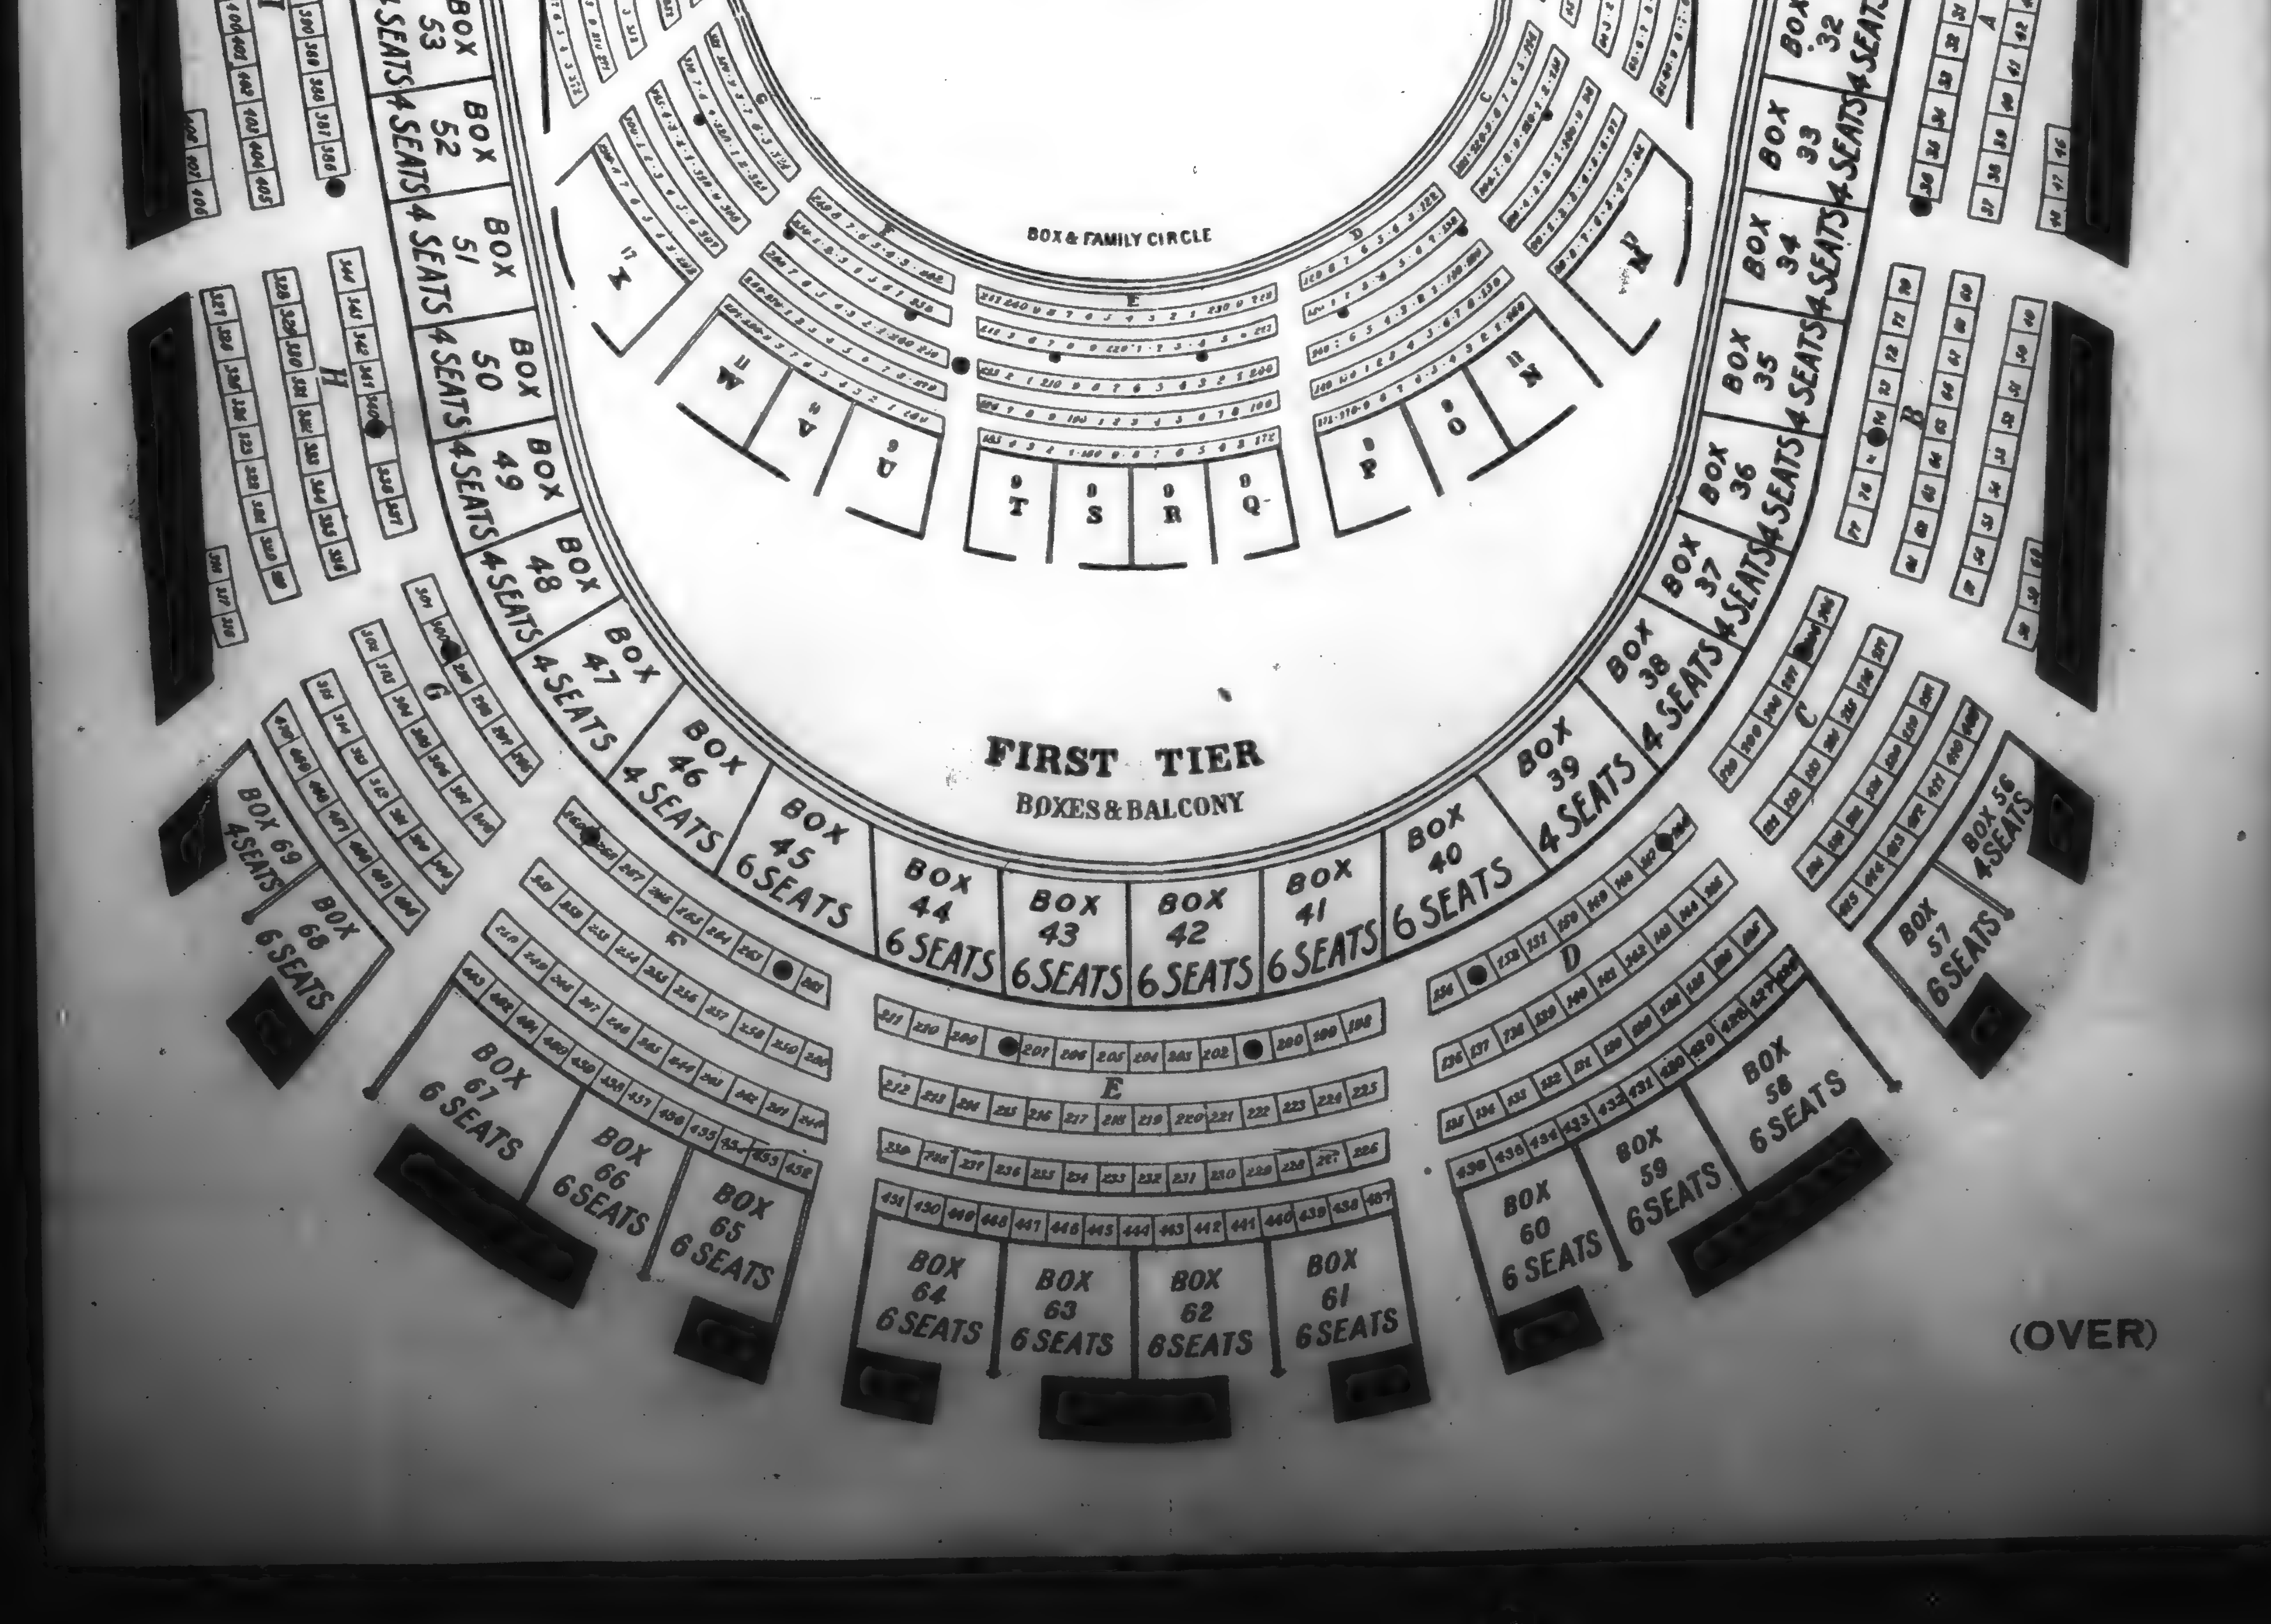
Proscenium Box No 4
Proscenium Box No 3
BOX & FAMILY CIRCLE
FIRST TIER
BOXES & BALCONY
BOX 55 4 SEATS
BOX 54 4 SEATS
BOX 53 4 SEATS
BOX 52 4 SEATS
BOX 51 4 SEATS
BOX 50 4 SEATS
BOX 49 4 SEATS
BOX 48 4 SEATS
BOX 47 4 SEATS
BOX 46 4 SEATS
BOX 45 6 SEATS
BOX 44 6 SEATS
BOX 43 6 SEATS
BOX 42 6 SEATS
BOX 41 6 SEATS
BOX 40 6 SEATS
BOX 39 4 SEATS
BOX 38 4 SEATS
BOX 37 4 SEATS
BOX 36 4 SEATS
BOX 35 4 SEATS
BOX 34 4 SEATS
BOX 33 4 SEATS
BOX 32 4 SEATS
BOX 31 4 SEATS
BOX 30 4 SEATS
BOX 69 4 SEATS
BOX 68 6 SEATS
BOX 67 6 SEATS
BOX 66 6 SEATS
BOX 65 6 SEATS
BOX 64 6 SEATS
BOX 63 6 SEATS
BOX 62 6 SEATS
BOX 61 6 SEATS
BOX 60 6 SEATS
BOX 59 6 SEATS
BOX 58 6 SEATS
BOX 57 6 SEATS
BOX 56 4 SEATS
A
B
C
D
E
F
G
H
I
K
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W

(OVER)



PARQUET
STAGE





AMPITHEATRE
Sealing Capacity
900
AMERICAN
Academy of Music
IN PHILADELPHIA.
N. LE BRUN
G. RUNGE
Architects
PHILADA
Proscenium Box No 4
Proscenium Box No 3
BOX & FAMILY CIRCLE
FIRST TIER
BOXES & BALCONY
BOX 30 4 SEATS
BOX 31 4 SEATS
BOX 32 4 SEATS
BOX 33 4 SEATS
BOX 34 4 SEATS
BOX 35 4 SEATS
BOX 36 4 SEATS
BOX 37 4 SEATS
BOX 38 4 SEATS
BOX 39 4 SEATS
BOX 40 6 SEATS
BOX 41 6 SEATS
BOX 42 6 SEATS
BOX 43 6 SEATS
BOX 44 6 SEATS
BOX 45 6 SEATS
BOX 46 4 SEATS
BOX 47 4 SEATS
BOX 48 4 SEATS
BOX 49 4 SEATS
BOX 50 4 SEATS
BOX 51 4 SEATS
BOX 52 4 SEATS
BOX 53 4 SEATS
BOX 54 4 SEATS
BOX 55 4 SEATS
BOX 56 4 SEATS
BOX 57 6 SEATS
BOX 58 6 SEATS
BOX 59 6 SEATS
BOX 60 6 SEATS
BOX 61 6 SEATS
BOX 62 6 SEATS
BOX 63 6 SEATS
BOX 64 6 SEATS
BOX 65 6 SEATS
BOX 66 6 SEATS
BOX 67 6 SEATS
BOX 68 6 SEATS
BOX 69 4 SEATS
A
B
C
D
E
G
H
I
K
M
N
O
P
Q
R
S
T
U
V
W

(OVER)

REDUCTION RATIO
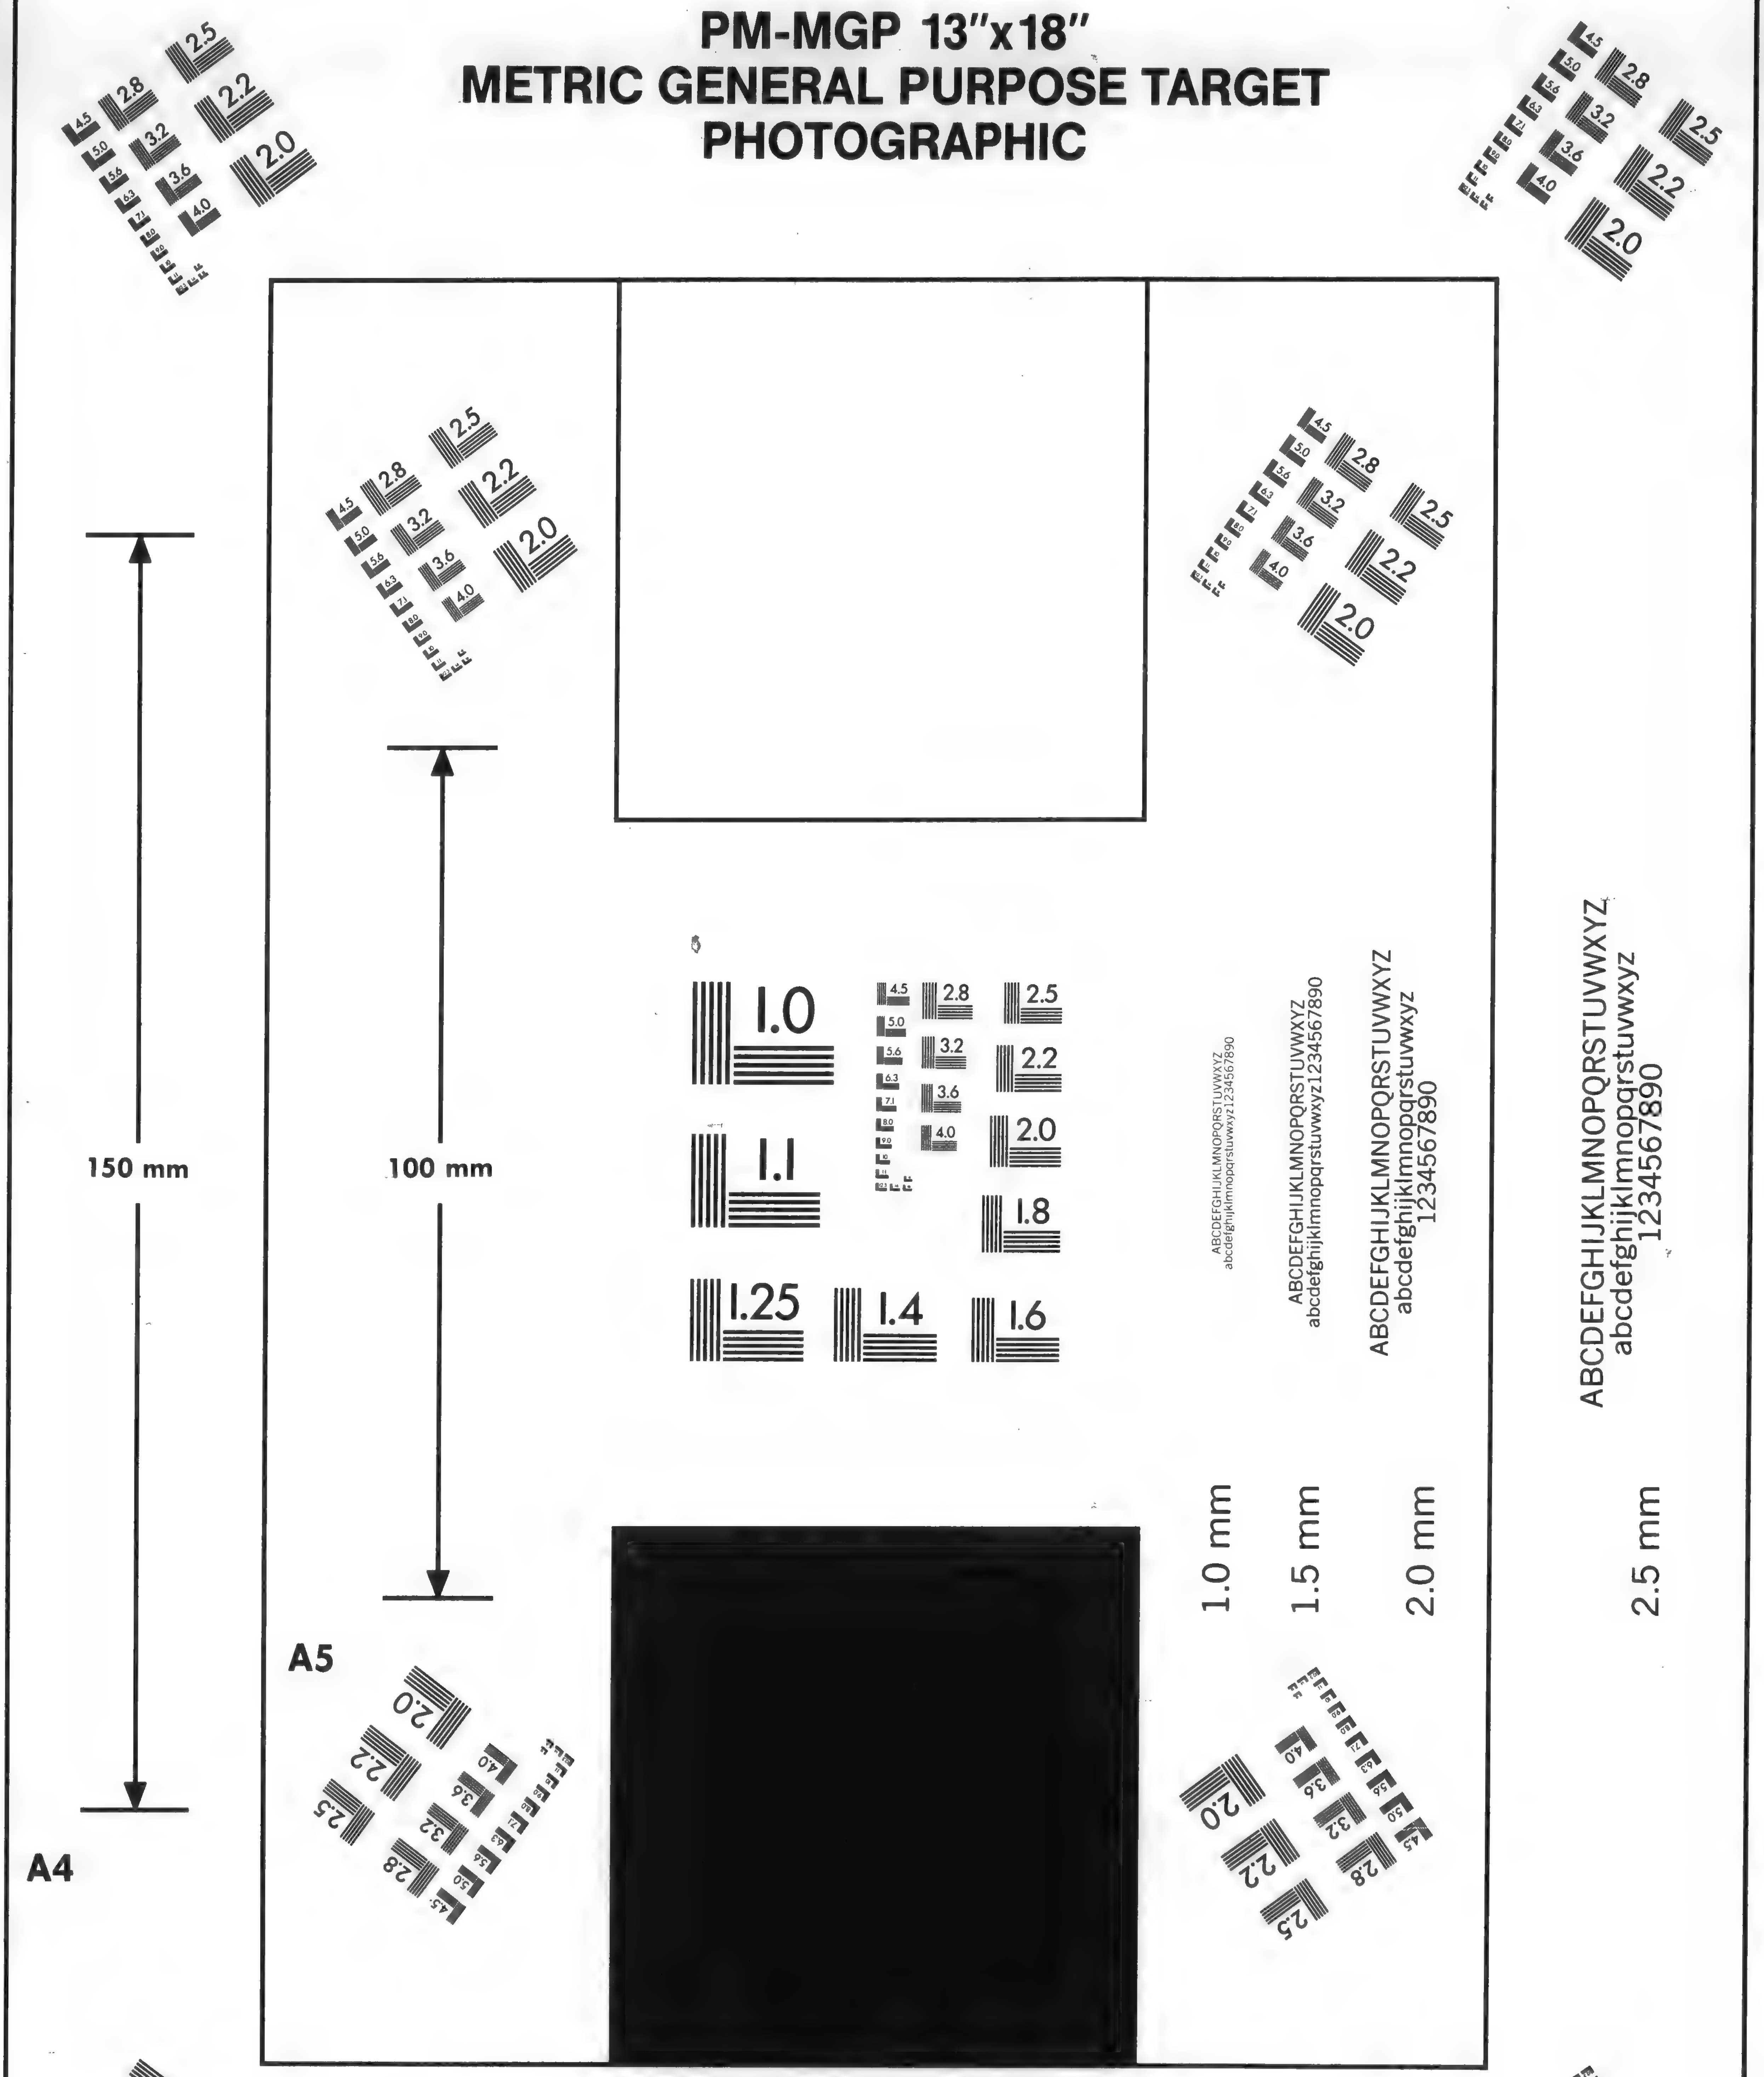
12x

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

PM-MGP 13″x18″
METRIC GENERAL PURPOSE TARGET
PHOTOGRAPHIC



1.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

1.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz1234567890

2.0 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

2.5 mm
ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

PRECISION℠ RESOLUTION TARGETS

Century
A&P
1303 Geneva Avenue
St. Paul, MN 55119

ABCDEFGHIJKLMNOPQRSTUVWXYZ
abcdefghijklmnopqrstuvwxyz
1234567890

4.5 mm

Academy of Music
Philadelphia

Nineteenth Season
1899-1900

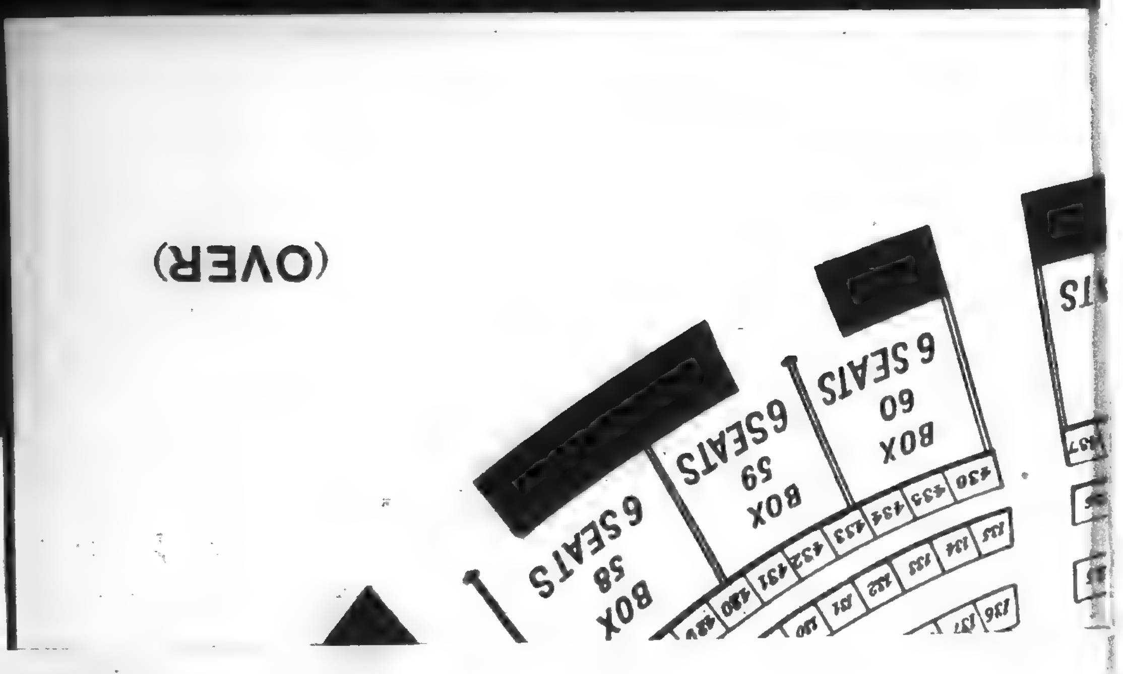
The Boston Symphony Orchestra

.. 87 Performers ..

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

A permanent Orchestra maintained solely for Concert performances

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager



CUT-OUT

PERSONNEL of the . . . . .
BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-1900.

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

FIRST VIOLINS.

Kneisel, Fr., Concertmeister.
Loeffler, C. M. Fiedler, E. Krafft, W. Eichheim, H.
Adamowski, T. Moldauer, A. Hoffmann, J. Rissland, K.
Roth, O. Kuntz, D. Strube, G. Theodorowicz, J.
Schnitzler, I. Ondricek, K. Mahn, F.

SECOND VIOLINS.

Akeroyd, J. Schuchman, F. E. Kurth, R. Eichler, J. Edw.
Fiumara, P. Kneisel, Jos. Goldstein, S. Michael, J.
Swornsbourne, W.W. Tischer-Zeitz, H. Berger, H. Kuntz, A.
Marble, E. B. Fiedler, B.

VIOLAS.

Svecenski, L. Sauer, G. Zahn, F. Kluge, M.
Zach, M. Kolster, A. Hoyer, H. Krauss, O. H.
Heindl, H. Barleben, C.

VIOLONCELLOS.

Schroeder, A. Adamowski, J. Rosé, E. Barth, C.
Keller, J. Mingels, E. F. Loeffler, E. Nagel, R.
Heberlein, H. Blaess, A.

BASSES.

Keller, K. Bareither, G. Barth, C. Butler, H. J.
Kunze, M. Seydel, T. Gerhardt, G. Elkind, S.

FLUTES.
Maquarre, A. Brooke, A. Fox, Paul.

OBOE.
Longy, G. Sautet, A.

ENGL. HORN.
Müller, F.

CLARINETS.
Selmer, A. Metzger, P.

BASS CLARINET.
E. Strasser.

BASSOONS.
Litke, A. Litke, P.

CONTRABASSOON.
Günzel, F. H.

HORNS.
Hackebarth, A. Hein, Fr. Lorbeer, H. Schumann, C.

TRUMPETS.
Kloepfel, L. Muller, P.
Mann, J.

TROMBONES.
Hampe, C. Mäusebach, A.
Meyer, F.

HARP.
Schuecker, H.

TUBA.
Thomae, A.

TYMPANI.
Rettberg, A.

DRUMS.
Ludwig, C. R.

CYMBALS, TRIANGLE, ETC.
Burkhardt, H.

TAMBOUR AND CASTANETS.
Senia, T.

LIBRARIAN.
Sauerquell, J.

Music Hall
Baltimore

Nineteenth Season
1899-1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

.. 87 Performers ..

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

✓

A permanent Orchestra maintained solely for Concert performances

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

[7]

Two Series of . . .

Five Concerts Each

First Series MONDAY EVENINGS at 8.15	Second Series
November 6.	Saturday Evening, November 11.
December 11.	Friday Evening, December 15.
January 15.	Friday Evening, January 19.
February 19.	Saturday Evening, February 24.
March 19.	Friday Evening, March 23.

The scale of prices will be the same for each series.

Proscenium boxes seating eight, and boxes seating six and four, will be sold at $75, $63, and $42, respectively, for the series of five concerts.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5, and $3.50, according to location.

The public sale of tickets for the first series will open Monday morning, October 16, and for the second series on the following Monday morning, October 23, at Blasius's, 1103 Chestnut Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Solo Artists

TERNINA
DOHNÁNYI
HAMBOURG
JACKSON
KNEISEL
ADAMOWSKI

And others to be announced

.. Special Announcement ..

Both series of concerts will be the same in character and equally attractive, but with different programmes and soloists.

Season ticket holders of last season will be allowed to retain the same seats for the first (Monday evening) series, payment for the same to be made on or before Saturday, October 21, by cash, money order, or check, made payable to Miss H. Harris, to whom all renewals of seats should be sent, at 1103 Chestnut Street.

On Monday, October 23, the season tickets for the second series will be offered for sale, absolutely "first come, first served," in deference to the steadily increasing patronage unable for several seasons past to secure seats of any description. For this series, personal application for seats the morning of the sale will, of course, receive first attention, after which mail orders, accompanied by cash or check, will be filled in the order in which they are received. Judging from frequent experiences in Boston, New York, and Brooklyn, the management hopes that Philadelphia patrons will find each series sufficiently attractive to induce them to attend both.

Five = = = Concerts

Tuesday Evenings at 8.15

NOVEMBER 7,
DECEMBER 12,
JANUARY 16,
FEBRUARY 20,
MARCH 20.

Ten new boxes seating six, and shown on the enclosed diagram of the hall, will be sold at $60 each, for the series of five concerts.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7 and $5, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at Albert's, 13 North Charles Street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Solo Artists

Mr. ERNST VON DOHNÁNYI

Mr. MARK HAMBOURG

Miss LEONORA JACKSON

And others to be announced

Two Ser

First Ser
MONDAY EVE
at 8.15

November
December
January
February
March

The scale
Proscenium will be sold at
concerts.
Season tic
$7, $5, and $3.
The publi morning, Octol morning, Octol
Programm
formed, will be season tickets.

"A virtuoso orchestra."—New York Sun.

⁂

"Peerless band of musicians."—New York Herald.

⁂

"For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."
—New York Times.

⁂

"A splendid organization, by far the most perfect in th country."—New York Life.

⁂

"The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."
—New York World.

Five =
Conce

NO
DEC
JAN

Ten new bo diagram of the l
five concerts.
Season tickets
$7 and $5, accordi
The sale of ti
Albert's, 13 North
Programme bo performed, will be of season tickets.

"A virtuoso orchestra."—New York Sun.

⁂

"Peerless band of musicians."—New York Herald.

⁂

"For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."
—New York Times.

⁂

"A splendid organization, by far the most perfect in th country."—New York Life.

⁂

"The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."
—New York World.

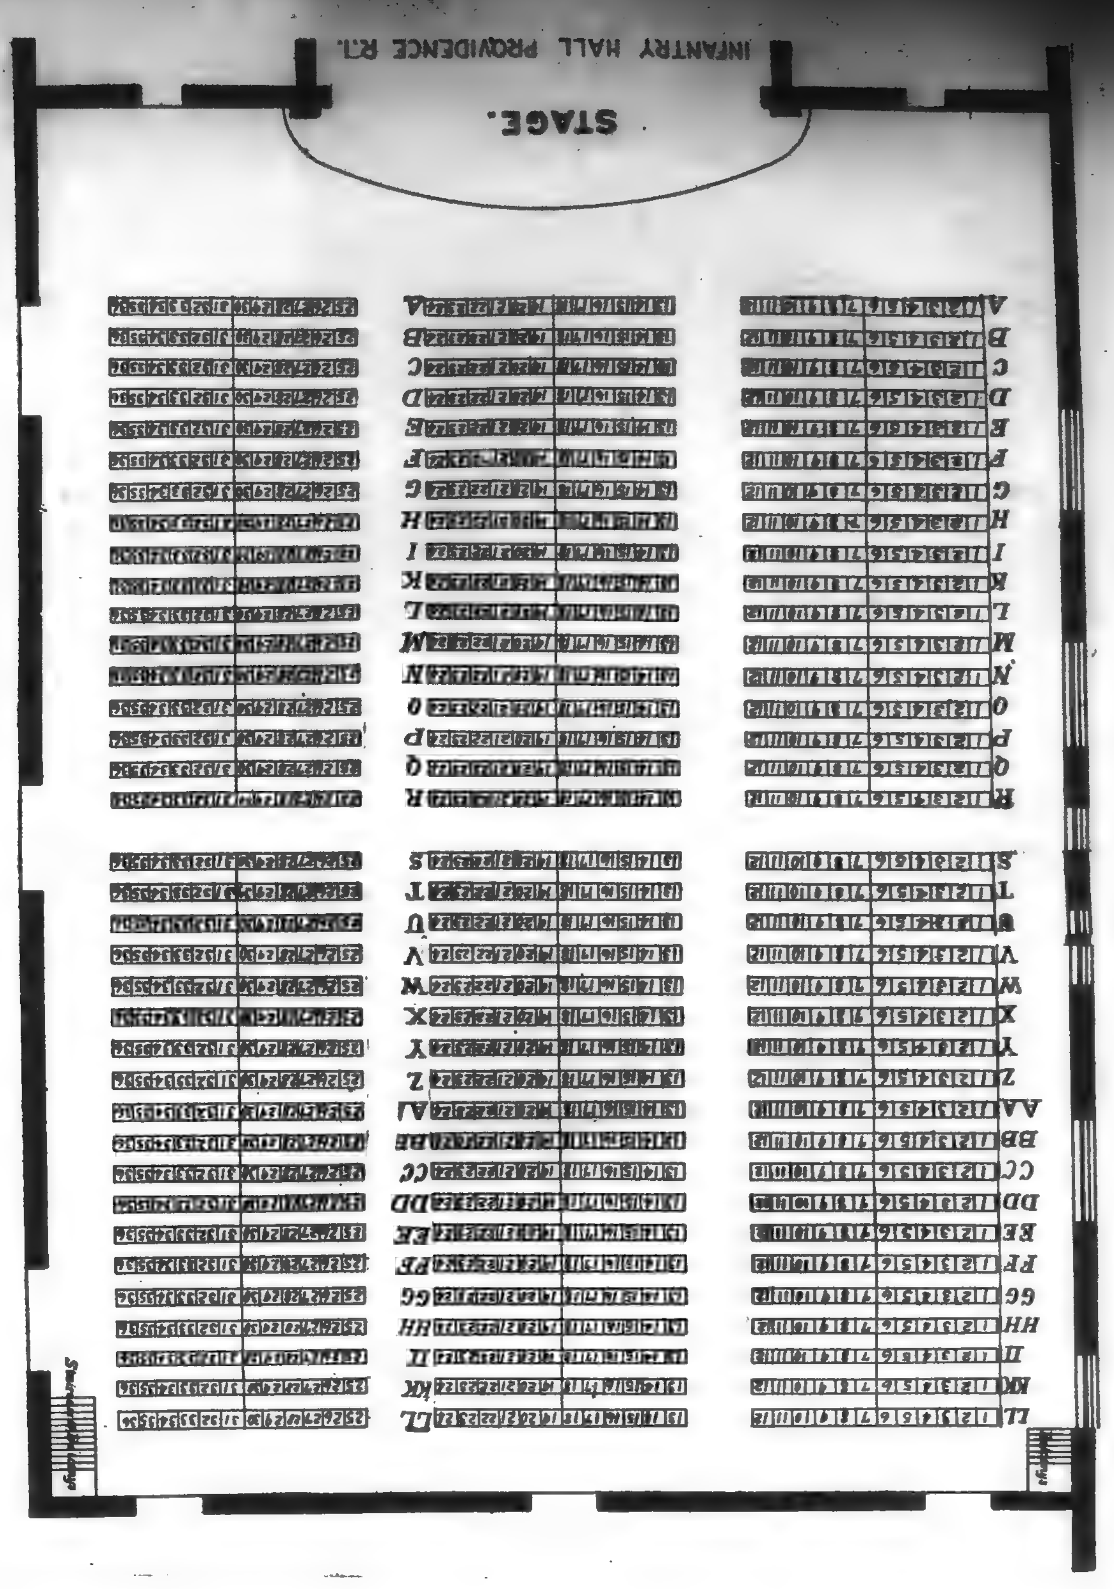
INFANTRY HALL PROVIDENCE R.I.
STAGE.
RIGHT BALCONY.
LEFT BALCONY.
FRONT BALCONY.
CORRIDOR 18 FEET WIDE.
EXIT to SOUTH MAIN ST. and BENEFIT ST.
EXIT
CORRIDOR 10 FEET WIDE.
SOUTH MAIN ST. to and BENEFIT ST.



INFANTRY HALL PROVIDENCE R.I.
STAGE.

Providence, October 5, 1899.

I hereby subscribe for .... season tickets for the series of eight Wednesday Evening Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall.

Location of seats last season

....

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.
FOUNDED 1881.
WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.
MUSIC HALL, BOSTON.

CHARLES A. ELLIS, MANAGER.
FREDERIC R. COMEE, ASSISTANT MANAGER.

October 5, 1899.

DEAR MADAM:

As a subscriber to the Wednesday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Infantry Hall last season, we should be pleased to reserve the same seats for you before the public subscription is opened.

Should you desire to renew your subscription, please sign and mail enclosed order before October 14, indicating the location of seats.

Yours respectfully,

C. A. ELLIS, MANAGER.

BOSTON, October 6, 1899.

DEAR SIR:

I beg that you will join me in a tribute of esteem to Mr. and Mrs. Higginson on the occasion of the wedding of their son, Mr. Alex. H. Higginson. It is my wish that the entire Boston Symphony Orchestra should play the Bridal March and the Prelude to Act III. from "Lohengrin" at the wedding ceremony.

The wedding takes place next Monday, October 9, at 12 o'clock, noon, at Trinity Church.

All members of the Orchestra are requested to come to the church on Monday morning at 9.45 o'clock for a few minutes' rehearsal.

Yours sincerely,

WILHELM GERICKE.

Private entrance to Trinity Church, on Huntington Avenue.

Carnegie Hall

Nineteenth Season
1899-1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

.. 87 Performers ..

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

A permanent Orchestra
maintained solely for
Concert performances

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

Infantry Hall
Providence

Nineteenth Season
1899-1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

.. 70 Performers ..

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

A permanent Orchestra
maintained solely for
Concert performances

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

Sanders Theatre
Cambridge

Nineteenth Season
1899-1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

.. 70 Performers ..

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

A permanent Orchestra
maintained solely for
Concert performances

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

WAGNER.	VORSPIEL to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
BERLIOZ.	CASSANDRA'S ARIA, from Act I. of "Les Troyens."
TCHAIKOVSKY.	CAPRICCIO ITALIEN, for ORCHESTRA, op. 45.
WAGNER.	SONGS with PIANOFORTE: a) SCHMERZEN; b) TRAUME.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Molto vivace. — Trio I: Molto più vivace.— Trio II. IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Soloist:

Miss GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The sale of season tickets for the ten Harvard University Chamber Concerts opens next Saturday, at the University Bookstore, at 8 A. M.

Carnegie Hall

Nineteenth Season
1899-1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

.. 87 Performers ..

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

A permanent Orchestra
maintained solely for
Concert performances

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

Infantry Hall
Providence

Nineteenth Season
1899-1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

.. 70 Performers ..

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

A permanent Orchestra
maintained solely for
Concert performances

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

Sanders Theatre
Cambridge

Nineteenth Season
1899-1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

.. 70 Performers ..

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

A permanent Orchestra
maintained solely for
Concert performances

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

WAGNER.	VORSPIEL to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
BERLIOZ.	CASSANDRA'S ARIA, from Act I. of "Les Troyens."
TCHAIKOVSKY.	CAPRICCIO ITALIEN, for ORCHESTRA, op. 45.
WAGNER.	SONGS with PIANOFORTE: a) SCHMERZEN; b) TRAUME.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Molto vivace.—Trio I: Molto più vivace.—Trio II. IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Soloist:

Miss GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The sale of season tickets for the ten Harvard University Chamber Concerts opens next Saturday, at the University Bookstore, at 8 A. M.

Five Matinees...

Wednesday Afternoons at 2.30

November 8.	February 21.
December 13.	March 21.
January 17.

AND

Five Concerts...

Thursday Evenings at 8.15

November 9.	February 22.
December 14.	March 22.
January 18.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five matinees or five concerts, $7.50, $6, $5, and $3, and boxes $50 and $40, according to location. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

☞ The programmes for the afternoon and evening series will be entirely different.

Solo Artists

Mme. SEMBRICH.
(By courtesy Maurice Grau, Esq.)
Frl. TERNINA.
(By courtesy Maurice Grau, Esq.)
Miss LEONORA JACKSON.
Mr. DOHNÁNYI.
Mr. HAMBOURG.
Mr. KNEISEL.
Mr. ADAMOWSKI.

And others to be announced

Infantry Hall
Providence

The B
Symphony

.. 70 Perform

Mr. WILHELM GERI

* A permanent Orchestra maintained solely for Concert performances

C.
F.

Ten = = = Concerts

On Thursday Evenings

OCTOBER	19
NOVEMBER	2
NOVEMBER	23
DECEMBER	7
DECEMBER	28
JANUARY	11
JANUARY	25
FEBRUARY	8
MARCH	1
MARCH	15

Season tickets for the ten concerts, $7.50, on sale at the University Bookstore, Harvard Square, Saturday morning, October 14, at 8 o'clock. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

Soloists

Miss GERTRUDE MAY STEIN
Mrs. MARIAN TITUS
Miss ADELE AUS DER OHE
Mme. ANTOINETTE SZUMOWSKA
Mr. ERNST DOHNÁNYI,
Mr. GEORGE PROCTOR
Mr. C. M. LOEFFLER
Mr. ALWIN SCHROEDER

And others to be announced

Sanders Theatre, Ca

SEASON 1899-190

BOSTON SYMPHONY O

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Co

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, A

Programme.

WAGNER.	VORSPIEL to "Die Meist
BERLIOZ.	CASSANDRA'S ARIA, fr "Les Troyens."
TCHAIKOVSKY.	CAPRICCIO ITALIEN, fo
WAGNER.	SONGS with PIANOFORTE a) SCHMERZEN; b) TRAUME.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B-f I. Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Molto vivace.—Tri Trio II. IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Soloist:

Miss GERTRUDE MAY S

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The sale of season tickets for the ten Harvard University Cha day, at the University Bookstore, at 8 A. M.

[9]

Five I

I
I

Five C

I
I

Season tick or five concerts, to location. Pr be performed, w
of season tickets

☞ The p will be entire

"A virtuoso orchestra."—New York Sun.

◆ ◆ ◆

"Peerless band of musicians."—New York Herald.

◆ ◆ ◆

"For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."—New York Times.

◆ ◆ ◆

"A splendid organization, by far the most perfect in the country."—New York Life.

◆ ◆ ◆

"The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."—New York World.

Infantry Hall
Providence

The Bo
Symphony O

.. 70 Perform

Mr. WILHELM GERIC

A permanent Orchestra
maintained solely for
Concert performances

C.
F.

Ten = =
Concer

Season t
University Bo
14, at 8 o'cl
for college off

"A virtuoso orchestra."—New York Sun.

◆ ◆ ◆

"Peerless band of musicians."—New York Herald.

◆ ◆ ◆

"For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."—New York Times.

◆ ◆ ◆

"A splendid organization, by far the most perfect in the country."—New York Life.

◆ ◆ ◆

"The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."—New York World.

Sanders Theatre, Ca

SEASON 1899-19

BOSTON SYMPHONY O

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Co

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, A

Programme.

WAGNER. VORSPIEL to "Die Meist

BERLIOZ. CASSANDRA'S ARIA, fr
"Les Troyens."

TCHAIKOVSKY. CAPRICCIO ITALIEN, for

WAGNER. SONGS with PIANOFORTE
a) SCHMERZEN;
b) TRAUME.

SCHUMANN. SYMPHONY No. 1, in B-f
I. Andante un poco maestoso.
Allegro molto vivace
II. Larghetto.
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace.—Tri
Trio II.
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Soloist:

Miss GERTRUDE MAY S

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The sale of season tickets for the ten Harvard University Cha day, at the University Bookstore, at 8 A. M.

Eight == Concerts

Wednesday Evenings at 8, sharp

OCTOBER 25,
NOVEMBER 15,
DECEMBER 20,
JANUARY 31,
MARCH 7,
MARCH 28,
APRIL 11,
APRIL 25.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of eight concerts, $7.

In just and grateful recognition of their steadfast and continued patronage, season ticket holders of last season will be allowed to renew the same seats. Checks or money orders should be sent with renewals to C. A. Ellis, Music Hall, Boston, on or before Saturday, October 14, on which day tickets will be ready for delivery at Infantry Hall.

The public sale will open at Infantry Hall, Monday morning, October 16, at 9.

Subscribers will please give full address in making renewals.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Solo Artists

Miss CLARA BUTT, the famous English contralto
(First appearance in Providence)

Miss GERTRUDE MAY STEIN

Miss LEONORA JACKSON, Violinist
(First appearance in Providence)

Miss ELSA RUEGGER, Violoncellist
(First appearance in Providence)

Mr. ERNST DOHNÁNYI, Pianist
(First appearance in Providence)

And others to be announced

Sanders Theatre
Cambridge

Nineteenth Season
1899-1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

.. 70 Performers ..

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

A permanent Orchestra
maintained solely for
Concert performances

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

WAGNER.	VORSPIEL to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
BERLIOZ.	CASSANDRA'S ARIA, from Act I. of "Les Troyens."
TCHAIKOVSKY.	CAPRICCIO ITALIEN, for ORCHESTRA, op. 45.
WAGNER.	SONGS with PIANOFORTE: a) SCHMERZEN; b) TRAUME.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Molto vivace.—Trio I: Molto più vivace.—Trio II. IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Soloist:

Miss GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The sale of season tickets for the ten Harvard University Chamber Concerts opens next Saturday, at the University Bookstore, at 8 A. M.

Eight = Concert

OCTO
NOV
DECE
JANU

Season tickets

In just and g patronage, season
the same seats. C to C. A. Ellis, Mu on which day tick

The public
October 16, at 9.

Subscribers

Programme formed, will be
season tickets.

"A virtuoso orchestra."—New York Sun.

◆◆◆

"Peerless band of musicians."—New York Herald.

◆◆◆

"For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance." —New York Times.

◆◆◆

"A splendid organization, by far the most perfect in the country."—New York Life.

◆◆◆

"The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country." —New York World.

Sanders Theatre
Cambridge

Nineteenth Season
1899-1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

.. 70 Performers ..

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

A permanent Orchestra maintained solely for Concert performances

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

I. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 19, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

WAGNER.	VORSPIEL to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
BERLIOZ.	CASSANDRA'S ARIA, from Act I. of "Les Troyens."
TCHAIKOVSKY.	CAPRICCIO ITALIEN, for ORCHESTRA, op. 45.
WAGNER.	SONGS with PIANOFORTE: a) SCHMERZEN; b) TRAUME.
SCHUMANN.	SYMPHONY No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38. I. Andante un poco maestoso. Allegro molto vivace II. Larghetto. III. Scherzo: Molto vivace.—Trio I: Molto più vivace.—Trio II. IV. Allegro animato e grazioso.

Soloist:

Miss GERTRUDE MAY STEIN.

The Pianoforte is a Steinway.

The sale of season tickets for the ten Harvard University Chamber Concerts opens next Saturday, at the University Bookstore, at 8 A. M.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC PHILADELPHIA

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899–1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

87 PERFORMERS

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR

TWO SERIES OF FIVE CONCERTS EACH

SOLO ARTISTS

TERNINA JACKSON
DOHNÁNYI KNEISEL
HAMBOURG ADAMOWSKI

AND OTHERS TO BE ANNOUNCED

F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager C. A. ELLIS, Manager

Sanders Theatre, Cambridge.

SEASON 1899-1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA,

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

II. CONCERT.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 2, AT 7.45, P.M.

Programme.

GOLDMARK.	OVERTURE, zum "Gefesselten Prometheus" von Aeschylos, op. 38.
BEETHOVEN.	CONCERTO for PIANOFORTE, in C minor. Allegro con brio. Largo. Rondo. Allegro.
J. S. BACH.	CHACONNE, in D minor. (Scored for ORCHESTRA by RAFF.)
GLAZOUNOFF.	SYMPHONY No. 6, in C minor, op. 58. I. Adagio. — Allegro passionato. II. Tema con variazioni: Andante. III. Intermezzo: Allegretto. IV. Andante maestoso. — Moderato maestoso. — Allegro moderato.

Soloist:

Mr. HEINRICH GEBHARD.

The Instrument is a Steinertone.

Carnegie Hall Nineteenth Season 1899-1900

The Boston Symphony Orchestra

- - 87 Performers - -

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor

First Matinee, Wednesday Afternoon, November 8, at 2.30

First Concert, Thursday Evening, November 9, at 8.15

Programmes

A permanent Orchestra maintained solely for Concert performances

C. A. ELLIS, Manager
F. R. COMEE, Assistant Manager

FIRST SERIES

Monday Evening, November 6
Monday Evening, December 11
Monday Evening, January 15
Monday Evening, February 19
Monday Evening, March 19
At 8.15

SECOND SERIES

Saturday Evening, November 11
Friday Evening, December 15
Friday Evening, January 19
Saturday Evening, February 24
Friday Evening, March 23
At 8.15

¶ The scale of prices will be the same for each series.

¶ Proscenium boxes seating eight, and boxes seating six and four, will be sold at $75, $63, and $42, respectively, for the series of five concerts.

¶ Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7, $5, and $3.50, according to location.

¶ Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

SPECIAL ANNOUNCEMENT

AS the entire house for the First (Monday evening) Series is already sold to season ticket holders of last season, the management begs to call the attention of patrons to the SECOND SERIES of five concerts, the same in character and equally as attractive as the First Series, but with entirely different programmes.

¶ On Monday morning, October 23, at eight o'clock, at 1103 Chestnut Street, the season tickets for the Second Series will be offered for sale, "first come, first served," in deference to the steadily increasing patronage unable for several seasons past to secure seats of any description. Personal application for tickets the morning of the sale will, of course, receive first attention, after which mail orders accompanied by cash or check will be filled in the order in which they are received. No more than ten tickets will be sold to one person. Checks should be made payable to Miss H. Harris.

¶ Judging from the numerous inquiries and frequent experiences in Boston and New York, Philadelphia patrons will find each series sufficiently attractive to induce them to attend both.

Sanders

SE

BOSTON SY

Mr. WILH

THURSDAY,

GOLDMARK.

BEETHOVEN.

J. S. BACH.

GLAZOUNOFF.

I
II
III
IV

Mr.

TH

Five Matinees...

Wednesday Afternoons at 2.30

November 8, December 13, January 17, February 21, March 21,

AND

Five Concerts...

Thursday Evenings at 8.15

November 9, December 14, January 18, February 22, March 22.

Solo Artists

Mme. SEMBRICH.
(By courtesy Maurice Grau, Esq.)
Frl. TERNINA.
(By courtesy Maurice Grau, Esq.)
Miss LEONORA JACKSON.
Mr. DOHNÂNYI.
Mr. HAMBOURG.
Mr. KNEISEL.
Mr. ADAMOWSKI.

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five matinees or five concerts, $7.50, $6, $5, and $3, and boxes $50 and $40, and single tickets for the first matinee and evening performance now on sale at Carnegie Hall and at Tyson's (Fifth Avenue Hotel) at regular prices, according to location. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

☞ The programmes for the afternoon and evening series will be entirely different.

First Matinee,

Wednesday Afternoon, November 8, at 2.30.

PROGRAMME.

Goldmark, Overture to the "Prometheus Bound" of Aeschylus, Op. 38
Saint-Saens – – Concerto for Pianoforte No. 4, in C minor
Tschaikovsky – – – – Capriccio Italien, Op. 45
Schumann – – Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, Op. 38

SOLOIST:

Mr. MARK HAMBOURG.

First Concert,

Thursday Evening, November 9, at 8.15.

PROGRAMME.

Siegfried Wagner – – – Overture, "Der Barenhauter" (First time.)
Humperdinck – – – – – – Maurische Rhapsodie (First time.)
Rubinstein – – Concerto for Pianoforte No. 4, in D minor
Glazounow – – – Symphony No. 6, in C minor, Op. 58 (First time.)

SOLOIST:

Mr. MARK HAMBOURG.

FIRST SE
M
M
M
M
M

SECOND
S

¶ The s

¶ Prosce six and respectiv

¶ Seaso five con

¶ Prog works each c

Five

Novem

Five

Novem

Mme
I

And others

Season
or five conce
tickets for t
Carnegie H
according t works to b purchasers

☞ Th will be en

"A virtuoso orchestra."—New York Sun.

◆◆◆

"Peerless band of musicians."—New York Herald.

◆◆◆

"For the past decade our standard of orchestral performance."—New York Times.

◆◆◆

"A splendid organization, by far the most perfect in the country."—New York Life.

◆◆◆

"The highest exponents of orchestral work in the country."—New York World.

Sanders

SE

BOSTON SY

Mr. WILH

I

THURSDAY,

GOLDMARK.

BEETHOVEN.

J. S. BACH.

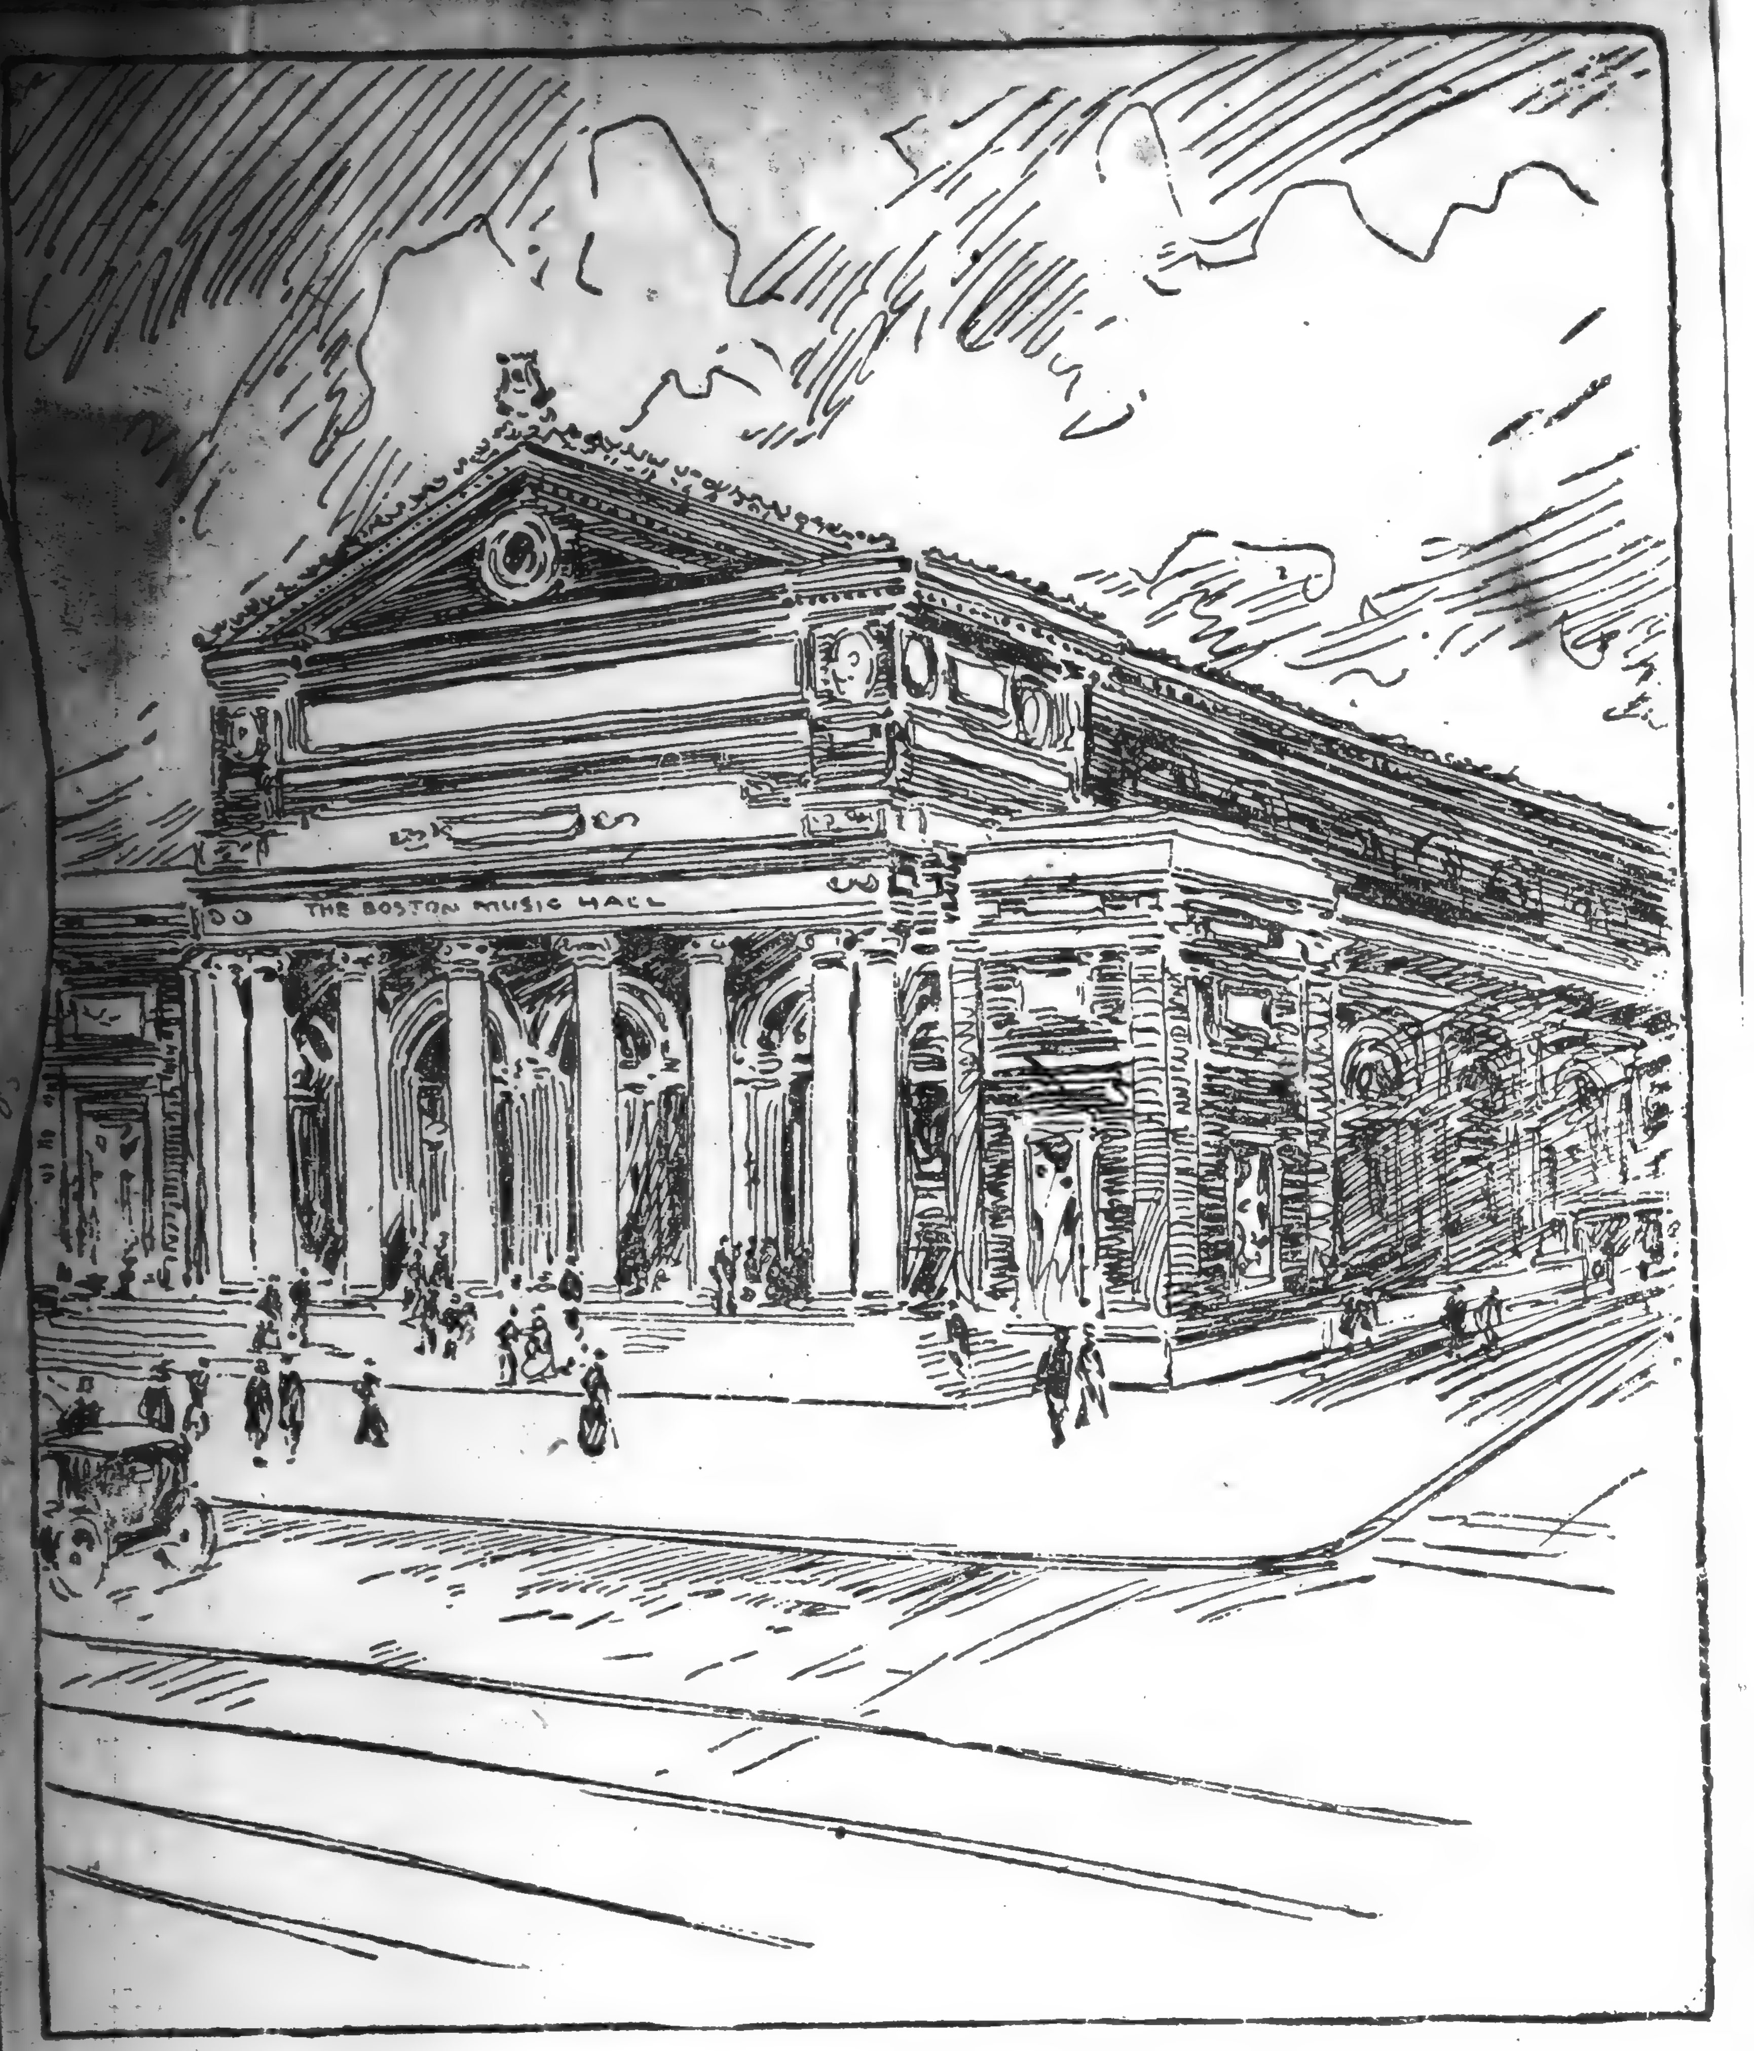
GLAZOUNOFF.

I
II
III
IV

Mr.

Th

SUNDAY HERALD—BOSTON, MARCH 11, 1900—



THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL

THE BOSTON MUSIC HALL —

BLANK PAGE

COLORED PAPER

Dec. 29 10 | Dec. 22 9 | Dec. 8 8 | Dec. 1 7 | Nov. 24 6 | Nov. 17 5 | Nov. 3 4 | Oct. 27 3 | Oct. 20 2 | Oct. 13 1

Jan. 5 11 | Jan. 12 12 | Jan. 26 13 | Feb. 2 14

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

MR. WILHELM GERICKE
CONDUCTOR

PUBLIC REHEARSALS:
FRIDAY AFTERNOONS AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900

FLOOR

15 Feb. 9 | 16 Feb. 16 | 17 Mar. 2 | 18 Mar. 9 | 19 Mar. 16 | 20 Mar. 30 | 21 Apr. 6 | 22 Apr. 13 | 23 Apr. 20 | 24 Apr. 27

1

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 566
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCT. 13, 1899, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

2

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 677
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCT. 20, 1899, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

3

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 179
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, OCT. 27, 1899, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

4

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 376
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOV. 3, 1899, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

5

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 744
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOV. 17, 1899, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

6

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 11
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOV. 24, 1899, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

7

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 709
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 1, 1899, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

8

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 142
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 8, 1899, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

9

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 214
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 22, 1899, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

10

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 233
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, DEC. 29, 1899, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

11

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 485
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JAN. 5, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

12

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 245
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JAN. 12, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

13

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 234
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, JAN. 26, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 359
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEB. 2, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

14

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 491
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEB. 9, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

15

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 437
Boston
Symphony
WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor
Orchestra
PUBLIC REHEARSAL
FRIDAY AFTERNOON, FEB. 16, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK.
ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

16

COLORED PAPER

17

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

Boston 48

Symphony

WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor

Orchestra

PUBLIC REHEARSAL

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 2, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK

ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

18

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

Boston 19

Symphony

WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor

Orchestra

PUBLIC REHEARSAL

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 9, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK

ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

19

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

Boston 44

Symphony

WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor

Orchestra

PUBLIC REHEARSAL

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 16, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK

ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

20

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 129

Boston

Symphony

WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor

Orchestra

PUBLIC REHEARSAL

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, MARCH 30, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK

ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

21

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 447

Boston

Symphony

WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor

Orchestra

PUBLIC REHEARSAL

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 6, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK

ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

22

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

Boston 92

Symphony

WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor

Orchestra

PUBLIC REHEARSAL

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 13, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK

ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

23

BOSTON MUSIC HALL 392

Boston

Symphony

WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor

Orchestra

PUBLIC REHEARSAL

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 20, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK

ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

24

BOSTON MUSIC HALL

Boston 778

Symphony

WILHELM GERICKE,
Conductor

Orchestra

PUBLIC REHEARSAL

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, APRIL 27, 1900, AT 2.30 O'CLOCK

ADMIT ONE C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

COLORED PAPER

CUT-OUT

3

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 10

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, OCTOBER 28, 1899.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

4

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 106

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, NOVEMBER 4, '99.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

5

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 102

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, NOVEMBER 18, '99.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

6

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 22

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, NOVEMBER 25, '99.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

7

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 34

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, DECEMBER 2, '99.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

8

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 227

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, DECEMBER 9, '99.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

9

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 184

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, DECEMBER 23, '99.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

10

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 51

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, DECEMBER 30, '99.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

11

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 52

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, JANUARY 6, 1900

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

12

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 10

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, JANUARY 13, 1900

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

13

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 146

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, JANUARY 27, 1900.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

14

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 12

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, FEBRUARY 3, 1900.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

15

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 205

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, FEBRUARY 10, 1900.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

16

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 21

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, FEBRUARY 17, 1900.

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

17

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 7

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, MARCH 3d, 1900

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

18

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 101

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, MARCH 10, 1900

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

19

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 62

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, MARCH 17, 1900

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

20

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 103

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, MARCH 31, 1900

GOOD THIS DATE ONLY.

C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

COLORED PAPER

21

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 52

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVE'G, APRIL 7th, 1900.

GOOD THIS
DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

22

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 51

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVEN'G, APRIL 14, 1900.

GOOD THIS
DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

23

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 14

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVEN'G, APRIL 21, 1900.

GOOD THIS
DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

24

BOSTON MUSIC HALL. 133

Boston Symphony Orchestra

WILHELM GERICKE, CONDUCTOR.

ADMISSION

TO FLOOR ONLY.

SATURDAY EVEN'G, APRIL 28, 1900.

GOOD THIS
DATE ONLY. C. A. Ellis
MANAGER.

CUT-OUT

BLANK PAGE

ERALD

EPTEMBER 10.

IN THE WORLD OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert Season.

Mr. Gericke Will Present a Number of Novelties – The Bostonians Have a New Comic Opera, "The Smugglers of Badayez" – Home and Foreign Notes.

FOR music lovers, the concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra constitute one of the most attractive features of winter life in Boston, and nothing at present will be read with more interest by the musical public than the arrangements made for its entertainment the coming season by the management of the orchestra. The concerts will begin at Music Hall Oct. 13, and, as usual, 24 Friday matinees and 24 Saturday evening concerts will be given. No changes in the composition of the orchestra have been made since last year, and it will again be under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke.

The programmes will contain a great number and variety of standard works and various novelties chosen by Mr. Gericke from a very large number of new compositions submitted to him for examination. First in interest among the latter is a concerto for violin in the Russian style, composed by Mr. C. M. Loeffler. It will be played by Mr. Franz Kneisel. The marked success of several of Mr. Loeffler's compositions already heard in these concerts justifies anticipation of the keenest pleasure in the hearing of this, his latest, work. A new symphony by Glazounow and a rhapsodie by Humperdinck, the composer of "Hansel and Gretel," are also in the long list of novelties soon to be announced.

Among the solo artists will be Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Petschnikoff, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski and Schroeder.

Never has the outlook for a season been more promising, and the quantities of letters of inquiry being received indicate a very widespread interest. The season ticket sales will be held at Music Hall, beginning Sept. 25. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 25, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, Sept. 26. The $12 and the $7.50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28 and 29, respectively. The sales will be by auction, and will begin each day at 10 A. M.

SUNDAY GLOBE–

EPTEMBER 10.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The 19th season of the Boston symphony orchestra will open Oct 13, at Music Hall, and at once takes on an added interest because it will be the last year in the audience room which has been its home since its founding in 1881. Nearly 1700 performances have been given by the orchestra in this time, and of these 895 have been given in Music hall. It would be interesting as well as significant to know just how many of the patrons for the coming series of concerts have been season ticket holders for the entire 19 years.

Mr Wilhelm Gericke will begin his seventh year and the second of his recent term as conductor, with exactly the same personnel as last season. There will be the usual 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The orchestra will make trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore during the weeks of Nov 6-11, Dec 11-16, Jan 15-20, Feb 19-24 and March 19-24, during which weeks the Boston concerts will be omitted.

Conductor Gericke has arranged during the summer most attractive programs, details of which will be announced at an early date. It is safe to assert that the quality of these programs and the standard of their performance will be on the same high plane as heretofore. To excel the record of the past would be almost impossible, yet it is to this end that conductor Gericke is always striving, and for conscientious effort, in which he spares neither the orchestra nor himself, he has no superior in the world of music today.

Although there is a very growing sentiment that the orchestra itself is the main attraction, to complete every detail and satisfy the most exacting, the management will present a list of soloists almost beyond criticism. The artists will include Sembrich, Ternina, Aus uer Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Leonora Jackson, Heyman, Ruegger, Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Petschnikoff and others, as well as some of the favorite solo artists of the orchestra. The auction sale of season tickets will be held at Music hall, beginning at 10 o'clock, on Sept 25, 26, 28 and 29.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper

OF NEW ENGLAND.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its nineteenth season at Music Hall on Oct. 13, and will give its usual series of twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings. The orchestra will be the same as last season in size and membership, and will again be under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. Programmes of great variety, and including many novelties, are promised, and many distinguished solo artists have been engaged. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 12, 1899.

The auction sales of season tickets for the 19th series of performances by the Boston symphony orchestra will be held at Music hall, Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept 25, 26, 28 and 29. The orchestra will be the same in size and membership as last year and will again be under the direction of Mr Wilhelm Gericke. Twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and 24

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper

OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 10, 1899

(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Impartial judges have often asserted that no city in the world can boast a musical organization superior to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and no organization, musical or otherwise, can duplicate its unique and admirable inception and maintenance. Therefore, Bostonians not only take a profound and justifiable pride in their orchestra, but they rally to its support with a confidence and loyalty that are at once natural and deserved. For eighteen years, every promise has been kept, allowing always for the unforeseen and the unavoidable, and not infrequently, in cases where a substitute was imperative, patrons have gained by the change.

The nineteenth season of the orchestra, and its last in the present Music Hall, opens Oct. 13, with Conductor Gericke commencing his seventh year, with the same personnel under his control as last season. His programmes will prove both interesting and acceptable, while there can be no reasonable doubt as to their performance. There will be the usual twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. The orchestra will make trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore during the weeks of Nov. 6-11, Dec. 11-16, Jan. 15-20, Feb. 19-24 and March 19-24, during which weeks the Boston concerts will be omitted.

The list of soloists is a generous one, including such artists as Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Leonora Jackson, Heyman, Ruegger, Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Petschnikoff and others, as well as some of the favorite solo artists of the orchestra. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall, beginning at 10 o'clock on Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 10, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

If it were necessary to look for assuring evidence of the standing of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Boston, it could readily be found, for long before any details of the season are announced, hundreds of patrons in Europe or at a distance in this country delegate their orders to their representatives as they have done for each year for an extended period. The coming season is to bear unusual fruit, for at its close, the traditions of 19 years are to be disturbed, and old Music Hall deserted for a new, more imposing and better auditorium to be completed before another summer, and destined to be the home of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for all time. A multitude of statistics could be printed in connection with the concerts given by the Orchestra in the old hall, but a year later will be the more appropriate time, as just now interest is keener in the season to come. Mr. William Gericke, with exactly the same orchestra as last year, will begin his seventh season as conductor, and the second of his more recent term. There will be the usual twenty-four Friday afternoon public rehearsals and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts, commencing Oct. 13, and continuing consecutively except during the weeks of Nov. 6-11, Dec. 11-16, Jan. 15-20, Feb. 19-24 and March 19-24, when the orchestra will be on tour. To complete the ensemble, the following list of famous artists is announced: Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Leonora Jackson, Heyman, Ruegger, Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Petschnikoff and others, as well as some of the solo artists of the Orchestra. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall beginning at 10 o'clock on Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 12, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will occupy old Music Hall but one more season before moving into the magnificent new building being erected for it on Massachusetts Avenue. Its last season in the old hall will be signalized by a series of concerts which bid fair to be the most brilliant musical entertainments ever given in the famous old building. It is generally conceded that the orchestra has no peer among similar organizations and it will have the co-operation of many fine solo artists for the coming concerts. Many of these are well known in America and others are young artists bearing the stamp of European approval who will be heard here for the first time. Subscribers will enjoy the privilege of hearing Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Leonora Jackson, Heyman, Ruegger, Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Petschnikoff and other guests, as well as some of the favorite solo artists of the orchestra. Mr. Gericke's summer holidays have been largely devoted to the arrangement of the programs. These will embrace a wide variety of standard works as well as a long list of novelties which will soon be announced. The concerts, which will begin on Oct. 13, will lack no element of popularity properly belonging to such occasions, and the numerous inquiries received about tickets indicate that the public is alive to the extraordinary character of the coming performances. The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29. The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1899

Circulars giving full particulars regarding the coming annual auction sale of season tickets for the series of public rehearsals and concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now ready at the box office, Music Hall. The dates appointed for

---

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State

The Official Paper of the City.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 12, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY SEASON.

The 19th season of the symphony orchestra, and its last in the present Music Hall, opens Oct. 13, with Conductor Gericke commencing his seventh year, with the same personnel under his control as last season.

His programmes will prove both interesting and acceptable, while there can be no reasonable doubt as to their performance. There will be the usual 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts. The orchestra will make trips to New York, Brooklyn, Philadelphia and Baltimore during the weeks of Nov. 6, 11. Dec. 11, 16, Jan. 15, 20, Feb. 19, 24 and March 19, 24, during which weeks the Boston concerts will be omitted.

The list of soloists is a generous one, including such artists as Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Leonora Jackson, Heyman, Ruegger, Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Petschnikoff and others as well as some of the favorite solo artists of the orchestra.

The auction sales of season tickets will be held at Music Hall beginning at 10 a.m. on Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR

VOL. CVI., NO. 74.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 12, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The Symphony concerts at Music Hall this winter will lack no element of attractiveness properly belonging to such performances. Subscribers will have the pleasure of hearing Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Leonora Jackson, Heyman, Ruegger, Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg and Petschnikoff, not to mention others of equal importance from the ranks of the orchestra. Mr. Gericke this summer has devoted much time to the selection of the programmes. They will embrace a wide variety of standard works, some of which have not been heard here for a long time, as well as a long list of novelties. This will be the last season of the orchestra in the old hall. The auction sales of season tickets willl be held at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29. The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State

The Official Paper of the City.

THURSDAY MORNING, SEPT. 14, 1899.

PLANS FOR SYMPHONY AUCTION.

Circulars giving full information regarding the annual auction sale of season tickets for the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals and 24 Saturday evening concerts by the Boston symphony orchestra are now ready, and will be mailed on application.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper

OF NEW ENGLAND. 14

The annual auction sale of season tickets for the coming season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will take place at Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29. The same general plan as in previous seasons will be in vogue this year.

Boston Journal.

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 14, 1899.

Circulars giving full information regarding the coming season of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra are now ready at the box office, Music Hall. The auction sale of tickets will take place on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 14, 1899

The sale of tickets for the symphony concerts will open at Music hall Sept 25.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 16, 1899

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Nineteenth Season Presents Many New Artists in Addition to Old Favorites

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin its nineteenth season at Music Hall on Oct. 13, and will give twenty-four public rehearsals on Friday afternoons and twenty-four concerts on Saturday evenings, according to custom.

The arrangements, now nearly completed, make it evident that the coming performances will possess a wealth of attractions for the musical, and there is every promise of an exceedingly brilliant season. The orchestra will be the same in size as last year, its membership will be the same, and it will again be under the masterly direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. The programmes have been carefully selected and are calculated to suit all tastes. They contain a fair proportion of new compositions and a wide variety of standard works. Some of the novelties chosen for performance are the following: Symphonies by Glazounow (No. 6), Tschaikowsky (No. 3), Anton Bruckner, Wilhelm Berger and Felix Weingartner; a Maurische Rhapsodie by Humperdinck, "Heldenlied" by Dvorak, "Les Eolides" by Cesar Franck, "Medei" by d'Indy, Norwedische Ballade by Jul. Routger, Symphonic Dances by Ed. Grieg, and a new composition by Horatio Parker; overtures by Siegfried Wagner, George W. Chadwick, Goldmark and Dresicke. The following are a few from the long list of standard works to be given: Beethoven Symphonies Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9 (Choral), Schumann Symphonies Nos. 1 and 4, two Mozart Symphonies, two Haydn Symphonies, Brahms Symphonies Nos. 1 and 4, and the "Romeo et Juliette" Symphony by Berlioz, etc.

Among the solo artists who will appear are Sembrich, Ternina, aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson and Ruegger, and Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Petschnikoff, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski and Schroeder. Of the abovenamed artists Sembrich, Ternina, Paderewski and several others are well known and need no introduction.

Leonora Jackson is a young American violinist, born in Boston. In 1896 she won the "Mendelssohn State Prize" at Berlin, where she was a pupil of Professor Joachim, who said of her: "Miss Jackson has impressed me deeply with her talent. If she continues to study she cannot fail to become a violinist of the greatest eminence." A year later Miss Jackson made a successful début with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin, and has since played much in public. During the last London season her services were much in demand, two noteworthy appearances of hers being with the London Philharmonic Orchestra and at Windsor Castle, where she appeared by royal command.

Elsa Ruegger is a young violoncello virtuoso, born in Switzerland and educated at Brussels. Miss Ruegger has won for herself a fine artistic position in Europe, and comes to America with the warmest indorsement of such authorities as D'Albert and Mottl. Many of the European critics are very enthusiastic in their praise of her performances.

Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist and composer, has been specially engaged to come to America to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities. Mr. Dohnanyi has created considerable stir in musical centres in Europe and is described by reliable critics as a veritable genius. A year ago he first appeared in London. He came with no preliminary booming and gave his first concert to a nearly empty house. He finished the season by packing St. James's Hall at an afternoon recital. The London Times commented as follows on Dohnanyi's first London recital: "Seldom in the recent history of music has a success so immediate or an impression so profound been made by an unknown artist as has been made by the young Hungarian pianist who lately appeared at a Richter concert. Though Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi's first recital, given yesterday afternoon in St. James's Hall, drew an audience nearly as small as that which attended Mr. Paderewski's first recital, the enthusiasm his wonderful playing aroused can be compared with nothing in the experience of recent years. Wonderful is, indeed, the only epithet that can be applied to the young artist's performances, but the word is not meant to convey the idea of a technical dexterity to which everything else is sacrificed; technique there is, and of a superbly finished kind, but it is entirely held in subjection to the higher things of interpretation. Those who heard him a fortnight ago, and those who were present yesterday, were not long in realizing that in the depth of poetic feeling, in the apparently infinite command of tone gradation, and in the intellectual insight into the soul of the music he plays, no pianoforte player now living can approach him."

Alexander Petschnikoff, the celebrated Russian violinist, was born in poverty. He was befriended by a Russian family and was educated at the Moscow Conservatory. Most of his early work was done away from the great art centres and his talents were fostered in complete isolation. Mr. Petschnikoff has been uncommonly successful in attracting the public, and his career has been likened to that of Paderewski. He will make his first American appearance in November.

Mark Hambourg, another newcomer, is a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is a pianist who first appeared as a "boy prodigy." Later, after having studied for three years with Leschetizky, he returned to public life equipped with a splendid technique and rare command of expression. His many successes fully justify his engagement for the Symphony concerts.

The auction sale of season tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be on Monday and Tuesday, Sept. 25 and 26, and for the Saturday evening concerts Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28 and 29.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 17, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

On Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, the first strains of another season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be heard for the nineteenth consecutive year, and the last season in old Music Hall.

Mr. Gericke begins his seventh season as conductor with exactly the same orchestra as last year, and to a striking extent the same which he left here at the close of his first term of service, ten years ago. This long-standing acquaintance with the musicians under his control contributes in no small degree to the almost perfect ensemble for which the Boston Symphony Orchestra is famous.

Among the standard works of beauty to be performed are Beethoven's Symphonies, Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9 (choral); Schumann's Symphonies, Nos. 1 and 4; two Mozart Symphonies; two Haydn Symphonies; Brahms's Symphonies, Nos. 1 and 4, and the "Romeo et Juliette" Symphony by Berlioz.

A partial list of the novelties chosen for performance follows: Symphonies by Glazounoff (No. 6), Tschaikowsky (No. 3), Bruckner, Wilhelm Berger and Felix Weingartner; "Maurische Rhapsodie," by Humperdinck; "Heldenlied," by Dvorak; "Les Eolides," by Cesar Franck; "Medei," by D'Indy; Norwegische Ballade, by Jul. Rontgen; Symphonie Dances, by Ed. Grieg; a new composition by Horatio Parker; overtures by Siegfried Wagner, Chadwick, Goldmark and Draeseke.

Among the solo artists who will appear are: Madames Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, and Messrs. Paderewski, Dohnànyi, Petschnikoff, Hambourg, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder.

Of Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler and Paderewski it is not necessary to speak at length. Of the newcomers, Leonora Jackson, a Boston born girl, of Revolutionary stock, and owing most of her musical talent to her mother, returns to her native city with laurels all the more creditable because won in European cities. Scarcely out of her teens, and having overcome obstacles calculated to dishearten the bravest, she has fairly earned the reputation of being one of the greatest woman violinists before the public. Among her other successes she won the Mendelssohn state prize at Berlin in 1896. She has played with Nikisch in Leipsic, with the London Philharmonic, the Royal Orchestral Society of Antwerp, with the Colonne Orchestra in Paris, and in the same city at a private recital before the King of Sweden.

Elsa Ruegger, born in Lucerne, is one of the very few well-known female 'cellists. She studied at the Royal Conservatory in Brussels. Before she was 11 years old she had developed a technic deemed little less than marvelous, and she soon began playing in public. She was rather like a mature artist than a prodigy. She made her metropolitan debut in Berlin with wondrous success, which she afterward duplicated in Vienna, Paris and London. From the unstinted praise she has received from the leading European critics, her coming is awaited with much anticipation.

Another new-comer in Ernst von Dohnànyi's, a Polish pianist, of whose first recital in St. James's Hall, London, it was said: "The enthusiasm his wonderful playing aroused can be compared with nothing in the experience of recent years. Wonderful is, indeed, the only epithet that can be applied to the young artist's performances, but the word is not meant to convey the idea of a technical dexterity to which everything else is sacrificed; technic there is, and of a superbly finished kind, but it is entirely held in subjection to the higher things of interpretation. Those who heard him a fortnight ago, and those who were present yesterday, were not long in realizing that in the depth of poetic feeling, in the apparently infinite command of tone gradation, and in the intellectual insight into the soul of the music he plays, no pianoforte player now living can approach him."

Alexander Petschnikoff, the celebrated Russian violinist, was born in poverty. He was befriended by a Russian family, and was educated at the Moscow Conservatory. Most of his early work was done away from the great art centres, and his talents were fostered in complete isolation. Mr. Petschnikoff has been uncommonly successful in attracting the public, and his career has been likened to that of Paderewski. He will make his first American appearance in New York in November.

Mark Hambourg, another new comer, is a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is a pianist who first appeared as a "boy prodigy." Later, after having studied for three years with Leschetizky, he returned to public life, equipped with a splendid technic and rare command of expression. His many successes fully justify his engagement for the Symphony Concerts.

The season ticket sales will be held at Music Hall, beginning Sept. 25. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 25, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, Sept. 26. The $12 and $7.50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28 and 29, respectively. The sales will be by auction, and will begin each day at 10 A. M.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 17, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA SEASON.

Less than twenty years ago the best musical performances could be heard only in European cities. But in orchestral music, Boston now leads the world, and the statement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no peer among similar musicians cannot be seriously questioned. This fine organization is comprised of 87 musicians, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. No changes have been made in its membership since last year. It will begin its nineteenth season in the Boston Music Hall on Oct. 13. Twenty-four afternoon concerts will be given on Fridays and 24 evening concerts on Saturdays.

The programmes will include interesting novelties and a wide variety of standard orchestral works, and subscribers will have the pleasure of hearing many solo artists of the highest distinction. Among them will be Sembrich, Ternina, Paderewski, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, Dohnanyi, Hambourg and Petschnikoff, not to mention others of equal importance from the ranks of the orchestra.

The Friday matinees offer good opportunities to music lovers of this city, and the number who attend these entertainments increases each season.

Of the soloists mentioned above that are to appear during the season, Sembrich, Ternina, Paderewski and some others are well known and need no introduction. Leonora Jackson is a young American violinist born in Boston. In 1896 she won the Mendelssohn state prize at Berlin when she was a pupil of Professor Joachim. A year later Miss Jackson made a successful debut with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin, and has since played with great success in other large European art centres. During the last London season her services were in constant demand, two notable appearances being with the Philharmonic Orchestra and at Windsor Castle by royal command.

Miss Elsa Ruegger is a young violoncello virtuoso, born in Switzerland and educated at Brussels. She has won for herself a fine artistic position in Europe, and comes to America with the warmest indorsement of such authorities as D'Albert and Mottl. European critics are very enthusiastic in their praise of her performances. Ernest von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist and composer, has been specially engaged to come to America to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities. Mr. Dohnanyi has made a considerable stir in musical centres in Europe, and is described as a veritable genius.

The London Times commented as follows on his first appearance: "Seldom in the history of music has a success so immediate or an impression so profound been made by an unknown artist as has been made by the young Hungarian pianist who lately appeared at a Richter concert. Though Herr Ernst von Dohnanyi's first recital, given yesterday afternoon in St. James's Hall, drew an audience nearly as small as that which attended M. Paderewski's first recital, the enthusiasm his wonderful playing aroused can be compared with nothing in the experience of recent years. Wonderful is, indeed, the only epithet that can be applied to the young artist's performances, but the word is not meant to convey the idea of a technical dexterity to which everything else is sacrificed; technique there is, and of a superbly finished kind, but it is entirely held in subjection to the higher things of interpretation. Those who heard him a fortnight ago and those who were present yesterday were not long in realizing that in the depth of poetic feeling, in the apparently infinite command of tone gradation, and in the intellectual insight into the soul of the music he plays, no pianoforte player now living can approach him."

Alexander Petschnikoff, the celebrated Russian violinist, was born in poverty. He was befriended by a Russian family and was educated at the Moscow Conservatory. Most of his early work was done away from the great art centres and his talents were fostered in complete isolation. Mr. Petschnikoff has been uncommonly successful in attracting the public, and his career has been likened to that of Paderewski. He will make his first American appearance in New York in November.

Mark Hambourg, another new comer, is a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is a pianist who first appeared as a "boy prodigy." Later, after having studied for three years with Leschetizky, he returned to public life equipped with a splendid technique and rare command of expression. His many successes fully justify his engagement for the Symphony concerts.

The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music Hall Monday, Sept. 25, at 10 a. m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals on Tuesday, Sept. 26. The $12 seats for the concerts on Thursday, Sept. 28. The $7.50 seats for the concerts on Friday, Sept. 29. Bids will be accepted for seats in their regular order only, and not for the choice; and no more than four seats will be sold on one bid. The seats open to competition will be shown on a agram and will be marked off as sold.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 79.
SUNDAY, SEPT. 17, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra's Coming Season.

Sketches of Some of the Artists Who Will Appear at the Concerts—Return of the Bostonians—The Bayreuth Festival — Mme. Wagner's Plans—Notes.

FOUNDED for the purpose of providing the best orchestral music, no organization ever more successfully fulfilled its mission than does the Boston Symphony orchestra. Year after year its concerts maintain the highest standard, and appeal to the public as occasions of rare musical enjoyment. The 19th season of the orchestra will begin at Music Hall on Oct. 13. It will comprise 24 public rehearsals on Friday afternoons, and 24 concerts on Saturday evenings, according to custom. The arrangements for the coming performances make it certain that they will lack none of the features that have given them their great popularity in the past. The membership of the orchestra will be the same as last season, and it will again be under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke.

The programmes have been chosen with great care and should suit all tastes. Some of the novelties and works to be performed in these concerts for the first time are the following: Symphonies by Glazounow (No. 6), Tschaikowsky (No. 3), Anton Bruckner, Wilhelm Berger, Felix Weingartner. A "Maurische Rhapsodie" by Humperdinck, "Heldenlied," by Dvorak, "Les Eolides," by Cesar Franck, "Medei," by D'Indy, "Norwegische Ballade," by Jul. Rontgen, Symphonic Dances by Ed. Greig, a new composition by Horatio Parker, Overtures by Seigfried Wagner, George W. Chadwick, Goldmark and Dresicke. The following are a few from the long list of standard works selected for performance: Beethoven Symphonies Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9; Schumann Symphonies Nos. 1 and 4; two Mozart Symphonies; two Haydn Symphonies; Brahms Symphonies Nos. 1 and 4, and the "Romeo et Juliette" Symphony by Berlioz.

Among the solo artists who are expected to appear are Mesdames Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson and Ruegger, MM. Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Petschnikoff, Kneisel, Loefflerer, Adamowski and Schroeder. Of these artists, Sembrich, Ternina, Paderewski and several others require no introduction. A word is perhaps needed for some of the others.

Miss Leonora Jackson is a young violinist, born in Boston. In 1896 she won the "Mendelssohn state prize" at Berlin, where she had been studying with Prof. Joachim, who said of her, "Miss Jackson has impressed me deeply with her talent. If she continues to study she cannot fail to become a violinist of the greatest eminence." A year later, Miss Jackson made a successful debut with the Philharmonic orchestra in Berlin, and she has since played much in public. During the last London season she became popular, and her services were in constant demand. Two notable appearances of hers were in the London Philharmonic concerts and at Windsor Castle, where she played by royal command.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, who comes to America for the first time, is a young violoncello virtuoso, born in Switzerland and educated at Brussels. Miss Ruegger has made for herself a fine artistic position in Europe, and brings the warmest indorsements of such authorities as Mottl and d'Albert. Many European critics are very enthusiastic in their praise of her performances.

Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist and composer, has been specially engaged to come to America to play with the Boston Symphony orchestra in various cities. Mr. Dohnanyi has created a considerable stir in musical circles in Europe, and is described by reliable authorities as a veritable genius. A year ago he first appeared in London, practically unannounced. He gave his first recital to a nearly empty house, and finished the season by packing St. James' Hall at an afternoon recital. The London Times commented on Dohnanyi's playing as follows:

> Seldom in the recent history of music has a success so immediate or an impression so profound been made by an unknown artist as has been made by the young Hungarian pianist who lately appeared at a Richter concert. Though Herr Ernst von Dohnanyi's first recital, given yesterday afternoon in St. James' Hall, drew an audience nearly as small as that which attended M. Paderewski's first recital, the enthusiasm his wonderful playing aroused can be compared with nothing in the experience of recent years. Wonderful is, indeed, the only epithet that can be applied to the young artist's performances, but the word is not meant to convey the idea of a technical dexterity to which everything else is sacrificed; technique there is, and of a superbly finished kind, but it is entirely held in subjection to the higher things of interpretation. Those who heard him a fortnight ago, and those who were present yesterday, were not long in realizing that in the depth of poetic feeling, in the apparently infinite command of tone gradation, and in the intellectual insight into the soul of the music he plays, no pianoforte player now living can approach him.

Alexander Petschnikoff, the Russian violinist, was born in poverty. He was befriended by a Russian family, and was educated at the Moscow conservatory. Most of his early work was done away from the great art centres, and his talents were fostered in complete isolation. Mr. Petschnikoff has been uncommonly successful in attracting the public, and his career has been likened to that of Paderewski. He will make his first American appearance in New York in November.

Mark Hambourg, another newcomer, is a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is a pianist who first appeared as a "boy prodigy." Later, after having studied for three years with Leschetizky, he returned to public life equipped with a splendid technique and rare command of expression. His many successes fully justify his engagement for the Symphony concerts.

The season, which will be the last to be given in old Music Hall, can hardly fail to be one of the most brilliant in the history of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The sales of season tickets will be held in Music Hall next week, and will be by auction. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsal will be sold on Monday, Sept. 25; the $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold on Tuesday, Sept. 26, and the $12 and $7.50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28 and 29, respectively.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, SEPT. 18, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY.

New Artists to Appear During the Coming Season.

The 19th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will show no diminution in attractiveness, for Conductor Gericke has the same personnel to a man under his baton, with an ambition to excel the glowing record of the past.

During the summer, Mr. Gericke has arranged some very attractive programmes. Of the old favorites there will be played Beethoven Symphonies Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9 (Choral), Schumann Symphonies Nos. 1 and 4, two Mozart symphonies, two Haydn symphonies, Brahms symphonies Nos. 1 and 4, and the Romeo et Juliette symphony by Berlioz, &c., &c.

Some of the novelties which will be presented for the first time at these concerts are symphonies by Glazounow (No. 6), Tschaikowsky (No. 3), Anton Bruckner, Wilhelm Berger and Felix Weingartner; "Maurische Rhapsodie," by Humperdinck, Heldenlied by Dvorak, "Les Eolides" by Cesar Franck, "Medei" by D'Indy, Norwegische Ballade by Jul. Rontgen, Symphonie Dances by Ed. Grieg, and a new composition by Horatio Parker; overtures by Siegfried Wagner, Chadwick, Goldmark and Dresicke.

Soloists will play as prominent a part in the concerts this season as heretofore. The list announced for the coming season is a brilliant one, including Mesdames Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, and Messrs. Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Petschnikoff, Hambourg, Kneisel, Adamowski, Loeffler, Schroeder, and others to be announced.

Of the new comers here, Ernst Dohnanyi is a young Hungarian pianist, who made his debut in one of the Richter concerts in London last season.

He played the Beethoven concerto in G major, and of his work the London Daily News said:—

"He has an exquisite touch and much sensibility. His brilliant interpretation of the first movement and of his own difficult cadenza, which was introduced into the finale, proved him even among the moderns to be a magnificent executant; while although, of course, he attempted no particularly new readings in Beethoven, and his interpretation of the master's music was an honest, straightforward piece of work, it showed plenty of warmth and real intellectuality."

Great interest has already been shown in the appearance of Miss Leonora Jackson, not only because of her brilliant success abroad as a violinist, but because she is a Boston born girl.

After a struggle harder than usually attends the efforts of young musicians, Miss Jackson's triumph was all the more complete. Her playing with Conductor Nikisch at Leipsic, at the London Philharmonic and at the Colonne symphony concert in Paris is enough to establish her standing as an artist of highest rank.

Elsa Ruegger, born in Lucerne, is one of the very few well-known women violoncellists. Her musical training was received at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Brussels. Before she was 11 she had developed a technique deemed little less than marvellous, and soon began playing in public. She made her metropolitan debut in Berlin with wondrous success, which she afterwards duplicated in Vienna, Paris and London.

Alexander Petschnikoff, the celebrated Russian violinist, was born in poverty. He was befriended by a Russian family, and was educated at a Moscow conservatory. Most of his early work was done away from the great art centres, and his talents were fostered in complete isolation.

Mr. Petschnikoff's career has been likened to that of Paderewski.

Mark Hambourg, another new comer, is a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is a pianist who first appeared as a "boy prodigy." Later he studied for three years with Leschetizky.

The season ticket sales will be held at Music Hall, beginning Sept. 25. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on Sept. 25, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Sept. 26; $12 and $7.50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts on Sept. 28 and 29 respectively.

The sales will be by auction, and will begin each day at 10 a.m.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 17, 1899.

SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Plans for the Concert Season Soon to Begin.

Famous Soloists and Many Novelties Promised by Director Gericke.

Seats to be Sold by Auction in Music Hall Next Week.

The launching of Boston's musical season is the announcement of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in which the interest is as keen as it is widespread. For this interest there is excellent reason, for Boston has a greater number of symphony concerts than any other city in the world, with an attendance at each measured only by the capacity of the hall. And this incontestable proof of stability and influence is no recent growth, for the story has been the same for many years.

The 19th season of the orchestra will show no diminution in attractiveness, for conductor Gericke has the same player to a man under his baton, with an ever present and most laudable ambition to excel if possible the glowing record of the past.

During the summer Mr Gericke has arranged some very attractive programs with a special view to please his audiences, with which his six-years' service has given him a close and cordial acquaintance. Even the keenest demand for new works never can displace the grand old classics, without which a symphony season would seem indeed strange and incomplete. Of these old favorites there will be played Beethoven symphonies, Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9 (choral), Schumann symphonies, Nos. 1 and 4, two Mozart symphonies, two Haydn symphonies, Brahm's symphonies, Nos. 1 and 4, and the "Romeo et Juliette" symphony by Berlioz, etc, etc.

Some of the novelties which will be presented for the first time at these concerts are symphonies by Glazounow (No. 6), Tschaikowsky (No. 3), Anton Bruckner, Wilhelm Berger and Felix Weingartner; "Maurische Rhapsodie," by Humperdinck; "Heldenlied," by Dvorak; "Les Eolides," by Cesar Franck; "Medei," by D'Indy; Norwegische ballade, by Jul. Rontgen; symphonie dances, by Ed. Grieg, and a new composition by Horatio Parker, overtures by Siegfried Wagner, Geo. W. Chadwick, Goldmark and Dresicke.

The list of soloists announced for the coming season is a brilliant one, including such great artists as Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield, Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger and Messrs Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Petschnikoff, Hambourg, Kneisel, Adamowski, Loeffler, Schroeder and others to be announced.

Of Sembrich, Ternina and Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield Zeisler and Paderewski no detailed mention is necessary. There is, however, always a natural curiosity to learn something about artists who, though already famous in Europe, are comparative strangers here. Of these newcomers Ernst Dohnanyi is a young Hungarian pianist, who made his debut in one of the Richter concerts in London last season. Conductor Richter is usually so very cautious in allowing debutants in his concerts that Dohnanyis' appearance naturally aroused a great deal of interest. He played the Beethoven concerto in G major, and of his work the London Daily News said: "He has an exquisite touch and much sensibility. His brilliant interpretation of the first movement and of his own difficult cadenza, which was introduced into the finale, proved him even among the moderns to be a magnificent executant, while, although, of course, he attempted no particularly new readings in Beethoven, and his interpretation of the master's music was an honest, straightforward piece of work, it showed plenty of warmth and real intellectuality. At the end of the concerto the young Hungarian was four times called to the platform, but declined an encore.

Great interest has already been shown in the appearance of Miss Leonora Jackson, not only because of her brilliant success abroad as a violinist, but because she is a Boston-born girl. After a struggle harder than usually attends the efforts of young musicians, Miss Jackson's triumph was all the more complete. Her playing with conductor Nikisch at Leipsic, at the London Philharmonic and at the Colonne symphony concert in Paris, is enough to establish her standing as an artist of highest rank, and she is the first American violinist engaged as soloist by these distinguished societies.

Elsa Ruegger, born in Lucerne, is one of the very few well-known women violoncellists. Her musical training was received at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Brussels. Before she was 11 years old she had developed a technique deemed little less than marvelous, and soon began playing in public. She was rather like a mature artist than a prodigy. She made her metropolitan debut in Berlin, with wondrous success, which she afterward duplicated in Vienna, Paris and London. Although playing one of the most difficult of all instruments, she has acquired extraordinary skill, and from the unstinted praise she received from the leading European critics her coming is awaited with much anticipation.

Alexander Petschnikoff, the celebrated Russian violinist, was born in poverty. He was befriended by a Russian family, and was educated at a Moscow conservatory. Most of his early work was done away from the great art centers, and his talents were fostered in complete isolation. Mr Petschnikoff has been uncommonly successful in attracting the public and his career has been likened to that of Paderewski. He will make his first American appearance in New York in November.

Mark Hambourg, another newcomer, is a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is a pianist who first appeared as a "boy prodigy." Later, after having studied for three years with Leschetizky, he returned to public life, equipped with a splendid technique and rare command of expression. His many successes fully justify his engagement for the Symphony concerts.

The season ticket sales will be at Music hall, beginning Sept 25. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept 25, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, Sept 26. The $12 and $7.50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Sept 28 and 29. The sales will be by auction, and will begin each day

---

—The Boston symphony orchestra, Mr Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, will give 24 concerts on consecutive Saturday evenings, from Oct 14, 1899, to April 28, 1900, omitting Nov 11, Dec 16, 1899, Jan 20, Feb 24 and March 24, 1900, and 24 public rehearsals on consecutive Friday afternoons, from Oct 13, 1899, to April 27, 1900, omitting Nov 10, Dec 15, 1899, Jan 19, Feb 23 and March 23, 1900. The $12 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music hall, Monday, Sept 25, at 10 a m. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction, at Music hall, Tuesday, Sept 26, at 10 a m. The $12 seats for the concerts will be sold at auction at Music hall, on Thursday, Sept 28, at 10 a m. The $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold in like manner at the same place, on Friday, Sept 29, at 10 a m.

Sept 18

"This Country, with its Institutions, Belongs to the People who Inhabit It."

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

THE SYMPHONY.

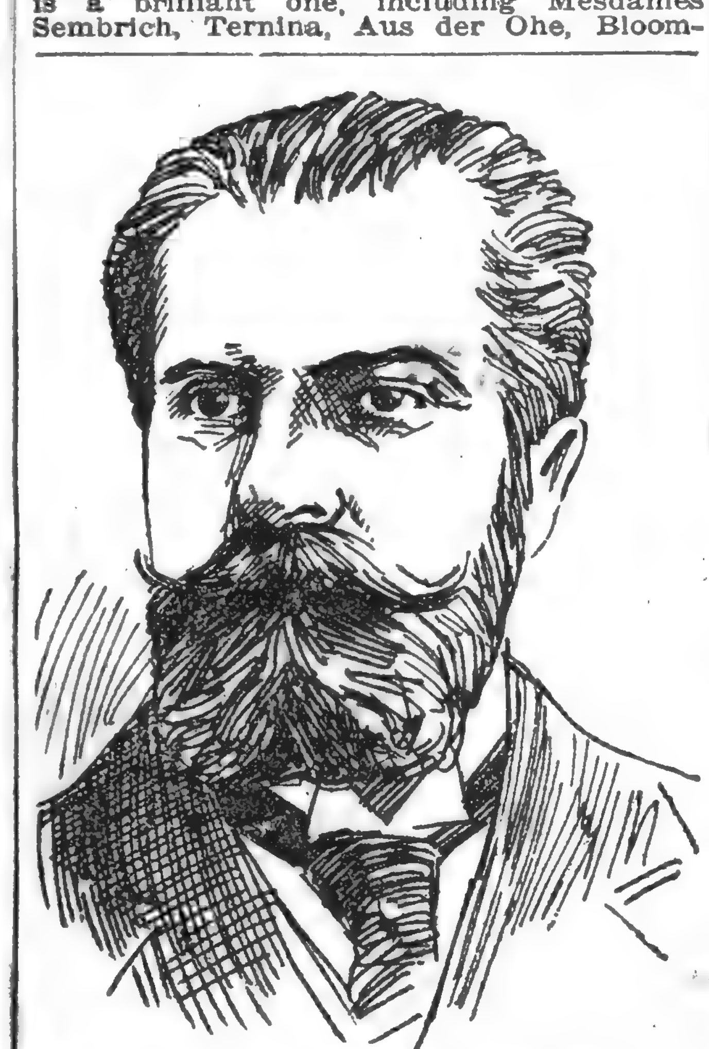
New Artists to Appear During the Coming Season.

The 19th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will show no diminution in attractiveness, for Conductor Gericke has the same personnel to a man under his baton, with an ambition to excel the glowing record of the past.

During the summer, Mr. Gericke has arranged some very attractive programmes. Of the old favorites there will be played Beethoven Symphonies Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9 (Choral), Schumann Symphonies Nos. 1 and 4, two Mozart symphonies, two Haydn symphonies, Brahms symphonies Nos. 1 and 4, and the Romeo et Juliette symphony by Berlioz, &c., &c.

Some of the novelties which will be presented for the first time at these concerts are symphonies by Glazounow (No. 6), Tschaikowsky (No. 3), Anton Bruckner, Wilhelm Berger and Felix Weingartner; "Maurische Rhapsodie," by Humperdinck, Heldenlied by Dvorak, "Les Eolides" by Cesar Franck, "Medei" by D'Indy, Norwegische Ballade by Jul. Rontgen, Symphonie Dances by Ed. Grieg, and a new composition by Horatio Parker; overtures by Siegfried Wagner, Chadwick, Goldmark and Dresicke.

Soloists will play as prominent a part in the concerts this season as heretofore. The list announced for the coming season is a brilliant one, including Mesdames Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, and Messrs. Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Petschnikoff, Hambourg, Kneisel, Adamowski, Loeffler, Schroeder, and others to be announced.



HERR WILHELM GERICKE.

Of the new comers here, Ernst Dohnanyi is a young Hungarian pianist, who made his debut in one of the Richter concerts in London last season.

He played the Beethoven concerto in G major, and of his work the London Daily News said:—

"He has an exquisite touch and much sensibility. His brilliant interpretation of the first movement and of his own difficult cadenza, which was introduced into the finale, proved him even among the moderns to be a magnificent executant; while although, of course, he attempted no particularly new readings in Beethoven, and his interpretation of the master's music was an honest, straightforward piece of work, it showed plenty of warmth and real intellectuality."

Great interest has already been shown in the appearance of Miss Leonora Jackson, not only because of her brilliant success abroad as a violinist, but because she is a Boston born girl.

After a struggle harder than usually attends the efforts of young musicians, Miss Jackson's triumph was all the more complete. Her playing with Conductor Nikisch at Leipsic, at the London Philharmonic and at the Colonne symphony concert in Paris is enough to establish her standing as an artist of highest rank.

Elsa Ruegger, born in Lucerne, is one of the very few well-known women violoncellists. Her musical training was received at the Royal Conservatory of Music in Brussels. Before she was 11 she had developed a technique deemed little less than marvellous, and soon began playing in public. She made her metropolitan debut in Berlin with wondrous success, which she afterwards duplicated in Vienna, Paris and London.

Alexander Petschnikoff, the celebrated Russian violinist, was born in poverty. He was befriended by a Russian family, and was educated at a Moscow conservatory. Most of his early work was done away from the great art centres, and his talents were fostered in complete isolation.

Mr. Petschnikoff's career has been likened to that of Paderewski.

Mark Hambourg, another new comer, is a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is a pianist who first appeared as a "boy prodigy." Later he studied for three years with Leschetizky.

The season ticket sales will be held at Music Hall, beginning Sept. 25. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on Sept. 25, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Sept. 26; $12 and $7.50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts on Sept. 28 and 29 respectively.

The sales will be by auction, and will

The Boston Traveler

Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.
307 Washington Street.

Preparations are already well under way for the last season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in the time-honored and dingy old Music Hall. Next year we shall hear the inimitable concerts in a fine and comfortable auditorium, and all that will remain of the first home of the orchestra will be a cluster of rich and tender memories. For this winter the usual plans have been made, that is to say, there will be 24 concerts and 24 rehearsals on Saturday nights and Friday afternoons respectively. The prices for season tickets will be $12 and $7.50—always remembering that the auction sale premiums will increase the total cost a little or a great deal according to location. These sales will be held in Music Hall on Monday, Tuesday, Thursday and Friday, Sept. 25, 26, 28 and 29.

The series of concerts will be exceptionally brilliant this year, it is promised. Mr. Gericke is to give many novelties in the way of orchestral music, and the list of soloists includes Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Leonora Jackson, Heyman, Ruegger, Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg and Petschnikoff, as well as some of the favorite solo artists of the orchestra. The first rehearsal will be given Oct. 13.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The preliminary announcement of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, as might be expected, has aroused a remarkable and widespread interest. The unusually strong attractions offered, together with the long-standing reputation of the orchestra for well-nigh perfect performances, is a combination too tempting for genuine music lovers to resist.

The list of soloists announced for the coming season is a brilliant one, including such great artists as Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield, Zeister, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, and Messrs. Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Petschnikoff, Hambourg, Kneisel, Adamowski, Loeffler, Schroeder and others to be announced.

The season ticket sales will be at Music Hall, beginning Sept. 25. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 25, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, Sept. 26. The $12 and $7.50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28 and 29. The sales will be by auction and will begin each day at 10 a. m.

Boston Journal.

TUESDAY, SEPTEMBER 19, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The nineteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will open at Music Hall on Oct. 13. Among the soloists announced to appear during the season are the following well-known artists: Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield, Zeister, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, and Messrs. Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Petschnikoff, Hambourg, Kneisel, Adamowski, Loeffler, Schroeder and others to be announced.

The season ticket sales will be at Music Hall, beginning Sept. 25. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on Monday, Sept. 25, and the $7 50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, Sept. 26. The $12 and $7 50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Thursday and Friday, Sept. 28 and 29. The sales will be by auction, and will begin each day at 10 A. M.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVI., NO. 81.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 19, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The recent announcements of the coming concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra has resulted in universal satisfaction. In addition to the large number of new orchestral works which Conductor Gericke has selected, the list of soloists to appear is a brilliant one. It includes Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield, Zeister, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger and Messrs. Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Petschnikoff, Hambourg, Kneisel, Adamowski, Loeffler, Schroeder and others, to be announced.

The season ticket sales will be at Music Hall, beginning the 25th instant. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on the 25th, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on the 26th. The $12 and $7.50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on the 28th and 29th. The sales will be by auction, and will begin each day at 10 A. M.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 19, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston symphony orchestra offers an attractive list of soloists to appear at its concerts during the coming season. Among those already engaged are the following: Mmes Sembrich, Ternina, Miss Aus Der Ohe, Mme Bloomfield Zeisler, Miss Heyman, Miss Leonora Jackson, Miss Ruegger, Messrs Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Petschnikoff, Hambourg, Kneisel, Schroeder, Loeffler and Adamowski.

The auction sale of tickets will begin Monday, Sept 5, and be continued on Tuesday, Thursday and Friday. The sale will open sharply at 10 a m each day.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 19, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The preliminary announcement of the Boston Symphony, which begins its nineteenth season at Music Hall, Oct. 13, has aroused widespread interest. The list of artists to appear as soloists is a brilliant one. They are Mmes. Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, and Messrs. Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Petschnikoff, Hambourg, Kneisel, Adamowski, Loeffler, Schroeder and others to be announced.

The season ticket sales will be at Music Hall, beginning Sept. 25. The $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold on Sept. 25, and the $7.50 seats for the same series on Tuesday, Sept. 26.

The $12 and $7.50 tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will be sold on Sept. 28 and 29. The sales will be by auction, and will begin each day at 10 a.m.

The Boston Traveler

Published by the 23

THE SYMPHONY SALE

Musical Boston is now turning its eyes prospectingly on the auction sales of the Symphony seats, which begin at Music Hall next Monday morning. A great many people care very little whether the market is to be run by the bulls or the bears; they will order some agent or other to get seats for them, and that ends the matter. But there are plenty of others who are compelled to count every extra 50 cents that is bid up on the places they want, and consequently they are hoping, if not praying, that prices will somehow or other stay down within obtainable limits. This hope is probably vain; there is a feeling in the air that premiums will go a-soaring this year, as never before. Times are good, the conductor is very popular, the list of soloists is excellent, and the fact that this is the last season of the concerts in the old hall will have a certain sentimental effect on the money rates.

Some of the novelties to be performed this year for the first time are the following: Symphonies by Glazounow (No. 6), Tschaikowsky (No. 3), Anton Bruckner, Wilhelm Berger, Felix Weingartner. A "Maurische Rhapsodie," by Humperdinck; "Heldenlied," by Dvorak; "Les Eolides," by Cesar Franck; "Medei," by D'Indy; "Norwegische Ballade," by Jul. Rontgen; "Symphonic Dances," by Edward Grieg; a new composition by Horatio Parker; overtures by Siegried Wagner, George W. Chadwick, Goldmark and Dresicke. The standard works to be given include Beethoven Symphonies No. 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9; Schumann Symphonies No. 1 and 4; two Mozart symphonies; two Haydn symphonies; Brahms Symphonies No. 1 and 4, and the "Romeo et Juliette" symphony, by Berlioz.

The soloists promised are certainly a fine lot. Among them are Mmes. Sembrich, Ternina, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler, Miss Heyman, Miss Leonora Jackson, Miss Ruegger, Messrs. Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Petschnikoff, Hambourg, Kneisel, Schroeder, Loeffler, Adamowski and others.

Boston Transcript

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 23, 1899

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

On Monday next the Symphony ticket auctions will begin at Music Hall with the sale of the $12 seats for the Friday-afternoon public rehearsals. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday and the sales of the $12 and $7.50 seats for the Saturday-evening concerts will be held on Thursday and Friday, respectively. The sales will begin each day at 10 A. M. The first performance will be given on Oct. 13.

No lover of music who has lived in Boston within the last nineteen winters need be reminded of the superlative excellence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra or of the attractions of its concerts. As time goes on they are attended by an ever-widening circle of subscribers, who look upon them as occasions of musical enjoyment not to be missed. The announcements that have been published concerning the approaching season justify the prediction that it will be one of the most brilliant in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Mr. Gericke has displayed a catholic taste in the selection of the programmes and the choice of solo artists leaves nothing to be desired. Sembrich and Paderewski, Ternina and Dohnanyi, aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heymann, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, Hambourg, Petschnikoff, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and others, who are to appear, comprise a collection of artists that has rarely if ever been equalled in any series of concerts.

Old Music Hall with its pleasant associations for most Bostonians, will be occupied by the Orchestra this winter for the last time. In the autumn of 1900 the organization will move to the new hall now being built for it on Massachusetts avenue.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVI., NO. 85.

SATURDAY, SEPT. 23, 1899.

SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

Patrons of the Boston Symphony concerts are reminded that on Monday morning the $12 season tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 tickets will be sold only on Tuesday. The auction sale of tickets for the Saturday evening concerts will take place on Thursday and Friday.

[19]

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, SEPTEMBER 24, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock the auction sale of season tickets for the 19th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opens in Music Hall.

This sounds like a very simple announcement, yet as we read between the lines we find that an orchestra of 87 finished musicians and with a reputation second to none in the world will give a larger number of symphony concerts of the highest order than is enjoyed by any other city in the country or in Europe, and every one of these 48 concerts will be attended by audiences filling Music Hall to its utmost capacity. The standard of performance of the Boston Symphony Orchestra has been kept on the highest plane. With Mr. Gericke as the conductor, it is absolutely safe to predict performances equal to those in the past, and a constant and most commendable effort to improve.

In addition to the work of the orchestra, one can hear at these concerts the best soloists available, both in America and from abroad. We do not recall a stronger list for any previous season that the following: Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson and Ruegger, and Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Petschnikoff, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski and Schroeder.

The auction sales will continue through the week and it should be borne in mind that the season tickets are easily within the means of those willing to pay an amount equal to the cost of other high class performances, both in the theatrical and musical world. Tomorrow's sale is for the $12 tickets to the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals, and the $7 50 tickets for the same series will be sold on Tuesday. There will be no sale on Wednesday, and on Thursday the $12 tickets for the 24 Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and the $7 50 tickets for the same series will be offered for sale on Friday. Each sale begins at 10 A. M. and continues without interruption through the day.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 24, 1899.

SYMPHONY TICKETS AT AUCTION.

Tomorrow morning the auction sales of season tickets for the performances of the Boston symphony orchestra will begin at Music hall. The sales will occupy four days. Only the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold tomorrow. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold Tuesday. The sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be held Thursday, and the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold Friday. The sales will begin each day at 10 a m.

The plan of selling these tickets by auction commends itself for its fairness, and the wide range of prices it creates accommodates all purposes. By attending the auctions one can usually secure tickets in some location at any reasonable price he wishes to pay.

"A virtuoso orchestra," as the critic of the New York Sun called it, is a title justly bestowed on the Boston symphony orchestra. Unlike most organizations appealing to the musical public for support, the attractiveness of its performances lies in the musicianship and ability of all its members and the perfection of its ensemble and not upon the personality and talent of an individual or of a few stars. For perfection of detail its performances can only be compared to the dramatic performances of the Comedie Francaise, and like that famous institution, the permanency of its success seems assured.

The announcements that have been made concerning the coming concerts have drawn forth many expressions of approval and the impression prevails in musical circles that the season will be the most brilliant in many years. Conductor Gericke has displayed a catholic taste in the choice of his programs and the arrangements, as far as announced, leave nothing to be desired. While the orchestra itself constitutes the principal attraction of these performances the opportunity afforded to hear many solo artists of renown will be welcomed by the subscribers. Among the artists engaged are Sembrich and Paderewski, Ternina and Dohnanyi, Aus Der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, Hombourg, Petschnikoff Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and others.

The first concert will be given on Oct 13.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 86.

SUNDAY, SEPT. 24, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Tomorrow morning at 10 o'clock the auction sale of season tickets for the 19th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra will begin in Music Hall. While in many other directions the tendency of entertainments has been to deteriorate in quality, the standard of performance of the Boston Symphony orchestra has been kept on the highest plane. With Conductor Gericke as the guiding spirit, it is absolutely safe to predict not only performances equal to those in the past, but a constant and most commendable effort to improve. In addition to the work of the orchestra, one can hear at these concerts the very best solo talent available, both in America and from abroad. Rarely has been presented a stronger list for any previous season than the following: Sembrich, Ternina, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson and Ruegger, and Paderewski, Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Petschnikoff, Kneisel, Loeffler Adamowski and Schroeder.

The auction sales will continue through the week, and it should be borne in mind that the season tickets are easily within the means of those willing to pay an amount equal to the cost of other high-class performances, both in the theatrical and musical world. Tomorrow's sale is for the $12 tickets to the 24 Friday afternoon public rehearsals, and the $7.50 tickets for the same series will be sold on Tuesday. There will be no sale on Wednesday, and on Thursday the $12 tickets for the 24 Saturday evening concerts will be sold, and the $7.50 tickets for the same series will be offered for sale on Friday. Each sale begins at 10 A. M. and continues without interruption through the day.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 24, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

The auction sales of season tickets for the performances of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin at Music Hall tomorrow when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold on Tuesday. The sale of the $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be held on Thursday and the $7.50 seats for the concerts will be sold on Friday. The sales will begin each day at 10 a. m.

Less than twenty years ago the best musical performances could be heard only in European cities, and one must still cross the ocean for grand opera in its perfection; but in orchestral music Boston now leads the world, and the statement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no peer among similar organizations cannot be seriously questioned. The announcements that have been made concerning the coming performances have created widespread interest, and the impression prevails in musical circles that the season will be one of the most brilliant in the history of the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Conductor Gericke has displayed catholic taste in the selection of his programme, and the list of solo artists who are to appear contains many distinguished names. Sembrich and Paderewski, Ternina and Dohnanyi, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, Hambourg, Petschnikoff, Kneisel, Loeffler, Adamowski, Schroeder and others have been engaged.

The first public rehearsal will be given on Friday afternoon, Oct. 13, followed by the first concert on Saturday evening, Oct. 14.

---

4 Sept 25

"This Country, with its Institutions, Belongs to the People who Inhabit It."

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

BIG BIDS

For Symphony Seats at Today's Sale.

Larger Premiums and Crowd Than Usual.

A larger number of people than usual—much larger than last year—attended the auction sale of symphony orchestra rehearsal seats this morning. Many who are familiar with these occasions state that the bidding today has been much higher and more spirited than usual.

The highest premium paid for any seat up to 3 p.m. was $135, for a location in row N, near the centre of the hall.

In this section there were several bids over $100.

B. J. Lang, F. F. Bullard, Alex, Steinert, E. M. Farnsworth, H. E. Raymond, Mrs. Walter Jackson, and Mrs. S. B. Field were among the bidders.

It certainly was not "bargain day" at Music Hall, unless for the lady who paid an $8 premium on A34, an end seat. The neighboring seats in the same row sold at figures ranging from $18 to $21.50.

Only $12 seats were sold today.

At noon the highest premium paid was $95 each for four seats—15, 16, 17, and 18—the purchaser being a Mr. Pratt.

The first row, A, sold for the least in the combined sales, the seats not being over $14 each on the average. B averaged about $20.

The larger bids began with C, when seats were sold from $31 to $55. D did not have as high an average nor E, where the bids ranged from $31 to $51.

In F four seats brought $58 premiums and several were sold between $40 and $50. In this section of the house the brokers were quite active.

After the outside seats in G had been disposed of there was a lively tilt for those located in the centre of the row and the prices paid were from $44.50 to $76.

In H came the largest bid of the day, already mentioned. As was to be expected there were many discrepancies, where seats next to those bringing high prices were sold for comparatively little. For example, H 15-18 brought $95; H 19-21 brought $51, a difference of $44.

I and J were other rows where the agents did some lively bidding. Individual seats sold at $72.50 and $75, and blocks of two and four at $86.50, $57, $51 and $81.

Here the large bids seemed to stop for the time being.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVI., NO. 87.

MONDAY, SEPT. 25, 1899.

SYMPHONY TICKET SALES.

Auction Begins at Music Hall Today, When $12 Seats Will Be Sold.

The auction sales of Symphony tickets will begin at Music Hall today, when the $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals will be sold. The $7.50 tickets for the rehearsals will be sold tomorrow, and the sales of the $12 and $7.50 seats for the Saturday evening concerts will be held on Thursday and Friday, respectively. The sales will begin at 10 A. M.

The plan of selling the tickets by auction commends itself for its fairness, and the wide range of prices it creates accommodates all purses. By attending the auctions one can always secure seats in some location for any reasonable sum he wishes to pay.

Conductor Gericke's attractive programmes, and the remarkably fine solo artists engaged, including Sembrich, Ternina, Paderewski and a host of others, cannot but make the coming season one of the most brilliant in the history of the Boston Symphony

---

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, SEPTEMBER 25, 1899

HIGHEST PRICE WAS $135

Seats for the Symphony Rehearsals

Sold by Lively Auction This Forenoon

No Sensational Premiums as Last Season

A Large Attendance and a Brisk Demand

In the musical and social world the event of today was the auction sale of the tickets for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. There was a very large attendance. Not many of the prominent society people were present, as they are yet in the country, but their choice of seats was carefully looked out for by the ticket agents. One well-known agent had orders for concert and rehearsal tickets to the amount of more then $20,000. Many were present out of curiosity. In the balcony there were groups of strangers, evidently travellers, who had dropped in to witness the auction.

On the general average the seats sold at a higher premium than they did last season. The fancy prices for two or three seats, however, that marked last year were not realized. It may be remembered that last year, in H, seat number 17 brought $320. This morning the highest premium was $135. This sum was paid for three seats each, in N, number 14, 15 and 16. The next highest premium was $102.50. Three seats were taken at this price. The premium at which the seats were started was as usual $12.

Those seats right in front on the floor went much higher than usual; $18 and $20 premium was paid for many in the front row that are usually considered not very advantageous. The end seats of the centre aisle in every row created a competition in bidding that added much interest to the contest. In F the premium was always in the neighborhood of $50. Last year 18 in G sold for more than $300 premium, but this year it only brought $75. For the Welds three seats were purchased in H at a premium of $95. In I the end centre seat was started at $40. The prices in K were higher this year than they were last year.

A large number of women did their own bidding, and watched the sale of every seat with keen interest. Others were equally happy at just making one bid, the starter, and then they were content to continue their embroidery or fondle the ears of the pet dog.

Tomorrow the $7.50 seats for the same series will be sold.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVI., NO. 87.

MONDAY, SEPT. 25, 1899.

SYMPHONY TICKETS.

Auction Sale Begun in Music Hall This Afternoon—Good Prices Realized.

At Music Hall, today, was begun the sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon public rehearsals of the Boston Symphony orchestra. The sale was largely attended, the audience including a number of men and women well known in social circles. As usual, too, the ticket brokers were present in force, and, also as usual, most of the highest priced bids were made by them.

It had been expected that the seats this year would command exceptionally high prices because of the era of prosperity in so many directions. It may be said that expectations were not disappointed, the indications being that the gross sales would be in excess of those of last year, although last year's sales were more than ordinarily good.

The highest premiums paid during the forenoon were $150 each for a small block of seats in about the middle of the hall. Prices did not, however, remain at this altitude. Four seats in H brought $95 each.

The lowest premium was $8, for a very undesirable seat on the extreme front and side. Two seats in I brought premiums of $86.50 each, and one in I and two in G brought $75 premiums. Several in J sold for $81.

The seats were not disposed of in blocks so much as has been usual, and the fact that they were bought one by one made the auction a slow one. At 1 o'clock, indeed, scarcely half of the orchestra floor had been sold.

Many seats brought premiums of between $70 and $60, and many more ranged between $60 and $50. It was obviously not a good time to get seats cheaply, and it may be safely predicted that few, if any, of the chairs for the afternoon public rehearsals will be secured for a song.

The Boston Traveler

Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.
307 Washington Street.

SYMPHONY SEATS SOLD.

A High Average Brought At Today's Auction, But No Such Sensational Prices As Last Year.

The appetizer, so to speak, for the Symphony concertf east that is to come later, was very much in evidence in Music Hall today. In fact, the annual auction sale of seats for these musical events began at a little after 10 o'clock, and at the hour of going to press it was still in progress.

Prices were very strong, the general average being considerably higher than last year. There was no such sky-rocketing as then took place to make things sensationally interesting, today's top figure being $95 as again $325 a season ago.

The usual accessories of the sale were to be observed: a plentiful attendance of well-dressed and nervous women, the huge chart of the stage, the two stepladders, the spare frame of Mr. Hartshorn, the official marker, the "agents," Connelly, Herrick, Heard, Cashin and the rest in front seats, and the tables of busy clerks in front hustling to keep track of the sales. The $12 rehearsal seats were the ones disposed of today.

But there was one feature lacking—the portly frame of Austioneer Jackson, who has year after year knocked down Symphony seats ever since they began to be disposed of in this way. Most people were vastly surprised when they saw a younger and taller and slimmer man ascend the platform, baton in hand, and begin the customary instructions to bidders. This was Auctioneer Jackson's son, and a worthy substitute he proved to be for his father, who is ill. He kept things moving rapidly, and showed excellent ability in keeping track of bids.

The first seat, A 1, was a forecast of the high prices to come. It brought $11.50 premium, whereas last year no bid at all was made on it. In this row $21 was the highest price, as against $19 last year, and the general average was much more.

Bids increased with great regularity as the chart was marked off backwards. In B $29 was the highest, but C brought out a top price of $55 as against $31 in 1898; D 18 brought $49. E 15, 16 and 17, $51. In F the highest was $58.

When row G arrived a general interest was immediately aroused, for here was the scene of last year's battle, the hottest in the history of the sales. At that time seat 18 brought the enormous premium of $325. But the fight was not to be repeated, for the same seat today brought but$75. The highest figure reached was $95 for midde aisle seats in H, where last year $310 and $150 were paid. From this row the figures gradually declined, although a very high average was maintained as far back s row M. It cost over $40 to get good locations anywhere in this vicinity.

The front seats in the first balcony were sold in the afternoon, and, as usual, high prices were the rule.

---

17 UN, TUESDAY, OCTOBER

Amusements.

CARNEGIE HALL.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Gericke

Sembrich

Ternina

Jackson

Dohnanyi

Hambourg

Kneisel

Adamowski

and others.

Five Matinees.

Wed. Afts.—Nov. 8, Dec. 13, Jan. 17, Feb. 21, Mar. 21.

Five Evg. Concerts.

Thursday—Nov. 9, Dec. 14, Jan. 18, Feb. 22, Mar. 22.

Change of programme each performance.

Season tickets with reserved seats for the series of five matinees or five evening concerts, $7.50, $10, $5, and $3; Boxes, $30 and $40, according to location.

Subscribers of last year may renew their subscriptions until Saturday, October 21st.

CARNEGIE HALL.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY of New York.

1899—Fifty-eighth Season—1900.

EMIL PAUR, CONDUCTOR.

Eight Public Rehearsals—Nov. 17, Dec. 8, Jan. 5, Jan. 26, Feb. 16, March 9, March 23, April 6.

Eight Concerts—Nov. 18, Dec. 9, Jan. 6, Jan. 27, Feb. 17, March 10, March 24, April 7.

RENEWALS of SUBSCRIPTIONS from Oct. 16 to Tuesday, October 31. Oct. 28. Sale of SUBSCRIPTIONS to new applicants.

PROSPECTUS with particulars for the season at Music Stores, Hotels and on application from AUG. ROEBBELEN, Secretary.

[20]

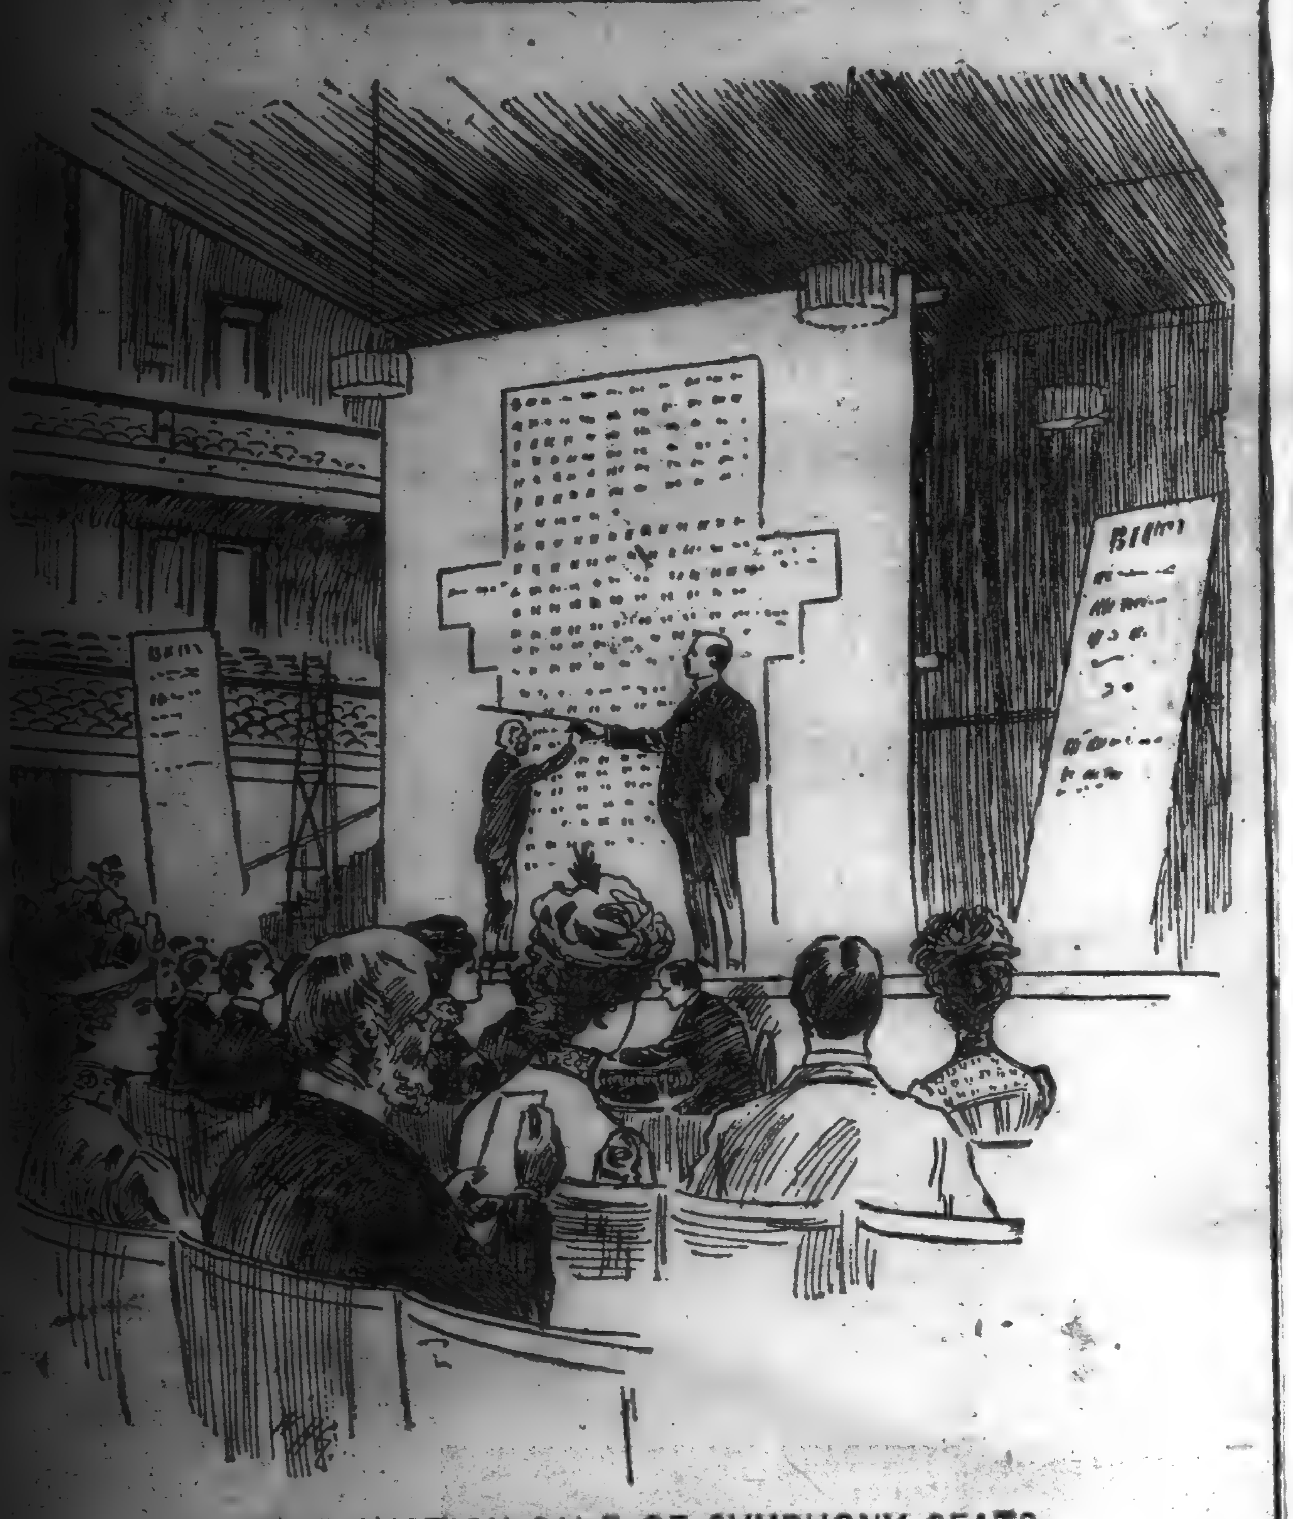
BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVI, NO. 88.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 26, 1899.

TICKETS SELL HIGH.

Average Price for Symphony Afternoon Seats Breaks All Records.



AT THE AUCTION SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

At the sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Music Hall yesterday, all past financial records were broken. By this, it is not meant that higher prices were paid for single seats than in any past year, but that the average for all the seats was very much higher, probbly from 25 to 35 per cent.

In the way of sensational premiums yesterday's sale had not much to offer, the highest premium paid being $150, whereas last year one premium of $325 and another of $310 headed the list. It is said that three seats at $150 were purchased for Mr. Eben Jordan, and three or four other seats brought the same premium.

The high general average of the sale is indicated by the fact that as far back as Z the premiums were often as high as $25, and the average for the first row under the rear balcony was about $18.

The sale was largely attended, many men and women of prominence being present. It had been expected that the wave of prosperity which is advancing over the land would cause higher prices than usual, and the results realized this expectation.

One noticeable sale was a block of four seats in H at premiums of $95 each.

The lowest premium was $8, for a very undesirable seat on the extreme front and side. Two seats in I brought premiums of $86.50 each, and one in I and two in G brought $75 premiums. Several in J sold for $81.

The seats were not disposed of in blocks so much as has been usual, and the fact that they were bought one by one made the auction a slow one. At 1 o'clock, indeed, scarcely half of the orchestra floor had been sold.

Many seats brought premiums of between $70 and $60, and many more ranged between $60 and $50.

In fact, it was not possible to obtain a rehearsal seat cheaply at any point in the hall. The management is very much gratified at the proceeds.

The Boston Traveler

26

Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.
Washington Street.

SYMPHONY SEATS CONTINUE HIGH

The $7.50 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were sold by auction in Music Hall today. There were present about 300 bidders. The management offered for sale the six last rows on the floor, the last row on the balcony sides and three on the rear balcony, and the entire second balcony.

The sale began at the right of the 31st row from the stage, with a premium of $11. Premiums for this first row ranged between $9 and $15, an average of $10. Last year's premiums were between $8 and $13, an average of $10.50.

The premiums for the next row ranged from $6 to $11, average $8.75, against $7 to $8 last year. The following rows averaged respectively $7.50, $6, $5 and $4. The highest premium for a floor seat was $15. The balcony seats averaged $23.50 for the right side, and a little less for the left. The highest bid was $42 for the four seats numbered 131, 132, 133 and 134 on the right balcony. Nos. 103 and 104 sold at $41. Last year's highest mark was $39 for a seat in the same section.

Boston Daily Globe.

TUESDAY, SEPT. 26, 1899.

CHOICE LOCATIONS RANGE HIGH.

Premium of $135 Paid for Each of Three Seats for the Symphony Orchestra's Rehearsal.

Three of the $12 seats in row N for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the symphony orchestra were bought yesterday by a broker for $147 each. He paid $135 premium on each of the three seats.

This was high water mark. This block of seats is in the first row back of the broad aisle which crosses Music hall from one side to the other and is probably the most advantageous row in the house. Its occupants have plenty of room to stretch their feet and they are far enough back to thoroughly enjoy the music, while they are not too far back to appreciate the finer and more delicate tonal effects of the big orchestra.

The average premium paid above the $12 stated price, was about $45. This makes a single seat cost about $57. On the whole the prices are running higher this year than last. The rehearsal seats always sell for more money than the seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

Some of the end seats on the rows half way back in the hall went for a premium of $12 or $15, but the nearer the center of the row the seats were the higher prices they brought.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music hall this morning at 10.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.

TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 26, 1899.

SYMPHONY AUCTION.

Sale of Seats Brings in Much More Than Last Year.

A larger number of people than usual—much larger than last year—attended the auction sale of symphony orchestra rehearsal seats yesterday. Many who are familiar with these occasions state that the bidding was much higher and more spirited than usual.

The highest premium paid for any seat was $135, for a location in row N, near the centre of the hall.

In this section there were several bids over $100.

B. J. Lang, F. F. Bullard, Alex, Steinert, E. M. Farnsworth, H. E. Raymond, Mrs. Walter Jackson, and Mrs. S. B. Field were among the bidders.

It certainly was not "bargain day" at Music Hall, unless for the lady who paid an $8 premium on A34, an end seat. The neighboring seats in the same row sold at figures ranging from $18 to $21.50.

At noon the highest premium paid was $95 each for four seats—15, 16, 17, and 18—the purchaser being a Mr. Pratt.

The first row, A, sold for the least in the combined sales, the seats not being over $14 each on the average. B averaged about $20.

The larger bids began with C, when seats were sold from $31 to $55. D did not have as high an average nor E, where the bids ranged from $31 to $51.

In F four seats brought $58 premiums and several were sold between $40 and $50. In this section of the house the brokers were quite active.

After the outside seats in G had been disposed of there was a lively tilt for those located in the centre of the row and the prices paid were from $44.50 to $75.

In H came the largest bid of the day, already mentioned. As was to be expected there were many discrepancies, where seats next to those bringing high prices were sold for comparatively little. For example, H 15-18 brought $95; H 19-21 brought $51, a difference of $44.

I and J were other rows where the agents did some lively bidding. Individual seats sold at $72.50 and $75, and blocks of two and four at $86.50, $57, $51 and $81.

Here the large bids seemed to stop for the time being.

It was not until 6:05 p.m. that Auctioneer Jackson left the platform, and at that hour some 20 seats were unsold and the people were all leaving the hall.

Approximate reports are to the effect that the aggregate sale is from one-third to one-half larger than that of last year. The rear seats on the floor have maintained this percentage of increase, but the highest bids, which were in the neighborhood of $150, have been far lower than last year, when some very high bidding was done, one seat bringing $325.

Among those who purchased seats were: Sam'l Guild, Dr. J. S. Bigelow, M. N. Bray, A. C. Wheelwright, G. C. Yeaton, J. W. Kenney, G. W. Armstrong, Hon. C. S. Hamlin, E. C. Swift, Mrs. R. D. Emerson, Mrs. J. M. Sears, G. B. Inches, C. C. Wheelwright and Wm. Whitman.

Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Mrs. H. M. Whitney, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, E. D. Jordan, Hon. Richard Olney, M. O. Adams and many other past patrons are believed to have been represented in the bidding.

Boston Daily Globe.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 28, 1899.

MUSIC LOVERS ERRATIC BIDDERS.

Premiums for Seats for the Symphony Concerts Vary, Yet Compare Favorably With Those Paid Last Year.

There was a fair attendance at the auction sale of season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra at Music hall this morning. Only $12 seats were on sale and the premiums offered were, of course, in addition to the regular price named.

It was the general opinion of patrons that the prices compared very favorably with those of last season. Some seats in the center of the auditorium brought perhaps higher prices than last year, but they averaged about the same. Although there was a fairly good attendance, the bidding was largely in the hands of brokers.

Perhaps the highest premium paid during the morning was $62.50 for No. 18, an aisle (center) seat in "I." The same seat in "G" brought $57, and the two aisle seats (center) in "H," numbered 18 and 19, brought $60. Seats on the side aisle in "H" brought anywhere from $9 to $20.

The most desirable seats in the center of the auditorium were sold at premiums ranging from $16 to $25, and a few sold for $30, $35 and $41. The difference in the prices paid for seats in the same row was somewhat striking. For instance No. 18, the center aisle seat in "M," brought $35, and the very next seat, numbered 19, went for $17.

The sale opened this morning at 10, and will be continued through the day.

The Boston Traveler

28

Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.

SYMPHONY SALE.

The auction of $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held this morning. There were about 350 people present.

The bidding dragged until row E was reached, many bidders coming late; for rows F to M the bidding was quite spirited. Much was done through brokers, who bought in blocks of three and four.

The first few rows averaged the same as last year, row A ranging from $1 to $4; the middle rows, however, brought better figures. The highest single prmium was $76 for a centre seat in H. I 18 brought $62.50, and other choice seats ranged well over $50. Last year's best premium was $64, in row J.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 24, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Less than twenty years ago, the best musical performances could be heard only in European cities, and one must still cross the ocean for grand opera in its perfection. But in orchestral music, Boston now leads the world, and the statement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no peer among similar musicans cannot be seriously questioned. This fine organization is comprised of eighty-seven musicians, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. No changes have been made in its membership since last year. It will begin its nineteenth season in the Boston Music Mall, October 13th. Twenty-four afternoon concerts will be given on Fridays, and twenty-four evening concerts on Saturdays. The programmes will include interesting novelties and a wide variety of standard orchestral works, and subscribers will have the pleasure of hearing many solo artists of the highest distinction. Among them will be Sembrich, Paderewski, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, Dohnanyi, Hambourg and Petschnikof; not to mention others of equal importance from the ranks of tha orchestra.

The Friday matinees offer good opportunities to music lovers of this city and the number attending these entertainments increases each season. The performances begin at 2.30 and finish at about four o'clock. The sale of season tickets for the Friday afternoon concerts will be held at the Boston Music Hall on Monday and Tuesday, September 25th and 26th.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVI, NO. 90.

THURSDAY, SEPT. 28, 1899.

SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

Top Notch Today Was $62.50 Premium for a Seat in Row I.

The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra were sold at auction at Music Hall today. The attendance of bidders was large. As usual, the ticket brokers were the largest purchasers, and the prices averaged as high as they did at last year's sale.

The entire forenoon was consumed in selling the front half of the floor, and it was not until after lunch that the balcony seats, which have been growing in popularity, were bid off. Only $12 seats were sold today, tomorrow being set apart for the sale of the $7.50 Saturday evening seats. The front row of seats on the floor, of course, went low, $2.50 being the best figure. Seats 21 and 28 in row B brought $8 premium each. In row C two aisle seats sold for $16. Row D averaged low, but when E was reached there was scme spirited bidding, and No. 19 was knocked off at $34.50. Seats 16, 17 and 18 in row F sold for $37 each, and seats 18 and 19 in the next dow, G, brought $57 premium each.

The aisle seats in the front centre were all in great demand, and often the ticket brokers were bidding against each other in order to fill orders at almost any cost. This was the case in row H, where seats 18 and 19 were sold for $60 each. The high-water mark was reached in row I, seat 18 selling for $62.50.

Good premiums were realized on the corresponding seats in the rows in the immediate rear. In J Nos. 15, 16 and 17 went for $41 each, and 18 and 19 for $54 each.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, SEPTEMBER 28, 1899

HIGHEST PRICE WAS $62.50

Seats for the Symphony Concerts Were in Good Demand Today

In size the Symphony auction audience is as large today as it was in the beginning. Premiums are averaging a good figure. The highest bid this foranoon was $62.50 for an end seat in I. The next highest was $60 for two seats—18 and 19—in H. Even the undesirable front seats brought a good figure. As usual, there was a great variance in premiums paid. In H there was one seat that went for $26 and the next one beside it went for $17.50. In G two seats brought $57, and the two beside, at the right, $19.50. Tomorrow, the last day of the auction, the $7.50 seats will be sold.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1899.

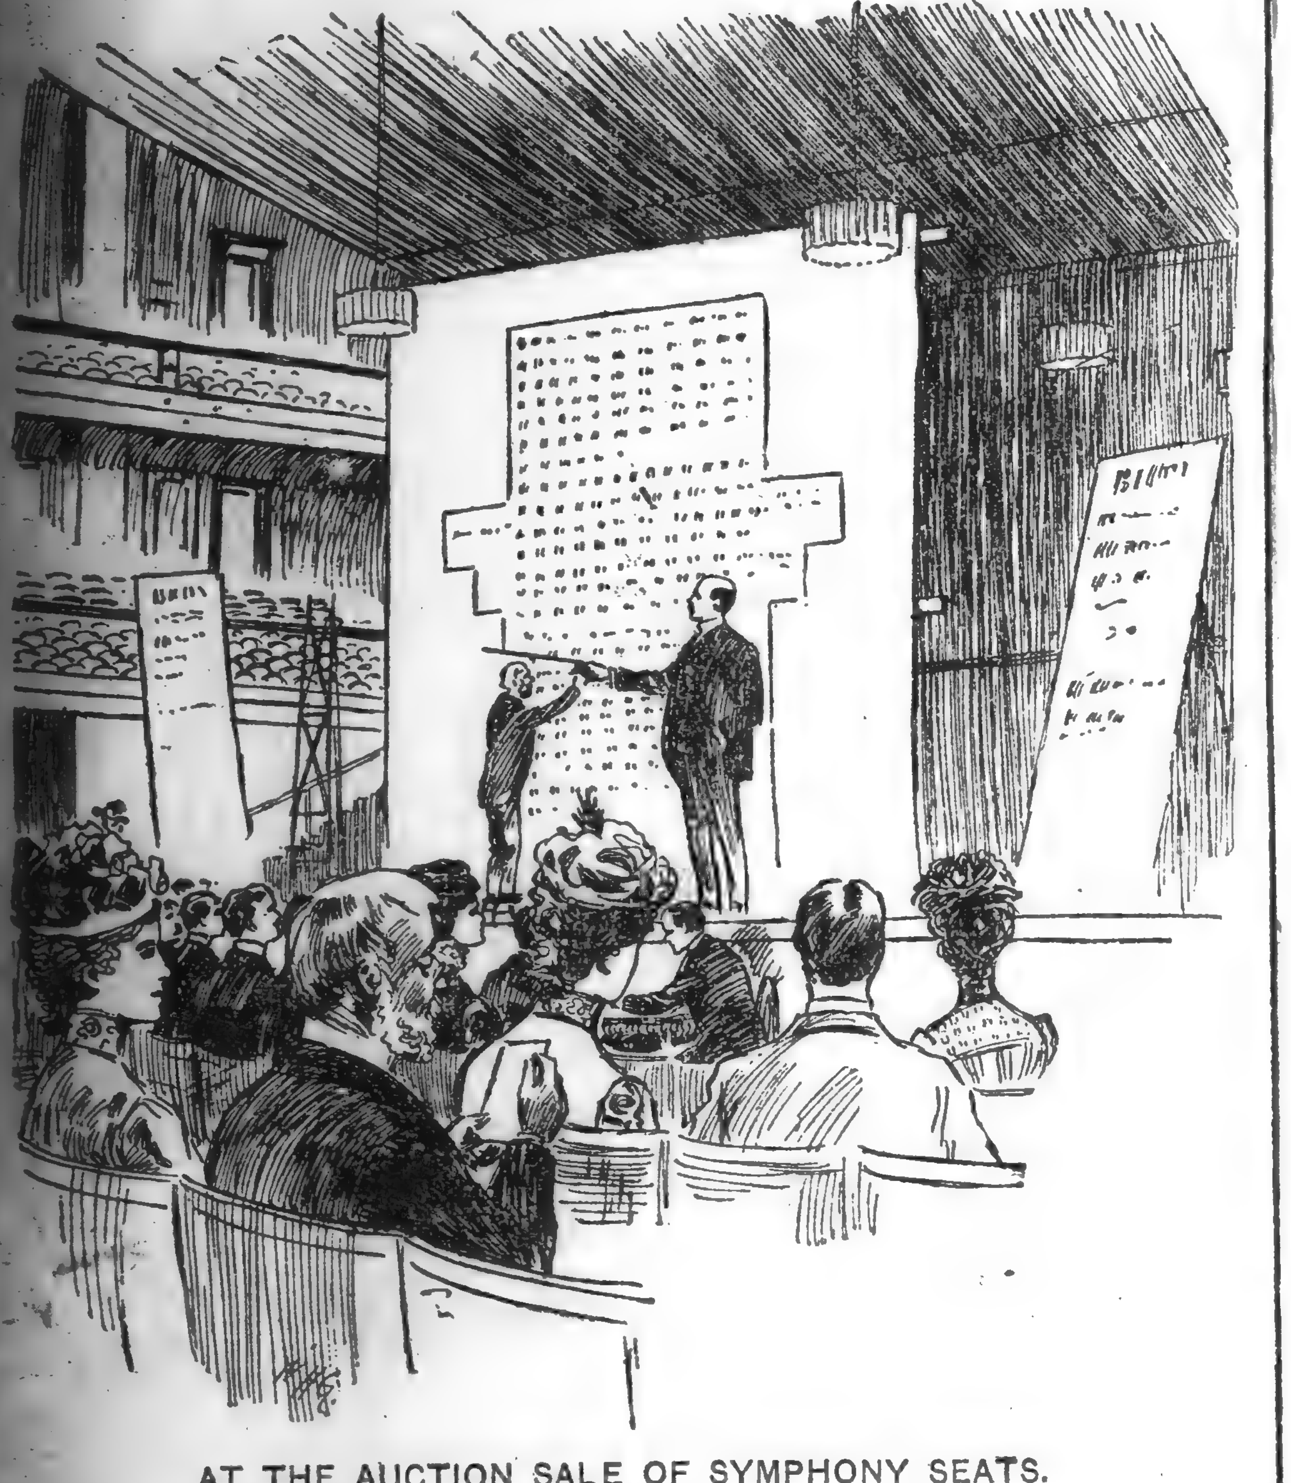
LAST OF THE SYMPHONY TICKET SALES TODAY.

The $7.50 season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be sold by auction at Music Hall today, beginning at 10 o'clock. There are about 1000 of these tickets. The concerts will begin on Oct. 14.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVI., NO. 88.
TUESDAY, SEPT. 26, 1899.

TICKETS SELL HIGH.

Average Price for Symphony Afternoon Seats Breaks All Records.



AT THE AUCTION SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

At the sale of $12 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place at Music Hall yesterday, all past financial records were broken. By this, it is not meant that higher prices were paid for single seats than in any past year, but that the average for all the seats was very much higher, probbly from 25 to 35 per cent.

In the way of sensational premiums yesterday's sale had not much to offer, the highest premium paid being $150, whereas last year one premium of $325 and another of $310 headed the list. It is said that three seats at $150 were purchased for Mr. Eben Jordan, and three or four other seats brought the same premium.

The high general average of the sale is indicated by the fact that as far back as Z the premiums were often as high as $25, and the average for the first row under the rear balcony was about $18.

The sale was largely attended, many men and women of prominence being present. It had been expected that the wave of prosperity which is advancing over the land would cause higher prices than usual, and the results realized this expectation.

One noticeable sale was a block of four seats in H at premiums of $95 each.

The lowest premium was $8, for a very undesirable seat on the extreme front and side. Two seats in I brought premiums of $86.50 each, and one in I and two in G brought $75 premiums. Several in J sold for $81.

The seats were not disposed of in blocks so much as has been usual, and the fact that they were bought one by one made the auction a slow one. At 1 o'clock, indeed, scarcely half of the orchestra floor had been sold.

Many seats brought premiums of between $70 and $60, and many more ranged between $60 and $50.

In fact, it was not possible to obtain a rehearsal seat cheaply at any point in the hall. The management is very much gratified at the proceeds.

The Boston Traveler
Published by the BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.
[illegible] Washington Street.

26

SYMPHONY SEATS CONTINUE HIGH

The $7.50 seats for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were sold by auction in Music Hall today. There were present about 300 bidders. The management offered for sale the six last rows on the floor, the last row on the balcony sides and three on the rear balcony, and the entire second balcony.

The sale began at the right of the 31st row from the stage, with a premium of $11. Premiums for this first row ranged between $9 and $15, an average of $10. Last year's premiums were between $8 and $13, an average of $10.50.

The premiums for the next row ranged from $6 to $11, average $8.75, against $7 to $9 last year. The following rows averaged respectively $7.50, $6. $5 and $4. The highest premium for a floor seat was $15. The balcony seats averaged $23.50 for the right side and a little less for the left. The highest bid was $42 for the four seats numbered 131, 132, 133 and 134 on the right balcony. Nos. 103 and 104 sold at $41. Last year's highest mark was $39 for a seat in the same section.

Boston Daily Globe.
TUESDAY, SEPT. 26, 1899.

CHOICE LOCATIONS RANGE HIGH.

Premium of $135 Paid for Each of Three Seats for the Symphony Orchestra's Rehearsal.

Three of the $12 seats in row N for the Friday afternoon rehearsals of the symphony orchestra were bought yesterday by a broker for $147 each. He paid $135 premium on each of the three seats.

This was high water mark. This block of seats is in the first row back of the broad aisle which crosses Music hall from one side to the other and is probably the most advantageous row in the house. Its occupants have plenty of room to stretch their feet and they are far enough back to thoroughly enjoy the music, while they are not too far back to appreciate the finer and more delicate tonal effects of the big orchestra.

The average premium paid above the $12 stated price, was about $45. This makes a single seat cost about $57. On the whole the prices are running higher this year than last. The rehearsal seats always sell for more money than the seats for the Saturday evening concerts.

Some of the end seats on the rows half way back in the hall went for a premium of $12 or $15, but the nearer the center of the row the seats were the higher prices they brought.

The $7.50 seats for the rehearsals will be sold at auction at Music hall this morning at 10.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
TUESDAY MORNING, SEPT. 26, 1899.

SYMPHONY AUCTION.

Sale of Seats Brings in Much More Than Last Year.

A larger number of people than usual—much larger than last year—attended the auction sale of symphony orchestra rehearsal seats yesterday. Many who are familiar with these occasions state that the bidding was much higher and more spirited than usual.

The highest premium paid for any seat was $135, for a location in row N, near the centre of the hall.

In this section there were several bids over $100.

B. J. Lang, F. F. Bullard, Alex, Steinert, E. M. Farnsworth, H. E. Raymond, Mrs. Walter Jackson, and Mrs. S. B. Field were among the bidders.

It certainly was not "bargain day" at Music Hall, unless for the lady who paid an $8 premium on A34, an end seat. The neighboring seats in the same row sold at figures ranging from $18 to $21.50.

At noon the highest premium paid was $95 each for four seats—15, 16, 17, and 18—the purchaser being a Mr. Pratt.

The first row, A, sold for the least in the combined sales, the seats not being over $14 each on the average. B averaged about $20.

The larger bids began with C, when seats were sold from $31 to $55. D did not have as high an average nor E, where the bids ranged from $31 to $51.

In F four seats brought $58 premiums and several were sold between $40 and $50. In this section of the house the brokers were quite active.

After the outside seats in G had been disposed of there was a lively tilt for those located in the centre of the row and the prices paid were from $44.50 to $75.

In H came the largest bid of the day, already mentioned. As was to be expected there were many discrepancies, where seats next to those bringing high prices were sold for comparatively little. For example, H 15-18 brought $95; H 19-21 brought $51, a difference of $44.

I and J were other rows where the agents did some lively bidding. Individual seats sold at $72.50 and $75, and blocks of two and four at $86.50, $57, $51 and $81.

Here the large bids seemed to stop for the time being.

It was not until 6:05 p.m. that Auctioneer Jackson left the platform, and at that hour some 20 seats were unsold and the people were all leaving the hall.

Approximate reports are to the effect that the aggregate sale is from one-third to one-half larger than that of last year.

The rear seats on the floor have maintained this percentage of increase, but the highest bids, which were in the neighborhood of $150, have been far lower than last year, when some very high bidding was done, one seat bringing $325.

Among those who purchased seats were: Sam'l Guild, Dr. J. S. Bigelow, M. N. Bray, A. C. Wheelwright, G. C. Yeaton, J. W. Kenney, G. W. Armstrong, Hon. C. S. Hamlin, E. C. Swift, Mrs. R. D. Emerson, Mrs. J. M. Sears, G. B. Inches, C. C. Wheelwright and Wm. Whitman.

Mrs. J. L. Gardner, Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Mrs. H. M. Whitney, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, E. D. Jordan, Hon. Richard Olney, M. O. Adams and many other past patrons are believed to have been represented in the bidding.

Boston Daily Globe.
THURSDAY, SEPT. 28, 1899.

MUSIC LOVERS ERRATIC BIDDERS.

Premiums for Seats for the Symphony Concerts Vary, Yet Compare Favorably With Those Paid Last Year.

There was a fair attendance at the auction sale of season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra at Music hall this morning. Only $12 seats were on sale and the premiums offered were, of course, in addition to the regular price named.

It was the general opinion of patrons that the prices compared very favorably with those of last season. Some seats in the center of the auditorium brought perhaps higher prices than last year, but they averaged about the same. Although there was a fairly good attendance, the bidding was largely in the hands of brokers.

Perhaps the highest premium paid during the morning was $62.50 for No. 18, an aisle (center) seat in "I." The same seat in "G" brought $57, and the two aisle seats (center) in "H," numbered 18 and 19, brought $60. Seats on the side aisle in "H" brought anywhere from $9 to $20.

The most desirable seats in the center of the auditorium were sold at premiums ranging from $16 to $25, and a few sold for $30, $35 and $41. The difference in the prices paid for seats in the same row was somewhat striking. For instance No. 18, the center aisle seat in "M," brought $35, and the very next seat, numbered 19, went for $17.

The sale opened this morning at 10, and will be continued through the day.

The Boston Traveler
Published by the BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.

28

SYMPHONY SALE.

The auction of $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was held this morning. There were about 350 people present.

The bidding dragged until row E was reached, many bidders coming late; for rows F to M the bidding was quite spirited. Much was done through brokers, who bought in blocks of three and four.

The first few rows averaged the same as last year, row A ranging from $1 to $4; the middle rows, however, brought better figures. The highest single primium was $76 for a centre seat in H. I 18 brought $62.50, and other choice seats ranged well over $50. Last year's best premium was $64, in row J.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, SEPT. 24, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Less than twenty years ago, the best musical performances could be heard only in European cities, and one must still cross the ocean for grand opera in its perfection. But in orchestral music, Boston now leads the world, and the statement that the Boston Symphony Orchestra has no peer among similar musicans cannot be seriously questioned. This fine organization is comprised of eighty-seven musicians, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke. No changes have been made in its membership since last year. It will begin its nineteenth season in the Boston Music Mall, October 13th. Twenty-four afternoon concerts will be given on Fridays, and twenty-four evening concerts on Saturdays. The programmes will include interesting novelties and a wide variety of standard orchestral works, and subscribers will have the pleasure of hearing many solo artists of the highest distinction. Among them will be Sembrich, Paderewski, Aus der Ohe, Bloomfield-Zeisler, Heyman, Leonora Jackson, Ruegger, Dohnanyi, Hambourg and Petschnikof; not to mention others of equal importance from the ranks of the orchestra.

The Friday matinees offer good opportunities to music lovers of this city and the number attending these entertainments increases each season. The performances begin at 2.30 and finish at about four o'clock. The sale of season tickets for the Friday afternoon concerts will be held at the Boston Music Hall on Monday and Tuesday, September 25th and 26th.

BOSTON HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVI., NO. 90.
THURSDAY, SEPT. 28, 1899.

SALE OF SYMPHONY SEATS.

Top Notch Today Was $62.50 Premium for a Seat in Row I.

The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra were sold at auction at Music Hall today. The attendance of bidders was large. As usual, the ticket brokers were the largest purchasers, and the prices averaged as high as they did at last year's sale.

The entire forenoon was consumed in selling the front half of the floor, and it was not until after lunch that the balcony seats, which have been growing in popularity, were bid off. Only $12 seats were sold today, tomorrow being set apart for the sale of the $7.50 Saturday evening seats. The front row of seats on the floor, of course, went low, $2.50 being the best figure. Seats 21 and 28 in row B brought $8 premium each. In row C two aisle seats sold for $16. Row D averaged low, but when E was reached there was some spirited bidding, and No. 19 was knocked off at $34.50. Seats 16, 17 and 18 in row F sold for $37 each, and seats 18 and 19 in the next dow, G, brought $57 premium each.

The aisle seats in the front centre were all in great demand, and often the ticket brokers were bidding against each other in order to fill orders at almost any cost. This was the case in row H, where seats 18 and 19 were sold for $60 each. The high-water mark was reached in row I, seat 18 selling for $62.50.

Good premiums were realized on the corresponding seats in the rows in the immediate rear. In J Nos. 15, 16 and 17 went for $41 each, and 18 and 19 for $54 each.

Boston Transcript
THURSDAY. SEPTEMBER 28. 1899

HIGHEST PRICE WAS $62.50

Seats for the Symphony Concerts Were in Good Demand Today

In size the Symphony auction audience is as large today as it was in the beginning. Premiums are averaging a good figure. The highest bid this forenoon was $62.50 for an end seat in I. The next highest was $60 for two seats—18 and 19—in H. Even the undesirable front seats brought a good figure. As usual, there was a great variance in premiums paid. In H there was one seat that went for $26 and the next one beside it went for $17.50. In G two seats brought $57, and the two beside, at the right, $19.50. Tomorrow, the last day of the auction, the $7.50 seats will be sold.

Boston Journal.
FRIDAY, SEPTEMBER 29, 1899.

LAST OF THE SYMPHONY TICKET SALES TODAY.

The $7.50 season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be sold by auction at Music Hall today, beginning at 10 o'clock. There are about 1000 of these tickets. The concerts will begin on Oct. 14.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVI., NO. 91.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 29, 1899.

GOOD MUSIC COMES HIGH.

Active Bidding and Good Prices at the Auction Sale of Symphony Seats Yesterday.

The $12 seats for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra were sold at auction at Music Hall yesterday. The attendance of bidders was large. As usual, the ticket brokers were the largest purchasers, and the prices averaged as high as they did at last year's sale.

The entire forenoon was consumed in selling the front half of the floor, and it was not until after lunch that the balcony seats, which have been growing in popularity, were bid off. Only $12 seats were sold yesterday, today being set apart for the sale of the $7.50 Saturday evening seats. The front row of seats on the floor, of course, went low, $2.50 being the best figure. Seats 21 and 28 in row B brought $8 premium each. In row C two aisle seats sold for $16. Row D averaged low, but when E was reached there was some spirited bidding, and No. 19 was knocked off at $34.50. Seats 16, 17 and 18 in row F sold for $37 each, and seats 18 and 19 in the next dow, G, brought $57 premium each.

The aisle seats in the front centre were all in great demand, and often the ticket brokers were bidding against each other in order to fill orders at almost any cost. This was the case in row H, where seats 18 and 19 were sold for $60 each. The high-water mark was reached in row I, seat 18 selling for $62.50.

Good premiums were realized on the corresponding seats in the rows in the immediate rear. In J Nos. 15, 16 and 17 went for $41 each, and 18 and 19 for $54 each.

Balcony seats brought comparatively larger premiums than floor seats. Seats 29, 30, 31 in the front row over the platform on the Hamilton place side of the hall went under the hammer for $45 each. On the opposite side of the hall the prices ranged from $18 to $22 for similar locations.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY. SEPTEMBER 29. 1899

BARGAINS FOR SYMPHONY SEATS

Music-Lovers Had Their Chance to Buy Tickets for the Concerts

As lively as a cricket went the bidding for the Saturday Symphony concert seats today. The $7.50 seats under the balcony on the floor and in the balconies were put up to end the sale for this season. The premiums were as delightfully reasonable today as they were astonishingly high on the opening day at the public rehearsal sale. There were actually some bargains. Away back under the balcony there were several seats that were secured at a premium of seventy-five cents. To be sure, from many points of view they were not very advantageous, but the music-lovers knew they could hear just as well in these seats as they could in the one that was sold at a premium of $135. The first row of $7.50 seats under the balcony went for an average of $5; the next row back on an average of $4; the next row, $3; the next, $2.50, and the very back row on an average of $1.50.

The seats up in the first balcony next went, and the fifteen seats on the second row from the wall, at the stage end, went at good prices. No. 103 went for $21 premium, and the rest on this row at an average of $10. The end seats next the aisle on the back row were all quickly taken at $15 premium. The seats in the second balcony went about as they have heretofore.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, SEPT. 29, 1899.

MUSIC LOVERS ERRATIC BIDDERS.

Premiums for Seats for the Symphony Concerts Vary, Yet Compare Favorably With Those Paid Last Year.

There was a fair attendance at the auction sale of season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston symphony orchestra at Music hall yesterday. Only $12 seats were on sale and the premiums offered were, of course, in addition to the regular price named.

It was the general opinion of patrons that the prices compared very favorably with those of last season. Some seats in the center of the auditorium brought perhaps higher prices than last year, but they averaged about the same. Although there was a fairly good attendance, the bidding was largely in the hands of brokers.

Perhaps the highest premium paid during the morning was $62.50 for No. 18, an aisle (center) seat in "I." The same seat in "G" brought $57, and the two aisle seats (center) in "H," numbered 18 and 19, brought $60. Seats on the side aisle in "H" brought anywhere from $9 to $20.

The most desirable seats in the center of the auditorium were sold at premiums ranging from $16 to $25, and a few sold [illegible], $35 and $41. The difference in the prices paid for seats in the same row was somewhat striking. For instance No. 18, the center aisle seat in [illegible] brought $35, and the very next seat, numbered 19, went for $17.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State

The Official Paper of the City.

FRIDAY MORNING, SEPT. 29, 1899.

LAST SYMPHONY SALES TODAY.

The $7.50 season tickets for the Saturday evening concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be sold by auction at Music Hall today, beginning at 10 a.m. There are about 1000 of these tickets, and the extremely low price brings them within the reach of nearly everybody. The concerts will begin on Oct. 14, and promise to be unusually attractive.

Sept BOSTON POST, 30

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SYMPHONY CONCERT SALE.

The last day of the sale of the tickets for the Symphony Orchestra concerts was conducted yesterday afternoon at Music Hall. The number of bidders was especially large, which was quite surprising, in view of the fact that the $7.50 Saturday evening seats were being sold.

The $7.50 seats admit, like all the other tickets, to the twenty-four concerts.

These seats are on the floor in the back part of the hall, the rear seats in the balcony and the second balcony entire. As the seats are not as desirable as the other seats in the house, not as high premiums were paid.

At the commencement of the sale, however, the bidding was quite high, as several people wished to secure the rear seats in the Hamilton place side of the first balcony. These seats are considered to be the best of the $7.50 seats, but strange to say the corresponding seats on the opposite side of the hall brought an equally high premium.

The first seats sold at yesterday's sale were the rear seats on the floor, and these brought premiums ranging in price from $1.50 to $15. The average premium on all the seats was about $1.50 or $2. Many seats were bought by the same persons who held them last year, and these people seemed unwilling to go above last year's price for seats. In some instances, however, two or more persons desired the same seats, and the result was a high premium for the auctioneers.

The best of the rear seats of the first balcony brought in some cases as high as $14 or $17, the latter being the highest price paid for a single seat. On the other hand some seats were desired by nobody apparently, and these went for $4 or $5.

This year the sale of seats for the Saturday night concerts has equalled in price that of last year. The tickets for the Friday afternoon rehearsals have averaged slightly higher than last year.

Boston Journal.

SATURDAY, SEPTEMBER 30, 1899.

SEAT BARGAINS.

Real Music Lovers Finally Get a Chance.

Symphony Sales Drop to Reasonable Figures.

All the Favorite Nooks Have Been Taken.

As lively as a cricket went the bidding for the Saturday Symphony Concert seats yesterday. The $7 50 seats under the balcony on the floor and in the balconies were put up to end the sale for this season. The premiums were as delightfully seasonable as they were astonishingly high on the opening day of the public rehearsal sale. There were actually some bargains. Away back under the balcony there were several seats that were secured at a premium of 75 cents. To be sure, from many points of view they were not very advantageous, but the music lovers knew they could hear just as well in these seats as they could in the one that was sold at a premium of $135. The first row of $7 50 seats under the balcony went for an average of $5; the next row back on an average of $4; the next row, $3; the next, $2 50, and the very back row on an average of $1 50.

The seats up in the first balcony next went, and the 15 seats on the second row from the wall, at the stage end, went at good prices. No. 103 went for $21 premium, and the rest on this row at an average of $10. The end seats next the aisle on the back row were all quickly taken at $15 premium. The seats in the second balcony went about as they have heretofore.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 1, 1899.

—The managers of the symphony concerts for the coming year must be more than gratified with the success that is assured by the sale of both afternoon and evening tickets the past week. Every seat in the house has been sold, and many of the steady concert goers have the same seats they have had for several years. Mr and Mrs Lang, Mrs John L. Gardner, Mr and Mrs Philip Hale, Mr and Mrs J. Montgomery Sears, Mr and Mrs Jacob Hecht, Dr Sturgis Bigelow, Mr and Mrs Eliot Hubbard, Mr and Mrs F. L. Higginson, Mr and Mrs Franz Zerrahn, Mr and Mrs Arthur Foote, Mr and Mrs Eliot W. Pratt, Mrs R. M. Morse, Mr and Mrs J. Arthur Beebe and others will be found in about the same places they occupied last year.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 93.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1899.

Col. Higginson, Mr. C. A. Ellis, who has just got home from Europe, Mr. Gericke, Mr. Comee and everybody else connected with the Symphony concerts directly or indirectly must be feeling very happy over the result of the auction sales last week. Although there were no tremendous premiums, the average price was higher than last year, and everybody seemed perfectly satisfied with what they had secured, so that at the start the season is sold out as it were. Among those who purchased seats either in person or through their agents, very many of their places being the same which they occupied last year, were: Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Gardner, Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. Franz Zerrahn, Mrs. J. W. Kenney, Mrs. Henry M. Whitney, Mrs. Walter Jackson, Mrs. Herbert Dumaresq, Mrs. J. H. Hecht, Mrs. Arthur Blake, Mrs. Alexander Steinert, Mr. Richard Olney, Mr. George B. Inches, Mr. E. D. Jordan, Mr. S. Eliot Guild, Dr. W. Sturgis Bigelow, Mr. Andrew C. Wheelwright, Mr. Charles S. Hamlin, Mr. E. C. Swift, Mr. Robert M. Cushing, Dr. Jack, Mr. Gaugengigl, Mr. W. H. Tyler, Mr. William F. Hall, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mr. Ernest Bigelow, Mr. F. H. Beebe, Mr. E. M. Farnsworth, Mr. Homer Norris, Mrs. W. H. Prior, Mrs. John Osborn, Mrs. Mark Andrews, Mrs. S. B. Field, Miss Lucy Fay of Fitchburg, Mr. Norman McLeod, Mr. F. F. Bullard, Mr. Henry E. Raymond, Mr. Arthur Beebe, Mr. Augustus Hemenway, Mr. Francis Bartlett, Mr. Melvin Adams and hundreds more.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, OCTOBER 1, 1899.

The auction sale of the Symphony rehearsal seats called out the usual large gathering at Music Hall on Monday morning, when Mr. Walter Jackson, in his father's absence, acted as auctioneer. In the large auditorium were scattered many well-known people, including Mr. and Mrs. Franz E. Zerrahn, Mr. Fred Field Bullard (the composer), Mr. Otis Kimball and his daughter, Miss Kimball; Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mr. Frank S. Chick, Mrs. Harry Howard, Mrs. Charles W. Whitcomb, Mrs. Geo. Richards, Mrs. Edwin Bangs, Mr. and Mrs. Gorham Hubbard, Mrs. Arthur A. Herrick, Mr. George W. Gregerson, Mrs. William H. Prior, Miss Lucy Fay, Mr. J. Fred Beebe, Mr. Elliott Pratt, Mrs. S. B. Field, Mr. Gerard Bement, Mrs. George Ball, Miss Ball, Miss Farnsworth, Mr. Homer A. Norris, Gen. and Mrs. Wilmon A. Blackmar, Miss Julia Wells, Mr. George Baty Blake, Mr. William Searle, Mr. Henry E. Raymond and his daughter, Mrs. Walter Jackson; Mr. Frederick P. Vinton (the artist), Mr. Harry Young, Miss Lucy E. Cobb, Mr. Benjamin Pitman, Mrs. Wm. H. Humphrey Mrs. Edith M. Binney and Father Bodfish.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 1, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

Among the purchasers at the Symphony sale, either in person or by proxy, were Mrs. John L. Gardner (who returns shortly from Italy), Mrs. Montgomery Sears, Mrs. Henry M. Whitney, Mrs. Roger Wolcott, Mrs. Weld, Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mr. Melvin O. Adams, Mrs. Richard Olney, Mrs. Arthur Blake, Mr. Eben Jordan, Mrs. Franz Zerrahn, Miss Lucy Fay, Mr. Fred Bullard, Mme. De Angelis, Mr. F. S. Chick, Mr. B. J. Lang, Mrs. Mark Andrews, Mr. Ernest Bigelow, Mr. Alexander Steinert and Mr. Homer Norris.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 8, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

The program of the first rehearsal and concert of the Boston symphony orchestra next Friday afternoon and Saturday evening, Oct 13 and 14, is as follows: Overture to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner; concerto for pianoforte, No 1 (first time), Arensky; Italian caprice, Tschaikowski; symphony No 1, Schumann. Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman will be the soloist.

Oct 8

THE PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.

Symphony Orchestra.

IMPARTIAL judges have often asserted that no city in the world can boast a musical organization superior to the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and no organization, musical or otherwise, can duplicate its unique and admirable inception and maintenance. Therefore, not only in Boston, but in all the cities visited, the musical public not only take a profound interest in the organization, but they rally to its support with a confidence and loyalty that are at once natural and deserved. In Providence every promise has been kept, allowing always for the unforeseen and the unavoidable, and not infrequently, in cases where a substitute was imperative, patrons have gained by the change.

A series of eight concerts by this orchestra will be given in Providence on the following Wednesday evenings: Oct. 25, Nov. 15, Dec. 20, Jan. 31, March 7 and 28, April 11 and 25.

Founded for the purpose of providing the best orchestral music no organization ever more successfully fulfilled its mission than does the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Year after year its concerts maintain the highest standard and appeal to the public as occasions of rare musical enjoyment.

Conductor Gericke begins his seventh year and the second of his more recent engagement, with precisely the same personnel to a man as last year, and it goes without saying that there will be the same striving after perfection, in which Mr. Gericke spares neither the orchestra nor himself.

Patrons will welcome the announcement that, adopting the plan followed in New York, Philadelphia and other cities visited by the orchestra, season ticket holders of last year will be allowed to retain the same seats for the coming season.

Although each year the sentiment grows stronger that the orchestra is, after all, the attraction, the management, to complete the announcement for the coming season, have booked a list of soloists the equal if not the best of any yet announced in this city. Providence patrons will be more than interested in the fact that many of the soloists are newcomers, with reputations already established in Europe.

Miss Clara Butt, the English contralto, although but 22 years old, is already a favorite in European capitals. She was born in Bristol, Eng., and inherited musical talent from her parents, who were heartily in sympathy with her musical aspirations. Previous to her 15th year she had made such progress that her parents deemed it advisable to place her under the guidance of Rootham, who was esteemed as the foremost teacher in Bristol. She studied for three years with this painstaking voice builder, and then won a scholarship at the Royal College of Music. After four years in the College of Music, Miss Butt, now becoming a fully developed prima donna, made her metropolitan debut, and won an immediate and brilliant success. Miss Butt has sung before the Queen on several occasions at Windsor and Balmoral. This beautiful singer is a favorite wherever she goes. Her wonderful voice, extending from lower C (bass clef) to A above the treble staff, is sufficient to enlist the interest of composers and cultivated musicians in every country she visits. Added to this, however, she has a charming personality, a keen intellect, and an abundance of good spirits, which at once make her a great favorite.

Leonora Jackson is a young violinist, born in Boston. In 1896 she won the "Mendelssohn State prize" at Berlin, where she was a pupil of Prof. Joachim, who said of her: "Miss Jackson has impressed me deeply with her talent. If she continues to study she cannot fail to become a violinist of the greatest eminence." A year later Miss Jackson made a successful debut with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin, and has since played much in public. During the last London season her services were much in demand, two noteworthy appearances of hers being with the London Philharmonic Orchestra and at Windsor Castle, where she appeared by royal command.

Miss Elsa Ruegger is a young violoncello virtuoso, born in Switzerland and educated at Brussels. She has won for herself a fine artistic position in Europe, and comes to America with the warmest endorsement of such authorities as D'Albert and Mottl. European critics are very enthusiastic in their praise of her performances.

Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist and composer, has been specially engaged to come to America to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities. Mr. Dohnanyi has created considerable stir in musical centres in Europe, and is described by reliable critics as a veritable genius. A year ago he first appeared in London. He came with no preliminary booming and gave his first concert to a nearly empty house. He finished the season by packing St. James's Hall at an afternoon recital. The London Times commented as follows on Dohnanyi's first London recital:

"Though Mr. Ernst von Dohnanyi's first recital, given yesterday afternoon in St. James's Hall, drew an audience nearly as small as that which attended Mr. Paderewski's first recital, the enthusiasm his wonderful playing aroused can be compared with nothing in the experience of recent years. Wonderful is, indeed, the only epithet that can be applied to the young artist's performances, but the word is not meant to convey the idea of a technical dexterity to which everything else is sacrificed; technique there is, and of a superbly finished kind, but it is entirely held in subjection to the higher things of interpretation. Those who heard him a fortnight ago, and those who were present yesterday, were not long in realizing that in the depth of poetic feeling, in the apparently infinite command of tone gradation, and in the intellectual insight into the soul of the music he plays, no pianoforte player now living can approach him."

The public sale of season tickets will open at Infantry Hall Monday morning, Oct. 16, at 9 o'clock.

[22]

Balto-Sunday American, Oct. 1, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making preparations for its annual tour. The orchestra will give its first concert in Baltimore in November, and thereafter, as has been the custom, one each month up to and including March. The orchestra is more popular every year. Under the lead of Mr. Gericke, last year, the band never did finer work.

In Boston there are two separate series of twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. For each of these series there are two separate auction sales—the first for what are termed the $12 tickets, and the second for the $7.50 tickets. These figures are the face value of the tickets, and premiums are bid on them. The aggregate of the sales of the $12 tickets recently amounted to over $65,000, the average price paid running from 30 to 35 per cent. higher than last year. Several seats in the middle of the house brought premiums of $135. One agent had orders for concert and rehearsal tickets to the amount of more than $20,000. On the general average the seats sold at a higher premium than they did last season.

For the past ten years every one of these tickets has been sold for the season of twenty-four concerts.

Last season was the best the orchestra has ever had in Baltimore.

MUSIC HALL.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-00.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

(87 Performers,)

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:

Dohnanyi,
Hambourg,
Jackson

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.
Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Season Will Begin at Music Hall on November 7.

14th

The 15th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city will open with its 54th performance on Tuesday evening, November 7, at Music Hall. The remaining concerts of the series will be given on Tuesday evenings, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 20.

Last season, as is now very generally known, the Baltimore concerts were guaranteed by a few public-spirited and generous citizens of the city, and it is to the credit of Baltimore as a musical city that after the second concert of the series of five given the full amount guaranteed had been received and the guarantors were relieved from any further responsibility. The season was the most successful in every way ever given in this city, and placed Baltimore safely on the list of musical centres entitled to be visited by the leading musical organization of this country.

The membership of the orchestra will be the same as last year. During the summer Conductor Gericke, who will again direct the performances for the seventh season and the second of his more recent term of service, has been preparing some excellent and attractive programmes. Although there is each year a stronger sentiment that the orchestra is after all the attraction, the management announces a number of new soloists. Among these is Leonora Jackson, a young violinist, born in Boston. In 1896 she won the "Mendelssohn State Prize" at Berlin, where she was a pupil of Professor Joachim. A year later Miss Jackson made a successful debut with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin, and has since played much in public. Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist and composer, has been specially engaged to come to America to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities. Mr. Dohnanyi has created considerable stir in musical centres in Europe and is described by reliable critics as a veritable genius. Mark Hambourg, another newcomer, is a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is a pianist who first appeared as a "boy prodigy." Later, after having studied for three years with Leschetizky, he returned to public life equipped with a splendid technique and rare command of expression. His many successes fully justify his engagement for the Symphony concerts.

Adopting the plan followed in New York, Philadelphia and other cities visited by the orchestra, season-ticket holders of last season will be allowed to retain the same seats for the coming season. The public sale of season tickets will open on Monday, October 16, at 15 North Charles street.

Balto-Sunday Herald, Oct. 1, 1899

MUSIC HALL.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-1900.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

(87 Performers.)

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:

DOHNANYI,
HAMBOURG,
JACKSON.

Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.
Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Music Hall.
NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

(87 Performers.)

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS:
TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS:

DOHNANYI
HAMBOURG
JACKSON

And Others to Be Announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of Five Concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open MONDAY MORNING, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.
Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

MUSIC HALL.

NINETEENTH SEASON—1899-'00.

BOSTON
SYMPHONY "News"
ORCHESTRA

(87 Performers.)

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS:

DOHNANYI,
HAMBOURG,
JACKSON

And Others, to Be Announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at Albert's, 15 N. Charles street.
Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making preparations for its annual tour. The orchestra will give its first concert in Baltimore in November, and thereafter, as has been the custom, one each month up to and including March. The orchestra is more popular every year. Under the lead of Mr. Gericke last year, the band never did finer work.

In Boston there are two separate series of twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. For each of these series there are two separate auction sales—the first for what are termed the $12 tickets, and the second for the $7.50 tickets. These figures are the face value of the tickets, and premiums are bid on them. The aggregate of the sales of the $12 tickets recently amounted to over $65,000, the average price paid running from 30 to 35 per cent. higher than last year.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1899

The first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurs tomorrow (Friday) afternoon, and the first concert on Saturday evening. Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman is the soloist, and the programme consists of the overture to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner; concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, Arensky (first time); Italian Caprice, Tchaikovsky; Symphony, No. 1, Schumann.

....Tomorrow afternoon, girls! Are you ready? The first rehearsal of the season, you know, and you must be in your places early to find out who are to be your neighbors for the winter.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a series of ten concerts at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 2, 23, Dec. 7, 28, Jan. 11, 25, Feb. 8 and March 1, 12. The soloists will be Miss Stein, Mrs. Titus, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mme. Szumowska, Messrs. Dohnanyi, Proctor, Loeffler, Schroeder and others. Subscription tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of ten concerts, $7.50; on sale at the University Book Store, Saturday morning, Oct. 14, at eight o'clock. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

MUSIC HALL.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-1900.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

(87 Performers.)

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:

DOHNANYI,
HAMBOURG,
JACKSON.

Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.
Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

MUSIC HALL.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-00.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

(87 Performers.)

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:

Dohnanyi,
Hambourg,
Jackson

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.
Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Music Hall.
NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston
Symphony
Orchestra

(87 Performers.)

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS:
TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS:

DOHNANYI
HAMBOURG
JACKSON

And Others to Be Announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of Five Concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.
The sale of tickets will open MONDAY MORNING, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.
Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

On November 7 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin another season of concerts in this city. From the prospectus issued, there is every indication that the coming series will be as successful, from every point of view, as they have been since the organization has been known to the City of Baltimore.

Like last year, the concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings, beginning with November 7 and concluding March 20.

Conductor Gericke will again lead the orchestra, with exactly the same personnel as last year, and to a very striking extent the same orchestra which he left 10 years ago.

Following are among the soloists engaged:

Leonora Jackson is a young violinist, born in Boston.

Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist and composer, has been specially engaged to come to America to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities.

Mark Hambourg, another newcomer, is a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is a pianist who first appeared as a "boy prodigy." Later, after having studied for three years with Leschetizky, he returned to public life equipped with a splendid technique and rare command of expression.

Vocalists of the highest reputation will be added to the list of soloists, and will be announced later.

Adopting the plan followed in New York, Philadelphia and other cities visited by the orchestra, season ticket holders of last year will be allowed to retain the same seats for the coming season.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 15, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

When Wilhelm Gericke swung his baton in the opening bars of Wagner's Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," in Music Hall, last evening, he inaugurated the nineteenth season of the Symphony concerts, and, in all probability, the last series that will ever be given in the historic building, as by another year the new Music Hall on the Back Bay will be in readiness for occupancy. The audience last evening was very large and inclined to be enthusiastic, for the members of the orchestra were most cordially greeted as they came upon the stage, and M. Gericke received a perfect ovation.

There is no apparent difference in the placing of the musicians over last year, when M. Gericke made some changes. The positions then assigned seemed to give entire satisfaction, and they were retained for another season. If it were possible to increase in excellence of performance, the orchestra is even better than ever. For precision, obedience to the leader and musical unity, it is well nogh perfect, and is certainly living up to its long since established reputation of being the finest body of musicians in the world.

The programme began last evening with the Vorspiel to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," familiar but always welcome, even to those who are not devotees of the German master. Its striking climaxes and unique contrapuntal effects are especially pleasing, and one never wearies of the number. That it was admirably well rendered goes without saying.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman, a comparative stranger in this city, and her offering was Arensky's concerto in F minor, heard for the first time here. Both were most agreeable surprises, for the single recital given by Miss Heyman in Boston about a year ago did not warrant any expectations for the superior performance she gave last evening. She is a Californian, but recently she has been making her home in New York, where she has attained some prominence.

Last evening was her most pretentious appearance, and she acquitted herself most creditably. Her touch is firm, almost masculine, with a marked degree of certainty, and her phrasing denotes the true artistic instinct. The three movements were played with all the confidence of a veteran, and especially in the first, the allegro maestoso, she brought out the melodic ideas with delicate yet convincing force. It was a positive delight to listen to her work, and it is to be hoped she will be heard here again this season.

Balto-Sunday American, Oct. 1, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making preparations for its annual tour. The orchestra will give its first concert in Baltimore in November, and thereafter, as has been the custom, one each month up to and including March. The orchestra is more popular every year. Under the lead of Mr. Gericke, last year, the band never did finer work.

In Boston there are two separate series of twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. For each of these series there are two separate auction sales—the first for what are termed the $12 tickets, and the second for the $7.50 tickets. These figures are the face value of the tickets, and premiums are bid on them. The aggregate of the sales of the $12 tickets recently amounted to over $65,000, the average price paid running from 30 to 35 per cent. higher than last year. Several seats in the middle of the house brought premiums of $135. One agent had orders for concert and rehearsal tickets to the amount of more than $20,000. On the general average the seats sold at a higher premium than they did last season.

For the past ten years every one of these tickets has been sold for the season of twenty-four concerts.

Last season was the best the orchestra has ever had in Baltimore.

MUSIC HALL.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-00.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(87 Performers.)

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:

Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Jackson

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.

Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Season Will Begin at Music Hall on November 7.

Sun

The 15th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city will open with its 54th performance on Tuesday evening, November 7, at Music Hall. The remaining concerts of the series will be given on Tuesday evenings, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 20.

Last season, as is now very generally known, the Baltimore concerts were guaranteed by a few public-spirited and generous citizens of the city, and it is to the credit of Baltimore as a musical city that after the second concert of the series of five given the full amount guaranteed had been received and the guarantors were relieved from any further responsibility. The season was the most successful in every way ever given in this city, and placed Baltimore safely on the list of musical centres entitled to be visited by the leading musical organization of this country.

The membership of the orchestra will be the same as last year. During the summer Conductor Gericke, who will again direct the performances for the seventh season and the second of his more recent term of service, has been preparing some excellent and attractive programmes. Although there is each year a stronger sentiment that the orchestra is after all the attraction, the management announces a number of new soloists. Among these is Leonora Jackson, a young violinist, born in Boston. In 1896 she won the "Mendelssohn State Prize" at Berlin, where she was a pupil of Professor Joachim. A year later Miss Jackson made a successful debut with the Philharmonic Orchestra in Berlin, and has since played much in public. Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist and composer, has been specially engaged to come to America to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities. Mr. Dohnanyi has created considerable stir in musical centres in Europe and is described by reliable critics as a veritable genius. Mark Hambourg, another newcomer, is a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is a pianist who first appeared as a "boy prodigy." Later, after having studied for three years with Leschetizky, he returned to public life equipped with a splendid technique and rare command of expression. His many successes fully justify his engagement for the Symphony concerts.

Adopting the plan followed in New York, Philadelphia and other cities visited by the orchestra, season-ticket holders of last season will be allowed to retain the same seats for the coming season. The public sale of season tickets will open on Monday, October 16, at 15 North Charles street.

Balto-Sunday Herald, Oct. 1, 1899

MUSIC HALL.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(87 Performers.)

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:

DOHNÁNYI, HAMBOURG, JACKSON.

Season Tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Music Hall.

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(87 Performers.)

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS:

TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS:

DOHNANYI

HAMBOURG

JACKSON

And Others to Be Announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of Five Concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open MONDAY MORNING, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.

Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

MUSIC HALL.

NINETEENTH SEASON—1899-'00.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

News

(87 Performers.)

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS:

DOHNANYI, HAMBOURG, JACKSON

And Others, to Be Announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at Albert's, 15 N. Charles street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is making preparations for its annual tour. The orchestra will give its first concert in Baltimore in November, and thereafter, as has been the custom, one each month up to and including March. The orchestra is more popular every year. Under the lead of Mr. Gericke last year, the band never did finer work.

In Boston there are two separate series of twenty-four Friday afternoon and twenty-four Saturday evening concerts. For each of these series there are two separate auction sales—the first for what are termed the $12 tickets, and the second for the $7.50 tickets. These figures are the face value of the tickets, and premiums are bid on them. The aggregate of the sales of the $12 tickets recently amounted to over $65,000, the average price paid running from 30 to 35 per cent. higher than last year.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 12, 1899

The first public rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra occurs tomorrow (Friday) afternoon, and the first concert on Saturday evening. Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman is the soloist, and the programme consists of the overture to "Die Meistersinger," Wagner; concerto for pianoforte, No. 1, Arensky (first time); Italian Caprice, Tchaikovsky; Symphony, No. 1, Schumann.

....Tomorrow afternoon, girls! Are you ready? The first rehearsal of the season, you know, and you must be in your places early to find out who are to be your neighbors for the winter.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give a series of ten concerts at Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, on Thursday evenings, Oct. 19, Nov. 2, 23, Dec. 7, 28, Jan. 11, 25, Feb. 8 and March 1, 12. The soloists will be Miss Stein, Mrs. Titus, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mme. Szumowska, Messrs. Dohnanyi, Proctor, Loeffler, Schroeder and others. Subscription tickets, with reserved seats, for the series of ten concerts, $7.50; on sale at the University Book Store, Saturday morning, Oct. 14, at eight o'clock. A limited number of seats have been reserved for college officers and invited guests.

MUSIC HALL.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(87 Performers.)

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:

DOHNANYI, HAMBOURG, JACKSON.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.

Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

MUSIC HALL.

Nineteenth Season, 1899-00.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(87 Performers.)

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS.

TUESDAY EVENING, NOV. 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DEC. 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JAN. 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEB. 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

Solo Artists:

Dohnanyi, Hambourg, Jackson

And others to be announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of five concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open Monday morning, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.

Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

Music Hall.

NINETEENTH SEASON, 1899-1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

(87 Performers.)

MR. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

FIVE CONCERTS:

TUESDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 7.
TUESDAY EVENING, DECEMBER 12.
TUESDAY EVENING, JANUARY 16.
TUESDAY EVENING, FEBRUARY 20.
TUESDAY EVENING, MARCH 20.
At 8 o'clock.

SOLO ARTISTS:

DOHNANYI

HAMBOURG

JACKSON

And Others to Be Announced.

Season tickets, with reserved seats for the series of Five Concerts, $7.00 and $5.00, according to location.

The sale of tickets will open MONDAY MORNING, October 16, at Albert's, 15 North Charles street.

Program books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr. C. A. ELLIS, Mgr.

Boston Symphony Season.

On November 7 the Boston Symphony Orchestra will begin another season of concerts in this city. From the prospectus issued, there is every indication that the coming series will be as successful, from every point of view, as they have been since the organization has been known to the City of Baltimore.

Like last year, the concerts will be given on Tuesday evenings, beginning with November 7 and concluding March 20.

Conductor Gericke will again lead the orchestra, with exactly the same personnel as last year, and to a very striking extent the same orchestra which he left 10 years ago.

Following are among the soloists engaged:

Leonora Jackson is a young violinist, born in Boston.

Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist and composer, has been specially engaged to come to America to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities.

Mark Hambourg, another newcomer, is a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is a pianist who first appeared as a "boy prodigy." Later, after having studied for three years with Leschetizky, he returned to public life equipped with a splendid technique and rare command of expression.

Vocalists of the highest reputation will be added to the list of soloists, and will be announced later.

Adopting the plan followed in New York, Philadelphia and other cities visited by the orchestra, season ticket holders of last year will be allowed to retain the same seats for the coming season.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 15, 1899.

(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERTS.

When Wilhelm Gericke swung his baton in the opening bars of Wagner's Vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg," in Music Hall, last evening, he inaugurated the nineteenth season of the Symphony concerts, and, in all probability, the last series that will ever be given in the historic building, as by another year the new Music Hall on the Back Bay will be in readiness for occupancy. The audience last evening was very large and inclined to be enthusiastic, for the members of the orchestra were most cordially greeted as they came upon the stage, and M. Gericke received a perfect ovation.

There is no apparent difference in the placing of the musicians over last year, when M. Gericke made some changes. The positions then assigned seemed to give entire satisfaction, and they were retained for another season. If it were possible to increase in excellence of performance, the orchestra is even better than ever. For precision, obedience to the leader and musical unity, it is well nogh perfect, and is certainly living up to its long since established reputation of being the finest body of musicians in the world.

The programme began last evening with the Vorspiel to Wagner's "Die Meistersinger," familiar but always welcome, even to those who are not devotees of the German master. Its striking climaxes and unique contrapuntal effects are especially pleasing, and one never wearies of the number. That it was admirably well rendered goes without saying.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman, a comparative stranger in this city, and her offering was Arensky's concerto in F minor, heard for the first time here. Both were most agreeable surprises, for the single recital given by Miss Heyman in Boston about a year ago did not warrant any expectations for the superior performance she gave last evening. She is a Californian, but recently she has been making her home in New York, where she has attained some prominence.

Last evening was her most pretentious appearance, and she acquitted herself most creditably. Her touch is firm, almost masculine, with a marked degree of certainty, and her phrasing denotes the true artistic instinct. The three movements were played with all the confidence of a veteran, and especially in the first, the allegro maestoso, she brought out the melodic ideas with delicate yet convincing force. It was a positive delight to listen to her work, and it is to be hoped she will be heard here again this season.

[23]

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

First Concert of the 19th Season in Music Hall.

Miss Heyman Plays Arrensky's Piano Concerto.

Orchestral Pieces by Wagner, Tschaikowsky, Schumann.

The program of the first concert of the 19th season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Prelude to 'Die Meistersinger'........Wagner
Piano concerto in F minor, op. 2....Arensky
(First time in Boston.)
Capriccio Italien, op. 45.........Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 1, in B flat..........Schumann

Inasmuch as Admiral Dewey is the uproariously honored guest of Boston, it might have been a graceful tribute to have performed last night in Music Hall Mascagni's Hymn to Admiral Dewey which was given for the first time July 23 at Pesaro before an audience of 2000. I say "might," because occasional pieces are often a blundering insult rather than the compliment of compliments, and Mascagni is not a man to be trusted blindly. So, perhaps, Mr. Gericke was wise in sticking to Schumann, whose symphony is now so familiar that the music lovers of Boston recognize it easily and feel safe in applauding it.

I have said something about Arensky in another column. This concerto was played, and for the first time in Boston, by Miss Katherine Heyman, whose recital in Steinert Hall, last March, is still pleasantly remembered. Some Western gentleman, forgetting that lying lips are abomination to the Lord, said that I put her by that recital above Messrs. Sauer and Rosenthal. I did nothing of the kind. Miss Heyman played Brahms's sonata No. 5, which Mr. Sauer had played shortly before. I wrote in the Journal: "I do not propose to compare the two performances, but it is only fair to say that Miss Heyman's reading of the first movements cleared away certain doubts left after Mr. Sauer's concert, for through her interpretation the movement assumed shape and definiteness." The Western gentleman, reading this, proceeded to amuse himself by arguing from particular to general, forgetting Jevons as well as the fear of the Lord.

There are two editions of Arensky's concerto. The first is a work of the composer's youth, and it is 15 years or so old. The second, published a year or two ago, was marred or enriched, as you please, by the labors of Paul Pabst, a teacher at the Moscow Conservatory. Just as young Russians orchestrally inclined build on Berlioz and Liszt, so the young Russians that make piano pieces build either on Chopin or Schumann. Arensky thought for the most part of Chopin, though he also remembered the modern French cantabile and the empty, blustering pomp of Liszt.

Thus in the second movement there is an almost direct reminder of the slow movement of Chopin's second concerto, and in the finale there are strong hints at snappy brass sentences dear to the Hungarian abbé. The themes of the work are not of marked strength or beauty; the sentiment is never above the level of salon elegance; the development is rambling and often without conviction; but the orchestration is at times of real interest. The concerto as a whole is calculated to please a large audience at the first hearing.

Miss Heyman displayed beauty of tone, clean technic, and true feeling, and she displayed these gifts, native and acquired, with simple, modest grace. Perhaps in the finale her bravura might have been more scintillating, and her slow trill is still a little stiff; but her performance was very creditable to herself and it gave the audience much pleasure. It is a delight to hear a pianist who does not pound, and who constantly bears in mind the limitations of this much abused instrument.

* * *

At the Symphony concert of Oct. 23, 1897, under Mr. Paur, the two last pieces were Tschaikowsky's Capriccio Italien and Schumann's first symphony. Last night this order was reversed—to the delight of those who wished to hear the Caprice and escape the symphony. A biographer of Tschaikowsky says that the former is a monument of the composer's love for Italy, and yet we find Tschaikowsky writing splenetically in 1877, "As regards my soul, there is a wound there that will never heal. I think I am 'homme fini' * * * Our going to Italy was pure folly. Her riches, her dazzling luxury made me irritable and worried me. I had no heart left to appreciate her great monuments which left me cold and indifferent." The Caprice was first played under Nicholas Rubinstein's auspices in Moscow, 1879, if I am not mistaken. It is not among the best works of the great composer. There is a coarseness that is an inherent quality of an irresistibly great nature; and there is a coarseness that quickly becomes tiresome. The coarseness of the Caprice is of the latter kind. Now when in the midst of thunder and guns and all that you begin to fear the recurrence of a tune, whether it be Italian, Russian or Senegambian, the composer shouts to you in vain.

The performance of the orchestra was brilliant, and Mr. Gericke was warmly welcomed.

Philip Hale.

The program of the Symphony concert Saturday evening will include Goldmark's overture to "Prometheus Bound"; Lalo's concerto for 'cello (Miss Elsa Ruegger, 'cellist); Ciaconna, Bach-Raff; Glazounoff's Symphony in C minor, [illegible] 6 (first time).

The Boston Symphony Orchestra will give ten concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Oct. 19, Nov. 2, 23, Dec. 7, 28, Jan. [illegible] 25, Feb. 8, March 1, 15. Among the soloists will be Miss Stein, Miss Aus der Ohe, Mrs. Szumowska, Messrs. Loeffler, Dohnányi and Schroeder, Mrs. Titus and others.

There will be 10 chamber concerts in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Oct. 24, Nov. 21, Dec. 5, Jan. 9, 30, Feb. 13, 27, March 13, April 3, 24. The Kneisel Quartet will play at nine concerts and the Adamowski Quartet at one. Mrs. Szumowska, Mrs. Hopekirk, Miss Mills, Messrs. Perabo, Burmeister, and Gebhardt will assist.

That autumn did no small share toward the success of the exquisite decorations at Trinity Church, was proved last Monday when, at high noon, took place the wedding of Miss Rosamond Tudor, a younger daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Frederick Tudor of Tappan Street, Brookline, to Mr. Alexander Higginson, the only child of Mr. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson of the Agassiz, 191 Commonwealth Avenue, which filled the church with by far the most fashionable gathering Boston has seen in many months. The chancel had its green background of palms, while the arch under which the impressive ceremony was performed was, together with the rail, one mass of barberry boughs, highly colored leaves and white asters and clematis, the latter vine confining each pew either side of the entire main aisle, tied in large bows of white ribbons.

The entire Symphony Orchestra (in which Mr. Henry Higginson has long been so actively interested) filled the front left gallery and played delightfully as the maid of honor and two bridesmaids entered the chancel from the left and proceeded down the aisle to meet the bride and her ushers. Miss Abigail Adams and Miss Barbara Higginson, with Miss Frances Whiteside, who debuted with Miss Tudor—she acting as maid of honor—were gowned in yellow crepe with embroidered black silk bow knots covering the front of their waists. They wore large black bonnets and carried Jacqueminot roses.

Mr. Reginald Johnston of Andover acted as groomsman, while the staff of ushers included Mr. Tyler Morse of this city, Mr. Malcolm Greenough of Cleveland, Mr. Harry Brooks of Milton, Mr. Charles Jackson of this city, Mr. Clifford Payson of this city, Mr. James Perkins of Milton and Mr. Frederic Tudor, Jr., of this city, brother of the bride.

The bride, escorted to the altar by her father, was a picture. As she came from the chancel to the strains of the orchestra, they playing for the first time a march composed especially for the occasion by her brother-in-law, Mr. Fred Converse. Her gown was of heavy white duchesse satin, with sleeves and yoke of exquisite point lace, while under the slashed skirt was a deep plaiting of white chiffon, which delicate material edged her tulle veil. She wore no gloves and carried a huge bunch of bride roses. The jewels worn were a beautiful rope of pearls, which hung to her waist, and a superb diamond brooch at her throat. Rev. E. Winchester Donald officiated.

The gowns worn were especially handsome in many instances. Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, mother of the groom, wore a beautiful pale gray satin with white lace collar and cap and white roses on her corsage. Her mother, Mme. Agassiz of Cambridge, who was with Mr. and Mrs. Higginson, Prof. Agassiz being away on a scientific expedition, had on a princess gown en traine of black velvet with point lace fichu and cap of the same beautiful texture.

Mrs. Tudor, the bride's mother, wore a delicate shade of heliotrope satin with entire overdress and waist of finest thread lace. Mrs. Tudor's costume was completed by a Directoire bonnet of black velvet and plumes, and she carried a bunch of pink roses. Mrs. Converse, her daughter, was gowned in a black creme de chine—being in mourning for her brother-in-law—with velvet, and wore a black bonnet and feather boa. Mrs. Converse's two young daughters were pictures in their delicate gowns of lace—one in pink ribbons, bonnet and boots, and the other in blue. Another sister of the bride, Mrs. James Garland, wore a beautiful black spangled net with large black hat to match. Mrs. Slade was in pink accordion plaited chiffon with touches of black and a black hat to match.

Mrs. Philip Sears (whose sister, Miss Higginson, acted as bridesmaid), wore a beautiful gown of blue crepe with black lace over white silk forming her yoke. Her hat was of a lighter shade of blue velvet, and her wrap a beautiful long cape of white silk with black lace over it. Mrs. Charles Francis Adams, 2d, was very smart in her tailor gown of gray cloth, with white silk vest and black velvet bands and black hat to match. Her sister, Mrs. Lovering, who was with her, was dressed in dark blue cloth. Mrs. James Jackson wore a plain black cloth tailor gown, with small bonnet. Her daughter, Mrs. George C. Lee, Jr., was gowned in black also, with bright cerise velvet stock, and wore a long black coat. Her sister, Miss Jackson, was remarkably pretty in a dark blue cloth gown, with wide sailor collar of white pique. Mrs. Frank Gair Macomber had on a black cloth gown with bands of black satin trimming the coat. Her daughter, Mrs. F. Lyman, was gowned in dark heliotrope broadcloth with beautiful fox fur boa and purple hat. Mrs. Harry Pratt McKean of Philadelphia, and a cousin of the groom—who was with her brother, Mr. Quincy A. Shaw, Jr., was very handsome in pale gray crepe de chine with blue. Her two young sons were with her.

Mrs. Robert G. Shaw, 2d, was very dainty, being a petite blonde, in her dress of dark-blue satin, with square yoke of blue velvet to match. The skirt had a wide panel of beautiful ecru lace. Her fur was a huge bear boa, and a large black hat, trimmed in tiny pink flowers, completed a very chic costume. Mrs. Tudor Hart wore a becoming coat of dark purple velvet, embroidered in the same shades and silver, with white lace at her throat. Mrs. William Tudor had on a beautiful creation of black velvet with point lace.

Among the many invited guests were Mr. and Mrs. George W. Chadwick, Gen. and Mrs. Curtis Guild, Miss Molly Johnson, a sister of Mrs. Guild's; Mr. Percival T. Hart, the artist, and a son of Mrs. Tudor Hart; Col. Thomas Wentworth Higginson, Mr. Franz E. Zerrahn, Dr. William Sturgis Bigelow, Hon. Robert Treat Paine, Miss Greland, Mr. Philip Sears, Mr. and Mrs. Quincy A. Shaw, aunt and uncle of the groom; Mr. and Mrs. Henry Long, Mr. Charles Francis Adams, 2d, Mr. and Mrs. Dean Pierce, Mr. and Mrs. Wilhelm Gericke, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Bowditch, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Wheelwright, Mr. Robert G. Shaw, 2d, Hon. and Mrs. John C. Bancroft, Dr. and Mrs. F. C. Balch, Mr. and Mrs. L. Cartaret Fenno, Mr. and Mrs. S. Parkman Blake, Dr. and Mrs. Shattuck, Mr. and Mrs. Rudolph Agassiz, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Almy, Mr. Godfrey Cabot, Dr. and Mrs. H. P. Bowditch, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Codman, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Dalton, Mr. Lawrence Lowell, President James M. Crafts of the Massachusetts Institute of Technology and Mrs. Crafts, Mr. and Mrs. Russell Codman, the latter a daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Crafts; Mr. and Mrs. J. E. Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Jr., and others.

The breakfast, which followed at the Tudor home in Brookline, was not as large as it would have been had their new house in Brookline been ready for occupancy, their present home not being sufficiently large to permit more guests.

Mr. and Mrs. Higginson will reside in Montana, where Mr. Higginson is to engage in business.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 16, 1899.

Opening Symphony Concert--A New Piano Concerto.

The hurly-burly of the Dewey festivities, the blare of many brass bands, and the noisy effervescence of a patriotic public, might have been poor preliminaries to a symphony concert, had not the opening number been quite in line with such a celebration; for what is the prelude to "The Mastersingers of Nuremburg" but a picture of a 16th century "Dewey day," with its processions, its shouting populace, and Hans Sachs as the hero of the occasions!

After the audience had bidden Mr. Gericke a cordial welcome the orchestra at once plunged into the Vorspiel and the 19th season had begun.

What a picture of popular rejoicing this prelude is! How the different rhythms jostle and crowd each other! What a conflict of varying sounds and ideas! But this artistic confusion makes it much more difficult to play than Haydn's contrapuntal picture of Chaos (in the "Creation") or Mendelssohn's fugal presentation of a clamoring populace, in the overture to "Elijah."

That is was well-played proves that the summer vacation does not perceptibly deteriorate our great band of musicians.

Novelties are likely to be the rule this season, and one of them graced this opening programme.

Some 15 years ago the young Russian, Arensky, wrote a piano concerto, which has since been revised. This work had never been heard in Boston, until Miss Katherine Ruth Heymann presented it at Saturday's concert.

Those who expected a feast of Vodki, Bortszsh, Pirok, Stschi, Caviar, Qvass, and other Russian viands and liquors, must have been disappointed, for back of the Muscovite mask was none other than Frederic Francois Chopin, whose voice could be plainly heard in the gentle morbidness that hung over the themes, but the orchestration went far beyond anything that Chopin ever achieved.

There was also a martial vein in the first movement, such as one finds in the military polonaises. There was no dulness in the treatment of this movement, the composer skilfully avoiding prolixity, and the resemblances above-noted by no means amounted to plagiarism.

In this allegro maestoso one might have demanded more breadth (not more vehemence) from Miss Heymann, although her clearness and intelligence were commendable here as well as in the two following movements.

The second movement had not so much to say for itself as the first; it came dangerously near the line of sentimentality. It often became a mixture of sugar and tremolo, and at times the shuddering orchestra suggested nothing higher than those musical shivers which occur in the melodrama when the heroine sinks down in a snow-storm and prays to her sainted mother in heaven. In other words, this movement was conventional, both in its dramatic touches and in its pathos.

It is possible that he Muscovites have a proverb—"He that conquereth a 5-4 rhythm is greater than he that conquereth a city;" whenever the Russian musicians become very ambitious they essay this rickety rhythm. Arensky is no exception and he attempts the feat which Tschaikowsky once successfully achieved.

The finale was bold and characteristic, yet, without being a "resemblance-hunter," the reviewer could not but note that Arensky had here transferred his allegiance from Chopin to Liszt.

The resolute four-noted figure, which appeared and reappeared with "damnable iteration" was a reminder of that figure (seven notes) which Liszt used in his E-flat piano concerto, and to which he playfully attached the words—"Das versteh't ihr alle nicht!"

Spite of the faults and resemblances which we have ventured to point out, the concerto deserved its place upon the symphonic programme. It is necessary for a musical community to keep abreast of the new Russian school of composition. When Russia has thoroughly digested the German school, when its young composers recover from the effects of having eaten of the Wagnerian fruit (one might suggest strong doses of Brahms as an antidote), St. Petersburg and Moscow may add a few masters to the list of the world's chief composers; the new Russian school may become the leading influence in the music of the near future, for Germany seems to bring forth chiefly Wagnerlings since the death of the great composer.

Miss Heymann was recalled with much enthusiasm after her performance and deserved the tribute.

The Russian feast went on; we now had Macaroni cooked in the Samovar, and we did not like the Italian dish as served by Tschaiowsky. Italian themes are essentially vocal, and much trouble ensues when a great orchestra[illegible]ter seizes upon them. The result is often the framing of a pretty little etching in ponderous gold frame.

Richard Strauss once kidnapped a genial Italian child named "Funicoli-Funicola," and dismembered it so that its own maker would not have recognized it. In like manner does Tschaiowsky "beat, bruise, maim, and otherwise maltreat" pretty Italian Pifferrari melodies in his "Italian Caprice."

The work is ushered in with a trumpet blast that suggests the walls of Jericho rather than a Salterello; once in a while the composer allows a simple bit of reed harmony which is in keeping with the simplicity of the actual melody, but invariably the pretty tune is swallowed up by an orchestration that might do for a tribe of Walkyries; Tschaikowsky waters his violets with a steam fire-engine.

The concert ended with Schumann's beautiful symphony, the "Spring Symphony," the record of the composer's happiest epoch, a glorious bit of musical autobiography and a tone-poem of inspiring spontaneity.

Criticasters are beginning to debate whether Schumann was really "a great master;" probably the verdict in such a matter will depend largely on personal temperament; to us Schumann will ever be one of the greatest of the moderns, the perfect presentation of the Teutonic nature in music, more distinctively German than Wagner himself. And to us the Symphony in B flat is a monument of eternal beauty.

We have never heard quite so much breadth given to that opening phrase, (was it pomposity?), and there was a trifle of roughness apparent here, but after this all went well; the daintiness of the Scherzo, the contrasts of the two trios, the dashing violin work of the finale, were points to dwell upon lovingly. It meant something to begin a season with a symphony as capricious in tempo, as full of syncopations, as this.

That the difficulties were so readily overcome as to be almost imperceptible to the auditor was a good augury for the season that the work ushered in.

Next Saturday comes more of Russia in the shape of a new symphony by Glazounow.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 107.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 15, 1899.

FIRST SYMPHONY OF SEASON

Large Audience Present at the Opening Concert.

Conductor Wilhelm Gericke Given a Most Cordial Reception—Miss Heyman's Charming Rendition of Arensky's Concerto for the Pianoforte.

The first concert of the 19th season of the Boston Symphony orchestra was given in Music Hall last evening. The programme was:

Prelude to "The Mastersingers"........Wagner
Concerto for pianoforte in F-minor, op. 2. Arensky
Capriccio Italien, op. 45..........Tshaikowsky
Symphony No. 1, in B flat...........Schumann

The soloist was Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman.

There was a large audience, and its reception of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke as he came forward to the conductor's stand was extremely cordial and long-sustained. There have been no changes in the personnel of the orchestra, and as matters settled down into their familiar aspect, it was not easy to realize that very close upon half a year had flown by since the last preceding concert was heard. The performance of the opening selection showed both conductor and orchestra fully up to their best standard. It was a large, impressive and gorgeously colored reading of the overture, and the playing of it was unsurpassable in its brilliancy and clearness. Rarely has the complicated orchestration of the middle portion of the work been brought out with more clean-cut distinctness or the closing climax wrought up with such stirring breadth and majesty of effect.

The Tschaikowsky Capriccio does not improve upon acquaintance. It is hardly to be ranked among the composer's orchestral felicities in either the treatment of its themes or in its instrumentation; nor do the themes themselves appear to possess a value or an interest to have warranted the pompous setting accorded them, to say nothing of the frequency with which Tschaikowsky has here lapsed into the trivially commonplace that is never wholly absent from even his most loftily aspiring efforts. Again came the reflection that he would have been capable of great little things if he had had the disposition or the courage to descend from his stilts to amuse himself with light comic opera.

One might almost fancy him lamenting the impropriety of his attempting such a thing. The capriccio, however, has the merits of a discreet brevity and freedom from boresomeness. It makes a successful appeal for popular favor, and with such a performance of it as Mr. Gericke brought about is pleasing enough in the hearing.

The Arensky concerto, which had not been heard here before, is an early work. Except in the finale, there is little that suggests the nationality of the composer. In fact, it would seem that when he wrote it, Arensky was so thoroughly saturated and fascinated by Chopin that he set himself the task of imitating him. He has not caught the master in his best vein, but the concerto is none the less Chopin; diluted and distorted, perhaps, but still unmistakably and unobjectionably clever. If it had been opus 30 instead of opus 2, he would not have avoided writing it in this fashion. It is very melodious, abundant in graceful refinements, providing ample opportunities for the soloist for display of technique and all the more delicate essentials of style.

The orchestration is full of charm and far superior to anything in its kind that his model achieved. The opening allegro and the andante are the best features of the work. The finale is in 5-4 time, but it does not move with the easy naturalness of the movement in the same rhythm in the Tschaikowsky "Pathetic" symphony. On the contrary, it halts and limps constantly, and with confusingly disjointed effect, suggesting the pace of a man of whose legs one is shorter than the other. Here again, however, the soloist is carefully considered, and has no end of opportunities for the display of agile finger work. The concerto has enough of prettiness and of brilliancy to become popular, and if it be lacking in power, freshness and original individuality, it does not offend by prolixity nor dulness.

Miss Heyman, who was heard here last season, with favorable results, in a piano recital, played the concerto very charmingly. She has a flexible technique, a distinctly musical touch, and plays with fluent ease, confidence and smoothness.

Her performance was never wanting in refined taste and was steadily interesting; and moreover shared sincere artistic feeling and conscience. Her style is virile, but she does not abuse the instrument after the modern fashion by pounding in the more fiery moments, and maintains a delightful and delighting discretion. In brief she is an admirable artist to whom it was a genuine pleasure to listen, and she wholly deserved the outbursts of applause that rewarded her at the close of the first and the second movements, and the vigorous plaudits and recalls that followed the end of the concerto. The accompaniment given her by Mr. Gericke, and the orchestra was in every way beautiful.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Prometheus Bound," Goldmark; concerto for violoncello in D, Lalo; chacoune by Bach, orchestrated by Raff, and Symphony in C minor, No. 6, by Glazounow, for the first time here. Miss Elsa Ruegger is to be the soloist.

It was a great turnout at the first rehearsal, last Friday, and one of the most animated reunions of the Symphony audiences that I can remember for a number of seasons. Something of the outer festivity of the Dewey excitement, perhaps, mingled with that essential oil of Boston society, and added life and spirit to the occasion. The flutter and hum of this prize musical congregation was at its loudest when Mr. Gericke appeared among his men, and the applause began. It has been remarked that women do not know how to applaud. The villain who said such nonsense would change his tone if he came to the Symphony rehearsals when some people are tremendously pleased! But the reception accorded the conductor on Friday all round, and it said, too, "Glad to see you again," as plainly as if one voice had shouted it above the audience. To be given a concerto at the opening of the season was rather a surprise, but the girls took it calmly, saying it was going to be a great year for soloists. As far as one could see, the whole orchestra looks fine as a fiddle. Even Mr. Loeffler, whose native blondness rouses much sympathy, is quite rosy and stouter than when he threw down his bow last May, and Mr. Kneisel is still wearing the coat of tan he probably picked up in the mountains. But why enumerate the improvements a summer's rest brings to all musicians? It won't be long before the cabinet will fade and wilt under the hard work of the winter, so let us make the most of their freshness and "go" in these early days. One thing, however, was perfectly apparent--there is not the slightest diminution in the society pull of Symphony rehearsals. Everybody but Mrs. "Jack" was there. The old familiar faces, and the new ones, belonging to the second and the third generation, with their unextinguishable air, and many strangers who came to look on this representative collection of Boston's best people, musically and fashionably considered. Thank goodness, the Boston audience is still a unique institution!

No wedding of late years has been more talked about or has made more of a stir socially and in a musical way than that which was celebrated at Trinity Church Monday noon of Miss Tudor and Mr. Higginson. Although the rain descended in no uncertain way at the time the guests were gathering, there was a delicious glow of color inside the edifice, reflected from the rich foliage which formed the principal decoration and transformed the broad chancel into a miniature autumnal forest. There were white blooms tied with ribbons on every pew of the broad aisle, which added to the light effect. There was a murmur of pleasurable anticipitation when the Symphony orchestra was discovered in a portion of the left-hand gallery, Mr. Gericke, his face ruddy from his country holiday, making a picturesque figure in its midst. But no anticipation, however strong, could come up to the realization when the "Lohengrin" bridal music, with the organ, came out with such superb effect. Mr. Gericke himself declares that there never was such a place as Trinity Church for acoustics, and that he in his turn was surprised and delighted at the magnificent results. As the bridal party passed up the aisle to this heavenly melody, it seemed to us no bride could have looked lovelier than Miss Tudor did in her panne velvet gown with honiton lace, and billowy flounces of chiffon covering the train, a fit setting for her sweet face, with its chataigne coloring. Her bearing was graceful and unaffected. Miss Higginson, Miss Adams and Miss Whiteside were picturesque in their clinging untrimmed princesse gowns of corn-colored crepe de chine, the bodices embroidered in black and white, and black velvet poke bonnets with ostrich plumes and jet aigrettes, fastened with narrow velvet ribbons. The Jacqueminot roses which they carried gave a fine dash of color.

Next in interest to the bridal party were Mrs. Tudor and her three other daughters, all of them matrons. Mrs. Tudor looked handsome and young in black lace over pinkish mauve satin, and a small black velvet poke bonnet with narrow strings. Mrs. Frederick Converse, the oldest daughter, who is in mourning for her husband's brother, was in black embroidered crepe de chine, and Mrs. James Garland, Jr., wore a costume of brilliant black jetted net, which fitted her svelte figure perfectly. Mrs. Edward Slade (who was Effie Tudor) was a refreshing sight beside these black costumes, in pink plaited chiffon, the bodice and tunic appliqued in black lace. Her picture hat was black velvet, faced with pink chiffon. She looked exceedingly well. Mrs. Converse's two little girls, one in rose and one in pale blue, and Mrs. Slade's petite daughter, in blue, were the daintiest little mites possible, and caused an audible murmur of admiration as they passed up and down the aisle. Others of the bride's family there were Mrs. William Tudor, who came up from Nova Scotia expressly for the wedding, with her two older daughters, Miss Elsa and Miss Delia Tudor, and Mrs. Tudor Hart, with her two sons, Mr. Percy Tudor Hart, the artist, and Mr. William Owen Tudor Hart. Mrs. Tudor Hart was a queenly figure in her purple cloth gown, with purple velvet wrap of a deeper shade, embroidered in steel. Her toque, which was also purple, had black coque cock's feathers and steel ornaments.

On the Higginson side Mrs. H. L. Higginson wore a gown of palest pearl gray silk, with much fine lace. Mrs. Quincy Shaw was in black, Mrs. H. P. McKean, who walked up the aisle with her little family around her, was in silver gray with turquoise jewels, and Mrs. Quincy A. Shaw, Jr., Mrs. R. G. Shaw, 2d, Mrs. James Higginson, Miss Dorothy Higginson, Mrs. Louis Shaw, Mrs. Carteret Fenno and Mrs. Rudolph Agassiz were conspicuous for their smart costumes.

The bride's ornaments were pearls, which she prefers to diamonds. They were the gifts of the groom, and exceedingly rare in color and quality. Her engagement ring at her special request was an opal surrounded with diamonds. It was a pearl wedding surely, for the bride's gifts to her maids were pearl circlet brooches, and the groom's to his

A few in the tremendous list of invited guests, beside those whom we have mentioned, most of whom were there, were Mr. F. L. Higginson, with his daughters, Mr. Quincy Shaw, Mr. H. P. McKean, Mr. and Mrs. Parkman Blake and daughters, Mr. Rudolph Agassiz, Mr. George Agassiz, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis, Jr., Admiral and Mrs. Higginson, Gov. and Mrs. Wolcott, Mr. Frank Jackson, Mr. Edward Jackson, Mr. and Mrs. George Putnam, the Misses Cary, Dr. and Mrs. John Elliott, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Russell, Mr. and Mrs. Henry Whitman, Mr. and Mrs. George D. Howe, Dr. and Mrs. Algernon Coolidge, Jr., Mr. T. H. Perkins, Dr. and Mrs. F. S. Watson, the John, Augustus and Charles Lowells, Charles Codmans, James Crafts, Richard Dixeys, Charles Bowditches, Henry P. Bowditches, Samuel Hoars and Andrew Wheelwright, President and Mrs. Eliot of Cambridge, Prof. Norton and Miss Grace Norton, Mrs. James Bell, Mr. and Mrs. Ellerton Pratt, Mrs. Philip Wheatland, and Judge and Mrs. Oliver Wendell Holmes. Also the Charles J. Paines, Robert Treat Paines, Arthur Lymans, Gardiner Lanes, C. C. Perkinses and Henry and Charles Daltons, Mr. and Mrs. C. F. Adams, 2d, Mr. and Mrs. Gericke, Mr. Adamowski, Mr. C. A. Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. F. R. Comee, Mrs. James T. Fields, Mr. Kneisel, Mr. Loeffler, Mrs. William Rogers and Mr. and Mrs. C. C. Perkins, Jr.

There was a small breakfast at Mrs. Tudor's house on Tappan street in Brookline. Mr. Higginson and his bride, after a short wedding journey, will go to Montana, where there is a fine field for Mr. Higginson's scientific tastes, which he inherits from his grandfather, Prof. Louis Agassiz. They will do a bit of roughing there, living a sort of ranch life, and as they are both devoted to out of door sports they are anticipating no end of pleasure from the experience. They will not come back until Easter. Mr. and Mrs. Higginson will live in Lincoln.

Mr. Harry Woodruff, by the way, who was to have been one of the ushers, was unfortunately obliged to appear in Rochester that same night in Mr. De Koven's new musical comedy, and so could not be on hand.

Apropos of the Symphony orchestra's part in the ceremony, Mr. Gericke was much gratified to receive a note from the bridegroom, wherein he expressed his exceeding gratification, appreciation and thanks for the music, which was such a surprise and delight to them all. And in this connection, we might add that Mr. Gericke says that he shall be perfectly happy if the new Music Hall possesses as fine acoustic properties as does Trinity Church.

The first social, as well as musical, event of the winter season is always the opening of the Symphony concerts, and on Friday afternoon for the rehearsal there was a perfect crush of subscribers. Many of them came up and in from their country places, so as to take part in the splendid welcome given Mr. Gericke as he stepped on the leader's platform for the first time this season. It was a gala occasion altogether, the balmy day and the Dewey decorations fluttering everywhere, giving added zest to the initial performance. Before and after the rehearsal, Hamilton place and the Winter street entrance resounded with gay chatter, which had for its keynote felicitations and welcomings after the summer campaign. There was any amount of bright coloring in the sea of gowns and hats on the floor and balconies. Indeed, the only out about the afternoon was the absence of the Beethoven statue, which we have all learned to love, and shall miss sadly from its time-honored place.

In the crowd of subscribers—most of them occupy their old seats—were noted Col. and Mrs. H. L. Higginson, Mrs. Louis Agassiz, Mr. and Mrs. C. P. Curtis, who had next them Mrs. Horatio Curtis, Mr. and Mrs. Edward Grew, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mr. and Mrs. Frank Zerrahn, Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Hamlin, Mrs. T. E. Chickering, Mrs. Hall Curtis, Mrs. William Hooper, with Mrs. Bryce Allan, both in black, with white en bodice and hat, Mrs. G. B. Shattuck, Mrs. John Lowell, Miss Lowell, Mr. John P. Lyman, Dr. W. Sturgis Bigelow, with Miss Mary Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Jordan, with their two children, Mr. J. Templeman Coolidge and Miss Mary Coolidge, Mrs. C. H. Drew, Miss Drew, Mr. Dana Estes, Mrs. Seth Sprague, with Miss Mary Hooper, Mrs. F. R. Spaulding, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mr. Edmund Dwight in his usual balcony seat, Mrs. Henry Howe, Mr. George B. Chase, Mrs. W. A. French, Miss French, Mrs. R. D. Evans and her sister, Miss Abby Hunt, Mrs. J. W. Kenney and Miss Kenney and Mr. and Mrs. George Inches; also, Mrs. Theodore Dwight, with friend from Weston, the Rev. Fr. Bodfish, Mrs. Frederick Warren, Mrs. A. F. Conant, Mme. de Angelis, Mrs. John B. Osborn, Mr. John K. Paine, Mr. and Mrs. Elliot W. Pratt, Miss Charlotte Dana, Mrs. Caleb D. Bradlee, Mrs. Walter C. Sm[illegible], Mrs. Charles A. Morss, Jr., Miss Mary Crane, Mrs. Hugh Cotton, Mrs. Martha Dana Shepard, Miss Rose Brown, Mr. Charles Vialle, Mrs. Gerard Bement, Miss Gertrude Sampson, Mrs. R. M. Field, Gen. and Mrs. Blackmar, Miss Julia Burgess and Mr. J. Foster White.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, OCT. 15, 1899.

The Boston symphony orchestra began its 19th season last week in Music hall, Mr Gericke conducting, with Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman as solo pianist. With these concerts the musical season may now be considered as opened. Of course, the usual scenes of enthusiasm were enacted. The hall was crowded. the program numbers were received with an approbation which is always specially demonstrative in the early part of the season and the young soloist, Miss Heyman, was found to be an artist of high ability. Mr Gericke departed from the custom usual at the first symphony concert by introducing a soloist and not confining himself to orchestral numbers exclusively. The program was as follows: Prelude to "The Master Singers," Wagner; concerto in F minor, for pianoforte, Arensky; "Capriccio Italien," Tchaikowsky, and Schumann's first symphony. The Arensky concerto was given for the first time in Boston.

Miss Heyman has already been favorably received in this city, and the artistic ability shown at her recital gave promise of excellence in a broader field of music. This promise was fulfilled in her admirable performance of Arensky's difficult work, the three movements requiring widely contrasted styles of treatment in interpreting the meaning of the composer. The first part is full of brilliant solo work, with a background of sonorous basses, and is broad in development, so broad in fact that the piano part is frequently obscured. The second movement is rather mournful in character, and the closing part partakes largely of the Russian dance type of music, fiery, light and filled with odd progressions. Miss Heyman's interpretation was thoroughly sympathetic, each "mood" being presented clearly, though at times lacking the proper force in fortissimo passages and being overpowered by the orchestra. Her runs, single and chord, were beautiful in tone and very clear, nearly every phrase was admirably outlined and without exaggeration or affectation. Her technique appears sufficient to overcome about every obstacle, and it is only in the heavier passages that she displays a lack of power. The mournful second movement was given in a charmingly sympathetic manner, and her staccato work in the dance themes of the finale was delightfully crisp and clear. Miss Heyman is an artist well equipped for her profession, and the prolonged applause which greeted her work was thoroughly deserved.

The orchestral numbers, familiar and welcome, call for little comment. The orchestra, as usual, did entire justice to each number. Wagner's beautiful prelude to "The Master Singers" was performed with all the pomp and cantible suggestiveness required, the "singing strings" possible being the feature of the interpretation.

Tchaikowsky's strange Italian capriccio, one of the musical fantasies that teems with surprises, melodic or inharmonious, as the composer's whims suggested, was played with telling effect. The vivacity and life which follows the introductory measures were sustained with characteristic impetuosity, and the whole interpretation was brilliant and an admirable example of the team work of this organization. The Schumann was as daintily played as ever, the fourth movement being worthy of special praise for the smooth ensemble work which preceded the final coda.

This week's concerts will have Miss Elsa Ruegger as soloist. The program will be as follows: Overture from "Gefesselten Prometheus," Goldmark; concerto for 'cello in D, Lalo; Ciaconna, orchestrated by J. Raff, Bach; symphony in C minor, No. 6, Glazounow.

—The marriage at Trinity on Monday of Miss Rosamond Tudor, daughter of Mr and Mrs Frederic Tudor of Brookline, and Mr Alexander Henry Higginson, only son of Mr and Mrs Henry Lee Higginson, was in many respects the most perfectly appointed of all the many weddings that have taken place here. The church was never more beautifully nor more appropriately decorated. All the pews in the center aisle were designated by big bows of white taffeta ribbon and a bunch of clematis, with its feathery white blossom and its green leaves. The chancel was aglow with autumn foliage, maple and oak leaves and branches, being arranged in the form of an arch, with a background of spruce and barberry bushes, laden with bunches of crimson fruit, were mingled effectively with the green. Asparagus vine and English ivy, with white chrysanthemums banked the chancel rail, and a bank of moss and trailing vines surrounded the pillow upon which the bridal couple knelt. Just before the entrance of the bridal party, the Symphony orchestra, with Mr Gericke as leader, which was placed in the balcony, at the left of the altar, played softly the music of the cathedral scene in Lohengrin. At the same time the three young women who attended the bride met at the altar and passed down the aisle to meet her. They were Miss Whiteside, maid of honor, Miss Barbara Higginson and Miss Abigail Adams and were dressed in pale yellow crepe-de-chine, en princesse, with accordion plaited chiffon petticoats. Their hats were of black velvet trimmed with plumes and fastened under the chin with big bows of ribbon. Their bouquets were of dark crimson roses tied with satin ribbon of the same shade. The bride, who entered the church on the arm of her father, wore a gown of white uncut velvet, the tunic cut in deep points and trimmed with lace, over a petticoat of accordion plaited and ruffled chiffon. The bodice was covered with Honiton lace, and her veil was of cream white chiffon, caught with a spray of clematis. She carried a bouquet of bride roses. The ushers, who led the procession were Messrs Frederic Tudor Jr, James Perkins, J. C. Howe, Harry Brooks, Tyler Morse, Charles Jackson, P. E. Catlin and J. C. Howe. At the conclusion of the ceremony, which was performed by Rev E. Winchester Donald, the recessional, played by the orchestra, accompanied by Mr Goodrich on the organ, filled the church with inspiring strains. Among the guests were Mrs Tudor, mother of the bride, who wore a violet satin gown covered with black chantilly lace, and white lace at the corsage, her toque was of jet faced with white silk and trimmed with black plumes. Mrs Higginson, mother of the bridegroom, in pale gray crepe, with white lace at the bodice. Mrs Quincy Shaw, aunt of the bridegroom, was also in gray. Mrs Slade, sister of the bride, was in pink chiffon, with black lace yoke to bodies. Mrs Converse, another sister, was in black embroidered crepe de chene, and with her were her two little girls, one in pink, the other in blue. Mrs Slade of Chestnut Hill, was in black cloth and hat with plumes, and Miss Slade was in a blue silk bodice over black skirt. Mrs Harry Pratt McKean, in a costume of gray satin had with her her two little boys. Others present were: Mr T. Wentworth Higginson, Miss Margaret Higginson in a brown costume with hat the same shade; Mrs Theodore Lyman in black, Dr and Mrs Harry L. Morse, Dr and Mrs Jack Eliot, Mrs Agassiz, Miss Emma Carey, Mrs James Jackson, Mrs George Cabot Lee Jr, Mrs S. Parkman Blake in black velvet with point lace, Mr and Mrs L. Carteret Fenno, the latter in gray-blue crepe de chine, the tunic embroidered in white, and black hat with plumes; Mr and Mrs Philip S. Sears, the latter in blue and green shaded grenadine, with white silk wrap covered with black figured lace, and light blue hat with wings; Mr and Mrs Edward Cabot, Mr and Mrs Joseph Lee, Mr and Mrs Charles Gardner, Mr and Mrs Henry Russell, Mrs Henry P. Whitman in a long black satin cloak worn over black and white striped silk, and black hat with plumes; Mrs John C. Gray in dark cloth costume, the bodice opening over white, and black toque with jet and plumes; Miss Eleanor Gray, in a dark blue cloth costume, and hat of violet straw with black plumes; Miss Rebecca Jackson, Mr and Mrs Gardner Lane, Mr Arthur Lyman, Mr and Mrs Neil Rantoul, Mr and Mrs Charles Codman, Mr Augustus Lowell and Dr W. Sturgis Bigelow. A reception confined to the immediate families, followed the ceremony at the home of the bride's' parents. Mr and Mrs Higginson have gone for a year to the interior of Montana, where Mr Higginson is to make researches in natural history for the Smithsonian institute.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its first concert of this, its nineteenth, season, in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nürnberg."
Arensky: Concerto for Pianoforte, in F minor, opus 2.
(First time in Boston.)
Tchaikovsky: Capriccio Italien, opus 45.
Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38.

Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman was the pianist.

Mr. Gericke was very warmly received as he stepped up to the conductor's desk. The "Meistersinger" prelude was played with immense brilliancy and spirit; the general tempo seemed to me rather faster than we have been used to here, but none the worse for that; the spirit of the music can very well be wronged by seeking after too great breadth in the contrapuntal first theme. The performance may fairly be called a model one, it savoured of nothing of a first night; the orchestra could not be expected to play better together in the middle of a season. All those dangerous little passages where Walther's long themes take the lead went to perfection with just the right delicate modifications [illegible] the closing climax was worked up with grand force.

Tchaikovsky's "Capriccio Italien" is decidedly one of his minor works, not the sort of thing for the wild and woolly Tchaikovskyite to swear by. When first given by Mr. Paur two years ago it seemed pretty poor trash; Mr. Gericke succeeds in getting more out of it—he makes it at least brilliantly effective, and it may be doubted if more than this is possible.

The gem of the evening, however—in the matter of performance—was the playing of Schumann's B-flat symphony. In the first movement, as in the "Meistersinger" prelude, the tempo was pushed to what struck me as an unusually fast pace, and with equally fine results. I cannot remember hearing this symphony played quite so "romantically" before; those sixteenth-note passages in the first theme of the first Allegro were played with a fluttering lightness that took away their usually too academic flavor; there was no suggestion of the old-fashioned "Handel fiddling," the theme was allowed to retain all its bright and sunny poetry. The finale, too, went admirably. I would make one suggestion: might it not be well, if only for experiment, to play the opening trumpet and horn phrase as Schumann originally wrote it—on the notes B-flat, G, A, B-flat—instead of in the shape to which Mendelssohn altered it, to make it possible for the old plain instruments? Our modern chromatic horns and trumpets can play the original versions perfectly well, and it is known that Schumann himself regretted the change, necessary though it was in his day.

The Arensky concerto is not quite a thing of joy. It was written when the composer was about twenty-three, an age at which most musicians have their heads full of other people's ideas, and are permeated with somebody's else's style. In writing this concerto the young Arensky was plainly thinking of Chopin—the most dangerous man in the world to have in mind while composing, for Chopin's style, minus Chopin's nobility and matured distinction, is nothing particularly admirable. Neither does this weakened bastard of a style take kindly to association with the Liszt hammer-and-tongs business—toward which Arensky seems also to have had a leaning at moments. And oh! if those Russians would only not be so fond of 5-4 time! You find yourself absolutely squinting before the last movement is over. The concerto is, however, quite a masterpiece in one way: in the astonishing skill with which the orchestral part is scored. Hitherto I have thought Edouard Lalo the best-skilled composer in scoring accompaniments to a solo instrument brilliantly, without crushing the solo part; but Lalo generally makes his heavily scored accompaniments transparent by writing his strong chords staccato, with gaps of silence between them; in this concerto Arensky follows another plan. By some magic he succeeds in taking all the noisiness out of his instruments; he will make play with his full orchestra in fortissimo, with sustained harmonies in trumpets and trombones, gaining great richness of color, but wholly without noisiness. How he does it is more than I can tell; but listen to the orchestral part of the last movement, without the pianoforte—as I had an opportunity of doing the other morning at a rehearsal—and the thing makes the impression of being clumsily scored; there is richness enough, if you will, but it all sounds dull and ineffective. Yet take this rather impotent-sounding scoring as a background for brilliant pianoforte passages, and you see at once with what admirable skill the composer has regulated his orchestral dynamics. I cannot remember ever hearing anything of quite this sort before.

Miss Heyman made a very favorable impression at a recital in Steinert Hall last season; there were holes in her talent, to be sure, but she gave unmistakable promise. It is hard to judge of a player's progress from hearing her play a wholly unfamiliar work; but, as far as I could tell from her performance last Saturday, I should say that she has already gone far toward filling up what lacunæ were noticeable last winter. She seems to have grown in the direction of what is called totality of conception; she shows a finer sense of musical proportion, of the true relation between the constituent parts of a whole. Her phrasing is now admirable, she carries through long periods without letting the musical thread snap. Indeed, her playing of the concerto was exceedingly good; she showed temperament and as much intellectuality as the composer gave her a chance for. Furthermore, she plays with due respect for the natural qualities and limitations of her instrument; her fortissimo is not pounding, her tone is always agreeable. Her success with the audience was unquestionable.

The next programme is: Goldmark, overture "zum Gefesselten Prometheus des Aeschylos," opus 38; Lalo, concerto for violoncello, in D minor (first time in Boston); Bach, chaconne, scored for orchestra by Raff; Glazounoff, symphony No. 6, in C minor (first time in Boston). Miss Elsa [illegible] will be the 'cellist.

W. F. A.

The Boston Traveler
Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.

THE SYMPHONY.

Opening of the Nineteenth Season at Music Hall, and the Last to Be Held in the Time-Honored Auditorium.

Nineteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; first concert. Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman, soloist. The programme:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"	Wagner
Piano concerto in F minor, op. 2 (First time in Boston.)	Arensky
Capriccio Italien, op. 45	Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 1, in B flat	Schumann

The return of the Symphony season, the last in old Music Hall, was marked by much the same scenes as in other years. The audience was large and characteristically musical; its greeting of Conductor Gericke dignifiedly warm and sincere, and its appreciation of an unusually interesting programme clearly evident. The orchestra is unchanged in make-up, and it would be a mere waste of words to dwell on the fact that it went at its work and accomplished it as if there had been no summer vacation at all. Everything was magnificently played, and Mr. Gericke is more and more emancipated from his old-time formalism, both in the matter of fiery readings and a freer style of conducting. Never has the Symphony Orchestra been in better shape than in this October of 1899.

Miss Heyman deserves gratitude for playing an unfamiliar concerto. Even a bad novelty is sometimes more welcome than a good, but oft-repeated classic. The Arensky work, however, was not at all bad. It smacks of Chopin, and touches no depth in doing so. But it is full of delicate beauty in themes and its orchestration is generally delightful. The whole thing is clean-cut and free from bombast, and as against these many virtues the fact that it is something near to "salon music" is not sufficient to damn it. It was played with great refinement, a sufficient technique and a poetic earnestness that won the attention at once and held it throughout. Miss Heyman has the true artistic spirit, and seems to be incapable of offending by the over-exuberance that so many young women players affect.

Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien" is a glowing and fascinating work. It seems to me to be a direct imitation of the characteristic melodies of the old-fashioned Italian opera—but with what a vast difference. Whereas the Donizetti-Bellini crowd wrote for their really delightful airs a set of orchestrations of the poorest and baldest sort, this great Russian has enveloped his tunes with a tonal richness and a musical coloring that are as gorgeous as a crimson sunset. Mr. Gericke's reading on this occasion was far finer than that of Mr. Paur two years ago. It had the dash and fire and lilt that the earlier performance lacked, and the occasional flavor of the commonplace felt aforetimes was not in evidence. This piece has been called "vulgar," but as the noble "Symphony Pathetique" of the same composer has been termed "obscene" by one eminent musical writer, it is evident that there is still considerable latitude in the matter of taste.

Not long ago I read a learned article on the "Decadence of Robert Schumann." It went on to demonstrate that except for a few pianoforte pieces and a song or two, the composer's work was on the high road to oblivion. It was quite impressive for the time being. But I have just heard the "Spring" symphony, and the learned writer's argument has gone for naught, in one case at least. Beauty like that is not born to die.

WILDER D. QUINT.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 15, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY.

In fulfilment of the announcement on the last Programme Book of the season 1898-1899, the first concert of the nineteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening.

The favorite Meistersinger overture played with spirit, set the key for a most enjoyable music-hour. A concerto for pianoforte, by the Russian composer Arewsky, (its first performance here) followed, and was interpreted by Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman, who appeared with success at Steinert Hall, last season, and by her rendering of the concerto showed ability worthy the larger stage. Her playing was without affectation and she entered into the spirit of the work with sympathetic insight. As to her technique, it was equal to all demands made upon it, and her trills, octaves and scales were delightful to hear. The work itself on a single hearing, was most interesting, and a valuable addition to pianoforte concertos. The piano part is never lost in the excess of orchestration, and seems the vital and moving part of the work.

The Italian Capriccio by Tschaikowsky was well chosen for the third selection; its composer, although Russian, was thoroughly in harmony with the animation and vivacity of the warm Italian nature.

Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, written when the composer was in the spring-tide of his hardly-earned happiness, and called by him the Spring Symphony, and in a letter to a friend he said "My Symphony was born in an hour of ecstasy," was the fourth selection.

Ehlert rhapsodically says, "It is imbued with the fragrant breath of a young pine grove, amid which the sun plays at hide and seek. It embodies as much of a joyful, bridal air, as though Schumann were celebrating his symphonic honeymoon. All its thoughts are aspirations."

This Symphony is so well known that any extended analysis is unnecessary.

Mr. Gericke gave it the clear, [illegible] reading with which he has made us familiar, and the orchestra showed itself as sensitive to his direction, as though no summer rest had intervened since the last concert.

Next week's programme includes: Goldmark Overture zum "Gefesselten Prometheus" des Aeschylor; Lalo, Concerto for Violincello in D; Bach, Ciaconna, orchestrated by J. Raff; Glazounon, Symphony in C minor, No. 6 (first time.)

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
Oct ESTABLISHED 1813. 14

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The first public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall on Friday afternoon. The programme was:

Overture, Die Meistersinzer,	Wagner
Concerts for pianoforte No. 1 (first time)	Arensky
Italian Caprice,	Tschailkowsky
Symphony No. 1,	Schumann

Soloist: Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman

The first concert of the Symphony Orchestra is always an event in musical Boston ,and it aroused the enthusiasm that is generally latent during the rest of the season. The greeting given to Mr. Gericke was most cordial, and at the fitting time the orchestra came in for its share of the all pervading enthuiasm. The soloist is not unknown to a Boston audience, she appeared here last year, and on the present occasion intensified the good impresion then made. On the side of technique there is little but praise to be accorded; the artist has well and carefully educated fingers and she uses them with skill and discretion. On the interpretative side it is more difficult to give an opinion, for the work performed does not call into action the higher artistic qualities of the player. It is a piece in which the Chopin elements dominate, without the Chopin outflow of melody and spontaneity of ideas. Miss Heyman conquered its difficulties with ease, and she demonstrated such meaning as it has with fine intelligence and with most excellent artistic taste. She has the musical temperament and reason why she should not, in the near from the evidence given there is no future, reach a place beside the most distinguished pianists of her sex. Of the work of Mr. Gericke and his orchestra it is needless to speak; it is sufficient to state that both were at their best. The soloist made a most favorable impression on her audience and she wa recalled many times in answer to the enthusiastic demand.

The programme for the second concert is:

Goldmark, Overture zum "Gefesselten Prometheus" des Aeschylos; Lalo, Concerto for Violoncello in D; Bach, Giaconna, Orchestrated by J. Raff; Glazounow, Symphony in C minor, No. 6, (first time.); Soloist, Miss Elsa Ruegger.

Boston Symphony Season.

The sale of season tickets for the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will begin tomorrow morning at Albert's ticket office. The season will consist, as usually, of five concerts, and be given on Tuesdays, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 20. Conductor Wilhelm Gericke has been retained, which will make this his seventh year with this famous organization. He will have under his control 87 musicians, with exactly the same artists he had last season. The management so far announces three of their soloists, but is in negotiation with some vocal talent of the highest reputation whose names will be announced shortly.

The soloists engaged up to the present time are as follows: Mark Hambourg, a noted Russian pianist, who created a sensation as a boy prodigy. He studied with Leschetizky, in Vienna, for three years, and when he returned before a critical audience of the same city he astonished the public with a rare technique and marvelous command of expression.

The second soloist is Miss Leonora Jackson, a young violinist born in Boston. In 1896 she won the Mendelssohn State prize at Berlin, where she was a pupil of Professor Joachin. A year later she made her debut with a philharmonic orchestra in Berlin, and has since played in public with remarkable success.

Ernst Dohnanyi, another of the soloists, is a young Hungarian pianist who has been specially engaged with this famous orchestra for all their series of concerts in Boston, Philadelphia, Brooklyn and Baltimore. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Tickets for the Symphony.

The sale of season tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at Music Hall, began yesterday morning at nine o'clock at Albert's, 15 North Charles street. An arrangement had been made by which former subscribers could secure their tickets by writing in advance. This simplified matters very considerably, and was very satisfactory to all concerned. The rush was avoided, and it was not necessary to endure the discomfort of standing in line for hours before the ticket office opened. The gentleman in charge of the ticket desk was kept busy, however, and a large number of seats were sold. From present indications, the sale of tickets will be equally as great as last year.

[26]

EVERY SEAT FOR THE 1ST SERIES OF FIVE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS SOLD FOR THE SEASON. THE SALE OF SEASON TICKETS FOR THE 2D SERIES OPENS NEXT MONDAY MORNING AT 8 O'CLOCK, AT 1103 CHESTNUT ST.

Sun Oct 14 '99
15 lines

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The initial concert of the fifteenth season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall on the evening of Tuesday, November 7. The membership of the orchestra, with a few exceptions, is the same as last season, and these exceptions will rather augment than detract from its strength. Conductor Wilhelm Gericke continues at the head of the organization, and this is to the public an assurance of the acceptability of the programs which have been arranged, as well as of the character and ability of the soloists who have been engaged. The sale of season tickets will begin next Monday.

Boston Symphony's Novelties.

The dates of the concerts this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on Tuesday evenings, as follows: November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 20. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again conduct the orchestra, with exactly the same personnel as last year. The following are among the soloists engaged: Leonora Jackson, a young violinist, born in Boston; Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist and composer, who has been specially engaged to come to America to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities; Mark Hamburg, a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is the pianist who first appeared as the boy prodigy; later, after having studied with Leschetizsy, he appeared in public equipped with a splendid technique and rare command of expression. Vocalists of high reputation will be added to the list of soloists, and will be announced shortly. The sale of season tickets begins tomorrow morning at Albert's ticket office.

Among the new things the orchestra promises this season here or elsewhere will be symphonies by Glazounoff (No. 6), Tschaikowsky (No. 3), Bruckner, Wilhelm Berger and Weingartner; Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody," Dvorak's "Heldenlied," Franck's "Les Eolides," D'Indy's "Medel," Rontgen's "Norwegische Ballade," Symphonique Dances by Grieg, a new composition by Horatio Parker, and overtures by Siegfried Wagner, Chadwick, Goldmark and Dresicke. Of Beethoven's symphonies the Second, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth and Ninth will probably be played; of Schumann's, the First and Fourth; of Brahm's, the First and Fourth, and two by Mozart and two by Haydn, and Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet."

Oct BOSTON POST, 21
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MUSIC HALL PLANS.

New York Report Says H. W. Savage Will Build New Theatre.

Rumor comes from New York that this city is to have another theatre, and the spot designated is the site of the present Music Hall. The same report also connects with the enterprise the name of Henry W. Savage, the well-known real estate man of this city, but who for the past few seasons has been more famous as an operatic impresario. As is well known, the old Music Hall is to be torn down the coming spring or summer. It will remain as it is until the close of the Symphony concerts, but whether or not it will be left untouched until the "Pops" have been given, even the present lessees cannot state.

Various schemes as to the disposition of the property in the autumn of 1900 have been agitated, but now comes the rumor above referred to, that it may be turned into a theatre for operatic purposes. Henry W. Savage became interested in the theatrical profession through his association with the Castle Square property.

Mr. Savage is a prominent member of the syndicate which now owns the Music Hall property. In fact, in some quarters it is said that he practically controls the place, and it is this which may have given rise to the story of an establishment of an operatic theatre in Boston.

The well-known musical tastes of the people of this city and the fact that such an organization was successful here when it was far less talented than the one Mr. Savage is now conducting, would point to a desire on the part of this gentleman to invade his home and demonstrate what can be done with grand opera at popular prices.

Boston Evening Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 16, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of this, its nineteenth, season, in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Wagner: Prelude to "Die Meistersinger von Nurnberg."
Arensky: Concerto for Pianoforte, in F minor, opus 2.
(First time in Boston.)
Tchaikovsky: Capriccio Italien, opus 45.
Schumann: Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, opus 38.

Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman was the pianist.

Mr. Gericke was very warmly received, as he stepped up to the conductor's desk. The "Meistersinger" prelude was played with immense brilliancy and spirit; the general tempo seemed to me rather faster than we have been used to here, but none the worse for that; the spirit of the music can very well be wronged by seeking after too great breadth in the contrapuntal first theme. The performance may fairly be called a model one, it savoured in nothing of a first night; the orchestra could not be expected to play better together in the middle of a season. All those dangerous little passages where Walther's love-themes take the lead went to perfection, with just the right delicate modifications [illegible], the closing climax was worked up with grand force.

Tchaikovsky's "Capriccio Italien" is decidedly one of his minor works, not the sort of thing for the wild and woolly Tchaikovskyite to swear by. When first given by Mr. Paur two years ago it seemed pretty poor trash; Mr. Gericke succeeds in getting more out of it—he makes it at least brilliantly effective, and it may be doubted if more than this is possible.

The gem of the evening, however—in the matter of performance—was the playing of Schumann's B-flat symphony. In the first movement, as in the "Meistersinger" prelude, the tempo was pushed to what struck me as an unusually fast pace, and with equally fine results. I cannot remember hearing this symphony played quite so "romantically" before; those sixteenth-note passages in the first theme of the first Allegro were played with a fluttering lightness that took away their usually too academic flavor; there was no suggestion of the old-fashioned "Handel fiddling," the theme was allowed to retain all its bright and sunny poetry. The finale, too, went admirably. I would make one suggestion: might it not be well, if only for experiment, to play the opening trumpet and horn phrase as Schumann originally wrote it—on the notes B-flat, G, A, B-flat—instead of in the shape to which Mendelssohn altered it, to make it possible for the old plain instruments? Our modern chromatic horns and trumpets can play the original versions perfectly well, and it is known that Schumann himself regretted the change, necessary though it was in his day.

The Arensky concerto is not quite a thing of joy. It was written when the composer was about twenty-three, an age at which most musicians have their heads full of other people's ideas, and are permeated with somebody's else's style. In writing this concerto the young Arensky was plainly thinking of Chopin—the most dangerous man in the world to have in mind while composing, for Chopin's style, minus Chopin's nobility and matured distinction, is nothing particularly admirable. Neither does this weakened bastard of a style take kindly to association with the Liszt hammer-and-tongs business — toward which Arensky seems also to have had a leaning at moments. And oh! if those Russians would only not be so fond of 5-4 time! You find yourself absolutely squinting before the last movement is over. The concerto is, however, quite a masterpiece in one way: in the astonishing skill with which the orchestral part is scored. Hitherto I have thought Edouard Lalo the best-skilled composer in scoring accompaniments to a solo instrument brilliantly, without crushing the solo part; but Lalo generally makes his heavily scored accompaniments transparent by writing his strong chords staccato, with gaps of silence between them; in this concerto Arensky follows another plan. By some magic he succeeds in taking all the noisiness out of his instruments; he will make play with his full orchestra in fortissimo, with sustained harmonies in trumpets and trombones, gaining great richness of color, but wholly without noisiness. How he does it is more than I can tell; but listen to the orchestral part of the last movement, without the pianoforte—as I had an opportunity of doing the other morning at a rehearsal—and the thing makes the impression of being clumsily scored; there is richness enough, if you will, but it all sounds dull and ineffective. Yet take this rather impotent-sounding scoring as a background for brilliant pianoforte passages, and you see at once with what admirable skill the composer has regulated his orchestral dynamics. I cannot remember ever hearing anything of quite this sort before.

Miss Heyman made a very favorable impression at a recital in Steinert Hall last season; there were holes in her talent, to be sure, but she gave unmistakable promise. It is hard to judge of a player's progress from hearing her play a wholly unfamiliar work; but, as far as I could tell from her performance last Saturday, I should say that she has already gone far toward filling up what lacunæ were noticeable last winter. She seems to have grown in the direction of what is called totality of conception; she shows a finer sense of musical proportion, of the true relation between the constituent parts of a whole. Her phrasing is now admirable, she carries through long periods without letting the musical thread snap. Indeed, her playing of the concerto was exceedingly good; she showed temperament and as much intellectuality as the composer gave her a chance for. Furthermore, she plays with due respect for the natural qualities and limitations of her instrument; her fortissimo is not pounding, her tone is always agreeable. Her success with the audience was unquestionable.

The next programme is: Goldmark, overture "zum Gefesselten Prometheus des Aeschylos," opus 38; Laid, concerto for violoncello, in D minor (first time in Boston); Bach, chaconne, scored for orchestra by Raff; Glazounoff, symphony No. 6, in C minor (first time in Boston). Miss Elsa Ruegger will be the 'cellist. W. F. A.

Oct 16

The Boston Traveler

Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.

THE SYMPHONY.

Opening of the Nineteenth Season at Music Hall, and the Last to Be Held in the Time-Honored Auditorium.

Nineteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; first concert. Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman, soloist. The programme:

Prelude to "Die Meistersinger"..........Wagner
Piano concerto in F minor, op. 2.......Arensky
(First time in Boston.)
Capriccio Italien, op. 45..........Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 1, in B flat...........Schumann

The return of the Symphony season, the last in old Music Hall, was marked by much the same scenes as in other years. The audience was large and characteristically musical, its greeting of Conductor Gericke dignifiedly warm and sincere, and its appreciation of an unusually interesting programme clearly evident. The orchestra is unchanged in make-up, and it would be a mere waste of words to dwell on the fact that it went at its work and accomplished it as if there had been no summer vacation at all. Everything was magnificently played, and Mr. Gericke is more and more emancipated from his old-time formalism, both in the matter of fiery readings and a freer style of conducting. Never has the Symphony Orchestra been in better shape than in this October of 1899.

Miss Heyman deserves gratitude for playing an unfamiliar concerto. Even a bad novelty is sometimes more welcome than a good, but oft-repeated classic. The Arensky work, however, was not at all bad. It smacks of Chopin, and touches no depth in doing so. But it is full of delicate beauty in themes and its orchestration is generally delightful. The whole thing is clean-cut and free from bombast, and as against these many virtues the fact that it is something near to "salon music" is not sufficient to damn it. It was played with great refinement, a sufficient technique and a poetic earnestness that won the attention at once and held it throughout. Miss Heyman has the true artistic spirit, and seems to be incapable of offending by the over-exuberance that so many young women players affect.

Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien" is a glowing and fascinating work. It seems to me to be a direct imitation of the characteristic melodies of the old-fashioned Italian opera—but with what a vast difference. Whereas the Donizetti-Bellini crowd wrote for their really delightful airs a set of orchestrations of the poorest and baldest sort, this great Russian has enveloped his tunes with a tonal richness and a musical coloring that are as gorgeous as a crimson sunset. Mr. Gericke's reading on this occasion was far finer than that of Mr. Paur two years ago. It had the dash and fire and lilt that the earlier performance lacked, and the occasional flavor of the commonplace felt aforetimes was not in evidence. This piece has been called "vulgar," but as the noble "Symphony Pathetique" of the same composer has been termed "obscene" by one eminent musical writer, it is evident that there is still considerable latitude in the matter of taste.

Not long ago I read a learned article on the "Decadence of Robert Schumann." It went on to demonstrate that except for a few pianoforte pieces and a song or two the composer's work was on the high road to oblivion. It was quite impressive for the time being. But I have just heard the "Spring" symphony, and the learned writer's argument has gone for naught, in one case at least. Beauty like that is not born to die.

WILDER D. QUINT.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCT. 15, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY.

In fulfilment of the announcement on the last Programme Book of the season 1898-1899, the first concert of the nineteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last evening.

The favorite Meistersinger overture played with spirit, set the key for a most enjoyable music-hour. A concerto for pianoforte, by the Russian composer Arewsky, (its first performance here) followed, and was interpreted by Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman, who appeared with success at Steinert Hall, last season, and by her rendering of the concerto showed ability worthy the larger stage. Her playing was without affectation and she entered into the spirit of the work with sympathetic insight. As to her technique, it was equal to all demands made upon it, and her trills, octaves and scales were delightful to hear. The work itself on a single hearing, was most interesting, and a valuable addition to pianoforte concertos. The piano part is never lost in the excess of orchestration, and seems the vital and moving part of the work.

The Italian Capriccio by Tschaikowsky was well chosen for the third selection; its composer, although Russian, was thoroughly in harmony with the animation and vivacity of the warm Italian nature.

Schumann's Symphony, No. 1, written when the composer was in the spring-tide of his hardly-earned happiness, and called by him the Spring Symphony, and in a letter to a friend he said "My Symphony was born in an hour of ecstasy," was the fourth selection.

Ehlert rhapsodically says, "It is imbued with the fragrant breath of a young pine grove, amid which the sun plays at hide and seek. It embodies as much of a joyful, bridal air, as though Schumann were celebrating his symphonic honeymoon. All its thoughts are aspirations."

This Symphony is so well known that any extended analysis is unnecessary.

Mr. Gericke gave it the clear, musicianly reading with which he has made us familiar, and the orchestra showed itself as sensitive to his direction, as though no summer rest had intervened since the last concert.

Next week's programme includes: Goldmark Overture zum "Gefesselten Prometheus" des Aeschylos; Lalo, Concerto for Violincello in D; Bach, Ciaconna, orchestrated by J. Raff; Glazonnon, Symphony in C minor. No. 6 (first time.)

BOSTON SATURDAY EVENING

Gazette

Oct ESTABLISHED 1813. 14

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT

The first public rehearsal of the Symphony Orchestra was given in Music Hall on Friday afternoon. The programme was:

Overture, Die Meistersinzer, Wagner
Concerts for pianoforte No. 1 (first time) Arensky
Italian Caprice, Tschailkowsky
Symphony No. 1, Schumann
Soloist: Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman

The first concert of the Symphony Orchestra is always an event in musical Boston ,and it aroused the enthusiasm that is generally latent during the rest of the season. The greeting given to Mr. Gericke was most cordial, and at the fitting time the orchestra came in for its share of the all pervading enthusiasm. The soloist is not unknown to a Boston audience, she appeared here last year, and on the present occasion intensified the good impresion then made. On the side of technique there is little but praise to be accorded; the artist has well and carefully educated fingers and she uses them with skill and discretion. On the interpretative side it is more difficult to give an opinion, for the work performed does not call into action the higher artistic qualities of the player. It is a piece in which the Chopin elements dominate, without the Chopin outflow of melody and spontaneity of ideas. Miss Heyman conquered its difficulties with ease, and she demonstrated such meaning as it has with fine intelligence and with most excellent artistic taste. She has the musical temperament and reason why she should not, in the near from the evidence given there is no future, reach a place beside the most distinguished pianists of her sex. Of the work of Mr. Gericke and his orchestra it is needless to speak; it is sufficient to state that both were at their best. The soloist made a most favorable impression on her audience and she wa recalled many times in answer to the enthusiastic demand.

The programme for the second concert is:

Goldmark, Overture zum "Gefesselten Prometheus" des Aeschylos; Lalo, Concerto for Violoncello in D; Bach, Giaconna, Orchestrated by J. Raff; Glazounow, Symphony in C minor, No. 6, (first time.); Soloist, Miss Elsa Ruegger.

Boston Symphony Season.

The sale of season tickets for the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts will begin tomorrow morning at Albert's ticket office. The season will consist, as usually, of five concerts, and be given on Tuesdays, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 20. Conductor Wilhelm Gericke has been retained, which will make this his seventh year with this famous organization. He will have under his control 87 musicians, with exactly the same artists he had last season. The management so far announces three of their soloists, but is in negotiation with some vocal talent of the highest reputation whose names will be announced shortly.

The soloists engaged up to the present time are as follows: Mark Hambourg, a noted Russian pianist, who created a sensation as a boy prodigy. He studied with Leschetizky, in Vienna, for three years, and when he returned before a critical audience of the same city he astonished the public with a rare technique and marvelous command of expression.

The second soloist is Miss Leonora Jackson, a young violinist born in Boston. In 1896 she won the Mendelssohn State prize at Berlin, where she was a pupil of Professor Joachin. A year later she made her debut with a philharmonic orchestra in Berlin, and has since played in public with remarkable success.

Ernst Dohnanyi, another of the soloists, is a young Hungarian pianist who has been specially engaged with this famous orchestra for all their series of concerts in Boston, Philadelphia, Brooklyn and Baltimore. Programme books, with descriptive notes on the works to be performed, will be mailed in advance of each concert to purchasers of season tickets.

Tickets for the Symphony.

The sale of season tickets for the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, to be given at Music Hall, began yesterday morning at nine o'clock at Albert's, 15 North Charles street. An arrangement had been made by which former subscribers could secure their tickets by writing in advance. This simplified matters very considerably, and was very satisfactory to all concerned. The rush was avoided, and it was not necessary to endure the discomfort of standing in line for hours before the ticket office opened. The gentleman in charge of the ticket desk was kept busy, however, and a large number of seats were sold. From present indications, the sale of tickets will be equally as great as last year.

[26]

EVERY SEAT FOR THE 1ST SERIES OF FIVE CONCERTS BY THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA IS SOLD FOR THE SEASON. THE SALE OF SEASON TICKETS FOR THE 2D SERIES OPENS NEXT MONDAY MORNING AT 8 O'CLOCK, AT 1103 CHESTNUT ST.

Sun Oct 14 '99
15 lines

Boston Symphony Concerts.

The initial concert of the fifteenth season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be given at Music Hall on the evening of Tuesday, November 7. The membership of the orchestra, with a few exceptions, is the same as last season, and these exceptions will rather augment than detract from its strength. Conductor Wilhelm Gericke continues at the head of the organization, and this is to the public an assurance of the acceptability of the programs which have been arranged, as well as of the character and ability of the soloists who have been engaged. The sale of season tickets will begin next Monday.

Boston Symphony's Novelties.

The dates of the concerts this season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra will be on Tuesday evenings, as follows: November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 20. Mr. Wilhelm Gericke will again conduct the orchestra, with exactly the same personnel as last year. The following are among the soloists engaged: Leonora Jackson, a young violinist, born in Boston; Ernst von Dohnanyi, the young Hungarian pianist and composer, who has been specially engaged to come to America to play with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in various cities; Mark Hamburg, a native of Russia, where he was born in 1879. He is the pianist who first appeared as the boy prodigy; later, after having studied with Leschetizsy, he appeared in public equipped with a splendid technique and rare command of expression. Vocalists of high reputation will be added to the list of soloists, and will be announced shortly. The sale of season tickets begins tomorrow morning at Albert's ticket office.

Among the new things the orchestra promises this season here or elsewhere will be symphonies by Glazounoff (No. 6), Tschaikowsky (No. 3), Bruckner, Wilhelm Berger and Weingartner; Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody," Dvorak's "Heldenlied," Franck's "Les Eolides," D'Indy's "Medei," Rontgen's "Norwegische Ballade," Symphonique Dances by Grieg, a new composition by Horatio Parker, and overtures by Siegfried Wagner, Chadwick, Goldmark and Dresicke. Of Beethoven's symphonies the Second, Sixth, Seventh, Eighth and Ninth will probably be played; of Schumann's, the First and Fourth; of Brahm's, the First and Fourth, and two by Mozart and two by Haydn, and Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet."

Oct BOSTON POST, 21
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

MUSIC HALL PLANS.

New York Report Says H. W. Savage Will Build New Theatre.

Rumor comes from New York that this city is to have another theatre, and the spot designated is the site of the present Music Hall. The same report also connects with the enterprise the name of Henry W. Savage, the well-known real estate man of this city, but who for the past few seasons has been more famous as an operatic impresario. As is well known, the old Music Hall is to be torn down the coming spring or summer. It will remain as it is until the close of the Symphony concerts, but whether or no it will be left untouched until the "Pops" have been given, even the present lessees cannot state.

Various schemes as to the disposition of the property in the autumn of 1900 have been agitated, but now comes the rumor above referred to, that it may be turned into a theatre for operatic purposes. Henry W. Savage became interested in the theatrical profession through his association with the Castle Square property.

Mr. Savage is a prominent member of the syndicate which now owns the Music Hall property. In fact, in some quarters it is said that he practically controls the place, and it is this which may have given rise to the story of an establishment of an operatic theatre in Boston.

The well-known musical tastes of the people of this city and the fact that such an organization was successful here when it was far less talented than the one Mr. Savage is now conducting, would point to a desire on the part of this gentleman to invade his home and demonstrate what can be done with grand opera at popular prices.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESI , OCTOBER 18, 1899.

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony seems to be the watchword for the musical season's opening, and conversations easily turn from golf, seaside, mountains, &c., to new soloists, new symphonies, new chamber music, and all the light and the serious talk that one hears while listening to people talk about "the musical season," and all that goes with it.

There is an atmosphere of sincerity about it, too, that makes it worth while listening to what is being said, even if one in no way agrees with the ideas advanced. There are promises of innumerable concerts both by foreign and local talent, and whatever may be presented it is certain that nothing can or will attract such audiences as the Boston Symphony. The seats for the afternoon rehearsals are practically sold out, and the night concerts are just about as liberally patronized. It is a fact that never in the history of the Boston Symphony has the sale of seats been so enormous.

* * *

It was a gracious thing, and altogether a thing to be appreciated, that the soloist for the opening concert was an American young girl, who, having been remembered from a successful piano recital given in March, was presented to the Boston music lovers as pianist with this superb organization. And very ably did Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman discharge the difficult duty of being the first soloist of the season. Miss Heyman was not only an instantaneous success, but the cordial reception accorded her in the afternoon by night expanded into an enthusiastic appreciation of her charming attainments, and perhaps not less of her modest and refined personality.

* * *

The concerts of Friday afternoon, October 13, and Saturday night, October 14, were the first of the nineteenth season, and this is to be the last season in the present Music Hall, which holds so many dear and sacred memories to the residents of this city, and to the musicians who have seen hopes flourish and hopes die within these four walls. There will always linger memories of those who lived the idol of the hour and passed on to make a path for whom? Some were kindly claimed to drink of that darker cup, and others have lived to know who their successors were, and to tell and re-tell to those who have learned by heart the oft-repeated story of "When I played—or sang—in Music Hall" —but the stride of civilization is rapid and iconoclastic.

Faneuil Hall, at whose name the country once trembled with emotion, is Faneuil Hall still, but it is the market place. The Boston Library on Boylston street has been razed to the ground to become a great modern theatre. What will hear the echoes of the musical glories of the past after the close of the nineteenth season of the Boston Symphony in Music Hall?

[The Boston Music Hall property has been purchased by Henry Savage, manager of the Castle Square Opera Company in this city.—EDS. MUSICAL COURIER.]

The first program was as follows:

Prelude to The Master Singers of Nuremberg	Wagner
Concerto for piano, in F minor, op. 2 (First time in Boston.)	Arensky
Capriccio Italien, op. 45	Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, op. 38	Schumann

The second number served to present a novelty as to composition and pianist, Katherine Ruth Heyman, of New York.

The composition was certainly not ineffective, but it was one of the many and well-known which please the public and fail to satisfy the critics and the musical ascetics. It is very certain that if Chopin had not lived this concerto would not have been written in this style. There is nothing characteristic of its nationality until the finale, when it becomes unmistakably Russian.

It is numbered op. 2, which reinforces me in the belief that when so important a work as a piano concerto is only op. 2 it ought never to be published. Miss Heyman's attainments as an artist, however, is another matter, she having played with poise and dignity to such an extent as to entitle her to this much abused appellation. There were many places where she refrained from dropping into an oversentimentality that would have made the composition an impossibility in the realm of art, yet she was delicately poetic and æsthetic throughout. Miss Heyman is well equipped technically, and, although frail to look upon, her bravura octaves were anything but in keeping with her physique. She evoked a storm of applause from critical Boston. The other two numbers are too well known to require any comment further than the fact that they were admirably presented.

Next Friday and Saturday the soloist will be Elsa Ruegger, who will play Lalo's concerto for violoncello in D.

* * *

Katherine Ruth Heyman will give a piano recital in Boston within six weeks or thereabouts.

The Boston Symphony will be heard in Providence, R. I., Wednesday evenings, at Infantry Hall, October 25, November 15, December 20, January 31, March 7, March 28, April 11, April 25.

Baltimore, Md., Tuesday evenings, at Music Hall, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20, March 20.

Philadelphia, Pa., two series, at Academy of Music. First series, Monday evenings, November 6, December 11, January 15, February 19, March 19. Second series—Saturday evening, November 11; Friday evening, December 15; Friday evening, January 19; Saturday evening, February 24; Friday evening, March 23.

New York, see THE MUSICAL COURIER of last week.

Brooklyn, Academy of Music, five concerts; Friday evening, November 10; Saturday evening, December 16; Saturday evening, January 20; Friday evening, February 23; Saturday evening, March 24.

These are to be evening concerts only, as conditions existing in Brooklyn did not warrant the management in presenting the afternoon rehearsals as heretofore.

Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evenings, at Sanders' Hall, October 19, November 2, November 23, December 7, December 28, January 11, January 25, February 8, March 1, March 15.

Soloists to appear at these concerts are Sembrich, Ternina, Hambourg, Leonora Jackson, Clara Butt, Elsa Ruegger, Kneisel, Adamowski, Marian Titus, Adele Aus der Ohe, Antoinette Szumowska, Ernest Dohnanyi, George

---

Fred Comée is managing a series of ten chamber concerts, under the patronage of Harvard University, to be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Mass.

Tuesdays evenings, October 24, November 21, December 5, January 9, January 30, February 13, February 27, March 13, April 3 and April 24, at 7:45 P. M. These concerts are partly illustrative of a course of lectures given to students by Prof. John K. Paine, on the "History of Music."

Sale of seats will begin Saturday morning, October 21, at 8 o'clock. A limited number of seats have been reserved for officers of the university, the students who take the course, and invited guests.

List of performers include the Kneisel Quartet (at nine concerts), the Adamowski Quartet; solo pianists, Szumowska, Lotta Mills, Hopekirk, Burmeister, Perabo and Gebhardt, and soloists from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Monday, October 9, at Trinity, the wedding of Henry L. Higginson's son, Alexander Henry Higginson, to Miss Rosamond Tudor, was the occasion of the most elaborate wedding music ever known in this country. It was furnished as a surprise and compliment by Wm. Gericke and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and those who heard it in the great, magnificent church say that such effects never have been heard anywhere. The selections were from "Lohengrin," the hackneyed bridal song not being of the number, and a wedding march composed by Frederic S. Converse, the bride's brother-in-law. Those of the orchestra present as invited guests were: C. A. Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. Fred R. Comée, Mr. and Mrs. Kneisel, Mr. and Mrs. Gericke, Mr. and Mrs. Adamowski, Mr. and Mrs. Svecenski, Mr. and Mrs. Schroeder, Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Roth.

* * *

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1899

NEW MUSIC HALL IS RISING

Day by Day the Building Gains in Construction—Delay in Securing Steel Retards the Work

Work on the new Music Hall at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues is progressing rapidly. The stone foundation is finished and the walls on the two sides of the big building back from the street and that on the Massachusetts avenue side are already up to the first gallery. The structural steel is being set and the floors, posts and other interior construction are in hand. Over all stand the staging and the skeleton framework complete.

In laying the stone foundation, excavation nineteen feet below the level of the sidewalk was necessary. When the old bed was finally reached, solid concrete five feet in depth was laid and on this was built five more solid feet of granite. To overcome the tidewater while the excavating was in progress, steam pumps were kept constantly at work and these were in use until the concrete flooring was laid. The walls of the cellar are now finished. They were built of pressed brick and on their outer side two heavy coats of pitch were laid to prevent moisture from entering.

The work on the walls above ground and on the steel structure generally would be much further advanced if the rolling mills were able to furnish the necessary steel promptly. Every rolling-mill in the country is going full blast with all the force it can handle and yet the demand from all the large cities is so great that few if any contracts made by the steel producers are being filled on time. This general condition has greatly affected the rapidity of the work on the new Music Hall, and the contractors fear that, despite their best efforts, they will be held back on account of it in the near future. The occasional visitor to the Back Bay district, however, cannot but be impressed by the rapid strides being made in the construction.

By the end of the week the brick walls all around the building will be up as high as the first gallery and much of the structural steel work will be set. Some eighty-five men—carpenters, brick-masons, laborers, stone-masons, etc.—are employed by the contractors. An instance of the desire of the Music Hall corporation to make the new site perfect in every respect came up yesterday. An electric trolley pole stands directly in front of what will be the Massachusetts avenue entrance to the building. H. L. Higginson, the corporation's president, had his attention called to this fact and, acting immediately on the suggestion offered him, he petitioned the Elevated Railway Company to have it removed. The petition was rushed through the hands of the various officials until it came to the division chief, who at once issued orders to have the objectionable pole removed.

The first of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. A large and appreciative audience was present and liberally applauded the various numbers. The concert opened with Wagner's vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger," which was not so well received as some of the other numbers. The most appreciated number on the entire programme was the "Capriccio Italien," by Tchaikovsky. Miss Gertrude May Stein was the soloist.

[illegible]

MISS RUEGGER'S SUCCESS.

It is not often that our concert stage is graced by a woman cellist, but the audiences at the Symphony last week had excellent reason to feel that in Miss Elsa Ruegger, the violoncello has an unaffected, rarely skilful and singularly sympathetic interpreter. She was heard in Lalo's concerto in D minor, announced on the program as given for the first time in this city. At the outset an unusual command of the possibilities of the cello was made manifest. A delightful and delicately managed "singing tone" was perhaps chief among the characteristics of Miss Ruegger's playing. Her marked technical skill, evidenced particularly in the closing movement of the concerto, commanded admiration, all the more because it was made manifest without the slightest apparent effort. As might reasonably have been expected from symphony players, the accompaniment given by the orchestra to the soloist proved delightful—never over emphasized, nor obtruded upon attention, but, under director Gericke's guiding baton, aiding and supplementing the effect of Miss Ruegger's remarkable solo performance. She was thrice recalled by the rehearsal assemblage, in whose plaudits the musicians joined heartily, as such an artist might well have been.

There was a symphony, too, given for the first time in Boston—Glazounoff's No. 6 in C minor. Being the work of a subject of the czar, there are Russian themes in it, "worked up" and wrought up with true Slav impetuosity and verve. True, there is a little more strenuousness in gaining some effects than seems quite necessary to a non-Russian audience, but abundant demonstration is given of a strong and strongly talented musical individuality, who is not in the least conventional. The symphony gives proof of delicate skill at more than one point—notably in the handling of theme variations in the second movement. A fugato and a notturno are remarkable illustrations of Glazounoff's characteristic ability in gaining unhackneyed and unexpected effects. Obviously he thoroughly understands an orchestra, even if he does sometimes make rather heavy drafts in this symphony upon the skill and endurance of its members.

Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture and Bach's chaconne in D minor, orchestrated by Joachim Raff, served to complete Mr Gericke's second program. Each was given to fine effect, and each added to his audience's enjoyment.

Miss Clara Butt will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this week. She is announced to contribute two arias. The orchestra's offerings, besides Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" for a first hearing, include Mendelssohn's "Melusine" overture and Mozart's symphony in G minor, which has not been heard as yet at the symphony concerts.

—Music hall has been filled with very large audiences for the first two rehearsals of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, unusually so for the beginning of the season, when many of its patrons still linger in the country and by the sea. The crush was enormous at the first performance a week ago, as the day was glorious, and not only was the orchestra in its best form, with Mr Gericke as leader, but it was also the first time when friends who had been separated for months met, exchanging pleasant greetings and making a social affair of the occasion. In the large audience, many of the season ticket holders having the same seats they occupied last year, were Mr and Mrs Theodore Dwight, Miss Charlotte Dana, Mrs James H. Beal, Miss Beal, the Misses Davis of Brookline, Mr Edward Holmes, Mrs Seth Sprague, Mrs Thomas E. Chickering, Mrs Gordon Prince, Miss Brewer, Mrs Albert Forbes Conant, Dr W. Sturgis Bigelow, Mr James P. Stearns, Mrs Oliver W. Mink, Mr and Mrs Eliot W. Pratt, Mrs John Bachelder, Mr J. Foster White, Mr S. Lothrop Thorndike, Mr Charles Gardner, Mrs William Hooper and Mr and Mrs Franz Zerrahn.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 22, 1899.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT

A new lady soloist and two new compositions, one of them, a symphony, were the special features of the second of this season's Symphonies last night.

To speak first of the soloist, Miss Elsa Ruegger, it may be said that she made a most excellent impression. Her instrument, the 'cello, yields easily to her touch, and her method of execution is both graceful and pleasing. Her concerto in D minor by Edouard Lalo, while distinctly a show piece, is full of charming melody and delicate phrases. Miss Ruegger apparently met all the demands of the solo instrument, and displayed both a broadness and firmness which easily convinced her audience of the possession of masterly ability. The 'cello is, for some reason, not an instrument to which women musicians take quickly, but in the present case it was a constant pleasure to listen to the lady. At the close of her brilliant performance she was warmly applauded.

The Glazownoff symphony, No. 6 in C minor, played here for the first time, is in four movements, in each of which the wood instruments and horns figure prominently. The final part of the first movement is strong and dramatic. The second movement consists of a set of variations on a simple theme, and is an exquisite bit of harmony. The third is a sort of intermezzo, and the fourth savors strongly of the Russian dances. The symphony is full of pleasing variations of a melodic character, and was charmingly played throughout.

The other two numbers on the programme were Goldmark's overture to "Prometheus Bound" and the Bach chaconne in D minor.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESI ', OCTOBER 18, 1899.

THE first concert of the Boston Symphony seems to be the watchword for the musical season's opening, and conversations easily turn from golf, seaside, mountains, &c., to new soloists, new symphonies, new chamber music, and all the light and the serious talk that one hears while listening to people talk about "the musical season," and all that goes with it.

There is an atmosphere of sincerity about it, too, that makes it worth while listening to what is being said, even if one in no way agrees with the ideas advanced. There are promises of innumerable concerts both by foreign and local talent, and whatever may be presented it is certain that nothing can or will attract such audiences as the Boston Symphony. The seats for the afternoon rehearsals are practically sold out, and the night concerts are just about as liberally patronized. It is a fact that never in the history of the Boston Symphony has the sale of seats been so enormous.

* * *

It was a gracious thing, and altogether a thing to be appreciated, that the soloist for the opening concert was an American young girl, who, having been remembered from a successful piano recital given in March, was presented to the Boston music lovers as pianist with this superb organization. And very ably did Miss Katherine Ruth Heyman discharge the difficult duty of being the first soloist of the season. Miss Heyman was not only an instantaneous success, but the cordial reception accorded her in the afternoon by night expanded into an enthusiastic appreciation of her charming attainments, and perhaps not less of her modest and refined personality.

* * *

The concerts of Friday afternoon, October 13, and Saturday night, October 14, were the first of the nineteenth season, and this is to be the last season in the present Music Hall, which holds so many dear and sacred memories to the residents of this city, and to the musicians who have seen hopes flourish and hopes die within these four walls. There will always linger memories of those who lived the idol of the hour and passed on to make a path for whom? Some were kindly claimed to drink of that darker cup, and others have lived to know who their successors were, and to tell and re-tell to those who have learned by heart the oft-repeated story of "When I played—or sang—in Music Hall"—but the stride of civilization is rapid and iconoclastic.

Faneuil Hall, at whose name the country once trembled with emotion, is Faneuil Hall still, but it is the market place. The Boston Library on Boylston street has been razed to the ground to become a great modern theatre. What will hear the echoes of the musical glories of the past after the close of the nineteenth season of the Boston Symphony in Music Hall?

[The Boston Music Hall property has been purchased by Henry Savage, manager of the Castle Square Opera Company in this city.—EDS. MUSICAL COURIER.]

The first program was as follows:

Prelude to The Master Singers of Nuremberg................Wagner
Concerto for piano, in F minor, op. 2........................Arensky
(First time in Boston.)
Capriccio Italien, op. 45..................................Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, op. 38..................Schumann

The second number served to present a novelty as to composition and pianist, Katherine Ruth Heyman, of New York.

The composition was certainly not ineffective, but it was one of the many and well-known which please the public and fail to satisfy the critics and the musical ascetics. It is very certain that if Chopin had not lived this concerto would not have been written in this style. There is nothing characteristic of its nationality until the finale, when it becomes unmistakably Russian.

It is numbered op. 2, which reinforces me in the belief that when so important a work as a piano concerto is only op. 2 it ought never to be published. Miss Heyman's attainments as an artist, however, is another matter, she having played with poise and dignity to such an extent as to entitle her to this much abused appellation. There were many places where she refrained from dropping into an oversentimentality that would have made the composition an impossibility in the realm of art, yet she was delicately poetic and æsthetic throughout. Miss Heyman is well equipped technically, and, although frail to look upon, her bravura octaves were anything but in keeping with her physique. She evoked a storm of applause from critical Boston. The other two numbers are too well known to require any comment further than the fact that they were admirably presented.

Next Friday and Saturday the soloist will be Elsa Ruegger, who will play Lalo's concerto for violoncello in D.

* * *

Katherine Ruth Heyman will give a piano recital in Boston within six weeks or thereabouts.

The Boston Symphony will be heard in Providence, R. I., Wednesday evenings, at Infantry Hall, October 25, November 15, December 20, January 31, March 7, March 28, April 11, April 25.

Baltimore, Md., Tuesday evenings, at Music Hall, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20, March 20.

Philadelphia, Pa., two series, at Academy of Music. First series, Monday evenings, November 6, December 11, January 15, February 19, March 19. Second series—Saturday evening, November 11; Friday evening, December 15; Friday evening, January 19; Saturday evening, February 24; Friday evening, March 23.

New York, see THE MUSICAL COURIER of last week.

Brooklyn, Academy of Music, five concerts, Friday evening, November 10; Saturday evening, December 16; Saturday evening, January 20; Friday evening, February 23; Saturday evening, March 24.

These are to be evening concerts only, as conditions existing in Brooklyn did not warrant the management in presenting the afternoon rehearsals as heretofore.

Cambridge, Mass., Thursday evenings, at Sanders' Hall, October 19, November 2, November 23, December 7, December 28, January 11, January 25, February 8, March 1, March 15.

Soloists to appear at these concerts are Sembrich, Ternina, Hambourg, Leonora Jackson, Clara Butt, Elsa Ruegger, Kneisel, Adamowski, Marian Titus, Adele Aus der Ohe, Antoinette Szumowska, Ernest Dohnanyi, George

---

Fred Comée is managing a series of ten chamber concerts, under the patronage of Harvard University, to be given in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, Mass.

Tuesdays evenings, October 24, November 21, December 5, January 9, January 30, February 13, February 27, March 13, April 3 and April 24, at 7:45 P. M. These concerts are partly illustrative of a course of lectures given to students by Prof. John K. Paine, on the "History of Music."

Sale of seats will begin Saturday morning, October 21, at 8 o'clock. A limited number of seats have been reserved for officers of the university, the students who take the course, and invited guests.

List of performers include the Kneisel Quartet (at nine concerts), the Adamowski Quartet; solo pianists, Szumowska, Lotta Mills, Hopekirk, Burmeister, Perabo and Gebhardt, and soloists from the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

* * *

Monday, October 9, at Trinity, the wedding of Henry L. Higginson's son, Alexander Henry Higginson, to Miss Rosamond Tudor, was the occasion of the most elaborate wedding music ever known in this country. It was furnished as a surprise and compliment by Wm. Gericke and the Boston Symphony Orchestra, and those who heard it in the great, magnificent church say that such effects never have been heard anywhere. The selections were from "Lohengrin," the hackneyed bridal song not being of the number, and a wedding march composed by Frederic S. Converse, the bride's brother-in-law. Those of the orchestra present as invited guests were: C. A. Ellis, Mr. and Mrs. Fred R. Comée, Mr. and Mrs. Kneisel, Mr. and Mrs. Gericke, Mr. and Mrs. Adamowski, Mr. and Mrs. Svecenski, Mr. and Mrs. Schroeder, Mr. Loeffler and Mr. Roth.

* * *

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, OCTOBER 20, 1899

NEW MUSIC HALL IS RISING

Day by Day the Building Gains in Construction—Delay in Securing Steel Retards the Work

Work on the new Music Hall at the corner of Huntington and Massachusetts avenues is progressing rapidly. The stone foundation is finished and the walls on the two sides of the big building back from the street and that on the Massachusetts avenue side are already up to the first gallery. The structural steel is being set and the floors, posts and other interior construction are in hand. Over all stand the staging and the skeleton framework complete.

In laying the stone foundation, excavation nineteen feet below the level of the sidewalk was necessary. When the old bed was finally reached, solid concrete five feet in depth was laid and on this was built five more solid feet of granite. To overcome the tidewater while the excavating was in progress, steam pumps were kept constantly at work and these were in use until the concrete flooring was laid. The walls of the cellar are now finished. They were built of pressed brick and on their outer side two heavy coats of pitch were laid to prevent moisture from entering.

The work on the walls above ground and on the steel structure generally would be much further advanced if the rolling mills were able to furnish the necessary steel promptly. Every rolling-mill in the country is going full blast with all the force it can handle and yet the demand from all the large cities is so great that few if any contracts made by the steel producers are being filled on time. This general condition has greatly affected the rapidity of the work on the new Music Hall, and the contractors fear that, despite their best efforts, they will be held back on account of it in the near future. The occasional visitor to the Back Bay district, however, cannot but be impressed by the rapid strides being made in the construction.

By the end of the week the brick walls all around the building will be up as high as the first gallery and much of the structural steel work will be set. Some eighty-five men—carpenters, brick-masons, laborers, stone-masons, etc.—are employed by the contractors. An instance of the desire of the Music Hall corporation to make the new site perfect in every respect came up yesterday. An electric trolley pole stands directly in front of what will be the Massachusetts avenue entrance to the building. H. L. Higginson, the corporation's president, had his attention called to this fact and, acting immediately on the suggestion offered him, he petitioned the Elevated Railway Company to have it removed. The petition was rushed through the hands of the various officials until it came to the division chief, who at once issued orders to have the objectionable pole removed.

The first of the series of concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge. A large and appreciative audience was present and liberally applauded the various numbers. The concert opened with Wagner's vorspiel to "Die Meistersinger," which was not so well received as some of the other numbers. The most appreciated number on the entire programme was the "Capriccio Italien," by Tchaikovsky. Miss Gertrude May Stein was the soloist.

Boston Sunday G

SUNDAY, OCT. 22, 1899

MISS RUEGGER'S SUCCESS

It is not often that our concert stage is graced by a woman cellist, but the audiences at the Symphony last week had excellent reason to feel that in Miss Elsa Ruegger, the violoncello has an unaffected, rarely skilful and singularly sympathetic interpreter. She was heard in Lalo's concerto in D minor, announced on the program as given for the first time in this city. At the outset an unusual command of the possibilities of the cello was made manifest. A delightful and delicately managed "singing tone" was perhaps chief among the characteristics of Miss Ruegger's playing. Her marked technical skill, evidenced particularly in the closing movement of the concerto, commanded admiration, all the more because it was made manifest without the slightest apparent effort. As might reasonably have been expected from symphony players, the accompaniment given by the orchestra to the soloist proved delightful—never over emphasized, nor obtruded upon attention, but, under director Gericke's guiding baton, aiding and supplementing the effect of Miss Ruegger's remarkable solo performance. She was thrice recalled by the rehearsal assemblage, in whose plaudits the musicians joined heartily, as such an artist might well have been.

There was a symphony, too, given for the first time in Boston—Glazounoff's No. 6 in C minor. Being the work of a subject of the czar, there are Russian themes in it, "worked up" and wrought up with true Slav impetuosity and verve. True, there is a little more strenuousness in gaining some effects than seems quite necessary to a non-Russian audience, but abundant demonstration is given of a strong and strongly talented musical individuality, who is not in the least conventional. The symphony gives proof of delicate skill at more than one point—notably in the handling of theme variations in the second movement. A fugato and a notturno are remarkable illustrations of Glazounoff's characteristic ability in gaining unhackneyed and unexpected effects. Obviously he thoroughly understands an orchestra, even if he does sometimes make rather heavy drafts in this symphony upon the skill and endurance of its members.

Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture and Bach's chaconne in D minor, orchestrated by Joachim Raff, served to complete Mr Gericke's second program. Each was given to fine effect, and each added to his audience's enjoyment.

Miss Clara Butt will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this week. She is announced to contribute two arias. The orchestra's offerings, besides Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" for a first hearing, include Mendelssohn's "Melusine" overture and Mozart's symphony in G minor, which has not been heard as yet at the symphony concerts.

——Music hall has been filled with very large audiences for the first two rehearsals of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, unusually so for the beginning of the season, when many of its patrons still linger in the country and by the sea. The crush was enormous at the first performance a week ago, as the day was glorious, and not only was the orchestra in its best form, with Mr Gericke as leader, but it was also the first time when friends who had been separated for months met, exchanging pleasant greetings and making a social affair of the occasion. In the large audience, many of the season ticket holders having the same seats they occupied last year, were Mr and Mrs Theodore Dwight, Miss Charlotte Dana, Mrs James H. Beal, Miss Beal, the Misses Davis of Brookline, Mr Edward Holmes, Mrs Seth Sprague, Mrs Thomas E. Chickering, Mrs Gordon Prince, Miss Brewer, Mrs Albert Forbes Conant, Dr W. Sturgis Bigelow, Mr James P. Stearns, Mrs Oliver W. Mink, Mr and Mrs Eliot W. Pratt, Mrs John Bachelder, Mr J. Foster White, Mr S. Lothrop Thorndike, Mr Charles Gardner, Mrs William Hooper and Mr and Mrs Franz Zerrahn.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, OCTOBER 22, 1899.

SECOND SYMPHONY CONCERT

A new lady soloist and two new compositions, one of them, a symphony, were the special features of the second of this season's Symphonies last night.

To speak first of the soloist, Miss Elsa Ruegger, it may be said that she made a most excellent impression. Her instrument, the 'cello, yields easily to her touch, and her method of execution is both graceful and pleasing. Her concerto in D minor by Edouard Lalo, while distinctly a show piece, is full of charming melody and delicate phrases. Miss Ruegger apparently met all the demands of the solo instrument, and displayed both a broadness and firmness which easily convinced her audience of the possession of masterly ability. The 'cello is, for some reason, not an instrument to which women musicians take quickly, but in the present case it was a constant pleasure to listen to the lady. At the close of her brilliant performance she was warmly applauded.

The Glazownoff symphony, No. 6 in C minor, played here for the first time, is in four movements, in each of which the wood instruments and horns figure prominently. The final part of the first movement is strong and dramatic. The second movement consists of a set of variations on a simple theme, and is an exquisite bit of harmony. The third is a sort of intermezzo, and the fourth savors strongly of the Russian dances. The symphony is full of pleasing variations of a melodic character, and was charmingly played throughout.

The other two numbers on the programme were Goldmark's overture to "Prometheus Bound" and the Bach chaconne in D minor.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1899.

ELSA RUEGGER.

First Appearance of This 'Cellist in Boston.

A Player of True and Delightful Talent.

A New Symphony by Alexander Glazounoff.

The program of the second Symphony concert last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "Prometheus Bound"....Goldmark
Concerto for 'cello in D minor............Lalo
Chaconne in D minor................Bach-Raff
Symphony No. 6, in C minor, op. 58..
Glazounoff
(First time in Boston.)

Miss Elsa Ruegger, the 'cellist, who appeared last night for the first time in America, was born at Lucerne, Switzerland, Dec. 6, 1881. She studied with Jacobs of the Brussels Conservatory; she played in a charity concert when she was 11 years old, and when she was 13 she made a concert tour. She was awarded in June, 1896, the first 'cello prize of the Brussels Conservatory "with the highest distinction." Since then she has played in the chief cities of Europe.

The concerto which she chose was first played at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris Dec. 9, 1877, when Lalo, the composer, was 54 years old. The player was Adolph Fischer, the Belgian, who died eight years ago in a madhouse. He played the concerto in several cities of Europe in 1878. It is my impression that Mr. Hekking played it while he was in this country, but it had not been heard in Boston before last night.

The work is not one of marked interest, except possibly in the orchestration. The first movement makes pompous announcements that lead to nothing; the themes are dry and labored, and with the exception of the pompous declamation the music is of an austere melancholy that at times is almost sour. The intermezzo is again in melancholy vein, with the exception of a piquant village dance. The finale, in spite of its rhythmic effects and skillful workmanship, is of little real musical interest. Lalo was a man of indisputable ability and noble ambition; but this concerto is below the standard of his orchestral and chamber music. I admit the extreme difficulty of writing a great concerto for the 'cello, an instrument which soon fatigues the ear; for the sensuous beauty of cantabile quickly becomes monotonous and bravura excites admiration only as a nimble gymnastic exercise.

Miss Ruegger's reputation is well deserved. Her tone, though it is comparatively small, is eminently agreeable and pure; her technic is sure and well-rounded; she is not over-sentimental in melody; her phrasing is musician-like; and, free from virtuoso trick or affectation, she is respectful to the composer and art.

⁂

Glazounoff has a habit of writing symphonies as well as symphonic poems. The one played last night is about a year and a half old, and it has already excited warm discussion in cities of Germany and in London. As a whole, it is not distinctively Russian, as are the symphonies of Borodine, and the composer thinks in the Western tonality. Perhaps you may detect the Russian in the finale by certain rhythmic and harmonic predilections, and there is always an Oriental love of gorgeous color; but the music is not Cossack. The first movement is thematically weak, thus the second theme is absolutely banal, but the development is full of interest and strength, there is a truly passionate mood, and you are convinced that the man has his own way of saying things, and although you may quarrel with his isolated main thoughts, there is nevertheless the power of cumulative eloquence. The variations are well made, well contrasted, brilliantly orchestrated, and —rare thing—never tedious. The third movement, an intermezzo, pleased me less, and again there was more expression than thought. The finale is rhythmically exciting—for a time; and then the piquancy and surprise of rhythm are dangerously near monotony. The climax, long deferred, hinted at constantly—suffers; it is as though you heard Glazounoff saying to the audience, "Wait a minute; it's coming; it's almost here. Look out! Bang! A-h-h-h! What do you think of that?" Brilliantly played, the symphony certainly made an impression. Whether a second hearing would deepen or lessen this impression is another question.

⁂

Raff in 1872 was made an honorary member of the Philharmonic Society, New York, and his arrangement of Bach's Chaconne was dedicated by him to the society. It was first played, however, under his direction March 20, 1874, at Wiesbaden, and the first performance in America was Dec. 12 of that year at a concert of the Philharmonic, led by Carl Bergmann. Raff believed that many of Bach's works for the violin were originally conceived for combinations of instruments, and he stated that the polyphonic structure of the chaconne clearly indicates that the violin piece as we know it was "only an arrangement." His transcription is a tour de force, ingenious, creditable; but are such transcriptions worth while?

The overture by Goldmark has been highly praised. To me it is long-winded, with episodes that suggest padding, with certain noble passages, with certain harmonic progressions which, while they are strongly Wagnerian, are time painted with the well-known Goldmarkian brush. Take the overture from beginning to end, and it is not characteristic of Goldmark or Aeschylus.

The performance throughout the concert was of a high order of excellence. The program suffered by continuity of thought in the minor, and it was a risky experiment to bring two sets of variations in close proximity.

Philip Hale.

MISS CLARA BUTT will sing for us Saturday at the Symphony concert. The story that she is six feet in height has been industriously circulated by her manager and agents. They have done her injustice; for she is 6 feet 2¼; but whether in her stockings, or in her presumably dainty boots, deponent saith not. And they say that Miss Butt has other qualifications which should command attention.

Now there has been no comment about those extraordinarily high sopranos, Miss Ellen Beach Yaw and Miss Ada Colley. The former, they say, repented of her virtuoso ways and has worked hard to win success as a singer rather than as a phenomenon. But is Miss Colley, the Australian, who now knows Koster and Bial's and frankly confesses that she has had only slight musical training, short, or medium, or a giraffe?

Miss Butt, whose height is the subject of so much press work, is a contralto.

She was born at Southwick, near Brighton, England. Studying under Mr. Rootham at Bristol, she sang in concert in December, 1889. She entered the Royal College of Music, distinguished herself at the concerts of this institution, and shone in opera. She made her début in London with the Royal Choral Society in Sullivan's "Golden Legend," Dec. 7, 1892, and the 10th of the same month she made a sensation by her impersonation of Orpheus in Gluck's opera at the Lyceum Theatre in a performance given by the Royal College of Music. Let me quote the remarks of a critic concerning this appearance:

Miss Butt gave signs of so much talent that her future career may be spoken of as a matter of national, rather than of local, importance.

As this young lady is only just out of her 'teens, and has had, we believe, no histrionic experience, she is not yet, of course, a Giula Ravogli as regards gesture; but apart from quite unnecessary comparisons (in this case they would be more than usually odious), her performance was in all respects remarkable.

July 19, 1893, at the annual meeting of the Corporation of the College, the Prince of Wales in his speech congratulated her, and mentioned the fact that he had not only heard her in "Orpheus," but also at the Queen's Concert and at a private concert given by his daughter. And His Royal Highness allowed that he wished her well.

Miss Butt sang again with the Royal Choral Society Nov. 23, 1893; at the Hanley Festival, Oct. 21, 1893; at the Bristol Festival, Oct. 25, 1893; at the Handel Festival of 1894; and since then in many festivals and concerts. She has studied in Paris with Bouhy and in Berlin with Gerster.

Her latest appearance of importance that I have noticed was Oct. 5, at the Norwich Festival, when she sang songs by Edward Elgar with orchestral accompaniment. These songs were written especially for her and the Festival, and Mr. Blackburn spoke of them and the singer as follows:

I definitely recognize in Mr. Elgar the musician who has the greatest claims of any Englishman of quite his period to serious consideration. He has, first, a wonderful gravity of purpose; he never trifles. So far as I know, all Mr. Elgar's music is distinguished by a most perfect sincerity, a complete responsibility. That in itself would be only a recommendation, not a final tribute to his art. Beyond this solid foundation, however, he has orchestral powers which demand the highest attention. In such a work, for example, as his "Meditation," played yesterday, the orchestra is handled with the facility of a master, and with an instinct for the right placing of musical sound—the purely untechnical phrase must be forgiven for its appropriateness—which together are not far removed from genius. This again is rather a recommendation, though of a more splendid sort, than a final tribute; but added to this, and to an extremely fine technique, it must be acknowledged that Mr. Elgar has an inspiration and a sense of beauty that are among the rare things of art. His sea-pictures are five in number, and they are concerned with the moods of the sea, in its slumberous appeal, in its depths, in its cruelty and in its more human aspect. They are not all equally fine; but the finest, perhaps, "In Haven," is extremely fine. Only those who understand (in Henley's splendid phrase) how all the universe can be "narrowed to the compass of a ring" will see how, in this slight-seeming creation, there is housed so great an artistic emotion. The poet saw in the smallest of flowers just the one shut door which kept him from all the mystery "of this unintelligible world;" so in one short song this exquisite composer houses the even more unintelligible mystery of artistic beauty. The big drama of the last song, "The Swimmer," by Adam Lindsay Gordon, was excellent and moving, but it was less personal, less secretly touching than the one I have already described; and the three remaining songs stand within the lines of merit drawn by these two. The songs were composed for, and were sung by, Miss Clara Butt. I admired this singer extremely a day or two ago, when she gave us the Biblical Songs of Dvorák; but I admired her more last night. Miss Butt has, for a beginning, an emotional temperament which has been steadily, so far as I have observed this great singer, growing with her progress in the paths of her art; and on this occasion she gave a really wonderful utterance of that temperament at its highest point. I have said that Mr. Elgar had been at pains—and at most successful pains—to interpret certain moods of the sea; Miss Butt caught those moods, and with just the right discrimination and power gave them the clothing of her magnificent voice. The result was a sort of vocal tone-picture, which, becoming a perfect part of Mr. Elgar's creation, made to my hearing a unique experience. It was good to hear the raptures of applause which followed the close of each song, and particularly the close of the last.

And somebody sang of Miss Butt as follows:

AN IMPROMPTU.

Norwich: October 5.

She sang of seas: and, as she sang,
  There came along th' heroic note,
The sound of music-winds that clang
  Where seabirds wheel, and curve, and float.

She sang of seas: then saw I clear
  The broad sea spreading to the sky,
Pulsating softly, as the dear
  And tender night came gently by.

She sang of seas: the sun waxed great
  And seemed like sound of brazen bell:
My heart, that voice was like a fate
  Calling the dead from the deep's deep hell.

She sang of seas: Ah, ye who mourn
  With sea-farewells of all regret,
That voice should make you less forlorn,
  Yea, though its message were "Forget."

But you would prefer gossip of a more intimate nature than a dry statistical record of her career, so I add here the report of an interview which, published some time ago in the Pall Mall Gazette, has not been reprinted in this country. It is headed, "From a Bristol Correspondent."

Miss Butt makes an ordinary man feel almost tiny in her presence, for she will not allow the odd quarter of an inch to be deducted from her height, which is 6 feet 2¼ inches—a height she bears so well few would suspect she attained it. I was curious to know at what age she first felt the power and passion of music; but, although as a child she enjoyed singing, she was by no means an infant prodigy. It was not until 14 or 15 that it was discovered she had a rich contralto, and not a soprano, as one early teacher deemed. "When I was told I was to be trained to be a singer I could hardly believe it!" she exclaimed, with a ray of pleasure filling her dark, expressive eyes. Then she told me of her early days, when she sat back in the choir of the Bristol Festival: in the same orchestra I had witnessed her triumph as the famous songstress.

"Ah! but those were pleasant days," she said: "I reveled in the pleasure of them."

"You were very good last night to your audience," I interjected.

"How could one help it, to one's own people?"

All her family are musical. "It would be a marvel if any of my brothers or sisters could not sing; my mother has an excellent voice." The German Emperor was right when he told her he was not afraid of being disappointed; her voice in speaking was enough. It is full of sympathy and rich in tone.

Having but lately come from a course of study abroad, I was anxious to hear her opinion upon the value of foreign study. She is quick at languages, having promptly mastered the pronunciation of French, German and Italian; but somewhat to my surprise she confessed to a preference for French as a singing language, the liquids of that tongue being rather a difficulty with most English singers.

On my venturing to ask her as to the value of a foreign training for young beginners, she replied with much warmth, that "for grounding" she thought "English teaching was good, but music was taken more seriously abroad. There one seemed to breathe music; it was their whole life and passion; their intense love for their art made them less satisfied with mediocrity. In England we were satisfied with a ballad concert and a little light opera, and the different attitude of the audience proved the power with which music swayed a people. In England often people talked; while in other countries if even your chair creaked your neighbors would kill you with a look."

Her rendering of a setting of the words "Abide with me" had proved that in her voice at least she possessed great dramatic force. Small wonder I thought as she produced her rich low notes, an old school teacher had thought it was a boy singing; and her expression ranged through the tender and submissive to the triumphant and passionate, and thence, in the last verse, to the pleading, her lower notes having a powerful, massive intonation that produced a great effect upon the intent audience.

Could this power of voice be added to the art of this actress? And with this thought I asked if she preferred ballad or operatic singing.

"Oh, I love acting! and have sung in 'Orpheo.'" But in spite of her triumphs here and in Europe, the young singer has ambitions and hopes to sing in an opera written for her. Perchance some day Sir Arthur Sullivan might write a "Cleopatra," with the title role for herself; and certainly Miss Butt would personate a magnificent Cleopatra. Her features of a Greek type, broadened out, if one may so venture to describe them, her dark hair and expressive eyes and commanding figure (probably more commanding than was Antony's destroyer) would all give effect to the part; and if Sir Arthur allowed full play to his rich imagination, and gave full scope to Miss Butt's compass, we might have an English Cleopatra that would satisfy the musical world, for miracles are sometimes worked even nowadays.

The program of the Symphony concert Saturday will include Mendelssohn's overture "Melusina," Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" (first time here), Mozart's Symphony in G minor No. 25 (first time at these concerts). Miss Clara Butt, contralto, will sing two arias.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEA
VOL. CVI., NO. 114.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 22, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Second of the Series Brings Out Some Surprises.

Minor in First Selections Makes Subsequent Brightness Attractive—Charming Movements Finely Interpreted—Miss Ruegger Cordially Received.

For the second concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, in Music Hall, last evening, this was the programme:

Overture, "Prometheus Bound".......Goldmark
Concerto for 'cello in D minor...........Lalo
Chaconne in D minor...................Bach
(Scored for orchestra by Raff).
Symphony No. 6 in C minor.........Glazounoff

The soloist was Miss Elsa Ruegger. The concerto and the symphony were new to Boston.

There was an undue prevalence of the minor in the selections, all of them being in that strain, and this imparted overmuch of tonal monotony and sombreness to the general effect of the concert, though it was brightened after the opening of the symphony, the three other movements being in major keys.

The Goldmark overture is a noble work, powerfully impressive in its vigorous dramatic feeling, strong in color and steadily interesting in the rich splendor of its orchestration. Here and there are moments in which the composer seems to have had his "Sakuntala" overture rooted so firmly in his mind that he unconsciously fell into reminiscences of it, now close and now merely suggestive; and, singularly enough, the very opening strain is almost identical with the first bars of the other work. It is, however, conceived and carried out in a larger and loftier spirit, and is on the whole, perhaps, the finest example that Goldmark has given of his powers in a majestically serious vein. The reading and the performance were of uncommon beauty.

The Lalo concerto has no lack of melodiousness and, the second movement, an intermezzo, is full of graceful charm in its appealing opening theme; but, taken altogether, it appears, at least on a first hearing, to be too wanting in contrasting variety of sentiment and constantly elegiac. Its chief interest seems to be more in the orchestration than in the solo part, and it is not wholly free from the charge of dullness. Then, too, it is spun out to an extent that is unfortunate in a composition in which the 'cello is the most prominent feature, for, noble as the instrument is as a vehicle for depth of musical expression, its tones pall and become depressingly monotonous when they are displayed at a length to which they are continued in this concerto.

Miss Ruegger's performance of the solo part showed her to be a young artist of admirable skill. Her tone is not large or firm, but it is pure. Her technique is ample, and she plays with a musician's sincerity of style, and a freedom from affectation and unnecessary display that win esteem for her at once. Elegance, warmth of feeling, intelligence and a leaning toward what is best and worthiest in her art are among the strongly marked qualities that were clearly apparent in all that she did. Her intonation is faultless, her execution without a blur, and her taste wholly refined. A larger tone and a broader vigor would have made her performance more satisfying; but these will probably come to her by and by. As it is, she is an excellent and very interesting artist, and the justly favorable impression she made was convincingly emphasized by the cordial applause and the enthusiastic recalls she received at the end of the concert.

The Glazounoff symphony was something of a surprise as a work by a composer of the modern Russian school. It is singularly free from the characteristic extravagances that we have learned to expect from the young disciples of that school. Not only this, but it is perfectly clear on a first hearing. More, still, its themes are bright, their treatment is without self-conscious eccentricity, and they are fairly melodious. The second movement, a theme and variations, is, perhaps, the most attractive and interesting part of the work; but there is an inspiriting fire in the finale, which is worked up with great skill and immense effect.

Scattered through the symphony profusely are fresh and charming moments of invention, of harmonic devices and of orchestration, especially in the passionate first allegro. The performance was one of splendid brilliancy, the orchestra being heard at its very best.

The arrangement of the Bach chaconne is remarkably ingenious, and shows the large learning and the profound mastery which Raff had over the details of his art; but, after all, the chaconne is better and more effective as it came from the great master's hand, and, wonderfully clever as the transcription undoubtedly is, the spirit of the original evaporates in the treatment to which the work is here subjected, dignified as it may be. The reading by Mr. Gericke and the performance by the orchestra were exquisite. A word of admiration is also due to the beauty of the accompaniment which Mr. Gericke vouchsafed to the 'cello concert.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Melusine," Mendelssohn; "Moorish Rhapsodie," Humperdinck (first time), and symphony in G minor, No. 25, Mozart, which will be given for the first time at these concerts. The soloist is to be the English contralto, Miss Clara Butt, who will contribute two arias to the programme.

Sanders Theatre was filled with a large and brilliant company of subscribers at the first concert for this season by the Symphony orchestra on Thursday night. Miss Gertrude May Stein, the soloist, was received with great heartiness and was obliged to acknowledge many recalls. She was attractive in a shell pink satin gown, with seed pearl embroidery, the low corsage studded with diamonds; a pink and white pompon was worn in her hair. Among the audience we noted Col. and Mrs. Henry L. Higginson, Bishop William Lawrence and family, Prof. John K. Paine, President and Mrs. Charles W. Eliot, Prof. and Mrs. John Fiske, Prof. C. C. Everett and family, Mr. and Mrs. Walter I. Badger, Mr. and Mrs. William M. Richardson, Prof. Barrett Wendell, Dr. and Mrs. William T. Councilman, Miss Elsie Mills, Dr. and Mrs. John G. Blake and Mr. and Mrs. Thomas C. Wales.

ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

[illegible] Paper of the State.

Official Paper of the City.

[illegible] MORNING, OCT. 23, 1899.

Symphony Concert—A Glazounoff Symphony.

In a book catalogue issued in London a few years ago, two works were specified as "Prometheus—unbound," and "Prometheus—bound." The symphonic concert of Saturday began with a musical setting of the latter, and judging by the heavy orchestration, it was bound in full [illegible].

We think Goldmark more equally successful in his overtures than in any other of his instrumental forms, and were therefore not surprised to find some noble climaxes in this mythological theme, but there were also pretty touches, in vivid contrast, which spoke of the gentler vein of the composer of "The Cricket on the Hearth" and of the sensuous style of the writer of "The Queen of Sheba," which seemed out of place in the portrayal of such an aggravated case of liver complaint.

Possibly (this guesswork is the weak point in almost all "programme-music") the brighter music suggests the shooting of the eagle, by Hercules, and the final liberation of the captive. The number was grandly played and deservedly applauded.

More sorrow followed in the shape of a rather tragic violoncello concerto by Lalo. Here the composer seems to consider only the grave side of the instrument and tears his passions to tatters, especially during the first movement.

The slow movement presents a gentler, lace-handkerchief style of grieving, and even ventures upon some lively bits of rusticity, while the constantly recurring figures of the accompaniment are novel in treatment and give a picturesque monotony which is charming.

The finale begins with a melancholy sort of recitative (the work indulges too much in recitative for the solo instrument), but soon bursts into a more vigorous and less plaintive theme. It is not a concerto that attracts on a first hearing, and we doubt its chance of finding more favor by repeated performance.

It served to introduce to our public a very talented young lady violoncellist, Miss Elsa Ruegger, who won a marked success. This means a good deal in a city like Boston, which has always had great violoncellists among its residents. Wulf Fries in the early days, Hekking and Schulz in later times, the born genius of the instrument—Fritz Giese, and at present the thorough artist, Schroeder, all these have caused the Bostonian to become a good connoisseur of performance on this particular instrument.

To win a success here, therefore, means something, and Miss Ruegger may be quite satisfied with her achievement. Her tone is not broad and massive (one feels this defect in some of the C string passages), but it is sympathetic and always true to pitch, while her surety is commendable.

The Bach quarry seems to yield up unsuspected treasures once in a while; Gounod dug into a prelude and exhumed an "Ave Maria;" Raff drilled into a violin solo and blasted out a set of symphonic variations. Raff's orchestral setting of the famous Chaconne in D minor may astonish, but can scarcely compel praise except for its ingenuity; he finds as many strange and unsuspected things in the violin solo as Sheridan found in Lord Burleigh's nod or Ignatius Donnelly in Shakespeare! One may alter the French saying, for this occasion, and exclaim—"C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas Bach!"

This particular Chaconne seems to invite the composers especially; it is not the first time it has been tampered with, and added accompaniments for piano and for orchestra have been made to its measures. It was brilliantly performed and, placing the question of fitness entirely aside, was an interesting number.

After which Mr. Gericke gave us our weekly Russian, this time a fine example of the best music of the north. Perhaps it is unjust to class Glazounoff's sixth symphony, in C minor, as Russian at all; true art is of no nationality, and the fault that we have often charged against many of the young Russians, that they thrust their national condiments too conspicuously into their works, is absent from this excellent symphony. Glazounoff carefully avoids that barbarrerrie which mars many of the recent Muscovite productions; of many of the orchestral productions of this school one can say, with Angelo:

> "This will last out a night in Russia
> When nights are longest there."

But just this prolixity is absent from Glazounoff's work; it is of normal length, clear shape, splendid development, and while giving a great degree of counterpoint makes no ostentatious parade of learning.

It is but natural that we should compare the composer with the great Russian symphonist—Tschaikowsky; Glazounoff does not lose by the juxta-position; he has not the mannerisms of Tschaikowsky (the solemn growls of low-toned wind instruments, for example, are seldom in evidence) and he equals him in thematic development.

Possibly the St. Petersburg critics will condemn the cosmopolitan character of such music, as they did in the case of Tschaikowsky, whom they accused of not being representatively Russian, but to our mind such music reaches a loftier plane than can be obtained by mere local coloring.

There is a little of the influence of Schumann present in the first movement, the incomplete return of themes in development being a favorite touch of the German master, and the splendid treatment and bold syncopation, sharp contrast of themes, are also Schumannesque.

The second movement, in the "Andante con Variazioni" form, is a masterpiece; not a trace of monotony, not a [illegible] of reiteration, noble scoring [illegible] contrasts. The theme itself [illegible] and the first variation [illegible] touches [illegible]

[illegible] the fourth variation was [illegible] contrast that made the number effective. The dainty pipings of the woodwind in the coda of the third and sixth variations were most charmingly bucolic. The impressive treatment of the brasses in the finale made a sufficiently broad climax.

The Intermezzo was unambitious; here the composer has followed Brahms in not giving a complete return of the first form after the Trio, but retaining a double contrast by bringing back the first period as coda. The flute had prominent work here, and did it well. Perhaps the modest prettiness of this movement finds its excuse in the fierce combat of themes and rhythms that is to follow in the finale.

The last movement had more syncopations than the great syncopationist—Schumann—would have dared to introduce. These were in contrast with a piquant theme which seemed to have come direct from Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne." The coda of this movement was wonderfully contrapuntal, but the movement as a whole did not seem to balance the power of the first two movements.

But it is refreshing to find a composer who still clings to the sonata form; it is delightful to see that all the old landmarks were not all swept away by the death of Brahms. It must be understood, however, that in speaking of Glazounoff in the same sentence with Brahms, we refer only to form; in spirit the composer is, as he ought to be, sui generis.

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Traveler

Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY,
[illegible] Washington Street.

Oct 23

THE SYMPHONY.

First Boston Appearance of Elsa Ruegger, 'Cellist—A New Glazounoff Symphony.

Nineteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; second concert. Miss Elsa Ruegger, soloist. The programme:

Overture, "Prometheus"	Goldmark
Concerto for 'celo in D Minor	Lalo
Chaconne in D Minor	Bach-Raff
Symphony No. 6, in C Minor	Glazounoff

The concert was of a very great sameness in that there was such an overabundance of the minor mode, and two sets of variations near to one another. And there was not a single work of the four possessing any great and real interest, nothing to hold you fast and make you oblivious to the clock. The orchestra played in masterly style from first to last, but it takes more than even our fine band to make an evening of delight for the practised Symphony-goer.

Goldmark's "Prometheus" bears all the marks of the composer of "Sakuntala"; it is its twin brother, a trifle less good-looking. The rich and glowing orchestration is there and the smoothly flowing melody, but not quite so much of inspiration or nobility. Mr. Longy's beautiful playing of the little oboe passage in this work was one of the most charming things of the evening.

Miss Ruegger has a remarkable mastery of the 'cello for so young a woman—or for a woman at all, for that matter. She brings out a pure, perfectly controlled tone, and her technique is wholly sufficient. Her method is full of grace and beauty; she also has intelligence and artistic taste in interpretation. But with all these positive merits, Miss Ruegger could scarcely make the Lalo concerto very interesting. It says nothing much, and it takes a long time in doing that. There are moments of dainty elegance, such as the little dance movement in the intermezzo, but as a whole there is too much for the 'cello to do—a very real fault, because the instrument easily becomes monotonous. The orchestration is exceedingly well done.

In a certain sense Glazounoff was a disappointment. I had expected to be greeted with rank whiffs of vodka and paprika from his symphony, had looked for an avalanche of Russian themes and Slavic tonality. But the flavor is weak, although some of the writing is strong and stirring. There is a deal of bustle and tumult, yet two or three of the modern Germans might have produced it. In fact, the intermezzo is quite remarkably like Brahms. It is in the handling of the orchestra that Glazounoff seems to excel. He can lay the paint on thick, yet preserve the outlines of the picture in an impressive way. A little musical inspiration and thought are thus made to go a long way and to produce some brilliant effects that will not, however, bear very close analysis. The symphony was played with superb virtuosity, so Mr. Glazounoff had all the benefit arising therefrom. Perhaps further acquaintance with the work might make some revision of opinion necessary.

WILDER D. QUINT.

American Art Journal.

The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.

NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCT. 21, 1899.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, will give five Wednesday matinees and five Thursday evening concerts, at Carnegie Hall, on the following dates: Nov, 8 and 9, Dec. 13 and 14, Jan. 17 and 18, Feb. 21 and 22, March 21 and 22. Mme. Sembrich, Fri. Ternina, Leonora Jackson, Dohnanyl Mark Hambourg, Franz Kneisel, Timothee Adamowski will be the solists.

[illegible] ER 23, [illegible]

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orche[illegible]

The programme of the second Symph[illegible] Concert, given in the Music Hall last [illegible]urday evening, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture to the "Prometheus Bound" of Æschylus, opus 38.
Lalo: Concerto for Violoncello, in D minor. (First time in Boston.)
Bach: Chaconne in D minor, scored for orchestra by Raff.
Glazounoff: Symphony No. 6, in C minor, opus 58. (First time in Boston.)

Miss Elsa Ruegger was the 'cellist.

If one were to pick out two ill-assorted names in history, one could hardly do better than to choose Æschylus and Goldmark. Perhaps Mr. Swinburne, who called Victor Hugo's Guanamara "a character of Æschylean grandeur,' might find something of that quality ins Goldmark overture, but, as for my single self, I cannot. Like the above-mentioned Guanamara—in "Les Burgraves"—the work does not rise above the Hugoesque; it is at moments strenuous, impassioned music, at others, merely pompous and showy; but of Æschylus's grand simple forcefulness there is nothing in it. Worst of all, except in the richness of the instrumentation, it is not particularly characteristic of Goldmark. I doubt if anyone in the audience would have spotted the composer had his name not been down on the programme. It is music that passes in at one ear, and out at the other, leaving nothing behind. It was beautifully, admirably played.

Raff's easy contrapuntal skill, his musical imaginativeness and mastery over the orchestra, make his arrangement of the Bach Chaconne a thing of more than transitory effectiveness; which can hardly be said of Esser's arrangements of the F major Toccata and the Passacaglia in C minor. In the palmy days of the Harvard Musical Association these could still pass muster, and John S. Dwight write glowingly about them in perfect good faith; but, when the Passacaglia was last played here—in the season of 1894-95—the only effect it had was to make one wonder how a composer could so arrange the marvellous work as to leave nothing but its academic side visible. Raff's arrangement of the Chaconne, however, is considerably more than merely academic; it shows true imaginativeness, shows that the composer had well felt his way to the very heart of the composition, and makes you feel how old Bach was able to stretch forth his mighty arm far beyond the confines of his century, and shake hands with the present. No composer yet has succeeded in being more modern than Bach; and Raff's brilliant orchestral dress fits his Chaconne to a T. It, too, was played to perfection.

Of Glazounoff's sixth symphony—well, humph! It is eminently worth playing and hearing, which is more than could be said of his Lyric Poem that Mr. Paur gave us two years ago; but, beyond this, the impression it makes is exceedingly vague. The composer does not seem to have very much to say; and, though he says it well enough, he hardly says it so brilliantly as to make it interesting. One looks in vain for an individuality, even for a nationality, in the music; you can see that the finale is recognizably Russian, but you do not really feel it to be so; Russian though it be in rhythm and accent, it sounds no more Samoedic than the authentically Russian themes Beethoven wove into his quartets—eliminating all their national flavor by a certain magic of his own. Only, Glazounoff's skill can hardly be called magical; in this finale he so harps on eccentricities of rhythm as to make their infinite variety monotonous. I liked the variations in the third movement best; here the composer falls easily and naturally into the romantic vein, and you follow him willingly. His orchestration is exceedingly beautiful, often grandly sonorous without noisiness. Upon the whole, the work inspires respect, if nothing warmer. The performance seemed impeccable.

Lalo's concerto gave fresh emphasis to the thought that, when a composer has hung a solo 'cello round his neck, the best thing for him to do next is to cast himself into the sea. Oh, what unspeakable monotony there is in that warm richness of tone, when you hear it through three long movements! It is worse than a male part-song, for that does not last half an hour. You feel like throwing something hard and sharp-cornered at the instrument! The usually bright and inventive Lalo has found no true inspiration in it; he has written as good a 'cello concerto as another, if you will, but, hold it beside his Symphonie Espagnole for the violin, and it shows very dull and murky. It is all in triple time, what the French call "mouvement de valse,' but gives you no cue for dancing. After all, it is eminently respectable, and the bravura in it is so skilfully written that it does not make you actually groan in sprit. Miss Ruegger, a young girl of eighteen, is plainly a master of her instrument; her tone, if not particularly large, is smooth, warm and searching; her phrasing, artistic in the extreme, her technique, absolute. Left-hand and bow-work are equally fine. Then she has evident temperament, and a well-trained musical understanding. Her success was unqualified.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture to the legend of "The Fair Melusina," opus 32, —, aria; Humperdinck, Moorish Rhapsody (first time in Boston); —, aria; Mozart, Symphony No. 25, in G minor, Kochel, No. 183 (first time at these concerts). Miss Clara Butt will be the singer.

W. F. A.

[illegible] reaches an [illegible] these opinions and they are [illegible] quoted with a view doubtless of increasing the reputation of the orchestra here, and repeated year after year, "lest we forget," or, perchance, intrepidly dare to question the facts set forth. The prospectus is built along lines which have become a tradition here and contain only such particulars as pertain to the dates, prices, opportunity of getting tickets and a partial list of the soloists.

There are to be two series of five concerts each. "Both series of concerts will be the same in character and equally attractive, but with different programmes and soloists."

The dates, alternating for each series, are November 6-11, December 11-15, January 15-19, February 19-24, March 19-23. No remark is vouchsafed concerning either the principal works or the novelties to be given during either series, and, in the absence of these, it may safely be presumed that the historic policy of musically inadequate programmes and an almost total absence of new or unknown works will again obtain at these concerts.

Last season the only complete musical treat of orchestral music was the programme of the second concert, and this was punctured with a large black hole by Willy Burmester. The only new work heard during that season was Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

In Boston it is different, as the following novelties are announced for performance for the first time at concerts there: Symphonies by Glazounow (No. 6), Tschaikowsky (No. 3), Anton Bruckner, Wilhelm Berger, Felix Weingartner, a "Maurische Rhapsodie," by Humperdinck; "Heldenlied," by Dvorak; "Les Eolides," by Cesar Franck; "Medei," by D'Indy; "Norwegische Ballade," by Jul Rontgen; "Symphonic Dances," by Edvard Grieg; a new composition by Horatio Parker; overtures by Siegfried, Wagner, George W. Chadwick, Goldmark and Dresicke. The standard works to be given include Beethoven symphonies Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9, Schumann symphonies Nos. 1 and 4, two Mozart symphonies, two Haydn symphonies, Brahm's symphonies Nos. 1 and 4, and the "Romeo et Juliette" symphony, by Berlioz.

Of course, each of the series of concerts here will witness no diminution in patronage from that which last season quickly took up every available seat, and this is as it should be. The musical public of the city is as large and opulent as that of any city which the orchestra visits, and it may quite naturally be expected that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will receive greater support here than any other concert organization until a local orchestra shall arrive to excel it in both musical accomplishments and programmes. Even then .. will be encouraged and properly supported upon proper principles of rivalry and in remembrance of its pioneer influences.

IN THE MUSIC WORLD

French Grand Opera—Aborn Company—Boston Symphony.

A treat is in store for music lovers in the French Grand Opera Company, which will begin a season at Music Hall on November 1. French grand opera appeals to a large class of music lovers in Baltimore. Many native residents speak French fluently, and it is an especial pleasure to them to hear the beautiful Parisian speech emphasized by its union with music. The "Faust" legend, it is said, although following the German of Goethe in the poem and the opera, is essentially French. "Carmen" is also French, although the subject is Spanish. "William Tell" was in opera a victory of French over the older Italian music in the mind of the genial Rossini himself; Verdi's great "Trovatore" was a break from Italian trills and arpeggios, and "Romeo and Juliet" is the international poem of youth, love and death, which arose in Italy, was developed in England and finally set to charming music by the French author of the immortal "Faust."

The four Aborn Opera companies have been united in one for a season of fall and winter performances, which will begin at Music Hall on November 11. The company will be complete in every respect. It has a list of brilliant artists, a large chorus, a chorus of children, a good orchestra, a military band for the stage and all the necessary accessories. Fine renditions of good standard operas are relied upon to bring success.

Baltimore is sure of at least one more season of fine orchestral concerts. The sales of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra are fully up to the record-breaker of last year, and does away with the guarantee which was necessary last year. Gericke is probably the best director under which this organization has ever played. His programs are always well chosen. Three artists—Dohnanyi, Hombourg and Jackson—all new to Baltimore, are announced, and two great vocalists are booked for the other two concerts. The first concert takes place Tuesday, November 7.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts promises well. Although changes have been made on the first floor of Music Hall, the division of prices remains the same. The season will consist as usual of five concerts, to be given on Tuesdays, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20, and March 20. Conductor Wilhelm Gericke has been retained, which will make this his seventh year with this famous organization. He will have under his control 87 musicians with exactly the same artists he had last season. The soloists engaged up to the present time are as follows: Mark Hambourg, a noted Russian pianist, who created a sensation as a boy prodigy. He studied with Leschetizky in Vienna for three years and when he returned before a critical audience of the same city he astonished the public with a rare technic and marvelous command of expression. The second soloist is Miss Leonora Jackson, a young violinist born in Boston. In 1896 she won the Mendelssohn State-prize at Berlin, where she was a pupil of Professor Joachim. A year later she made her debut with a philharmonic orchestra in Berlin and has since played in public with remarkable success. Ernst Donnanyi, another of the soloists, is a young Hungarian pianist who has been specially engaged with this famous orchestra.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 23, 1899.

The Symphony Concert—A Glazounoff Symphony.

In a book catalogue issued in London a few years ago, two works were specified as "Prometheus—unbound," and "Ditto—bound." The symphonic concert of Saturday began with a musical setting of the latter, and judging by the rich orchestration, it was bound in full morocco.

We think Goldmark more equally successful in his overtures than in any other of his instrumental forms, and were therefore not surprised to find some noble climaxes in this mythological theme, but there were also pretty touches, in vivid contrast, which spoke of the lighter vein of the composer of "The Cricket on the Hearth" and of the sensuous style of the writer of "The Queen of Sheba," which seemed out of place in the portrayal of such an aggravated case of liver complaint.

Possibly (this guesswork is the weak spot in almost all "programme-music") the brighter music suggests the shooting of the eagle, by Hercules, and the final liberation of the captive. The number was grandly played and deservedly applauded.

More sorrow followed in the shape of a rather tragic violoncello concerto by Lalo. Here the composer seems to consider only the grave side of the instrument and tears his passions to tatters, especially during the first movement.

The slow movement presents a gentler, lace-handkerchief style of grieving, and even ventures upon some lively bits of rusticity, while the constantly recurring figures of the accompaniment are novel in treatment and give a picturesque monotony which is charming.

The finale begins with a melancholy sort of recitative (the work indulges too much in recitative for the solo instrument), but soon bursts into a more vigorous and less plaintive theme. It is not a concerto that attracts on a first hearing, and we doubt its chance of finding more favor by repeated performance.

It served to introduce to our public a very talented young lady violoncellist, Miss Elsa Ruegger, who won a marked success. This means a good deal in a city like Boston, which has always had great violoncellists among its residents. Wulf Fries in the early days, Hekking and Schulz in later times, the born genius of the instrument—Fritz Giese, and at present the thorough artist, Schroeder, all these have caused the Bostonian to become a good connoisseur of performance on this particular instrument

To win a success here, therefore, means something, and Miss Ruegger may be quite satisfied with her achievement. Her tone is not broad and massive (one feels this defect in some of the C string passages), but it is sympathetic and always true to pitch, while her surety is commendable.

The Bach quarry seems to yield up unsuspected treasures once in a while; Gounod dug into a prelude and exhumed an "Ave Maria;" Raff drilled into a violin solo and blasted out a set of symphonic variations. Raff's orchestral setting of the famous Chaconne in D minor may astonish, but can scarcely compel praise except for its ingenuity; he finds as many strange and unsuspected things in the violin solo as Sheridan found in Lord Burleigh's nod or Ignatius Donnelly in Shakespeare! One may alter the French saying, for this occasion, and exclaim—"C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas Bach!"

This particular Chaconne seems to incite the composers especially; it is not the first time it has been tampered with, and added accompaniments for piano and for orchestra have been made to its measures. It was brilliantly performed and, placing the question of fitness entirely aside, was an interesting number.

After which Mr. Gericke gave us our weekly Russian, this time a fine example of the best music of the north. Perhaps it is unjust to class Glazounoff's sixth symphony, in C minor, as Russian at all; true art is of no nationality, and the fault that we have often charged against many of the young Russians, that they thrust their national condiments too conspicuously into their works, is absent from this excellent symphony. Glazounoff carefully avoids that bizarrerrie which mars many of the recent Muscovite productions; of many of the orchestral productions of this school one can say, with Angelo:

> "This will last out a night in Russia
> When nights are longest there."

But just this prolixity is absent from Glazounoff's work; it is of normal length, clear shape, splendid development, and while giving a great degree of counterpoint makes no ostentatious parade of learning.

It is but natural that we should compare the composer with the great Russian symphonist—Tschaikowsky; Glazounoff does not lose by the juxta-position; he has not the mannerisms of Tschaikowsky (the solemn growls of deep-toned wind instruments, for example, are seldom in evidence) and he equals him in thematic development.

Possibly the St. Petersburg critics will condemn the cosmopolitan character of such music, as they did in the case of Tschaikowsky, whom they accused of not being representatively Russian, but to our mind such music reaches a loftier plane than can be obtained by mere local coloring.

There is a little of the influence of Schumann present in the first movement, the incomplete return of themes after development being a favorite touch of the German master, and the splendid figure treatment and bold syncopation, the sharp contrast of themes, are also Schumannesque.

The second movement, in the "Andante con Variazioni" form, is a masterpiece; not a trace of monotony, not a suspicion of reiteration, noble scoring and effective contrasts. The theme itself is impressive, and the first variation [illegible] with bold chromatic touches still [illegible]. The second variation gives a [illegible]

The use of the third Gregorian tone in the fourth variation was another contrast that made the number effective. The dainty pipings of the woodwind in the coda of the third and sixth variations were most charmingly bucolic. The impressive treatment of the brasses in the finale made a sufficiently broad climax.

The Intermezzo was unambitious; here the composer has followed Brahms in not giving a complete return of the first form after the Trio, but retaining a double contrast by bringing back the first period as coda. The flute had prominent work here, and did it well. Perhaps the modest prettiness of this movement finds its excuse in the fierce combat of themes and rhythms that is to follow in the finale.

The last movement had more syncopations than the great syncopationist—Schumann—would have dared to introduce. These were in contrast with a piquant theme which seemed to have come direct from Bizet's "Suite Arlesienne." The coda of this movement was wonderfully contrapuntal, but the movement as a whole did not seem to balance the power of the first two movements.

But it is refreshing to find a composer who still clings to the sonata form; it is delightful to see that all the old landmarks were not all swept away by the death of Brahms. It must be understood, however, that in speaking of Glazounoff in the same sentence with Brahms, we refer only to form; in spirit the composer is, as he ought to be, sui generis.

Louis C. Elson.

The Boston Traveler
Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY,
307 Washington Street.

Oct 23

THE SYMPHONY.

First Boston Appearance of Elsa Ruegger, 'Cellist—A New Glazounoff Symphony.

Nineteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; second concert. Miss Elsa Ruegger, soloist. The programme:

Overture, "Prometheus"..............Goldmark
Concerto for 'cello in D Minor..............Lalo
Chaconne in D Minor..................Bach-Raff
Symphony No. 6, in C Minor..........Glazounoff

The concert was of a very great sameness in that there was such an overabundance of the minor mode, and two sets of variations near to one another. And there was not a single work of the four possessing any great and real interest, nothing to hold you fast and make you oblivious to the clock. The orchestra played in masterly style from first to last, but it takes more than even our fine band to make an evening of delight for the practised Symphony-goer.

Goldmark's "Prometheus" bears all the marks of the composer of "Sakuntala"; it is its twin brother, a trifle less good-looking. The rich and glowing orchestration is there and the smoothly flowing melody, but not quite so much of inspiration or nobility. Mr. Longy's beautiful playing of the little oboe passage in this work was one of the most charming things of the evening.

Miss Ruegger has a remarkable mastery of the 'cello for so young a woman—or for a woman at all, for that matter. She brings out a pure, perfectly controlled tone, and her technique is wholly sufficient. Her method is full of grace and beauty; she also has intelligence and artistic taste in interpretation. But with all these positive merits, Miss Ruegger could scarcely make the Lalo concerto very interesting. It says nothing much, and it takes a long time in doing that. There are moments of dainty elegance, such as the little dance movement in the intermezzo, but as a whole there is too much for the 'cello to do—a very real fault, because the instrument easily becomes monotonous. The orchestration is exceedingly well done.

In a certain sense Glazounoff was a disappointment. I had expected to be greeted with rank whiffs of vodka and paprika from his symphony, had looked for an avalanche of Russian themes and Slavic tonality. But the flavor is weak, although some of the writing is strong and stirring. There is a deal of bustle and tumult, yet two or three of the modern Germans might have produced it. In fact, the intermezzo is quite remarkably like Brahms. It is in the handling of the orchestra that Glazounoff seems to excel. He can lay the paint on thick, yet preserve the outlines of the picture in an impressive way. A little musical inspiration and thought are thus made to go a long way and to produce some brilliant effects that will not, however, bear very close analysis. The symphony was played with superb virtuosity, so Mr. Glazounoff had all the benefit arising therefrom. Perhaps further acquaintance with the work might make some revision of opinion necessary.

WILDER D. QUINT.

American Art Journal.
The Oldest Musical Weekly Published in America.
NEW YORK, SATURDAY, OCT. 21, 1899.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, will give five Wednesday matinees and five Thursday evening concerts, at Carnegie Hall, on the following dates: Nov, 8 and 9, Dec. 13 and 14, Jan. 17 and 18, Feb. 21 and 22, March 21 and 22. Mme. Sembrich, Frl. Ternina, Leonora Jackson, Dohnanyl Mark Hambourg, Franz Kneisel, Timothee Adamowski will be the solists.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, OCTOBER 23, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the second Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was as follows:

Goldmark: Overture to the "Prometheus Bound" of Æschylus, opus 38.
Lalo: Concerto for Violoncello, in D minor. (First time in Boston.)
Bach: Chaconne in D minor, scored for orchestra by Raff.
Glazounoff: Symphony No. 6, in C minor, opus 58. (First time in Boston.)

Miss Elsa Ruegger was the 'cellist.

If one were to pick out two ill-assorted names in history, one could hardly do better than to choose Æschylus and Goldmark. Perhaps Mr. Swinburne, who called Victor Hugo's Guanamara "a character of Æschylean grandeur,' might find something of that quality ins Goldmark' overture, but, as for my single self, I cannot. Like the above-mentioned Guanamara—in "Les Burgraves"—the work does not rise above the Hugoesque; it is at moments strenuous, impassioned music, at others, merely pompous and showy; but of Æschylus's grand simple forcefulness there is nothing in it. Worst of all, except in the richness of the instrumentation, it is not particularly characteristic of Goldmark. I doubt if anyone in the audience would have spotted the composer had his name not been down on the programme. It is music that passes in at one ear, and out at the other, leaving nothing behind. It was beautifully, admirably played.

Raff's easy contrapuntal skill, his musical imaginativeness and mastery over the orchestra, make his arrangement of the Bach Chaconne a thing of more than transitory effectiveness; which can hardly be said of Esser's arrangements of the F major Toccata and the Passacaglia in C minor. In the palmy days of the Harvard Musical Association these could still pass muster, and John S. Dwight write glowingly about them in perfect good faith; but, when the Passacaglia was last played here—in the season of 1894-95—the only effect it had was to make one wonder how a composer could so arrange the marvellous work as to leave nothing but its academic side visible. Raff's arrangement of the Chaconne, however, is considerably more than merely academic; it shows true imaginativeness, shows that the composer had well felt his way to the very heart of the composition, and makes you feel how old Bach was able to stretch forth his mighty arm far beyond the confines of his century, and shake hands with the present. No composer yet has succeeded in being more modern than Bach; and Raff's brilliant orchestral dress fits his Chaconne to a T. It, too, was played to perfection.

Of Glazounoff's sixth symphony—well, humph! It is eminently worth playing and hearing, which is more than could be said of his Lyric Poem that Mr. Paur gave us two years ago; but, beyond this, the impression it makes is exceedingly vague. The composer does not seem to have very much to say; and, though he says it well enough, he hardly says it so brilliantly as to make it interesting. One looks in vain for an individuality, even for a nationality, in the music; you can see that the finale is recognizably Russian, but you do not really feel it to be so; Russian though it be in rhythm and accent, it sounds no more Samoedic than the authentically Russian themes Beethoven wove into his quartets—eliminating all their national flavor by a certain magic of his own. Only, Glazounoff's skill can hardly be called magical; in this finale he so harps on eccentricities of rhythm as to make their infinite variety monotonous. I liked the variations in the third movement best; here the composer falls easily and naturally into the romantic vein, and you follow him willingly. His orchestration is exceedingly beautiful, often grandly sonorous without noisiness. Upon the whole, the work inspires respect, if nothing warmer. The performance seemed impeccable.

Lalo's concerto gave fresh emphasis to the thought that, when a composer has hung a solo 'cello round his neck, the best thing for him to do next is to cast himself into the sea. Oh, what unspeakable monotony there is in that warm richness of tone, when you hear it through three long movements! It is worse than a male part-song, for that does not last half an hour. You feel like throwing something hard and sharp-cornered at the instrument! The usually bright and inventive Lalo has found no true inspiration in it; he has written as good a 'cello concerto as another, if you will, but, hold it beside his Symphonie Espagnole for the violin, and it shows very dull and murky. It is all in triple time, what the French call "mouvement de valse,' but gives you no cue for dancing. After all, it is eminently respectable, and the bravura in it is so skilfully written that it does not make you actually groan in sprit. Miss Ruegger, a young girl of eighteen, is plainly a master of her instrument; her tone, if not particularly large, is smooth, warm and searching; her phrasing, artistic in the extreme, her technique, absolute. Left-hand and bow-work are equally fine. Then she has evident temperament, and a well-trained musical understanding. Her success was unqualified.

The next programme is: Mendelssohn, overture to the legend of "The Fair Melusina," opus 32, ——, aria; Humperdinck, Moorish Rhapsody (first time in Boston); ——, aria; Mozart, Symphony No. 25, in G minor, Kochel, No. 183 (first time at these concerts). Miss Clara Butt will be the singer.

W. F. A.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra has issued its prospectus for the season, indorsed with the usual expression of New York critics. New England provincialism still attaches an undue importance to these opinions and they are therefore quoted with a view doubtless of increasing the reputation of the orchestra here, and repeated year after year, "lest we forget," or, perchance, intrepidly dare to question the facts set forth. The prospectus is built along lines which have become a tradition here and contain only such particulars as pertain to the dates, prices, opportunity of getting tickets and a partial list of the soloists.

There are to be two series of five concerts each. "Both series of concerts will be the same in character and equally attractive, but with different programmes and soloists."

The dates, alternating for each series, are November 6-11, December 11-15, January 15-19, February 19-24, March 19-23. No remark is vouchsafed concerning either the principal works or the novelties to be given during either series, and, in the absence of these, it may safely be presumed that the historic policy of musically inadequate programmes and an almost total absence of new or unknown works will again obtain at these concerts.

Last season the only complete musical treat of orchestral music was the programme of the second concert, and this was punctured with a large black hole by Willy Burmester. The only new work heard during that season was Richard Strauss' tone poem, "Death and Transfiguration."

In Boston it is different, as the following novelties are announced for performance for the first time at concerts there: Symphonies by Glazounow (No. 6), Tschaikowsky (No. 3), Anton Bruckner, Wilhelm Berger, Felix Weingartner, a "Maurische Rhapsodie," by Humperdinck; "Heldenlied," by Dvorak; "Les Eolides," by Cesar Franck; "Medel," by D'Indy; "Norwegische Ballade," by Jul Rontgen; "Symphonic Dances," by Edvard Grieg; a new composition by Horatio Parker; overtures by Siegfried, Wagner, George W. Chadwick, Goldmark and Dresicke. The standard works to be given include Beethoven symphonies Nos. 2, 6, 7, 8 and 9, Schumann symphonies Nos. 1 and 4, two Mozart symphonies, two Haydn symphonies, Brahm's symphonies Nos. 1 and 4, and the "Romeo et Juliette" symphony, by Berlioz.

Of course, each of the series of concerts here will witness no diminution in patronage from that which last season quickly took up every available seat, and this is as it should be. The musical public of the city is as large and opulent as that of any city which the orchestra visits, and it may quite naturally be expected that the Boston Symphony Orchestra will receive greater support here than any other concert organization until a local orchestra shall arrive to excel it in both musical accomplishments and programmes. Even then .. will be encouraged and properly supported upon proper principles of rivalry and in remembrance of its pioneer influences.

Elsa Ruegger arrives in this

IN THE MUSIC WORLD

French Grand Opera—Aborn Company—Boston Symphony.

A treat is in store for music lovers in the French Grand Opera Company, which will begin a season at Music Hall on November 1. French grand opera appeals to a large class of music lovers in Baltimore. Many native residents speak French fluently, and it is an especial pleasure to them to hear the beautiful Parisian speech emphasized by its union with music. The "Faust" legend, it is said, although following the German of Goethe in the poem and the opera, is essentially French. "Carmen" is also French, although the subject is Spanish. "William Tell" was in opera a victory of French over the older Italian music in the mind of the genial Rossini himself; Verdi's great "Trovatore" was a break from Italian trills and arpeggios, and "Romeo and Juliet" is the international poem of youth, love and death, which arose in Italy, was developed in England and finally set to charming music by the French author of the immortal "Faust."

The four Aborn Opera companies have been united in one for a season of fall and winter performances, which will begin at Music Hall on November 11. The company will be complete in every respect. It has a list of brilliant artists, a large chorus, a chorus of children, a good orchestra, a military band for the stage and all the necessary accessories. Fine renditions of good standard operas are relied upon to bring success.

Baltimore is sure of at least one more season of fine orchestral concerts. The sales of seats for the Boston Symphony Orchestra are fully up to the record-breaker of last year, and does away with the guarantee which was necessary last year. Gericke is probably the best director under which this organization has ever played. His programs are always well chosen. Three artists—Dohnanyi, Hombourg and Jackson—all new to Baltimore, are announced, and two great vocalists are booked for the other two concerts. The first concert takes place Tuesday, November 7.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The sale of season tickets for the series of Boston Symphony Orchestra concerts promises well. Although changes have been made on the first floor of Music Hall, the division of prices remains the same. The season will consist as usual of five concerts, to be given on Tuesdays, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20, and March 20. Conductor Wilhelm Gericke has been retained, which will make this his seventh year with this famous organization. He will have under his control 87 musicians with exactly the same artists he had last season. The soloists engaged up to the present time are as follows: Mark Hambourg, a noted Russian pianist, who created a sensation as a boy prodigy. He studied with Leschetizky in Vienna for three years and when he returned before a critical audience of the same city he astonished the public with a rare technic and marvelous command of expression. The second soloist is Miss Leonora Jackson, a young violinist born in Boston. In 1896 she won the Mendelssohn State prize at Berlin, where she was a pupil of Professor Joachim. A year later she made her debut with a philharmonic orchestra in Berlin and has since played in public with remarkable success. Ernst Donnanyi, another of the soloists, is a young Hungarian pianist who has been specially engaged with this famous orchestra.

The World of Music.

Second Series of Symphony Concerts—The Thomson Concert Attraction.

Phila Press

Sunday Oct 22/99

By the decision of the management of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to give two series of five evening concerts in this city during the coming season, Philadelphia adds to its wonderful and unique record of a complete "sell out" for the first series the reputation of taking second place to Boston only in the number of concerts given in outside cities.

Philadelphia also has the distinction of being the first city visited by the orchestra outside of New England. It was on April 10, 1886, that the Boston Symphony Orchestra made its debut at the Academy of Music under the direction of the present conductor, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, and since that time 71 concerts have been given. It is an interesting coincidence in the way of statistics that the concert to be given in Boston on the afternoon of Friday, November 3, just previous to their opening concert here, will be the 900th performance in Boston and the 1700th in all. These figures are exact, and a matter of record.

Such totals as these explain the marvelous ensemble in the work of the orchestra and also show how this organization is making the musical history of the United States. And all this because of the desire of one man to present good music in the best way. Nowhere else in the wide world does there exist such an organization, conceived and carried out unselfishly to a glorious consummation, and the tremendous support so generously given by musical and social Philadelphia is to the mutual credit of the founder, the orchestra, and its clientele here.

The second series of five evening concerts is intended to meet the demands of hundreds of the lovers of the best in music in this city who have tried the past two seasons to attend the Monday evening series, but have been unable to secure seats of any kind for any of the five performances. The second series will be the equal of the first in every detail, with an entire change of programme. That there is a wiedspread interest in this series is shown by the repeated requests of the subscribers to the first series for their same seats for the second, with numerous urgent appeals received by the management to set aside seats in advance of the sale. The decision to adhere strictly to the rule of "first come, first served," has compelled a negative reply to all such demands. The limit of ten tickets to one person has been established by the management. The scale of prices will be the same as for the first series; in fact, the two series will be as near alike, with the single exception of different programmes, as they can be made. The sale of season tickets opens to-morrow morning at 1103 Chestnut Street, at 8 o'clock.

BOSTON HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVI., NO. 118.

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1899.

It is said that Miss Clara Butt, the English contralto, who is to be soloist at the Symphony concert this week, has been debarred from appearing on the lyric stage on account of her extreme height. She stands six feet in her silk stockings. Now, I should not think that would prevent her being a very personable page. Suzanne Adams isn't short, by any means, but these gallant youngsters in opera are not expected to sing in deep contralto tones such as Miss Butt possesses. However, we can tell better after next Saturday.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL,

THURSDAY, OCTOBER 26, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Brilliant Beginning for the Season.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra for this season was given in Infantry Hall last evening. In spite of the fact that the attendance has not been over-encouraging during the last two or three years, the full course of eight concerts will be given again this season. This is a boon to those who appreciate the highest forms of musical art, even if the general public fails to manifest the interest and enthusiasm which attend the performances of the orchestra at home and in the other cities to which it pays yearly visits. But the patronage in Providence is at least constant if not large. One sees the same faces at the concerts year after year, and those who attend are fully appreciative of the fine work done by the premier orchestra of America.

Last night's audience was of about the usual size, perhaps sufficient to fill half the seats in the hall. The programme consisted of the following numbers:

Prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg"……………………Richard Wagner
Cassandra's Aria from Act I. of "Les Troyens"………………Hector Berlioz
Capriccio Italien, op. 45………………………………Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky
Songs, with pianoforte, (a) "Schmerzen," (b) "Traume"…………Richard Wagner
Symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, op. 38……………………Robert Schumann
I. Andante un poco maestoso (B-flat major).
Allegro molto vivace (B-flat major).
II. Larghetto (E-flat major).
III. Scherzo: Molto vivace (D minor).
Trio I.: Molto piu vivace (D major).
Trio II.: (B-flat major).
IV. Allegro animato e grazioso (b-flat major).

The programme was shorter than the average, the concert being concluded by half-past nine. Any lack of quantity, however, was amply set off by the quality of what was offered and the general characteristic of brilliancy that pervaded the concert from first to last. And the players, fresh from a season of rest, were in condition to do full justice to the resplendent piling up of climaxes with which they were called upon to deal. It is doubtful if there is to be found in the whole range of orchestral music anything more gorgeously rich and brilliant than the famous prelude to Wagner's "Meistersingers." On top of some of the most marvellous polophonic writing since Bach—some of it burlesque and some of it earnest, but all of it effective—Wagner has superimposed all the wealth of tone-color and intricacy of instrumentation in the handling of which he is so pre-eminently a master. When delivered with the splendid vim and sonority that marked its performance last night, the most rabid of anti-Wagnerites can hardly fail for the nonce to recant his belief, and the true disciple bends his knee, if possible, a little lower.

The note of brilliancy thus struck at the outset was well sustained in Tschaikowsky's "Italian Capriccio." Mr. Horatio W. Parker, the well-known American composer, is reported in a recent interview as saying that "in a few more years nothing will be left of Tschaikorsky's music." Similar remarks are now and then quoted from other sources. A peculiar fact to be noted in this connection is that all these prophets are devout disciples of the Brahms cult. It would be interesting to know if there exists any basis for such a ridiculous idea save the well-known antagonism between the two composers. Brahms could not abide the music of Tschaikorsky any more than the latter could that of the ponderous German. When Jove takes snuff must we all sneeze?

It is just as well to remember, before we come to shelving things so hastily, that composers have, with very few exceptions, always proved to be the poorest judges of each other's work. To the musician without prejudice the compositions of the great Russian contain the elements of lasting worth rather than of decay. He is the only man with a new word to say in music since Wagner. Where else can be found such originality, such power, such daring or such masterly grasp of detail. When such monumental art-works as Tschaikorsky bequeathed us begin to fade into nothingness, it will be about time to close the book.

Of the "Capriccio" played last evening it only need be said that it is at once a fanciful and powerful composition. There is no attempt to suggest hidden meanings, but simply the elaborating and piquant setting forth of original and attractive musical matter. It is at once characteristic and tremendously effective. The performance was marked by the greatest spirit and virtuosity. A very satisfactory presentation of Schumann's fine B-flat symphony closed the enjoyable programme.

The soloist of the evening was Miss Gertrude May Stein, always a most welcome figure on our concert platform. For voice, for purity and elegance of style, for consummate musicianship exhibited in every shade of nuance and in unfailing stability to pitch, we must indeed go far to find her equal. She chose for her principal number an aria from a little known opera by Berlioz, finely suited to her powers of dramatic delivery. The two songs given with piano accompaniment were well contrasted with the aria, and displayed her versatility as an interpreter of lieder. She was cordially applauded.

The second concert by the orchestra will be given on Wednesday evening, Nov. 15.

This evening, at Infantry hall, will be inaugurated the eighteenth season in this city of the Boston Symphony orchestra. For all these years this organization has been presenting to Providence the very best illustration of high class music attainable. The quality of performance, the standard of programme, and the soloists, have all been in keeping with the splendid reputation long ago established by the orchestra. In every other city visited, the record has been one of slow, but always sure growth, until today, everywhere except in Providence, the orchestra is welcomed by audiences equaled in enthusiasm and in size only by those at home. In Philadelphia, for illustration, last year every seat in the vast Academy of Music was sold for the season to subscribers of the previous year in advance of the advertised sale, and this season again the same record has been made. Encouraged by this magnificent support, the management announced a second series of five evening concerts, and the season ticket sale for this series, which opened yesterday morning, promises a repetition of the splendid record of the first series; in other words, a clean "sell-out" for this additional series. In New York, also, from the beginning the audiences have grown in numbers and enthusiasm, until today it is safe to say that both the concerts and audiences of the Boston Symphony orchestra are second to none in the city.

Under these circumstances, it is indeed perplexing and discouraging to admit that Providence stands alone as the only luke-warm city on the list of those visited by the best orchestral organization in this country. Explanations of this state of affairs can be as numerous as they are unsatisfying. The prices are the lowest of those in any city visited, so there is absolutely no argument on this ground. The management is almost tempted to offer a special prize to the person who can satisfactorily explain such an unusual and unsatisfactory state of affairs.

Notwithstanding all this, the orchestra will continue to give the same splendid performances, in the hope that at some time in the near future the public of Providence will awaken to a proper sense of appreciation of the visits of this organization. At the opening concert this evening the soloist will be Miss Gertrude May Stein, a great favorite in this city, and the following excellent programme will be presented: Wagner, prelude to "The Master Singers of Nuremberg"; Berlioz, Cassandra's Aria from Act 1. of "Les Troyens"; Tschaikovsky, Capriccio Italian, op. 45; Wagner, songs with pianoforte. (a) "Schmerzen," (b) "Traume"; Schumann, symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, op. 38.

Season tickets for the series of eight concerts, and single tickets for the performance this evening, can be had at the box office, Infantry hall.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1899.

THE second symphony concert on Saturday night presented a superb program, and this week included the magnificent piano recital of De Pachmann, so it would seem as though had it contained nothing else the week would have been replete, and music lovers may well have been thoroughly satisfied.

* * *

The symphony program presented was:

Overture to the Prometheus Bound, of Æschylus, op. 38...Goldmark
Concert for violoncello, in D minor..Lalo
(First time in Boston.)
Chaconne in D minor..J. S. Bach
(Scored for orchestra by Joachim Raff.)
Symphony No. 6, in C minor, op. 58........................Glazounoff
(First time in Boston.)

Elso Ruegger, the 'cellist, made her first appearance in America as soloist, and if the success of her tour may be measured by her success upon this occasion it will assuredly be very great. Miss Ruegger is young, but nineteen, and beautiful to look upon, yet when she plays one fails to see the physical, attractive as it is, for such preponderance of musical intelligence, refinement and elegance is in evidence. Miss Ruegger came as so many others come, totally unknown except through the medium of a sort of heraldry which so often is the cause of disappointment. It is agreeable then to state that in no way has she fallen short of the most exalted expectations. She handles her instrument with an ease which is almost unexpected upon a violoncello, her intonation is flawless and her refinement and intellect vie with her musicianship, which is really great. She needs no apology for either youth or sex, as she is an artist in every sense, and the public has proved its recognition of this fact.

The Lalo Concerto is not grateful in the first movement, and were it not for many charming bits in the two latter movements, not even Miss Ruegger's skill could have saved it. It opens in a quiet Lento with a sudden and persistent fortissimo chord, which returns when it is least expected and least wanted. The recitative form is used almost to a degree of incoherence and entirely to the degree of monotony. When, however, the intermezzo comes like relief all else must be forgotten, as it contains melody and all the musical merits that is expected of Lalo.

Miss Ruegger was enthusiastically received.

The orchestral numbers were delightfully chosen, and the Glazounoff Symphony, a novelty, was a surprise to all. Mr. Apthorp in his program notes says:

> Alexander Glazounoff was born in St. Petersburg on August 10, 1865. His parents were well off, and enabled to give him an excellent education; indeed, he has always been in such easy circum stances that he could devote all his time to the practice of his art without the burden of giving music lessons. At the age of thirteen he was put under Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff for his musical education. In 1883 his first published work, a string quartet, was produced. He was one of the musicians who represented Russia at the Paris Exposition of 1889, conducting his symphonic poem, "Stenka Rakine," at the Trocadéro on June 22, and his second symphony, in F sharp minor, op. 16, on June 29; both of these works were exceedingly favorably noticed in the Paris press. The symphony was written in memory of Franz Liszt.

From a man with a Russian name one has learned to expect the flavor of caviare, but Glazounoff has given us a healthy, straightforward piece of work, devoid of noisy eccentricities and eccentric noises. It is a wonderfully lucid composition, thoroughly in keeping with classical demands, yet distinctly and essentially modern. The second movement is a set of seven variations on a simple theme; nothing could be more interesting nor more melodious than these variations.

In the third movement, an intermezzo, Glazounoff was warmed by the Magic Fire, but he was not consumed as so many others have been. In the fourth movement he pays tribute to his country, and says more plainly than in words, "I am a Russian." The symphony is good. I am glad I heard it, and to know that the writer is young.

The Bach Chaconne, under Gericke's superb classical direction, was a pure bit of classicality; yet don't we all wish that arrangers, even though they be Raffs, would not disarrange Bach?

Those who know and who love "Sakuntala" have no reason to do aught else with the overture of "Prometheus Bound," for they are enough alike to be brothers. Goldmark has, however, wrought a superb musical poem upon this well-known subject, and the way it was presented was admirable. The program was an exceptionally fine one, yet would it not have stood a dash of brilliancy? There was just a tinge of sombreness.

The next soloist will be Miss Clara Butt, and Humperdinck's Moorish Symphony is on the program. ,

---

When Elsa Ruegger appeared before the audience at the Boston Symphony concert on Saturday evening, she looked so young and girlish that it seemed almost impossible to realize what a successful career she has had already. The members of the orchestra were most enthusiastic in their admiration and praise of her work, and Mr. Gericke personally congratulated her, paying her a high compliment. She is unaffected by all the praises that have been showered upon her, and realizes that she must study and work hard to attain the high position for which she aims. Her recreation is astronomy, a subject many would consider sufficiently difficult to be taken as a study and not as a pastime. When next she goes to Boston—some time in January—she is anticipating much pleasure in visiting the observatory at Cambridge, and also looks forward to seeing the observatory and telescope at Syracuse.

Friday, 22d, Boston, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall.
Saturday, 23d, Boston, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall.

Wednesday, 27th, Boston (R.), matinee, Music Hall
Saturday, 30th, Boston (R.), matinee, Music Hall.

JANUARY, 1900.

Tuesday, 2d, Portland, Me., City Hall.
Wednesday, 3d, Portland, Me., matinee, City Hall.

Ruegger's American Debut.

SCORES AN IMMEDIATE AND PRONOUNCED TRIUMPH WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

ELSA RUEGGER, the distinguished young Swiss 'cellist, who comes to America crowned with the flattering plaudits of the most exacting European critics, made her American début in Boston last week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This beautiful young artist has, in addition to the compelling force of her art, a magnetic personality and a manner that is at once unassuming and free from any trace of affectation.

Incidentally, she is the first woman 'cellist who has appeared with the Boston Symphony organization during its entire history, and she convinced the Boston critics of her eminence as a mature artist, in spite of the fact that she will not be eighteen years old until December 6.

That Miss Ruegger had scored an immediate, pronounced and unequivocal success was sent broadcast over the continent by the Associated Press dispatches after her initial appearance Friday afternoon, and the fact was corroborated and indorsed by the verdict of the critics Saturday night. In the opinion of some, the choice of the young soloist's selection was open to question, but all were unanimous in their praise of the masterly manner in which she acquitted herself, as may be seen by the appended excerpts from the Boston Sunday papers:

Miss Elsa Ruegger, the 'cellist, who appeared last night for the first time in America, was born at Lucerne, Switzerland, December 6, 1881. She studied with Jacobs, of the Brussels Conservatory; she played in a charity concert when she was eleven years old, and when she was thirteen she made a concert tour. She was awarded in June, 1896, the first 'cello prize of the Brussels Conservatory "with the highest distinction." Since then she has played in the chief cities of Europe.

The Concerto which she chose was first played at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris December 9, 1877, when Lalo, the composer, was fifty-four years old. The player was Adolph Fischer, the Belgian, who died eight years ago in a madhouse. He played the Concerto in several cities of Europe in 1878.

Miss Ruegger's reputation is well deserved. Her tone is eminently agreeable and pure; her technic is sure and well rounded; she is not over-sentimental in melody; her phrasing is musician-like; and, free from virtuoso trick or affectation, she is respectful to the composer and art.—Philip Hale in the Boston Sunday Journal October 22.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, of Switzerland, the violoncello virtuoso, who achieved a musical triumph in Berlin last season, made her first American appearance in concert as the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall to-day. She played the Concerto in D minor, by Edouard Lalo, and her genius was recognized by the large audience present. The Concerto, heard here for the first time, gave ample opportunity for Miss Ruegger to display her talent.—Associated Press.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, the young Swiss 'cellist, at her American début with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, had an enthusiastic reception. Although only seventeen years old she is called by many one of the leading 'cello players in the world.

Miss Ruegger's personal magnetism was no small factor in her success. Several times she was called out.—Special to the New York Press.

The Concerto for violoncello by Edouard Lalo, the distinguished violinist and composer, was naturally in a more serious vein than his brilliant Symphonie Espagnole, written for the violin, since the violoncello, at its gayest, has a pathetic note. The young artist, Miss Ruegger, gave the smooth, flowing air with pure tone and sympathetic feeling.—Boston Courier, October 22.

Miss Ruegger's performance of the solo part showed her to be a young artist of admirable skill. Her tone is pure, her technic is ample, and she plays with a musician's sincerity of style and a freedom from affectation and unnecessary display that win esteem for her at once. Elegance, warmth of feeling, intelligence and a leaning toward what is best and worthiest in her art are among the strongly marked qualities that were clearly apparent in all that she did. Her intonation is faultless, her execution without a blur, and her taste wholly refined. A larger tone and a broader vigor would have made her performance more satisfying; but these will probably come to her by and by. As it is, she is an excellent and very interesting artist, and the justly favorable impression she made was convincingly emphasized by the cordial applause and the enthusiastic recalls she received at the end of the concert.—Ben Woolf in The Sunday Herald, Boston, October 22, 1899.

Elsa Ruegger, the Swiss violoncello virtuoso, made her American début at the Symphony concerts last week. She is just nineteen years old, but the success she has received in the principal cities of Europe is such as would do credit to those who have assiduously studied for many times that number of years. And her European success was duplicated at Music Hall in the Lalo Concerto. It was a masterful rendering.—Boston Times, October 22, 1899.

The Lalo Concerto is not imposing, but it served its purpose in introducing an admirable artist to the Boston public. Miss Ruegger is a 'cello player of rare excellence; in the way of technic she has little to learn; as an interpreter she had small chance of demonstrating her merits in the piece selected. Her style is large and full and dignified, her intonation is faultless and she plays with the easy grace of a master. No allowance need be made for sex, and although Miss Ruegger's talent has not reached its full development, it is of a quality about which there is no doubt.—Saturday Evening Gazette, October 21, 1899.

Miss Ruegger's Success.—It is not often that our concert stage is graced by a woman 'cellist, but the audiences at the Symphony last week had excellent reason to feel that in Miss Elsa Ruegger the violoncello has an unaffected, rarely skilfull and singularly sympathetic interpreter. She was heard in Lalo's Concerto in D minor, announced on the program as given for the first time in this city. At the outset an unusual command of the possibilities of the 'cello was made manifest. A delightful and delicately managed "singing tone" was perhaps chief among the characteristics of Miss Ruegger's playing. Her marked technical skill, evidenced particularly in the closing movement of the Concerto, commanded admiration, all the more because it was made manifest without the slightest apparent effort. As might reasonably have been expected from symphony players, the accompaniment given by the orchestra to the soloist proved delightful—never over emphasized, nor obtruded upon attention, but, under Director Gericke's guiding baton, aiding and supplementing the effect of Miss Ruegger's remarkable solo performance. She was thrice recalled by the rehearsal assemblage, in whose plaudits the musicians joined heartily.—The Boston Sunday Globe, October 22, 1899.

The Lalo Concerto served to introduce to our public a very talented young lady 'cellist, Mlle. Elsa Ruegger, who won a marked success. This means a good deal in a city like Boston, which has always had great 'cellists among its residents. Wulf Fries, in the early days, and Schulz in latter time, the born genius ot the instrument, Fritz Giese, and at present the thorough artist Schroeder. All these have caused the Bostonians to become good connoisseurs of performances on this particular instrument. To win success here, therefore, means something, and Mlle. Ruegger may be quite satisfied with her achievements.—Louis C. Elson in Boston Daily Advertiser, October 23.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 29, 1899.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Three of the five numbers on the program of the symphony concerts last week were presented for the first time in Boston, an avia from "Nadeshda," by A. Goring Thomas; Humpperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" and Mozart's G-minor symphony. The overture to Mendelssohn's "Fair Melusina" and an air from Gluck's "Alceste" were the other numbers. The English contralto, Miss Clara Butt, was the solo singer. Mendelssohn's fanciful work was beautifully interpreted, its delicate tonal coloring being exquisitely set forth, and the brilliancy and dash of the so-called Lusignan episodes showing the full orchestra at its best.

Miss Butt, who is strikingly tall, has a rich and resonant contralto voice that might truthfully be called ponderous. It is too large for a small hall and is much more effective and satisfying when accompanied by an orchestra than when the piano is used. Her lower tones are organ like, the two registers are well blended, the tonal qualities of the upper voice are quite even and a fair degree of flexibility is shown. It appears after a single hearing as if the voice had been carefully developed, for Miss Butt sings quite easily and with marked artistic expression, mainly along dramatic lines. Her declamation in the Gluck aria was almost masculine in its intensity and volume. The song from "Nadeshda" contained contrasting episodes which gave the soloist a wider range for expression and except for an undue accentuation in the more dramatic portions, here Miss Butt clearly indicated her right to be classed as a singer with great natural gifts supplemented by careful preparation. She has a remarkable voice and one which will cause much discussion, pro and con. She was most cordially received, being recalled to the platform many times.

The Humperdinck rhapsody is a romantic work, representing three episodes, "Sunrise," "A Night in a Moorish Cafe" and "A Ride in the Desert," tone pictures, perfectly free in form and descriptive of the subjects. The second movement is specially vivid in colors, and the orchestra played this with splendid effect. The other parts call for no special mention, being easily within the abilities, individually and collectively, of the musicians. Mozart's symphony, almost simple in many of its components, was daintily played throughout, the work of the strings being prominent for unison and clarity of tone.

Mr Mark Hambourg will be the soloist this week. The orchestral novelties will comprise the overture from Siegfried Wagner's "Der Barenhauten" and W. Berger's B-flat major symphony. Mr Hambourg will play Rubinstein's fourth concerto for pianoforte, and the Liszt symphonic poem, "Orpheus," will complete the program.

—Again was Music hall filled with a very large audience at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, several hundred persons standing throughout the concert hour. In the large audience were noted Mrs Agassiz, Mrs Curtis Guild Jr, Miss Mollie Johnson, Mrs William P, Fay, Miss Kitty Fay, Mr Charles Gardner, Mrs E. C. Swift, Mrs Albert Nickerson, Miss Alice Cobb, Mrs Lucius Shattuck, Mrs John Bachelder, Mr J. Foster White and Mr S. Lothrop Thorndike.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, OCTOBER 25, 1899.

THE second symphony concert on Saturday night presented a superb program, and this week included the magnificent piano recital of De Pachmann, so it would seem as though had it contained nothing else the week would have been replete, and music lovers may well have been thoroughly satisfied.

* * *

The symphony program presented was:

Overture to the Prometheus Bound, of Æschylus, op. 38...Goldmark
Concert for violoncello, in D minor.....Lalo
(First time in Boston.)
Chaconne in D minor.....J. S. Bach
(Scored for orchestra by Joachim Raff.)
Symphony No. 6, in C minor, op. 58.....Glazounoff
(First time in Boston.)

Elso Ruegger, the 'cellist, made her first appearance in America as soloist, and if the success of her tour may be measured by her success upon this occasion it will assuredly be very great. Miss Ruegger is young, but nineteen, and beautiful to look upon, yet when she plays one fails to see the physical, attractive as it is, for such preponderance of musical intelligence, refinement and elegance is in evidence. Miss Ruegger came as so many others come, totally unknown except through the medium of a sort of heraldry which so often is the cause of disappointment. It is agreeable then to state that in no way has she fallen short of the most exalted expectations. She handles her instrument with an ease which is almost unexpected upon a violoncello, her intonation is flawless and her refinement and intellect vie with her musicianship, which is really great. She needs no apology for either youth or sex, as she is an artist in every sense, and the public has proved its recognition of this fact.

The Lalo Concerto is not grateful in the first movement, and were it not for many charming bits in the two latter movements, not even Miss Ruegger's skill could have saved it. It opens in a quiet Lento with a sudden and persistent fortissimo chord, which returns when it is least expected and least wanted. The recitative form is used almost to a degree of incoherence and entirely to the degree of monotony. When, however, the intermezzo comes like relief all else must be forgotten, as it contains melody and all the musical merits that is expected of Lalo.

Miss Ruegger was enthusiastically received.

The orchestral numbers were delightfully chosen, and the Glazounoff Symphony, a novelty, was a surprise to all. Mr. Apthorp in his program notes says:

> Alexander Glazounoff was born in St. Petersburg on August 10, 1865. His parents were well off, and enabled to give him an excellent education; indeed, he has always been in such easy circumstances that he could devote all his time to the practice of his art without the burden of giving music lessons. At the age of thirteen he was put under Nicolai Rimsky-Korsakoff for his musical education. In 1883 his first published work, a string quartet, was produced. He was one of the musicians who represented Russia at the Paris Exposition of 1889, conducting his symphonic poem, "Stenka Rakine," at the Trocadéro on June 22, and his second symphony, in F sharp minor, op. 16, on June 29; both of these works were exceedingly favorably noticed in the Paris press. The symphony was written in memory of Franz Liszt.

From a man with a Russian name one has learned to expect the flavor of caviare, but Glazounoff has given us a healthy, straightforward piece of work, devoid of noisy eccentricities and eccentric noises. It is a wonderfully lucid composition, thoroughly in keeping with classical demands, yet distinctly and essentially modern. The second movement is a set of seven variations on a simple theme; nothing could be more interesting nor more melodious than these variations.

In the third movement, an intermezzo, Glazounoff was warmed by the Magic Fire, but he was not consumed as so many others have been. In the fourth movement he pays tribute to his country, and says more plainly than in words, "I am a Russian." The symphony is good. I am glad I heard it, and to know that the writer is young.

The Bach Chaconne, under Gericke's superb classical direction, was a pure bit of classicality; yet don't we all wish that arrangers, even though they be Raffs, would not disarrange Bach?

Those who know and who love "Sakuntala" have no reason to do aught else with the overture of "Prometheus Bound," for they are enough alike to be brothers. Goldmark has, however, wrought a superb musical poem upon this well-known subject, and the way it was presented was admirable. The program was an exceptionably fine one, yet would it not have stood a dash of brilliancy? There was just a tinge of sombreness.

The next soloist will be Miss Clara Butt, and Humperdinck's Moorish Symphony is on the program.

When Elsa Ruegger appeared before the audience at the Boston Symphony concert on Saturday evening, she looked so young and girlish that it seemed almost impossible to realize what a successful career she has had already. The members of the orchestra were most enthusiastic in their admiration and praise of her work, and Mr. Gericke personally congratulated her, paying her a high compliment. She is unaffected by all the praises that have been showered upon her, and realizes that she must study and work hard to attain the high position for which she aims. Her recreation is astronomy, a subject many would consider sufficiently difficult to be taken as a study and not as a pastime. When next she goes to Boston—some time in January—she is anticipating much pleasure in visiting the observatory at Cambridge, and also looks forward to seeing the observatory and telescope at Syracuse.

Friday, 22d, Boston, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall.
Saturday, 23d, Boston, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, Music Hall.

Wednesday, 27th, Boston (R.), matinee, Music Hall
Saturday, 30th, Boston (R.), matinee, Music Hall.

JANUARY, 1900.

Tuesday, 2d, Portland, Me., City Hall.
Wednesday, 3d, Portland, Me., matinee, City Hall.

Ruegger's American Debut.

SCORES AN IMMEDIATE AND PRONOUNCED TRIUMPH WITH THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

ELSA RUEGGER, the distinguished young Swiss 'cellist, who comes to America crowned with the flattering plaudits of the most exacting European critics, made her American début in Boston last week with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. This beautiful young artist has, in addition to the compelling force of her art, a magnetic personality and a manner that is at once unassuming and free from any trace of affectation.

Incidentally, she is the first woman 'cellist who has appeared with the Boston Symphony organization during its entire history, and she convinced the Boston critics of her eminence as a mature artist, in spite of the fact that she will not be eighteen years old until December 6.

That Miss Ruegger had scored an immediate, pronounced and unequivocal success was sent broadcast over the continent by the Associated Press dispatches after her initial appearance Friday afternoon, and the fact was corroborated and indorsed by the verdict of the critics Saturday night. In the opinion of some, the choice of the young soloist's selection was open to question, but all were unanimous in their praise of the masterly manner in which she acquitted herself, as may be seen by the appended excerpts from the Boston Sunday papers:

Miss Elsa Ruegger, the 'cellist, who appeared last night for the first time in America, was born at Lucerne, Switzerland, December 6, 1881. She studied with Jacobs, of the Brussels Conservatory; she played in a charity concert when she was eleven years old, and when she was thirteen she made a concert tour. She was awarded in June, 1896, the first 'cello prize of the Brussels Conservatory "with the highest distinction." Since then she has played in the chief cities of Europe.

The Concerto which she chose was first played at a Pasdeloup concert in Paris December 9, 1877, when Lalo, the composer, was fifty-four years old. The player was Adolph Fischer, the Belgian, who died eight years ago in a madhouse. He played the Concerto in several cities of Europe in 1878.

Miss Ruegger's reputation is well deserved. Her tone is eminently agreeable and pure; her technic is sure and well rounded; she is not over-sentimental in melody; her phrasing is musician-like; and, free from virtuoso trick or affectation, she is respectful to the composer and art.—Philip Hale in the Boston Sunday Journal October 22.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, of Switzerland, the violoncello virtuoso, who achieved a musical triumph in Berlin last season, made her first American appearance in concert as the soloist of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall to-day. She played the Concerto in D minor, by Edouard Lalo, and her genius was recognized by the large audience present. The Concerto, heard here for the first time, gave ample opportunity for Miss Ruegger to display her talent.—Associated Press.

Miss Elsa Ruegger, the young Swiss 'cellist, at her American début with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, had an enthusiastic reception. Although only seventeen years old she is called by many one of the leading 'cello players in the world.

Miss Ruegger's personal magnetism was no small factor in her success. Several times she was called out.—Special to the New York Press.

The Concerto for violoncello by Edouard Lalo, the distinguished violinist and composer, was naturally in a more serious vein than his brilliant Symphonie Espagnole, written for the violin, since the violoncello, at its gayest, has a pathetic note. The young artist, Miss Ruegger, gave the smooth, flowing air with pure tone and sympathetic feeling.—Boston Courier, October 22.

Miss Ruegger's performance of the solo part showed her to be a young artist of admirable skill. Her tone is pure, her technic is ample, and she plays with a musician's sincerity of style and a freedom from affectation and unnecessary display that win esteem for her at once. Elegance, warmth of feeling, intelligence and a leaning toward what is best and worthiest in her art are among the strongly marked qualities that were clearly apparent in all that she did. Her intonation is faultless, her execution without a blur, and her taste wholly refined. A larger tone and a broader vigor would have made her performance more satisfying; but these will probably come to her by and by. As it is, she is an excellent and very interesting artist, and the justly favorable impression she made was convincingly emphasized by the cordial applause and the enthusiastic recalls she received at the end of the concert.—Ben Woolf in The Sunday Herald, Boston, October 22, 1899.

Elsa Ruegger, the Swiss violoncello virtuoso, made her American début at the Symphony concerts last week. She is just nineteen years old, but the success she has received in the principal cities of Europe is such as would do credit to those who have assiduously studied for many times that number of years. And her European success was duplicated at Music Hall in the Lalo Concerto. It was a masterful rendering.—Boston Times, October 22, 1899.

The Lalo Concerto is not imposing, but it served its purpose in introducing an admirable artist to the Boston public. Miss Ruegger is a 'cello player of rare excellence; in the way of technic she has little to learn; as an interpreter she had small chance of demonstrating her merits in the piece selected. Her style is large and full and dignified, her intonation is faultless and she plays with the easy grace of a master. No allowance need be made for sex, and although Miss Ruegger's talent has not reached its full development, it is of a quality about which there is no doubt.—Saturday Evening Gazette, October 21, 1899.

Miss Ruegger's Success.—It is not often that our concert stage is graced by a woman 'cellist, but the audiences at the Symphony last week had excellent reason to feel that in Miss Elsa Ruegger the violoncello has an unaffected, rarely skilfull and singularly sympathetic interpreter. She was heard in Lalo's Concerto in D minor, announced on the program as given for the first time in this city. At the outset an unusual command of the possibilities of the 'cello was made manifest. A delightful and delicately managed "singing tone" was perhaps chief among the characteristics of Miss Ruegger's playing. Her marked technical skill, evidenced particularly in the closing movement of the Concerto, commanded admiration, all the more because it was made manifest without the slightest apparent effort. As might reasonably have been expected from symphony players, the accompaniment given by the orchestra to the soloist proved delightful—never over emphasized, nor obtruded upon attention, but, under Director Gericke's guiding baton, aiding and supplementing the effect of Miss Ruegger's remarkable solo performance. She was thrice recalled by the rehearsal assemblage, in whose plaudits the musicians joined heartily.—The Boston Sunday Globe, October 22, 1899.

The Lalo Concerto served to introduce to our public a very talented young lady 'cellist, Mlle. Elsa Ruegger, who won a marked success. This means a good deal in a city like Boston, which has always had great 'cellists among its residents. Wulf Fries, in the early days, and Schulz in latter time, the born genius of the instrument, Fritz Giese, and at present the thorough artist Schroeder. All these have caused the Bostonians to become good connoisseurs of performances on this particular instrument. To win success here, therefore, means something, and Mlle. Ruegger may be quite satisfied with her achievements.—Louis C. Elson in Boston Daily Advertiser, October 23.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, OCT. 29, 1899.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Three of the five numbers on the program of the symphony concerts last week were presented for the first time in Boston, an avia from "Nadeshda," by A. Goring Thomas; Humpperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" and Mozart's G-minor symphony. The overture to Mendelssohn's "Fair Melusina" and an air from Gluck's "Alceste" were the other numbers. The English contralto, Miss Clara Butt, was the solo singer. Mendelssohn's fanciful work was beautifully interpreted, its delicate tonal coloring being exquisitely set forth, and the brilliancy and dash of the so-called Lusignan episodes showing the full orchestra at its best.

Miss Butt, who is strikingly tall, has a rich and resonant contralto voice that might truthfully be called ponderous. It is too large for a small hall and is much more effective and satisfying when accompanied by an orchestra than when the piano is used. Her lower tones are organ like, the two registers are well blended, the tonal qualities of the upper voice are quite even and a fair degree of flexibility is shown. It appears after a single hearing as if the voice had been carefully developed, for Miss Butt sings quite easily and with marked artistic expression, mainly along dramatic lines. Her declamation in the Gluck aria was almost masculine in its intensity and volume. The song from "Nadeshda" contained contrasting episodes which gave the soloist a wider range for expression and except for an undue accentuation in the more dramatic portions, here Miss Butt clearly indicated her right to be classed as a singer with great natural gifts supplemented by careful preparation. She has a remarkable voice and one which will cause much discussion, pro and con. She was most cordially received, being recalled to the platform many times.

The Humperdinck rhapsody is a romantic work, representing three episodes, "Sunrise," "A Night in a Moorish Cafe" and "A Ride in the Desert," tone pictures, perfectly free in form and descriptive of the subjects. The second movement is specially vivid in colors, and the orchestra played this with splendid effect. The other parts call for no special mention, being easily within the abilities, individually and collectively, of the musicians. Mozart's symphony, almost simple in many of its components, was daintily played throughout, the work of the strings being prominent for unison and clarity of tone.

Mr Mark Hambourg will be the soloist this week. The orchestral novelties will comprise the overture from Siegfried Wagner's "Der Barenhauten" and W. Berger's B-flat major symphony. Mr Hambourg will play Rubinstein's fourth concerto for pianoforte, and the Liszt symphonic poem, "Orpheus," will complete the program.

—Again was Music hall filled with a very large audience at the Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon, several hundred persons standing throughout the concert hour. In the large audience were noted Mrs Agassiz, Mrs Curtis Guild Jr, Miss Mollie Johnson, Mrs William P. Fay, Miss Kitty Fay, Mr Charles Gardner, Mrs E. C. Swift, Mrs Albert Nickerson, Miss Alice Cobb, Mrs Lucius Shattuck, Mrs John Bachelder, Mr J. Foster White and Mr S. Lothrop Thorndike.

AN ARTIST.

Mlle. Elsa Ruegger,

THE FIRST WOMAN 'CELLIST WHO HAS EVER APPEARED WITH THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Scores a Triumph

ASSOCIATED PRESS DISPATCHES.

BOSTON, Oct. 20, 1899.

Mlle. Ruegger's genius was recognized by the large audience present. Her execution was superb at times, and on the whole was masterful.

Special to the New York Press:

BOSTON, Oct. 21, 1899.

Mlle. Elsa Ruegger, the young Swiss 'cellist, at her American début with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, had an enthusiastic reception. Although only seventeen years old, she is called by many one of the leading 'cello players of the world. Mlle. Ruegger's personal magnetism was no small factor in her success. Several times she was called out.

ABBREVIATED BOSTON CRITICISMS.

Boston Journal, Oct. 22, 1899.

Mlle. Ruegger's reputation is well deserved. Her technic is sure and well rounded; her phrasing is musician-like; she is respectful to the composer and art.—PHILIP HALE.

Boston Herald, Oct. 22, 1899.

Mlle. Ruegger's performance showed her to be a young artist of admirable skill. Elegance, warmth of feeling, intelligence and a leaning toward what is best and worthiest in her art are among the strongly marked qualities that were clearly apparent in all that she did. Her intonation is faultless, her execution without a blur, and her taste wholly refined.

The justly favorable impression she made was convincingly emphasized by the cordial applause and enthusiastic recalls she received at the end of the concert.—WOOLF.

Boston Globe, Oct. 22, 1899.

After Miss Elsa Ruegger's remarkable solo performance, she was thrice recalled by the rehearsal assemblage, in whose plaudits the musicians of the orchestra joined heartily.

Boston Evening Gazette, Oct. 21, 1899.

Mlle. Ruegger is a 'cello player of rare excellence; in the way of technic she has little to learn; her style is large and full and dignified, her intonation is faultless, and she plays with the easy grace of a master.

Boston Times, Oct. 22, 1899.

Mlle. Ruegger's European success was duplicated at Music Hall in the Lalo Concerto, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a masterful rendering.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING OCTOBER 29, 1899.
COPYRIGHT, 1899, POST PUBLISHING CO.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A larger audience than the week before was present at last night's Symphony concert, drawn thither, doubtless, by the presence of the new English contralto, Miss Clara Butt, who was heard here for the first time. To speak first of the soloist, she is tall and willowy, has a fine, expressive face, and altogether a pleasing stage presence. She is easy and natural, and sings with little effort. Her first number was an air from the opera "Alceste," by Christoph Willibald. Neither composer nor opera are familiar to Boston audiences, so, therefore, last night's performance was in the nature of a novelty.

The selection gave ample opportunity to display all the qualities of her voice, and the very first notes showed the [illegible] to which she could go. For a contralto her range is quite wide. Her notes have a clear, bell-like quality, though not possessing much body. In volume of tone she quite equals any singer heard here in a long time, but last night there was a slight tendency to be explosive. For clearness of enunciation, she is to be heartily commended, and almost as much so for her style of singing.

Her second number, a song by Goring Thomas, was less successful, owing largely to the monotony of the song, which, while full of florid passages, is yet colorless. However, after each number she was heartily applauded, and bowed her acknowledgments with a true English cordiality. During her performance she stood with her hands behind her, instead of in front, which is so characteristic of English singers.

A novelty on the programme was the Moorish Rhapsody by Humperdinck. It has three movements, each as distinct from the other as possible, and every one full of quaint variations, showing the inventive, resourceful mind of the composer. Each movement is thoroughly descriptive, telling the story quite as plainly in music as might be done in speech.

The other numbers were the Bartholdy overture to "The Fair Melusina" and the Mozart symphony No. 25 in G minor.

[illegible] next week's Symphony the soloist [illegible] be Mark Hambourg, who will be [illegible] in the Rubinstein concerto for [illegible], No. 4, while two numbers heard [illegible] the first time will be the over- [illegible] "[illegible] Barenhauten," by Sieg- [illegible], son of the famous com- [illegible] symphony in B flat major

---

Belongs to the People who Inhabit It.
Oct 28
BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

It is strange that our city is no more advanced, musically, at this day than it was a quarter of a century ago, says the Brooklyn Eagle. Indeed, it is longer ago than that since Theodore Thomas made his most noted successes in the dingy hall, with its accessory bar and sandwich counter, that was called Central Park Garden. Population at that time centred miles below the park, and the only way to go there was by means of horse cars that required about an hour to make the trip from the lower part of the city, unless one resorted to the shaky little elevated road, with 2 story cars and 10-ct. fares, on Ninth ave., a mile away.

Yet those concerts were well patronized and it was there that Mr. Thomas confirmed his reputation and made his place as the leading orchestra director in this country. It was there that Wagner was popularized and the Fifth Symphony was heard through clouds of cigar smoke.

If good music can be given under such conditions, why can it not be supplied under better conditions, if there is no increase in price? It must be that the reason for the fewness of orchestral concerts is in the timidity of managers. In Brooklyn the people do not care so much for music as they used to dö. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the best in the world, does not bring out so many of them as Mr. Thomas did in the days of the Philharmonic.

This seems strange when we hear that Philadelphia has sold in advance every seat for every concert of the same orchestra; but Brooklyn always did like to be different, and she may not patronize orchestral concerts worthily until she has a good band of her own.

Has Brooklyn gone backward in 25 yrs., in spite of its doubled population, or has it found that music and surf makes the most agreeable combination? There must be a revival of interest in the highest music one of these days. It cannot be that Boston is continually to hold the lead over us.

AN ARTIST.

Mlle. Elsa Ruegger,

THE FIRST WOMAN 'CELLIST WHO
HAS EVER APPEARED WITH THE

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Scores a Triumph

ASSOCIATED PRESS DISPATCHES.

BOSTON, Oct. 20, 1899.

Mlle. Ruegger's genius was recognized by the large audience present. Her execution was superb at times, and on the whole was masterful.

Special to the New York Press:

BOSTON, Oct. 21, 1899.

Mlle. Elsa Ruegger, the young Swiss 'cellist, at her American début with the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, had an enthusiastic reception. Although only seventeen years old, she is called by many one of the leading 'cello players of the world. Mlle. Ruegger's personal magnetism was no small factor in her success. Several times she was called out.

ABBREVIATED BOSTON CRITICISMS.

Boston Journal, Oct. 22, 1899.

Mlle. Ruegger's reputation is well deserved. Her technic is sure and well rounded; her phrasing is musician-like; she is respectful to the composer and art.—PHILIP HALE.

Boston Herald, Oct. 22, 1899.

Mlle. Ruegger's performance showed her to be a young artist of admirable skill. Elegance, warmth of feeling, intelligence and a leaning toward what is best and worthiest in her art are among the strongly marked qualities that were clearly apparent in all that she did. Her intonation is faultless, her execution without a blur, and her taste wholly refined.

The justly favorable impression she made was convincingly emphasized by the cordial applause and enthusiastic recalls she received at the end of the concert.—WOOLF.

Boston Globe, Oct. 22, 1899.

After Miss Elsa Ruegger's remarkable solo performance, she was thrice recalled by the rehearsal assemblage, in whose plaudits the musicians of the orchestra joined heartily.

Boston Evening Gazette, Oct. 21, 1899.

Mlle. Ruegger is a 'cello player of rare excellence; in the way of technic she has little to learn; her style is large and full and dignified, her intonation is faultless, and she plays with the easy grace of a master.

Boston Times, Oct. 22, 1899.

Mlle. Ruegger's European success was duplicated at Music Hall in the Lalo Concerto, with the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was a masterful rendering.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING OCTOBER 29, 1899.
COPYRIGHT, 1899, POST PUBLISHING CO.

THIRD SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A larger audience than the week before was present at last night's Symphony concert, drawn thither, doubtless, by the presence of the new English contralto, Miss Clara Butt, who was heard here for the first time. To speak first of the soloist, she is tall and willowy, has a fine, expressive face, and altogether a pleasing stage presence. She is easy and natural, and sings with little effort. Her first number was an air from the opera "Alceste," by Christoph Willibald. Neither composer nor opera are familiar to Boston audiences, so, therefore, last night's performance was in the nature of a novelty.

The selection gave ample opportunity to display all the qualities of her voice, and the very first notes showed the depth to which she could go. For a contralto her range is quite wide. Her notes have a clear, bell-like quality, though not possessing much body. In volume of tone she quite equals any singer heard here in a long time, but last night there was a slight tendency to be explosive. For clearness of enunciation, she is to be heartily commended, and almost as much so for her style of singing.

Her second number, a song by Goring Thomas, was less successful, owing largely to the monotony of the song, which, while full of florid passages, is yet colorless. However, after each number she was heartily applauded, and bowed her acknowledgments with a true English cordiality. During her performance she stood with her hands behind her, instead of in front, which is so characteristic of English singers.

A novelty on the programme was the Moorish Rhapsody by Humperdinck. It has three movements, each as distinct from the other as possible, and every one full of quaint variations, showing the inventive, resourceful mind of the composer. Each movement is thoroughly descriptive, telling the story quite as plainly in music as might be done in speech.

The other numbers were the Bartholdy overture to "The Fair Melusina" and the Mozart symphony No. 25 in G minor.

At next week's Symphony the soloist will be Mark Hambourg, who will be heard in the Rubinstein concerto for piano, No. 4, while two numbers heard here for the first time will be the overture to "Der Barenhauten," by Siegfried Wagner, son of the famous composer, and the symphony in B flat major by W. Berger.

Belongs to the People who Inhabit It."

Oct 28

BOSTON EVENING RECORD.

It is strange that our city is no more advanced, musically, at this day than it was a quarter of a century ago, says the Brooklyn Eagle. Indeed, it is longer ago than that since Theodore Thomas made his most noted successes in the dingy hall, with its accessory bar and sandwich counter, that was called Central Park Garden. Population at that time centred miles below the park, and the only way to go there was by means of horse cars that required about an hour to make the trip from the lower part of the city, unless one resorted to the shaky little elevated road, with 2 story cars and 10-ct. fares, on Ninth ave., a mile away.

Yet those concerts were well patronized and it was there that Mr. Thomas confirmed his reputation and made his place as the leading orchestra director in this country. It was there that Wagner was popularized and the Fifth Symphony was heard through clouds of cigar smoke.

If good music can be given under such conditions, why can it not be supplied under better conditions, if there is no increase in price? It must be that the reason for the fewness of orchestral concerts is in the timidity of managers. In Brooklyn the people do not care so much for music as they used to do. The Boston Symphony Orchestra, the best in the world, does not bring out so many of them as Mr. Thomas did in the days of the Philharmonic.

This seems strange when we hear that Philadelphia has sold in advance every seat for every concert of the same orchestra; but Brooklyn always did like to be different, and she may not patronize orchestral concerts worthily until she has a good band of her own.

Has Brooklyn gone backward in 25 yrs., in spite of its doubled population, or has it found that music and surf makes the most agreeable combination? There must be a revival of interest in the highest music one of these days. It cannot be that Boston is continually to hold the lead over us.

[32]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, OCT. 30, 1899.

Third Symphony Concert—Miss Butt's First Appearance.

There was no great intellectual strain on those who heard the third Symphony concert Saturday night. Everything was pretty, and well-bred, and nice, and extremely ladylike. Even the Humperdinck rhapsody was provocative of mental excitement only because of its extremely gaudy coloring and its multitude of Humperdincky outbursts.

There was the sweetly solemn thought of the Mendelssohn "Melusina" and there was a symphony in G minor (not "the" symphony in G minor, but the "boy-prodigy" work of the composer at an early age, when he stole better men's themes and wrote them out in his own hand), and Miss Butt, the contralto, who was making her first Boston appearance, sang an aria from Gluck's "Alceste," and also a song from Goring-Thomas's "Nadeshda."

The weather was out of place for the last of October, and the air was so damp that more than one string was unexpectedly snapped; but within Music Hall there was peace and refinement and as thoroughly enjoyable a time as if it were an afternoon tea over which "Mrs." Mendelssohn was presiding. The Humperdinck outburst was really the only outre episode of the evening.

Of that interesting but sometimes garrulous and blatant number, it is to be said that it has many merits, but these are too obtrusively presented. The composer has found some good stories, but that is no reason why he should persist in telling them so insistently and so abundantly, ringing the changes so constantly, until his hearers are likely to call him a bore.

There is much that is admirable in his tales of Morocco, but the man who bores his acquaintances too much with his experiences of foreign travel is eventually shunned like a Chelsea smallpox suspect.

With a stern and conscientious use of the blue pencil, the rhapsody would be much improved. It sometimes seems a pity that the censor devotes himself exclusively to war news in these days, and lets an inviting thing like the Moorish rhapsody escape him.

Miss Butt is a singer of much merit who has an unusually good voice in the lower register. She chose as her first song the aria "Divinites du Styx," which was sung with far more dramatic effect by Blanche Marchesi last season.

It is not altogether profitless to compare the two, for Miss Butt sang with a remarkable contralto voice and Mme. Marchesi had a far inferior voice; yet the memory of the earlier singer showed that Miss Butt did not seize all her opportunities. Her change from a contralto to a higher register showed a sudden reediness. It would be wiser to choose less exacting numbers, so as to give fuller scope for her best tones, or else to endeavor to cultivate in her higher register the same beautiful fulness and charm that are so delightful in the lower tones.

There could be no doubt as to the impression made on her auditors. A really good, resonant contralto is so rare that it is not surprising that the soloist was recalled again and again, after each of her songs. Although she missed something of the full dramatic effect in the Gluck aria, it is to be said at least that her singing is of a decidedly higher level than the average blanked-eyed, staring-at-the-wall concert singers. There are many concert-singers of pretensions who would sing the aria with about the same expression and intensity as a clerk reading the call for a democratic caucus in Wd. 11.

Of the orchestral work generally, it is worth special comment that the handicap of the weather on the strings (and it must have been serious) could not produce any departure from the absolutely artistic and almost perfect ensemble. Entirely apart from any question of the merits of the works presented, the orchestral achievements under such conditions absolutely compelled admiration. The achievement was limited to no special number, but perhaps it was most noteworthy in the many difficult passages of the Mendelssohn overture. The brilliant coloring of the opening movement, those delicate arpeggios which represent the flowing waters from which Melusina came (perhaps "sprang" would be the better word, as they were spring waters) was deliciously given, where a less skilful orchestra would have suggested merely the spasmodic gurgling of a soda-fountain faucet.

Of the Mozart symphony, it must be admitted that there is little in the score itself to evoke awe or unrestrained delight. When young, Mozart must have had an easy-going disposition, for he certainly took things as he found them. He exploits a number of his finds in the G minor symphony that was given at the concert; but these foundlings are not always interesting. Yet the orchestra certainly left no room for criticism on its ability or judgment. Indeed there was rather cause for wonder that so uninteresting a symphony could be played with such thorough command and oftentimes with really attractive beauty.

Altogether the soloist and the orchestra turned what had promised to be a rather dull entertainment into a pleasant and delightful evening, in many ways. Mr. Gericke was his old self again and had his men under perfect command. The programme for next Saturday's concert mentions Wagner's overture "Der Baerenhaeuten," for the first time, Berger's symphony in B flat major, also a novelty, and Mark Hambourg as soloist.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1899.

CLARA BUTT.

First Appearance of This Contralto in Boston.

A Singer of Noble Voice in Lower Register.

Old and New Works by Mozart and Humperdinck.

(By Philip Hale.)

The program of the third Symphony concert in Music Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Overture, "The Fair Melusina"..Mendelssohn
"Divinités du Styx"....................Gluck
Moorish Rhapsody..............Humperdinck
(First time in Boston.)
I. Tarifa, Elegy at Sunrise.
II. Tangier, A Night in the Moorish Café.
III. Tetuan, A Ride into the Desert.
Song, "My Heart is Weary," from "Nadeshda"....................Goring Thomas
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 25, in G minor (Kochel, No. 183)..........................Mozart
(First time in Boston.)

Humperdinck wrote his "Moorish Rhapsody" for the Leeds Festival of 1898, and the first performance of the first two movements was at Leeds, Oct. 7, when he conducted. The same movements were played at Heidelberg in November of that year, and the first performance of the Rhapsody as it was heard last night was at Frankfort-on-the-Main, Feb. 17, 1899, when Kogel led. Humperdinck, a Rhinelander by birth and present residence, spent two years ('85-'87) in Barcelona, where he taught att he conservatory. Hence, possibly, the thought of a Moorish Rhapsody.

I wish that Mr. Apthorp had been ungentlemanly enough to disregard the singular request of the publisher of the score, and had printed the poems by Gustav Humperdinck, the father of the composer, in the program-book. These poems might show the literary-musical intentions of the Humperdinck family. As it was, the music was in great measure absolute, and the hearer who has not visited the three towns, roaming at large or personally conducted by an agent of good Mr. Cook, was obliged to receive merely musical impressions.

The work is in certain ways ingenious and interesting. There are piquant rhythms, there is exotic melody, there are gorgeous and fascinating pages of orchestration. The reminiscences of Humperdinck, however seriously they may vex others, do not disturb me, for they are sporadic and no doubt accidental rather than chronic and deliberate. There is much to admire in the workmanship. The composer is a master of polyphonic treatment, and his utterance in this respect is authoritative and often his own. You may be reminded for a moment of Wagner, or Liszt, or Smetana, but, after all, Humperdinck has a good deal to say. I may add that he says too much, for he is garrulous, especially in the last movement.

He is too enamored of his own effects, especially of a peculiarly ingenious thickening of color. You wish that something would check, or, on the other hand, reinforce the long tune of the first violins. The exotic melody, the Oriental scale, the ultra-modern harmonization—all these finally bring weariness and you feel that a few commonplaces of tonic and dominant and subdominant would add contrasting piquancy. Yet you hear with pleasure and you remember after the concert the effective close of "Tangier"; the lively tune of the obe in "Tarifa," the opening measures of "Tetuan," and many strong, irresistible orchestral effects. If the third movement were condensed, I am sure the whole would make a stronger impression.

⁂

The symphony of Mozart, exhumed by Mr. Gericke, was written in Salzburg when the "glorious boy" was about 17 years old, and, as Mr. Apthorp reminds us, nearly 20 years before the first of Haydn's "Salomon" symphonies. It therefore may have a historical interest. It has no other interest, for melodically, harmonically, rhythmically and orchestrally it is dull and as dead as King Pandion. Even the presence of four horns in the orchestra in 1773 does not console me.

I had not heard the Melusina overture for some years. When I was a student in Berlin it was a favorite piece, and it was used alternately with the equally celebrated "Oberon" overture. It is not to be ranked with the "Hebrides" overture, which is one of the very few masterpieces of Mendelssohn—you can count them on one hand.

⁂

Miss Clara Butt, who made her first appearance in Boston, is a popular singer in her own country. She sings at Festivals, and she sings in concerts where artless and sentimental tunes arouse the crowd to delirious applause. The Prince of Wales complimented her publicly when she was still in school, and just before her departure for this country some passionate soul addressed to her a poem which was published in the Pall Mall Gazette on the page which at present reeks with bloodthirsty articles against the Boers.

She sang last night the great air from "Alceste," which is not a contralto aria; it was written for a dramatic soprano and sung first by Bernasconi, and then by Rosalie Levasseur. The air itself loses half its force when it is taken from its frame and exhibited on the concert stage. I have heard Gabriele Krauss deliver it with thrilling effect, even when she had passed her prime, but Krauss was a great dramatic singer and a mistress of the grand style. Miss Butt also sang an air of the Princess from Goring Thomas's Russian opera "Nadéshda," produced at Drury Lane April 16, 1885, when this air was sung by Josephine Yorke. Julian Sturgis wrote the libretto and the following verse sung by Miss Butt suggests at once a pleasing ballad of the heart and home:

Oh, my heart is weary,
Weary night and day,
For dreaming of my children
And doom of brothers' fray.

Goring Thomas has written delightful things, but this song is an admirable specimen of the sheet-music, drawing-room ballad that moves the bulbous British matron after a solemn, potent dinner. It is a pity that Miss Butt did not give us the opportunity of hearing Mr. Elgar's Sea-Songs with orchestral accompaniment which were written expressly for her.

Miss Butt has lower tones of noble sonority and haunting beauty. Her upper register is in sharp contrast. The tones are artificial and without body. You are reminded of Wordworth's "two voices are there"; but, alas, each is not "a mighty voice." Her middle tones are weak, and the transition from natural strength to that which is artificial and precarious is disagreeably marked. She has pronounced dramatic feeling, and she could, therefore, dispense with a few mannerisms that suggest affectation. She sings with an abandon that is often extremely effective; and she is so evidently a woman favored by Nature that you regret the lack of thoroughly grounded technic. It seems to me that sudden and tumultuous praise when she was at the beginning of her career swereved her from the long and narrow path that must be tramped laboriously; that, seeing how easy it is to gain applause, she relied chiefly on the sumptuousness of certain and natural lower tones. And I was disturbed constantly during her performance, even when I was thrilled by the strength and the beauty of her lower register, by the suspicion that she would much prefer to be singing the world-famous ballad of the late Mr. Crouch and awaiting the thunderous applause that would follow a "soulful" interpretation of that ditty.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 121.
SUNDAY, OCTOBER 29, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Third for This Season, with Miss Butt as Soloist.

Three Novelties of Differing Merits on the Programme—Splendid Orchestral Work in Difficult Compositions—The English Singer Meets with Favor.

The programme for the third concert of its season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke conductor, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture, "Melusina"..............Mendelssohn
Air, "Divinites du Styx," from "Alceste"..................................Gluck
Moorish rhapsody................Humperdinck
(First time in Boston.)
Song, "My Heart is Weary," from "Nadeshda"......................Goring Thomas
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 25, in G minor (Kochel, 183)
Mozart
(First time in Boston.)

The soloist was Miss Clara Butt, an English contralto, who has won great popularity in her own country.

Of the three novelties, the Humperdinck rhapsody was the most important. On a first hearing its meaning is not made very clear. The programme informs the listener that the opening movement is an "Elegy at Sunrise" at Tarifa; the second, "A Night in the Moorish Cafe" at Tangier, and the third, "A Ride Into the Desert" at Tetuan. The musical treatment of all three movements seems to be much in the same vein; and if the descriptive titles had been differently applied, it is to be doubted if any one would be the wiser, as far as the general effect is concerned.

A more familiar acquaintance with the work may possibly lay bare melodic beauties that were not apparent last night. As it was, the chief interest of the composition was in the orchestration, which is extraordinarily elaborate, often singularly ingenious, and at times strikingly original. The score is almost amazing in its variety of instrumental color. There is much of noise, much of solid massing of brass, little that charms by reason of grace and tenderness. Everything burns at a white heat. One at last wearies of the clever and brilliant orchestral complexity, and yearns for something more of repose and of simplicity.

The spirit of the whole is Wagnerian, but there is a lack of the clearness, the largeness and the admirable judgment shown in Wagner's scoring. That there is vigorous power in the rhapsody is undeniable, but, taken altogether, its interest falls off after the opening of the second movement, owing to the persistence with which the same orchestral devices are repeated again and again, and yet again. The demands made on the virtuosity of the players, strings, wood and brass, are immense, but, it is hardly necessary to add, these were met and overcome with fluent success, and the performance displayed the splendid quality and discipline of the orchestra at their highest point.

The Mozart symphony is not to be ranked with the greater works in kind of the composer, but it does not deserve the neglect with which it has been treated, and Mr. Gericke is to be heartily thanked for the opportunity he has afforded to hear it. The score is remarkable, inasmuch as it is without flutes, clarinets and trumpets, and also because it is the only work in which the composer has used four horns. The wood wind is confined to two oboes and two bassoons.

After the storm and stress of the rhapsody, it was interesting to observe how solid a body of tone and what vigorous effects Mozart has obtained from the simple means to which he resorted. The symphony is notable for its sustained vigor and for the infrequency with which are heard those peculiar characteristics which we have learned to call Mozartish. The second theme of the opening movement and of the finale, and the charming trio in the minuet for the wind instruments alone, are, however, unmistakable. Mr. Gericke's reading of the work was delightfully frank and sympathetic, and its performance was, of course, faultless.

It was gratifying to hear the graceful and poetic Mendelssohn overture again, especially in the beautiful interpretation that was accorded it.

Miss Butt has a superb voice of remarkable range. It is a real contralto, of which the lower notes are of extraordinary volume and richness and surprisingly masculine in timbre. The upper notes are clean, but scarcely of pleasing quality, and there seems to be a decided gap between her deeper and her higher registers; in fact, they do not seem to be connected by what may be called a middle register naturally growing out of the the lower one and joining it to the upper. In fact, there is a point at which the contralto quality seems to stop short. With the exception of her lower notes, her tone, though large, is hollow, and appears to be lacking in proper support by the breath.

She has fire and temperament, natural gifts of a high order, and sings with a frankness that is decidedly winning. She declaimed the Gluck aria with intelligent dramatic feeling in its leading theme; but elsewhere something of necessary largeness and sincerity of style was missing.

The trashy Goring-Thomas aria was wholly out of place on a Symphony programme. It is little better than a parlor song bombasted beyond its due proportions, and exasperating in its flabby pretentiousness. In this song, however, the artist was heard with better general effect than in the Gluck selection, and after hearing her in this music it was easy to understand the great favor she has won abroad as a singer of songs and ballads in which her beautiful voice and her limited command over the higher essentials of her art are not too exactingly taxed. Miss Butt was received cordially and was applauded and recalled with great enthusiasm after each of her contributions to the concert.

The programme for the next performance is: Overture, "Der Baerenhaeuten," Siegfried Wagner (first time); concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, Rubinstein; symphonic poem, "Orpheus," Liszt; symphony, B-flat major, W. Berger (first time). Mr. Mark Hambourg is to be the soloist.

Some of us want to call her "Mr." Clare Butt, she is such a good fellow, and when she acknowledges the audience's applause we wish to keep calling her out again and again, just to see her bow. There is plenty of Swedish movement about this young giantess, who is as limber as a willow wand.

Miss Clara Butt, the English contralto and one of the handsomest singers who has visited America for some years, made a tremendous success at the symphony rehearsal and concert last week. She has just arrived from her home in London where she is well known to many Boston people who have met her at Mrs. Ronald's, and other smart houses during the season. Miss Butt's voice is beautifully placed, of splendid compass and rare power, and she sings with great dramatic force. She is superbly tall, standing six feet two, and her head is so well set on her shoulders and she carries it so high that she seems even of greater height than she is. It is a treat to see a woman so exceedingly tall, as svelte and graceful as Miss Butt is. Her figure is like a young sapling in its splendid suppleness. Friday afternoon Miss Butt wore black, the tunic of thinner material, heavily paillетted with steel and jet. The bodice was done in the same way, slightly opened at the throat to show a deep dog collar of pearls. She wore a rope of pearls extending far below the waist, and was without a hat. Last night Miss Butt was simply resplendent in a London gown of latest mode of white satin and chiffon. She carried the crowded house by storm, not more by her voice than her magnetic personality. A few in the crush noted at the rehearsal were Mr. and Mrs. Gerard Bement, Miss Mary Parkman, Mrs. R. D. Evans and Miss Hunt, Miss Alice Cotting, Miss Constance Morse, Mrs. Sewell H. Fessenden, Mr. and Mrs. William B. Merrill, Mr. and Mrs. George Inches, Mrs. John Lowell, Mr. Homer Norris, Miss Rita Hollander, Mr. Lothrop Thorndike, Mrs. W. P. Fay with her brother Mr. Abbott, Miss Mabel Jones of Cambridge, Mrs. S. V. R. Crosby, Mrs. William Hooper, Mrs. E. D. Jordan and her son, Mrs. Herbert Dumaresq and Miss Elsa Sherwood.

Miss Butt made a sensation at the Hollis Street Theatre on Friday night, where she went to see Mr. and Mrs. Kendal. She was in a box with Mr. C. A. Ellis and wore the same gown in which she appeared at the rehearsal.

MARK HAMBOURG, THE RUSSIAN PIANIST.

HAMBOURG IS HERE

Young Russian Pianist Arrives in New York.

PLEASING PERSONALITY

Artist Is Easy to Approach and Talks Interestingly of His Career and Achievements—Made His Debut in Moscow.

Mark Hambourg, the young Russian pianist, arrived in New York on Wednesday, crossing on the Teutonic. Young Hambourg has made a remarkable record in the Old World, and now comes to the United States to establish an American reputation.

Mr. Hambourg is an attractive young fellow from every standpoint. He is approachable, quite communicative, and seems willing to talk about himself without appearing at all egotistical. The pianist is 20 years old, but he looks any age between that and 30. He is short and square-shouldered, with a pale, intellectual face, a huge forehead and a mass of dark-brown hair, brushed back in careless fashion. His hands are rather small and delicately slender, but in his forearms and shoulders there are muscles that are as hard as hickory sticks. He speaks English fluently.

He was seen at the Hotel Martin, in New York, on Thursday, and gave the following facts about himself to a representative of the Herald.

Born in Bogutschar.

"You want some statistics about me, I suppose," Mr. Hambourg said. "I was born in Bogutschar and studied with my father. I was not fond of practicing at that time, and used to do all sorts of things to avoid having to practice. I recollect my best scheme was to run splinters and pieces of wood into my fingers, accidentally, of course, so that I would be excused from regular work at the piano. When I was 9 years old I made my debut in Moscow. Then I had a short career as a prodigy. I went to Leschititsky to study in 1895. I have played in Germany, Paris and England and have made two tours in Australia."

"You use the dumb keyboard, Mr. Hambourg?"

"Oh, yes. I used it on shipboard."

"What do you practice on it—simply exercises, to keep your fingers in trim?"

"Oh, no—anything," he said with a shrug.

"And for memorizing?"

"No, for that I use the piano."

"You memorize easily, then?"

"Oh, yes. I think I have a very good memory. I play over a piece a couple of times, and I have it—a short piece; a longer one, 15 minutes."

"Do you practice much?"

"Hardly ever more than three hours and a half a day."

"And what do you do the rest of the time?"

"I read. Yes, I think I have a pretty good education. I have read a good deal of philosophy. One has to know many things nowadays; we live so fast. They used to say if a man had a musical education that was enough. But I think music is a gift all by itself. Look at Beethoven—what did he know?"

"He knew Shakespeare."

"Yes, he could read Shakespeare and understand him—but that was genius."

"Who are your favorite composers, Mr. Hambourg?"

"Oh, you mustn't ask me my opinions," said Mr. Hambourg, looking somewhat bewildered. "I like the three B's—Bach, Beethoven and Brahms. I like Schuman and Chopin, too."

Hard to Decide.

"Who is writing the best music for the piano now?"

"Ah, that is very hard to say. They are all writing very well. Ah, but they understand it. They learned it from Liszt. He was the greatest of them all. He made the piano. Why, before he showed them how no one could play Beethoven's sonatas. Everyone made them so dry, so dull—it made Beethoven himself crazy—'chopping sticks,' he called it. But they all played like that then. There was Clementi. He was dry and formal as could be. People want 13-story buildings nowadays, and they want 13-story pieces."

"But the ideas—take Haydn, for example?"

"Haydn is too simple to play nowadays. The idea of a one-story building may be very good, but people want the 13- story buildings. This is a nervous age, and people want emotional music."

"Speaking of the sonatas, you know the glissando runs in the last movement of the Waldstein sonata"—

"Oh, yes," said Mr. Hambourg, humming them and waving his hands, as though he were playing them. "But I do not play them glissando. Paderewski does, but no one else. They are easy, however. I once saw the original manuscript of the Waldstein sonata," continued Mr. Hambourg, "and over those glissando runs Beethoven had written nicht zu schnell' (not too fast). It shows what a genius he had. He could forsee that pianists would want to play those runs too fast. I have some Beethoven autographs of my own—a sketch of an overture. I collect autographs and coins. I have many works on numismatics, in German, French and English—quite a library."

"Do you like the last sonatas of Beethoven, Mr. Hambourg?"

"Now, don't ask my opinion about that. It is quite heretical and would shock people. Beethoven tried to write contrapuntally—fugues, canons—in those sonatas. But he was greatest in melody. Bach has said the last word in fugue. Bach is the Shakespeare in music. He has said everything. Take a score of Wagner. There is nothing new in it He is all in Bach. And so many of Bach's works aren't known. I discovered a little while ago that he wrote thirty-two variations—canons, fugues, chorals—all with the most modern harmonies."

"Are you going to play them?"

"No; they would take too long and are very dry besides."

"Shall you play any novelties?"

"Yes, some rather new things. Some of my own, too."

'And all the war horses?"

"What do you mean by war horses?" said Mr. Hambourg, looking puzzled.

The reporter explained.

"Oh, yes, I have a pretty good repertoire. I play seventeen concerti. There are only twenty-one that you can play everywhere."

"Are you at all nervous when you play?"

'Oh, yes, just before I play. I think it grows on me the more I play. But a player ought to be a little bit nervous That makes the audience nervous and they get in sympathy with him."

"Have you ever thought of doing anything else besides playing, Mr. Hambourg?"

Thinks Only of Art.

"No. Isn't that enough—and writing some for the piano?"

"In Melbourne, Australia, I met Mark Twain, who was lecturing at the same time I appeared there. I was introduced to Mr. Clemens on the afternoon of one of my concerts, and he promised to be present at my recital that evening. I was just about to take my place at the piano at the time Mark Twain was entering the hall. There was some applause from the audience during the time Mark Twain took his seat. He immediately got up from his position in the hall, and bowed right and left. He thought it was a very good joke, and tried to make me believe next day that he considered the applause was intended for him—not for me. I have since gotten to be a very good friend of Mr. Clemens, and he [illegible] me several strong letters of introduction to friends of his in this country. It will not be a breach of confidence if I read you one of these, wherein he says, 'This will introduce to your kind favor and consideration, Mr. Hambourg, a friend of the Clemens family, whom we have known for three or four years. He has more musical ability than I have, but not as good a complexion.' "

Mr. Hambourg comes to Baltimore the week after next with the Boston Symphony Orchestra, when the music-lovers of this city will have an opportunity of judging Mr. Hambourg's capabilities as a pianist.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

At the close of the first week of the sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given at Music Hall on Tuesday evening, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 20, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, it seems assured that Baltimore will take the same high position in appreciation of this magnificent organization as last year.

April 12, 1886, the orchestra made its debut in this city at the Academy of Music, under the direction of the present conductor, Wilhelm Gericke, and since that time 53 concerts have been given. It is an interesting coincidence in the way of statistics that the concert to be given in Boston on the afternoon of Friday, November 3, just previous to their opening concert here, will be the 900th performance in Boston and the 1,700th in all. These figures are exact, and a matter of record. Such totals as these explain the marvelous ensemble in the work of the orchestra and also show how this organization is making the musical history of the United States. And all this because of the desire of one man to present good music in the best way! Nowhere else in the wide world does there exist such an organization, conceived and carried out unselfishly to a glorious consummation, and the tremendous support so generously given by musical and social Baltimore is to the mutual credit of the founder, the orchestra, and its clientele here.

As the opening of another season approaches the management acknowledges its marked appreciation of the generous action of a few public-spirited gentlemen of this city who last year put their names to a guarantee fund to make sure of the usual series of five concerts. It is also a matter of much pride to the management of the orchestra that at the expiration of the second concert of the series of five last year they were enabled to release the guarantors from any further responsibility, as the receipts were very handsomely in excess of the specified amount.

No performance to be given in Music Hall during the coming winter will be more improved and benefited by the recent change in the hall by which the seats have been raised from the middle of the floor toward the rear. The addition of 10 boxes is also a move in the direction to give to the interior of the hall an effect similar to that which obtains in New York and Philadelphia, where box parties are a distinct feature of the concerts of this orchestra.

The management notes with much pleasure the frequent expressions of appreciation by the patrons of these concerts of the plan adopted this year of allowing season ticket holders of last year to renew the same seats, thus saving them the inconvenience of standing in line. This idea has been received with equal appreciation and pleasure in the other cities, and has grown to be a distinct feature of the concerts of this organization.

It will be a matter of great interest to Baltimore patrons to know that at a very early date one or two singers of the highest artistic ability will be added to the list of soloists for the Baltimore concerts. Season tickets are on sale at 15 North Charles street.

Music and Musicians.

At the close of the first week of the sale of season tickets for the five concerts to be given at Music Hall on Tuesday evenings, November 7, December 12, January 16, February 20 and March 20, by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, the results have been such that it is apparent the orchestra will be well supported. On April 12, 1886, the orchestra made its debut in this city at the Academy of Music, under the direction of the present conductor, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, and since that date fifty-three concerts have been given. The concert to be given in Boston on November 3 will be the nine hundredth performance in Boston and the seventeen hundredth in all. The orchestra has won its way to the front rank. There is no better organization of its kind in the world. The increased attendance every year bears evidence that it is thoroughly appreciated wherever it appears.

The generous action of a few public-spirited gentlemen of Baltimore who last year put their names to a guarantee fund to make sure of the usual series of five concerts is deeply appreciated by the managers. At the expiration of the second concert of the series of five last year the receipts were such that the guarantors were released from any further responsibility. The improvements made in Music Hall, by which the seats have been raised from the middle of the floor toward the rear, will make the house more comfortable. Ten boxes have been added.

Mark Hambourg, the young pianist, arrived in New York last Thursday from Europe. He will shortly appear with the orchestra. Young Hambourg is a Russian and is twenty years old. He played in London when eleven years old and made a success. He has studied under Leschetizky and has played in most of the larger cities of Europe and has also made a tour in Australia. The young player is said to be free from mannerisms and has been warmly praised wherever he has appeared.

The Boston Traveler
Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY,
207 Washington Street

Clara Butt at The Symphony.

Nineteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra, third concert. Miss Clara Butt, soloist. The programme:

Overture, "Melusina"	Mendelssohn
Air, "Divinites du Styx" from "Alceste"	Gluck
Moorish rhapsody	Humperdinck
(First time in Boston.)
Song, "My Heart in Weary," from "Nadeshda"	Goring Thomas
(First time in Boston.)
Symphony No. 25, in G minor (Kochel, 183)	Mozart
(First time in Boston.)

There were curious streaks of good and bad music, interesting and dull in the concert. In fact, they were almost arranged in alternate layers. The beautiful—and, of late years unhackneyed—"Melusina" overture has the true Mendelssohnian loveliness and grace; without being great, it is appealing and fascinating. Nothing could be more beautiful in its way than the ocean-like flow of that principal theme; no man has ever equalled Mendelssohn in sea pictures like that. The overture was played to perfection.

Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" is bizarre, noisy and generally uninteresting. His tone views are cloudy, they suggest little of detail. Each movement is over-elaborated and carried to inordinate lengths. There are germs of good musical stuff in each, but so much rubbish is piled over them that their full flower is never attained. The chief value and interest of the work is its rich and ingenious orchestration. At every turn of a phrase there is some new effect of tone-massing, some fresh laying on of the instrumental paint. But it all becomes wearisome at last, and the effect is nil. It was no easy thing to play, but the orchestra never flinched.

The Mozart symphony, which had never been given here before, was well worth while. It was youthful, imitative and weak by comparison, but still full of dainty melody and very charming effects. It was read with exquisite taste by Mr. Gericke.

Miss Clara Butt, the English contralto of rather meteroric fame, is a very tall and willowy young woman, with a sincere determination to please, and a rather crude style. Her voice is powerful and impressive in its low register, but loses as it ascends, and is faultily produced. I should say that Miss Butt has a great deal of technique still to learn. Still, her natural equipment is great, and she is even now an attractive singer. Her singing of the great Gluck aria was not wholly effective, but had moments of beauty. The song from Goring Thomas' "Nadeshda" was such unmitigated trash as to make one wonder shudderingly what the rest of the work is like. Miss Butt sang it very well, and was applauded.

WILDER D. QUINT.

[34]

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the third Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, was:

Mendelssohn: Overture to the Legend, "Die schöne Melusine," opus 32.
Gluck: Air, "Divinités du Styx," from "Alceste."
Humperdinck: Moorish Rhapsody.
(First time in Boston.)
Goring Thomas: Song, "My heart is weary," from "Nadeshda."
(First time in Boston.)
Mozart: Symphony No. 25, in G minor (Köchel, No. 183).
(First time in Boston.)
Miss Clara Butt was the singer.

The playing of Mendelssohn's "Melusine" overture was an answer to old prayers—so old as to be half-forgotten—from some of us. This overture was one of the most frequently played twenty years, or so, ago; and how we did long to hear that arpeggio-phrase played just as it was played last Saturday evening!—in smoothly flowing, accentless legato. But we never succeeded in getting it so played then; there was always an accent on the first note of every group of six. What the first flute, first clarinet and strings did with this phrase on Saturday evening was simply perfect; it suggested just the right Mendelssohnian picture of smoothly flowing water. Indeed, the whole performance was masterly. And, even apart from its poetic suggestiveness, what a wonder of plastic beauty this overture is; how every phrase, every recurrence of a figure comes exactly in the right place, so that you feel that it, and nothing else, belongs there! What an unflagging wealth of musical imagination and resource there is through it all! There is much in Mendelssohn that is now dead past hope of resurrection, much that is fast dying; but here we have something that will down at no modern thunderer's bidding.

Humperdinck's new Moorish Rhapsody somehow made me think of that "Humoreske" of his, with which he made his first bow to our public, under Mr. Nikisch's auspices. A good deal has come into Humperdinck's life since he wrote that "Humoreske:" a considerable and fruitful experience of Bayreuth, for one thing. This Moorish Rhapsody shows the effects of it. Yet, from beneath all the dazzling technique and Bayreuth-Wagnerian varnish, I cannot help thinking I see the old Humperdinck of the "Humoreske" peep forth—the same old sixpence. The man has no little poetry in him, he looks at things in an imaginative way, finding more in them than the ordinary prosaic eye describes; yet, with all this, he is but a bon bourgeois at heart, the man to write apposite music to the picture described by Monsieur Poirrier. Mr. Runciman calls "Fidelio" a "Hausfrau opera;" well, in one sense, it is; the subject is essentially bourgeois, poignant, if you will, but commonplace, quite on the Monsieur Poirrier level; but how Beethoven's music takes that homely picture and sets it among the stars! The subjects Humperdinck has taken to illustrate musically in his Rhapsody—an Elegy at Sunrise in Tarifa, a Night in the Moorish Café in Tangier, a Ride into the Desert at Tetuan—are not, in themselves, commonplace at all; they have a certain poetic distinction; but the cast of his musical feeling does seem to me desperately commonplace. He is not without a sense for beauty, he is often exceedingly ingenious; but his feeling is bourgeois. Then take what I have called his dazzling technique; the trouble with it is that it is only dazzling, not illuminating. It is a borrowed technique (from Wagner), not his own; he makes astonishing play with it, but to little real musical purpose; his several themes cross and recross one another with hair-raising ingenuity, but all this contrapuntal skill does not help the composition onward, it does not make it grow and develop; as Leech's old farmer said of claret: "We drink, and we drink, but we don't get no forrader!" The orchestration is a wonder; but whose is not nowadays? Of the three movements, I liked the third best, perhaps because I had not heard it previously at rehearsals, and had had no chance to get tired of it; but there are, none the less, some absolutely original and very striking effects in this movement. The performance of the whole rhapsody was admirable in the extreme.

The new Mozart symphony was, to me, a disappointment. Mozart was only seventeen when he wrote it; and, though one of the most precocious geniuses on record, his precocity was not very thorough-going. It was more a precocity of technical musicianship than early maturity of feeling; Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" overture (written also at the age of seventeen), even making allowance for over fifty years' difference of period, shows far more maturity than this swmphony. In the first, third and fourth movements you feel strongly the influence of Gluck—"Orfeo," with which Gluck's "great" manner began, was brought out in Vienna eleven years before—while the Andante shows just as surely the influence of Bach. Was the Bach influence the more subtile and pervasive of the two, an influence of deeper-going quality than that of mere manner? One can suspect it; for, in the Andante of this symphony, the young Mozart seems to work with more freedom under it, to be more himself, than in the three Gluckish movements, which are full of reminiscences of "Orfeo." After all, the symphony is a stoutly constructed, well written work, with many passages of unmistakable beauty; but it is still plainly the work of a very young, immature man (or boy), and its interest is, to me, more biographico-historical than anything else. It was excellently well played. And, by the way, it gives the lie to those historians who have set the first use of four horns in the orchestra at—where have they set it, come to think of it? I fancy in one of Rossini's operas. But here are the four horns, in this early symphony of Mozart's, written in 1773.

Last Saturday evening happened to be the first time I ever heard Gluck's "Divinités du Styx" sung with orchestra. I was prepared to be disappointed (pardon the bull); for Gluck was not immortal all through and all over, and the rhapsodies Berlioz and others of his time have written about this air seemed a thought too good [illegible] true. But I was not disap-me great, noble, magnificent music, a little formal in cut, if you will, but in the grand tragic vein, and with now and then a phrase bedewed with the true Gluck tear. To be sure, I could not but feel how much more deeply effective the air would be in its proper place, on the stage, than in the concert hall; Gluck was a scenic craftsman to the tips of his fingers, and the dramatic stage must be taken into account in all he wrote. Since Mme. Viardot-Garcia's revival of "Alceste" in Paris in 1861, this air has come within the contralto repertory—not entirely to its advantage, as I suspect.

Miss Butt, who made her first appearance before a Boston audience on this occasion, has a booming contralto voice, rather of the velvety than if the trimbrée sort, but with some cavernous tones in it of distinct tragic value. She has decided temperament, and a certain appreciation of grandeur of style; she has what the French call "Envarguré"—literally, "stretch of yard," i. e., wide spread of canvas—and does nothing in a small way. As might be expected of a young Englishwoman, she tends at moments to fall from the dramatic vein into the oratorical (I mean this adjective to relate to oratory, not to oratorio), from apostrophe into haranguing; at some repetition of the phrase, "Divinité du Styx," you felt that, if the deities turned a deaf ear to her, she would "cry sleep to death!" Upon the whole, hers is a talent that will bear some pruning-down and polishing; there is enough in her, vocally and temperamentally, to stand this. But she is very effective, very frank, sincere and outspoken; there is no sham about her.

Would that I could have formed some rational opinion of her singing of Goring Thomas's song, and of the music itself! But I really could not. You see, it had been my misfortune to have to copy out the words of the song for the programme book; and whoever has once seen those words can surely not forget them. Even if I could have forgotten them under ordinary conditions, Miss Butt's beautifully distinct articulation would have made forgetting useless. Now, singing a sentimental, pathetic or tragic song to those words is like singing it under an upheld tattered old cotton umbrella, or with a farce-comedy facial make-up, or anything else that forbids seriousness of mood. Let the blood be upon Goring Thomas's head; he did not write that astounding balderdash, but he accepted it and set it to music. In the presence of those words, not even the death of a dear friend could keep you from laughing. I could think of nothing else! But let me say that Miss Butt was loudly applauded, and repeatedly recalled, after both songs.

The next programme is: Siegfried Wagner, overture to "Der Bärenhäuter (first time in Boston); Rubinstein, concerto for pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, opus 70; Liszt, symphonic poem No. 4, "Orpheus"; Wilhelm Berger, symphony in B-flat major (first time). Mr. Mark Hambourg will be the pianist.

W. F. A.

RECORD MONDAY OCTOBER 30 1899.

MISS BUTT'S FIRST APPEARANCE WITH THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

There was no great intellectual strain on those who heard the third Symphony concert Saturday night. Everything was pretty, and well-bred, and nice, and extremely ladylike. Even the Humperdinck rhapsody was provocative of mental excitement only because of its extremely gaudy coloring and its multitude of Humperdincky outbursts.

There was the sweetly solemn thought of the Mendelssohn "Melusina" and there was a symphony in G minor (not "the" symphony in G minor, but the "boy-prodigy" work of the composer at an early age, when he stole better men's themes and wrote them out in his own hand), and Miss Butt, the contralto, who was making her first Boston appearance, sang an aria from Gluck's "Alceste," and also a song from Goring-Thomas's "Nadeshda."

The weather was out of place for the last of October, and the air was so damp that more than one string was unexpectedly snapped; but within Music Hall there was peace and refinement and as thoroughly enjoyable a time as if it were an afternoon tea over which "Mrs." Mendelssohn was presiding. The Humperdinck outburst was really the only outre episode of the evening.

Of that interesting but sometimes garrulous and blatant number, it is to be said that it has many merits, but these are too obtrusively presented. The composer has found some good stories, but that is no reason why he should persist in telling them so insistently and so abundantly, ringing the changes so constantly, until his hearers are likely to call him a bore.

There is much that is admirable in his tales of Morocco, but the man who bores his acquaintances too much with his experiences of foreign travel is eventually shunned like a Chelsea smallpox suspect.

With a stern and conscientious use of the blue pencil, the rhapsody would be much improved. It sometimes seems a pity that the censor devotes himself exclusively to war news in these days, and lets an inviting thing like the Moorish rhapsody escape him.

Miss Butt is a singer of much merit who has an unusually good voice in the lower register. She chose as her first song the aria "Divinites du Styx," which was sung with far more dramatic effect by Blanche Marchesi last season.

It is not altogether profitless to compare the two, for Miss Butt sang with a remarkable contralto voice and Mme. Marchesi had a far inferior voice; yet the memory of the earlier singer showed that Miss Butt did not seize all her opportunities. Her change from a contralto to a higher register showed a sudden reediness. It would be wiser to choose less exacting numbers, so as to give fuller scope for her best tones, or else to endeavor to cultivate in her higher register the same beautiful fulness and charm that are so delightful in the lower tones.

There could be no doubt as to the impression made on her auditors. A really good, resonant contralto is so rare that it is not surprising that the soloist was recalled again and again, after each of her songs. Although she missed something of the full dramatic effect in the Gluck aria, it is to be said at least that her singing is of a decidedly higher level than the average blanked-eyed, staring-at-the-wall concert singers. There are many concert-singers of pretensions who would sing the aria with about the same expression and intensity as a clerk reading the call for a democratic caucus in Wd. 11.

Of the orchestral work generally, it is worth special comment that the handicap of the weather on the strings (and it must have been serious) could not produce any departure from the absolutely artistic and almost perfect ensemble. Entirely apart from any question of the merits of the works presented, the orchestral achievements under such conditions absolutely compelled admiration. The achievement was limited to no special number, but perhaps it was most noteworthy in the many difficult passages of the Mendelssohn overture. The brilliant coloring of the opening movement, those delicate arpeggios which represent the flowing waters from which Melusina came (perhaps "sprang" would be the better word, as they were spring waters) was deliciously given, where a less skilful orchestra would have suggested merely the spasmodic gurgling of a soda-fountain faucet.

Of the Mozart symphony, it must be admitted that there is little in the score itself to evoke awe or unrestrained delight. When young, Mozart must have had an easy-going disposition, for he certainly took things as he found them. He exploits a number of his finds in the G minor symphony that was given at the concert; but these foundlings are not always interesting. Yet the orchestra certainly left no room for criticism on its ability or judgment. Indeed there was rather cause for wonder that so uninteresting a symphony could be played with such thorough command and oftentimes with really attractive beauty.

Altogether the soloist and the orchestra turned what had promised to be a rather dull entertainment into a pleasant and delightful evening, in many ways. Mr. Gericke was his old self again and had his men under perfect command. The programme for next Saturday's concert mentions Wagner's overture "Der Baerenhaeuten," for the first time, Berger's symphony in B flat major, also a novelty, and Mark Hambourg as soloist.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 3, 1899

FOR A HARVARD CLUB

Major H. L. Higginson Gives $150,000

It Will Be Erected Opposite Beck Hall

Meeting-Place for All Harvard Men

To Be Modelled After Finest Social Club Houses

Major Henry L. Higginson, '55, who gave Soldiers Field to Harvard University, has given the sum of $150,000 to be used for the erection and equipment of a building suitable to the uses of a university club. The corporation, in return, offers the Warren property, at the corner of Harvard and Quincy streets, for the site of the building. Plans for the erection of the building have been under consideration since last spring, when a new committee was formed by combining the old University Club and the Memorial committees. The committee decided last spring that the best form of memorial to the Harvard men who died in the Spanish war would be a building which should be so connected with the daily life of the students that the memory of our volunteers should be constantly impressed on each successive generation of Harvard students.

A meeting of the members of the committee will be called next week to consider more fully what the internal arrangement of the club should be.

It was three or four years ago when this plan for a university club was first pushed to the front. It engaged the attention of graduates all over the country, and influential Harvard men of this city gave active assistance in developing the idea. After some agitation, a meeting was held at the University Club, at which thirty or forty Harvard men were present, among them President Eliot, John C. Ropes, Major Higginson and others. What was said at that meeting showed in a general way what the club could be, and what it must not be, but although a committee had the furtherance of the plans under consideration for some time, the matter eventually had to be dropped for a time. As President Eliot said at that time, it was of little avail to try to go ahead with the project on the strength of what funds could be gathered together from relatively small individual subscriptions; what was needed was a large contribution in the lump, sufficiently large of itself to make the building a possibility. He estimated at that time that $200,000 would not be too large a sum on which to begin operations, and he expressed the [illegible] have to be held in abeyance until something like a contribution of that magnitude should be received. Now the gift of Major Higginson has met the need.

When the original promoters theorized about the plan and scope of the club before, it was held that it should be to college life what the finest social clubs are to a city. Its building should be handsome and elegant enough, so that the wealthiest men in the university would not feel averse to it, yet the fees should be low enough so that no man who could afford to give any attention at all to the social life at the university would be excluded. President Eliot at that time urged that the yearly fees should in no case be more than $10, for he argued that as soon as the expense of membership should be raised above that figure, a great number of men would not be able to afford the privileges of membership, and the club would become only a repetition of the present type of college club, to which only men of considerable means can afford to belong.

It is not believed that the theory as to what the club should be has changed materially, though the plans have not been formulated. The gift is admittedly an outcome of the agitation of some years ago, and presumably the plans will follow the idea of the university clubs at Oxford and Cambridge, which are known as the Oxford Union and Cambridge Union. In the rough, the idea is to provide a place where Harvard men of all classes and conditions, undergraduates, graduates, instructors and professors shall meet on a common ground, socially; where graduates shall feel at home, especially on the days of the great gatherings at Cambridge, such as commencement, class day and the days of the great games; where the life of the university may centre. Following out this idea, there would be rooms for reading and writing, comfortable rooms for lounging and smoking, rooms for small gatherings of one sort or another, perhaps where meetings incidental on social or athletic affairs might be held, much as in the fine city clubhouses, the whole to be of such a character that the men would care to go there and that the club would be in fact, as well as in theory, the centre of the university life. From what has been already hinted in regard to the building, it would be perhaps not more than three stories in height. It is not expected that there will be any attempt to provide offices for the college papers or things of that sort, as has been stated in print, for the nature of the building would be inconsistent with business quarters of any sort. The social idea is the one that is emphasized.

Among the university people at Cambridge the news of Colonel Higginson's gift aroused new enthusiasm for the club project, and arrangements were at once begun for a meeting of the general committee that has been working in the interest of the scheme. The meeting is planned for next Monday evening in the Fogg Art Museum at Cambridge. It is hoped that Major Higginson will be present. He is chairman of the committee, which is made up, aside from himself, of Robert Bacon, '80; J. J. Storrow, '85; A. C. Coolidge, '87; J. H. Sears, '89; Henry James, 2d, '99; Arthur Adams, '99; W. A. M. Burden, 1900; C. D. Daly, 1901; J. H. Hyde, '98; C. E. Morgan, '98; Malcolm Donald, '99; F. M. Alger, '99; W. B. Cutting, 1900; W. H. Phillips, 1900; G. C. Clark, 1901. The first nine of these were appointed after a mass meeting of students in Sanders Theatre Oct. 21, 1398, held to consider a memorial for the Harvard men who responded to the call for service in the Spanish war. The others were appointed at a mass meeting held in 1897 in the Fogg Art Museum to take measures to promote the University Club project.

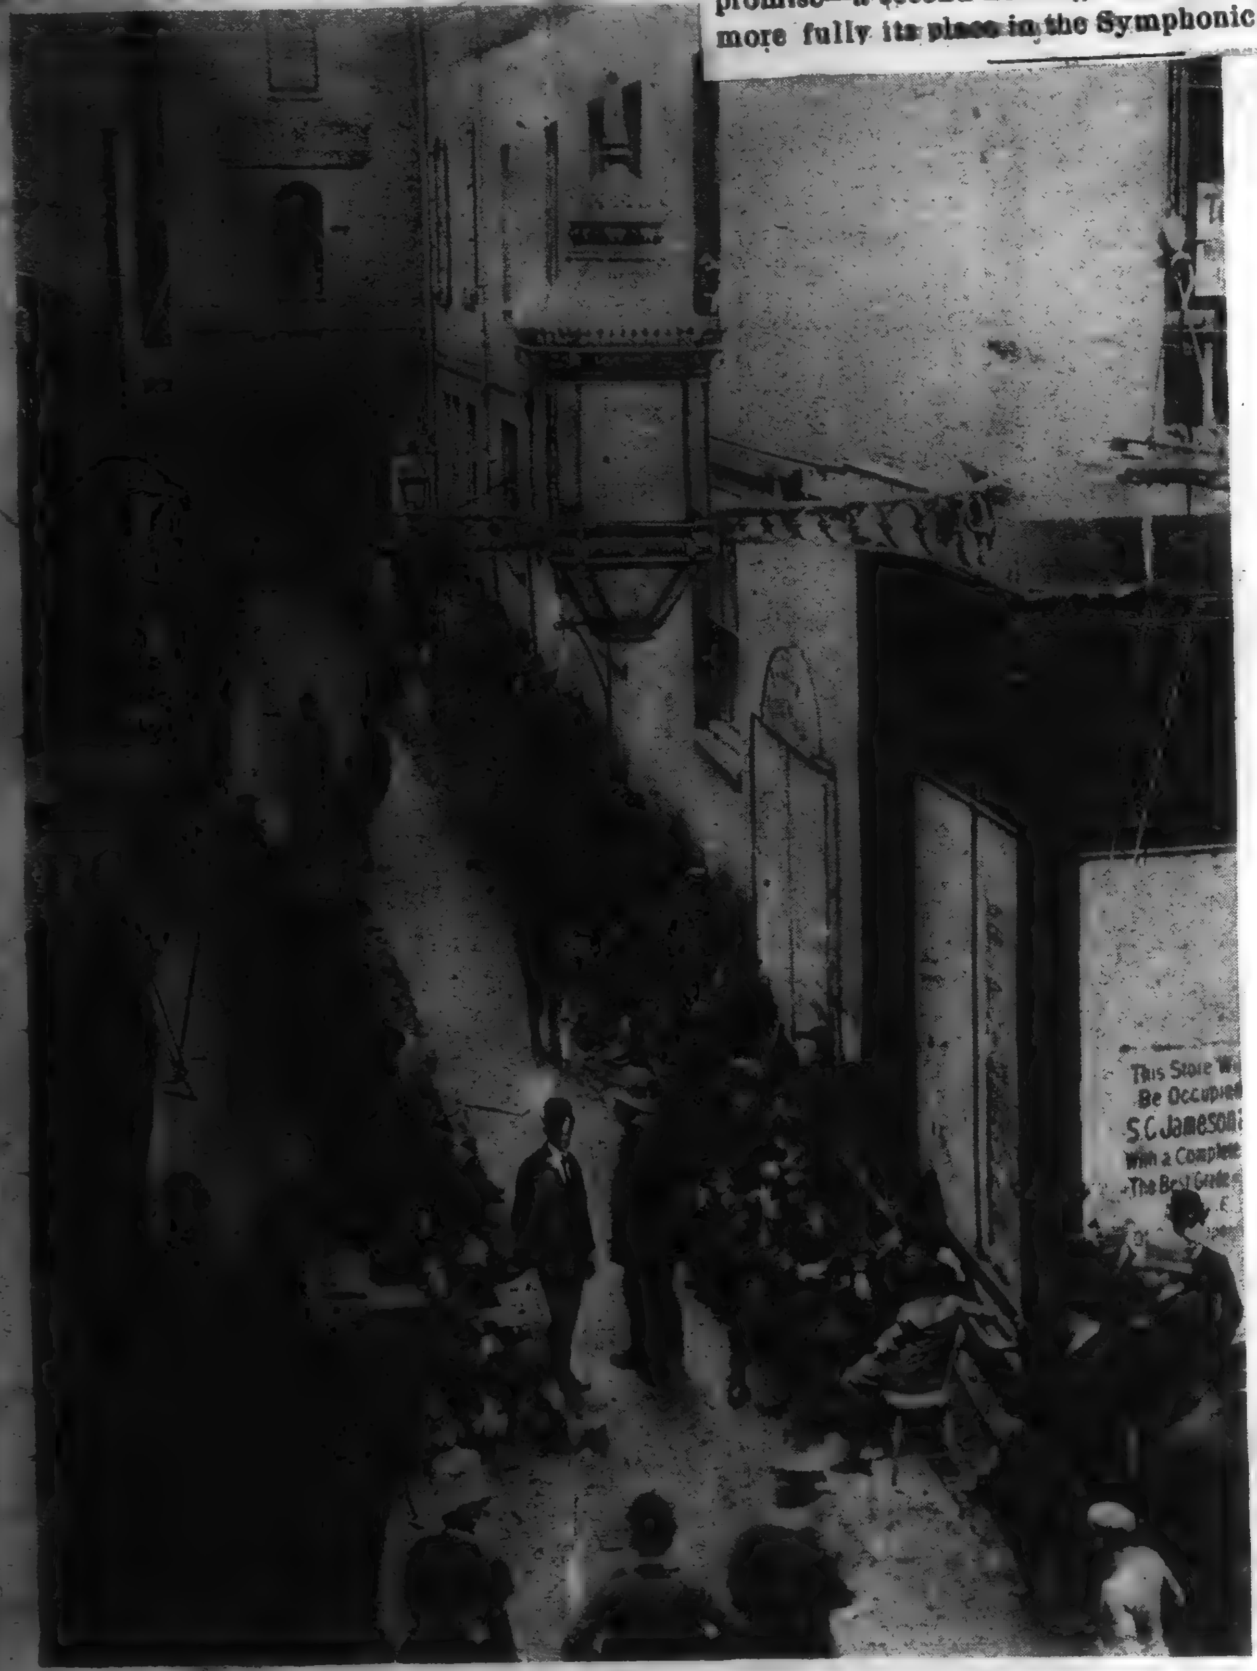
COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER.

SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1899.

BOSTON LOVES MUSIC.

An accompanying picture illustrates the demand for high-class music in Boston. The photograph from which the half-tone cut is reproduced was taken the last year that seats for the Symphony Orchestra concerts were sold to first arrivals. It was the demand that compelled a change of methods.

At that time the tickets for the series of symphony concerts which were held in Boston were sold as tickets for the series in New York are sold—first come, first served. In New York there is a good demand for choice seats, and a line of purchasers is always waiting when the box office opens to get the first choice of location. But this line does not form more than an hour before the opening of the box office. In Boston so great was the demand for seats that the line used to form five days before the opening of the box office. The illustration shows a crowd of men and boys, most of whom have been patiently waiting for five days and five nights in rain and shine for a chance to buy tickets. Some of them have been hired to hold places in the line; some were speculators, who expected to sell their places to the highest bidders before the box office opened. As a result of the long wait two persons died of pneumonia. This directed attention to the fact that, while large premiums were being paid to speculators, the orchestra was not benefiting year by year by the demand for tickets. From that time it was determined to sell the seats at auction, so that those who were ready to pay the premium would pay it to the orchestra and not to the speculators. This rule has prevailed since, and large sums are realized each year from the auction sale of seats.



BOSTON'S LOVE OF MUSIC.

LINES OF APPLICANTS FOR TICKETS TO THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS. MANY OF THOSE IN LINE HELD THEIR PLACES FOR FIVE DAYS AND NIGHTS. IT CAUSED A CHANGE OF METHODS AND THE SEATS ARE NOW SOLD AT AUCTION.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 5, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY.

The fourth concert contained two novelties: the overture to "Der Baenhauter" by Siegfried Wagner, and the Symphony by Wilhelm Berger. The libretto to the opera was arranged by the composer (a pupil of Humperdinck, as well as a follower of his brilliant father) the subjects being taken from Grimmes' tale of the Man with the Bearskin" and the "Spielmann's Weisen" of Wilhelm Herg.

Some of the most striking themes of the score are introduced in the overture, the music of which, with the aid of the programme book and the distinct motive, can be readily understood.

The author aimed at a true Volksopera and is now busied upon a second and greater work similar in character.

Rubenstein's Concerto No. 4, had for its exponent, Mr. Mark Hambourg, a native of Russia where he was born in 1879. He first appeared as a "boy prodigy," but since studying for three years with Leschetzky he has acquired a splendid technique, and great power of expression. His performance of the Concerto was masterly—such virility of style and perfection of finger work eliciting the hearty applause of the audience who recalled him again and again. The orchestral part was given with just the right degree of shading and perfection of execution. The first two movements are especially beautiful and satisfying, the themes melodious, and their working out not too academic to be comprehended by the mere listener.

The Symphony by W. Berger—who it seems had the honor and privilege in 1861 of having Boston for his birthplace, although as he was taken to Germany the following year his musical inspiration cannot be said to have been derived from this home of the Muses—was given here for the first time, and its fine rendering would have delighted its author could he have listened to the waves of sound that rose and fell at the bidding of our able and musicianly conductor.

It seems a well-constructed work and shows great promise—a second hearing might enable us to judge more fully its place in the Symphonic world.

PUBLISHED [illegible] YEAR
VOL. [illegible] NO. [illegible]

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Mark Hambourg Makes His Appearance as Soloist.

Overture and Symphony Are New to Boston—Both Are Received with Great Cordiality—The Soloist Warmly Greeted—The Fourth De Pachmann Recital.

The fourth of this season's concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given in Music Hall last evening, the programme being:

Overture to "Der Baerenhaeuter"........Siegfried Wagner
Concerto for pianoforte, in D-minor, No. 4........Rubinstein
Symphony in B-flat, op. 71.....Wilhelm Berger

Mr. Mark Hambourg was the soloist, and the occasion was his first concert appearance in this country. The overture and the symphony were new to Boston.

There is nothing of interest in the overture except the orchestration, which is rich generally, now and then piquant in effect, and showing, on the whole, ample knowledge of the resources of modern instrumentation. For the rest, it oscillates between the loftiness of the elder Wagner and the commonplace triviality, and at times vulgarity, of French opera bouffe. It has a superfluity of themes that impart to it a pot pourri aspect, and in no instance is there any attempt to develop them. In fact, the work is a bit of pretentious patchwork, and not over clever at that.

It would seem that the son thought he had inherited his father's music, for he has drawn heavily on it with a frank literalness that can be accounted for on no other grounds. There are fragments of "The Mastersingers," of "Die Walkure," of "Triston and Isolde," of "The Rheingold" and of "Die Gotterdamerung," without any pretence of disguise. Hunding stalks threateningly through it; Isolde waves her scarf; Siegfried's corpse is carried through the mist; Brunhilde consoles Siegelinde, and Walter and Harris Sachs are heard in consultation. It appeals to the popular taste and is not unpleasing in its way; but it is not difficult to imagine Wagner the great after hearing the overture, inviting Wagner the little to a conference with him in private, with the purpose of inflicting the paternal slipper on the youngster by way of admonishing chastisement. The work was brilliantly and effectively performed, and very heartily applauded.

The symphony is a work of great merit. Though eminently modern in treatment it is clear, free from extravagance in conception and in its themes, and its form leans steadily in the direction of the older masters. Dignity, solidity and heartfulness of sentiment are its leading characteristics. It is tuneful, free from any suggestion of labored deliberation in invention and appeals uninterruptedly to the attention of its hearers.

The orchestration is brilliant and effective, though, perhaps too frequently and disturbingly noisy, the composer, after the fashion of the day, feeling it incumbent on him, after having resolved to make use of the bass-tuba, to bring it into evidence, and the rest of the brass as often as possible. However, this may be condoned since he refrained from the English horn and the bass clarinet. There is fine dramatic fervor in the opening movement, and a stirring animation in the finale, with its clever, final treatment and its large and impressive climax. Taken altogether, it may rank with the most praiseworthy of recent symphonies, and will well bear repetition from time to time.

Mr. Hambourg is a young artist of admirable powers. His technique appears to be fully able to meet any demand that may be made on it. He plays with easy freedom, great vigor and absolute certainty of touch. He was not heard under conditions that enabled him to display the finer qualities of style and of musical expression, and it was clearly manifest that he was not heard at his best. Under the circumstances it would be more fair to him to defer forming a final judgment regarding the scope of his deservings until he has a more favorable opportunity to make them fully apparent. Enough, however, was made evident to stamp him as an artist entitled to very serious consideration. He made, despite the drawback referred to, a very marked impression, and was applauded and recalled some three or four times with immense enthusiasm.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Hans Heiling," Marschner; "Holdenlied," Dvorak, first time; "Bilder aus Osten," Schumann, orchestrated by Reinecke; Symphony No. 2, Beethoven.

The Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon was unusually attractive, regarding the audience, as well as the young soloist. M. De Pachmann was a most interested listener, sitting in the Gericke seats, and Mr. and Mrs. Kendal were quite as much objects of interest. Mrs. Kendal was in brown broadcloth with sable bands, and a toque of brown velvet and violets. Others there were Mrs. George P. Sanger, Mrs. George B. Dexter, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mr. and Mrs. Wheelwright, Miss Banchor, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Updike, Miss Constance Lovett, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mr. Charles T. White and Miss White, Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Mr. J. T. Coolidge, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. E. G. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. Redfern, Miss French, Mr. Edmund Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. William Hooper and Dr. Lawrence. Mr. Hambourg made a great hit. He was recalled five times amid much enthusiasm

---

They go direct to [illegible] o'clock and will play at the Academy of Music there tomorrow night at 8. They then go to Baltimore, appearing there on Tuesday evening, thence to New York for concerts on Wednesday and Thursday, Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday they open the second series in Philadelphia, the house for the first series of concerts there being sold out on the opening day.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 5, 1899.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Russian pianist Mark Hambourg was the soloist at last week's symphony concerts. The program comprised Siegfried Wagner's overture to his opera, "Der Barenhauter," first time here; Rubinstein's fourth concerto and William Berger's symphony in B-flat major, first time in Boston. Young Wagner's abilities as conductor and composer have aroused numerous partisans in the musical world abroad, and the opinions expressed regarding his works have generally been of the most radical nature in praise or condemnation. In his opera, "Der Barenhauter," the full score may not be specially rich in characteristic color, but the overture is quite effective in its suggestions of characters, the music given to the devil, the saucy hero, the gentle heroine, the villagers and the imps being expressive of the various attributes usually associated with these people. Of course these "tonal meanings" may be admirably shown in miniature and yet not be consistently developed and maintained throughout the work; but the overture certainly may be classed as meritorious and pleasing, although without much originality in combining the instruments for producing the best results. The orchestra played smoothly, bringing out the composer's meaning with proper effect.

Mr Hambourg's performance of the Rubinstein concerto revealed an excellent development of technique and a tone of power and breadth, which in the rapid passages was a trifle clouded and lacking in crispness in the staccato phrases. This was noticeable in the octave ornaments at the close of the first movement. The cadenzas were played with considerable brilliancy. The cantabile themes in the second part were delightfully treated, and the closing movement was also played with splendid verve and finger dexterity, the least satisfactory results showing in the fortissimo work, which may have been caused by atmospheric conditions or some other circumstance beyond Mr Hambourg's control. He evidently is a young artist of high attainments, and he certainly pleased his auditors, who showered him with applause at the close of his performance.

The symphony of Wilhelm Berger is well scored, the combinations for the brasses being particularly effective as well as frequent, as if the young composer was fond of bold phrases and martial moments. In the first part there are some very clever bits for the clarinet, which were exquisitely played, and a concluding coda that was brilliant in form and brilliantly played. A dainty little theme runs through the second movement, capitally given throughout by the different instruments, and the dramatic material in the third part is excellent in form and treatment. The horns, clarinets and flutes here were notably pure in tone, and the violas gave out the principal theme with a precision and harmony most commendable. In the closing part there is much originality shown in the "conversations," which each set of instruments carried admirably. A free fantasia was gracefully played, special mention being due to the violin contingent for delicate work.

The program for the fifth rehearsal and concert, Nov 17 and 18, will be as follows: Overture, "Hans Heiling," Marschner; "Heldenlied," Dvorak; "Bilder aus Osten," Schumann; Symphony No. 2, Beethoven.

HOWARD ATHENEUM.

For several seasons past the [36]

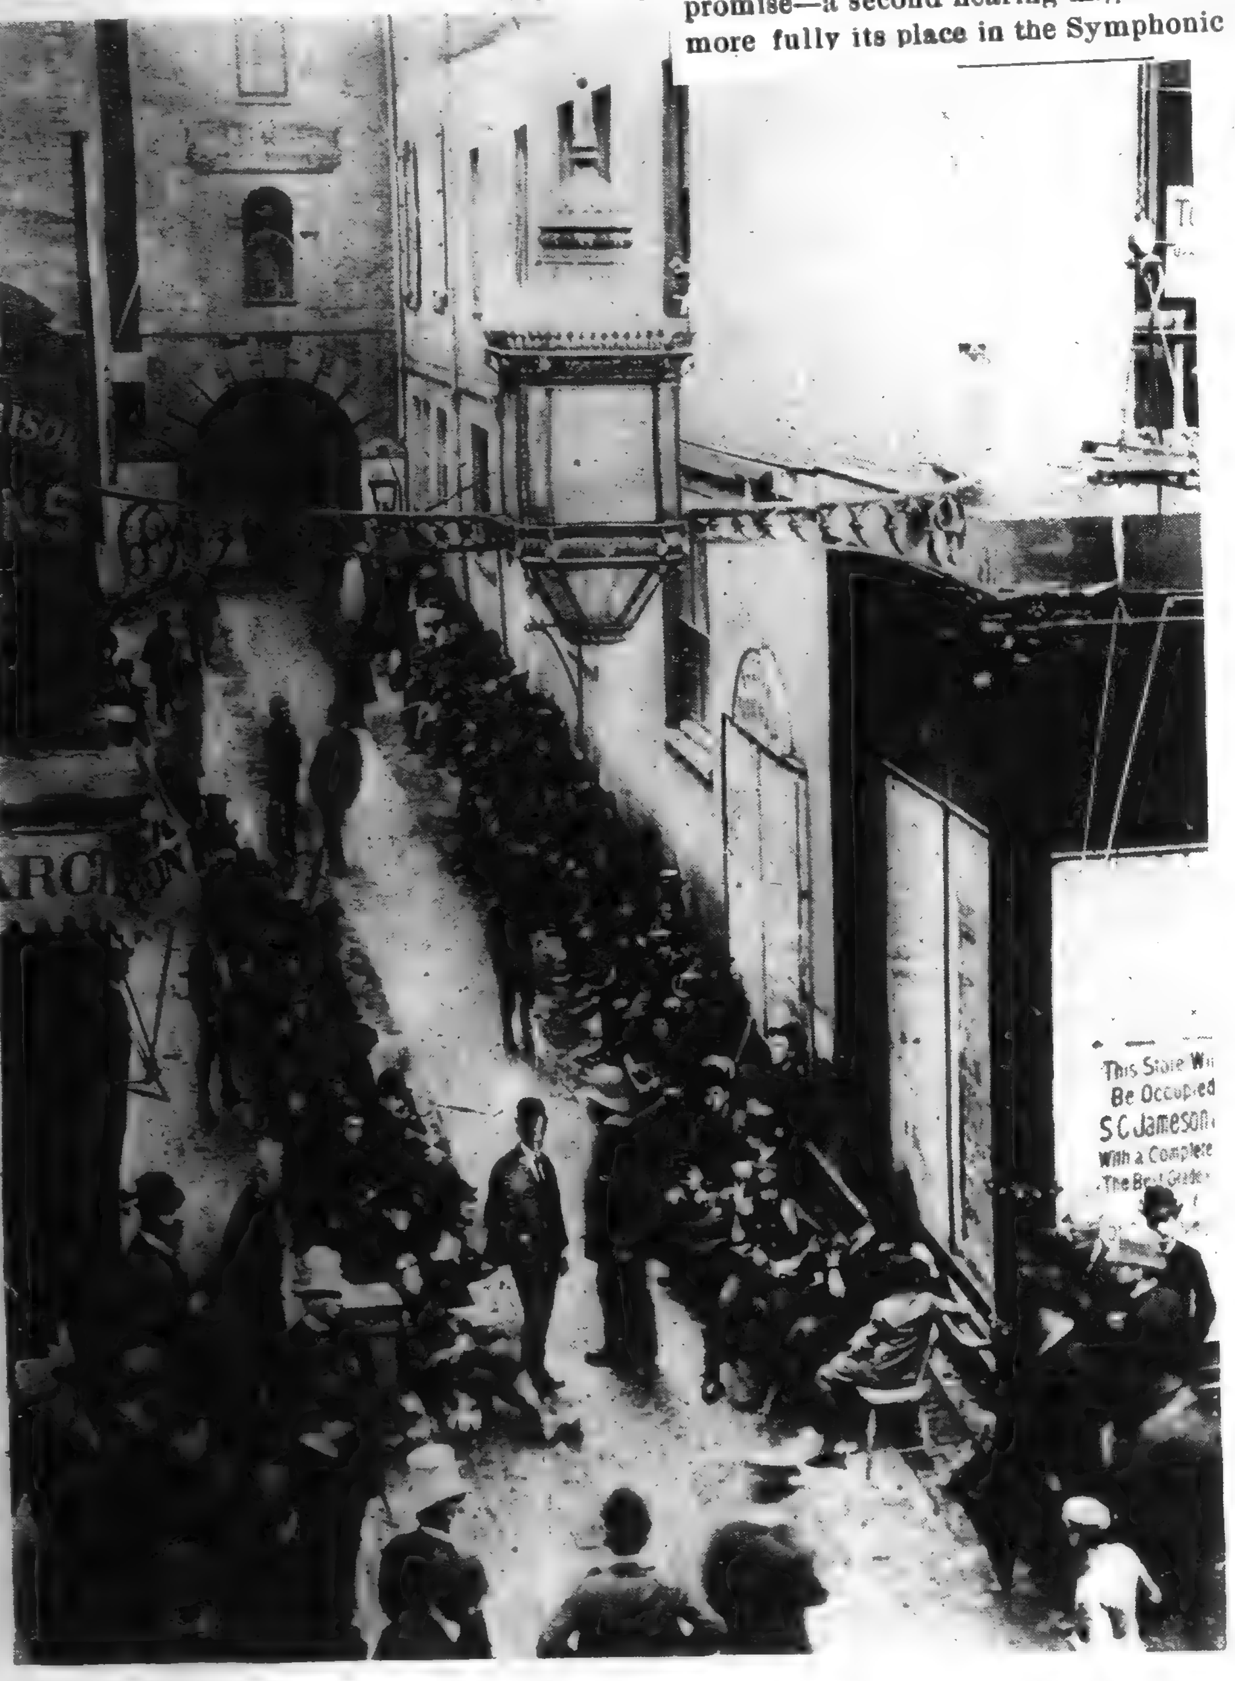
THE COMMERCIAL ADVERTISER,
SATURDAY, NOVEMBER 4, 1899.

BOSTON LOVES MUSIC.

An accompanying picture illustrates the demand for high-class music in Boston. The photograph from which the half-tone cut is reproduced was taken the last year that seats for the Symphony Orchestra concerts were sold to first arrivals. It was the demand that compelled a change of methods.

At that time the tickets for the series of symphony concerts which were held in Boston were sold as tickets for the series in New York are sold—first come, first served. In New York there is a good demand for choice seats, and a line of purchasers is always waiting when the box office opens to get the first choice of location. But this line does not form more than an hour before the opening of the box office. In Boston so great was the demand for seats that the line used to form five days before the opening of the box office. The illustration shows a crowd of men and boys, most of whom have been patiently waiting for five days and five nights in rain and shine for a chance to buy tickets. Some of them have been hired to hold places in the line; some were speculators, who expected to sell their places to the highest bidders before the box office opened. As a result of the long wait two persons died of pneumonia. This directed attention to the fact that, while large premiums were being paid to speculators, the orchestra was not benefiting year by year by the demand for tickets. From that time it was determined to sell the seats at auction, so that those who were ready to pay the premium would pay it to the orchestra and not to the speculators. This rule has prevailed since, and large sums are realized each year from the auction sale of seats.



BOSTON'S LOVE OF MUSIC.

LINES OF APPLICANTS FOR TICKETS TO THE SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA CONCERTS. MANY OF THOSE IN LINE HELD THEIR PLACES FOR FIVE DAYS AND NIGHTS. IT CAUSED A CHANGE OF METHODS AND THE SEATS ARE NOW SOLD AT AUCTION.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 5, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY.

The fourth concert contained two novelties; the overture to "Der Baunhauter" by Siegfried Wagner, and the Symphony by Wilhelm Berger. The libretto to the opera was arranged by the composer (a pupil of Humperdinck, as well as a follower of his brilliant father) the subjects being taken from Grimmes' tale of the Man with the Bearskin" and the "Spielmanns Weisen" of Wilhelm Herg.

Some of the most striking themes of the score are introduced in the overture, the music of which, with the aid of the programme book and the distinct motive, can be readily understood.

The author aimed at a true Volksopera and is now busied upon a second and greater work similar in character.

Rubenstein's Concerto No. 4, had for its exponent, Mr. Mark Hambourg, a native of Russia where he was born in 1879. He first appeared as a "boy prodigy," but since studying for three years with Leschetzky he has acquired a splendid technique, and great power of expression. His performance of the Concerto was masterly—such virility of style and perfection of finger work eliciting the hearty applause of the audience who recalled him again and again. The orchestral part was given with just the right degree of shading and perfection of execution. The first two movements are especially beautiful and satisfying, the themes melodious, and their working out not too academic to be comprehended by the mere listener.

The Symphony by W. Berger—who it seems had the honor and privilege in 1861 of having Boston for his birthplace, although as he was taken to Germany the following year his musical inspiration cannot be said to have been derived from this home of the Muses—was given here for the first time, and its fine rendering would have delighted its author could he have listened to the waves of sound that rose and fell at the bidding of our able and musicianly conductor.

It seems a well-constructed work and shows great promise—a second hearing might enable us to judge more fully its place in the Symphonic world.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 128.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr. Mark Hambourg Makes His Appearance as Soloist.

Overture and Symphony Are New to Boston—Both Are Received with Great Cordiality—The Soloist Warmly Greeted—The Fourth De Pachmann Recital.

The fourth of this season's concerts of the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, was given in Music Hall last evening, the programme being:

Overture to "Der Baerenhaeuter"........ Siegfried Wagner
Concerto for pianoforte, in D-minor, No. 4 Rubinstein
Symphony in B-flat, op. 71.....Wilhelm Berger

Mr. Mark Hambourg was the soloist, and the occasion was his first concert appearance in this country. The overture and the symphony were new to Boston.

There is nothing of interest in the overture except the orchestration, which is rich generally, now and then piquant in effect, and showing, on the whole, ample knowledge of the resources of modern instrumentation. For the rest, it oscillates between the loftiness of the elder Wagner and the commonplace triviality, and at times vulgarity, of French opera bouffe. It has a superfluity of themes that impart to it a pot pourri aspect, and in no instance is there any attempt to develop them. In fact, the work is a bit of pretentious patchwork, and not over clever at that.

It would seem that the son thought he had inherited his father's music, for he has drawn heavily on it with a frank literalness that can be accounted for on no other grounds. There are fragments of "The Mastersingers," of "Die Walkure," of "Triston and Isolde," of "The Rheingold" and of "Die Gotterdamerung," without any pretence of disguise. Hunding stalks threateningly through it; Isolde waves her scarf; Siegfried's corpse is carried through the mist; Brunhilde consoles Siegelinde, and Walter and Harris Sachs are heard in consultation. It appeals to the popular taste and is not unpleasing in its way; but it is not difficult to imagine Wagner the great after hearing the overture, inviting Wagner the little to a conference with him in private, with the purpose of inflicting the paternal slipper on the youngster by way of admonishing chastisement. The work was brilliantly and effectively performed, and very heartily applauded.

The symphony is a work of great merit. Though eminently modern in treatment it is clear, free from extravagance in conception and in its themes, and its form leans steadily in the direction of the older masters. Dignity, solidity and heartfulness of sentiment are its leading characteristics. It is tuneful, free from any suggestion of labored deliberation in invention and appeals uninterruptedly to the attention of its hearers.

The orchestration is brilliant and effective, though, perhaps too frequently and disturbingly noisy, the composer, after the fashion of the day, feeling it incumbent on him, after having resolved to make use of the bass-tuba, to bring it into evidence, and the rest of the brass as often as possible. However, this may be condoned since he refrained from the English horn and the bass clarinet. There is fine dramatic fervor in the opening movement, and a stirring animation in the finale, with its clever, final treatment and its large and impressive climax. Taken altogether, it may rank with the most praiseworthy of recent symphonies, and will well bear repetition from time to time.

Mr. Hambourg is a young artist of admirable powers. His technique appears to be fully able to meet any demand that may be made on it. He plays with easy freedom, great vigor and absolute certainty of touch. He was not heard under conditions that enabled him to display the finer qualities of style and of musical expression, and it was clearly manifest that he was not heard at his best. Under the circumstances it would be more fair to him to defer forming a final judgment regarding the scope of his deservings until he has a more favorable opportunity to make them fully apparent. Enough, however, was made evident to stamp him as an artist entitled to very serious consideration. He made, despite the drawback referred to, a very marked impression, and was applauded and recalled some three or four times with immense enthusiasm.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Overture, "Hans Heiling," Marschner; "Holdenlied," Dvorak, first time; "Bilder aus Osten," Schumann, orchestrated by Reinecke; Symphony No. 2, Beethoven.

The Symphony rehearsal Friday afternoon was unusually attractive, regarding the audience, as well as the young soloist. M. De Pachmann was a most interested listener, sitting in the Gericke seats, and Mr. and Mrs. Kendal were quite as much objects of interest. Mrs. Kendal was in brown broadcloth with sable bands, and a toque of brown velvet and violets. Others there were Mrs. George P. Sanger, Mrs. George B. Dexter, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mr. and Mrs. Wheelwright, Miss Banchor, Mr. and Mrs. C. A. Updike, Miss Constance Lovett, Miss Alice Stackpole, Mr. Charles T. White and Miss White, Mrs. Henry S. Howe, Mr. J. T. Coolidge, Jr., Mr. and Mrs. E. G. Gardiner, Mr. and Mrs. Redfern, Miss French, Mr. Edmund Dwight, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mrs. William Hooper and Dr. Lawrence. Mr. Hambourg made a great hit. He was recalled five times amid much enthusiasm.

The Symphony orchestra are starting tonight on their first trip of the season. They go direct to Philadelphia at o'clock and will play at the Academy of Music there tomorrow night at 8. They then go to Baltimore, appearing there on Tuesday evening, thence to New York for concerts on Wednesday and Thursday, Friday night in Brooklyn, and Saturday they open the second series in Philadelphia, the house for the first series of concerts there being sold out on the opening day.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV. 5, 1899.

FOURTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Russian pianist Mark Hambourg was the soloist at last week's symphony concerts. The program comprised Siegfried Wagner's overture to his opera, "Der Barenhauter," first time here; Rubinstein's fourth concerto and William Berger's symphony in B-flat major, first time in Boston. Young Wagner's abilities as conductor and composer have aroused numerous partisans in the musical world abroad, and the opinions expressed regarding his works have generally been of the most radical nature in praise or condemnation. In his opera, "Der Barenhauter," the full score may not be specially rich in characteristic color, but the overture is quite effective in its suggestions of characters, the music given to the devil, the saucy hero, the gentle heroine, the villagers and the imps being expressive of the various attributes usually associated with these people. Of course these "tonal meanings" may be admirably shown in miniature and yet not be consistently developed and maintained throughout the work; but the overture certainly may be classed as meritorious and pleasing, although without much originality in combining the instruments for producing the best results. The orchestra played smoothly, bringing out the composer's meaning with proper effect.

Mr Hambourg's performance of the Rubinstein concerto revealed an excellent development of technique and a tone of power and breadth, which in the rapid passages was a trifle clouded and lacking in crispness in the staccato phrases. This was noticeable in the octave ornaments at the close of the first movement. The cadenzas were played with considerable brilliancy. The cantabile themes in the second part were delightfully treated, and the closing movement was also played with splendid verve and finger dexterity, the least satisfactory results showing in the fortissimo work, which may have been caused by atmospheric conditions or some other circumstance beyond Mr Hambourg's control. He evidently is a young artist of high attainments, and he certainly pleased his auditors, who showered him with applause at the close of his performance.

The symphony of Wilhelm Berger is well scored, the combinations for the brasses being particularly effective as well as frequent, as if the young composer was fond of bold phrases and martial moments. In the first part there are some very clever bits for the clarinet, which were exquisitely played, and a concluding coda that was brilliant in form and brilliantly played. A dainty little theme runs through the second movement, capitally given throughout by the different instruments, and the dramatic material in the third part is excellent in form and treatment. The horns, clarinets and flutes here were notably pure in tone, and the violas gave out the principal theme with a precision and harmony most commendable. In the closing part there is much originality shown in the "conversations," which each set of instruments carried admirably. A free fantasia was gracefully played, special mention being due to the violin contingent for delicate work.

The program for the fifth rehearsal and concert, Nov 17 and 18, will be as follows: Overture, "Hans Heiling," Marschner; "Heldenlied," Dvorak; "Bilder aus Osten," Schumann; Symphony No. 2, Beethoven.

HOWARD ATHENEUM.

For several seasons past the firm

ADVERTISER

NOVEMBER 6, 1899.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Siegfried Wagner's Overture.

Once in a while a musical genius has a son who approaches the ability of his father. The great Alessandro Scarlatti was almost rivalled by his son Domenico; the great Bach gave rise to several lesser Bachs, to two of whom the word "Baechlein" could by no means be applied; indeed Burney said of C. P. E. Bach—"He is learned, I think, even beyond his father, whenever he pleases, and is far before him in variety of modulation,"—which was not true. Generally, however, it means obliteration to be born under the shadow of a great name, as witness the case of W. A. Mozart, junior, of Michael Haydn (brother of the famous Haydn), and now of Siegfried Wagner.

Siegfried Wagner was an architect; possibly he read Schlegel's famous remark, so often attributed to Mme. de Stael,—"Architecture is frozen music,'—and he proceeds to thaw it out.

It may have lost something in the process of liquefaction, or possibly the auditor wearied of seeing the leit-motif business carried on at the old stand, at all events, the overture to "Der Baerenhaeuter" carried no conviction with it and awakened no enthusiasm; the public were not inclined to accept Astyanax in the place of Hector.

Although one could easily detect the Beyreuth school in the work, everything seemed diluted and weakened; there was a little Siegfried blowing his horn, there was a more respectable Isolde, and there was also a suspicion of frankly melodic comic opera music. That the "ewig Weibliche" touches of the overture could not reach Wagnerian intensity was foreordained; the young Siegfried will do well not to attempt the per-fervid eroticism of his awful father.

Years ago the present writer made a journey to Munich to hear Richard Wagner's first opera—"The Fairies."

It would be difficult to imagine anything more suggestive of musical shreds and patches than that opera. Siegfried Wagner is some years older than his parent was when he committed this indiscretion, but he starts better. The orchestration is generally good, the contrasts often effective, but the rambling style, the incoherent babbling of short themes that lead nowhere, are flaws in the work.

Some of this incoherency might vanish on acquaintance with the opera itself, and one hesitates to pronounce decisive judgment; we would like to shelter ourselves, on this first hearing, behind a species of Dreyfus verdict—"Not proven, but with extenuating circumstances, and recommended to mercy!"

Now came a solo upon the piano-fortissimo! It was Rubinstein's fourth concerto, but Rubinstein manages to keep his favorite instrument well in the foreground, to make a solo out of a concerto, and on this occasion he was ably abetted by Mr. Mark Hambourg.

Mr. Hambourg is an artist of high standing; he has but recently emerged from the "prodigy" cocoon, and is tempted to flutter his wings in the field of virtuosity. His technique was far more in evidence than his poetic feeling. The first movement was rather prosaic; Rubinstein has not very much to say in this, and Mr. Hambourg did not do much more than deliver the goods.

The second movement was somewhat more poetic, a tender song-form with the old device of allowing the theme to appear the second time upon an orchestral instrument (the clarinette in this case) while the piano wreathed an embroidery of embellishments around it.

The finale bristled with technical difficulties and was played with an evident desire to astonish.

Here the instrumental Boanerges thundered along with irresistible might and at a cavalry charge pace, so that the movement was exciting in a high degree. At the end of the third round the piano had not been knocked out. There was much applause and the power of the artist was self-evident; but we hope to hear him in some other than this "King Cambyses vein" before we class him with our very great artists.

It is natural for a young man to glory in his strength, but we fancy that more subtlety is likely to enter into Mr. Hambourg's playing as the years go by.

What a series of novelties we are having at the symphony concerts this year! Each programme presents something absolutely new and generally these novelties are important. The Siegfried Wagner overture, which began this concert, may have been merely a curio, but the Berger symphony in B flat, which ended it, was something more. An unforced work in good form, finely developed (sometimes overmuch) and interestingly scored. The composer was born in Boston, which gave the work a double right to a Music Hall hearing.

The first movement was Addisonian in its correctness and classicality. It was pleasant to listen to a development that was normal and natural, and the absence of visible straining for effect made this intellectual movement a good augury for the work.

In the contrasts of the Scherzo, the introduction of slow episodes seems to intimate that the composer has studied his Brahms. The third movement was rather too prolix, the composer falling a victim to his ease of expression and making his treatment of themes considerably too long.

The finale copies the form of Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, in so far that it opens with a fugal exposition which [illegible] as chief theme, which returns, however, in the recapitulation, in a more [illegible] state. The contrast between the chief and the subordinate [illegible] admirably effective and the [illegible] treatment ushered in by a

Yet the symphony is not [illegible] an exciting one; it is well within the conservative lines; were it a little briefer it might be compared with the symphonies of Volkmann. In these days when almost every composer tries to make his works proclaim, "I am a Genius," it is refreshing to find a few marching along the beaten track and satisfied with being talents where Beethoven and Brahms have forbidden further displays of genius. And better a talent on the right road than a genius on the wrong one.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1899.

NEW SYMPHONY

By Wilhelm Berger, a Bostonian by Birth.

Mark Hambourg Makes His Debut in This Country.

"Baerenhaeuter" Overture by Wagner the Little.

(By Philip Hale.)

Thep rogram of the fourth Symphony concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture "Der Baerenhaeuter"........... Siegfried Wagner
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for piano No. 4 in D minor.... Rubinstein
Mr. Mark Hambourg.
Symphony in B flat major, op. 71........ W. Berger
(First time in Boston.)

I met and talked with Siegfried Wagner at Dresden in the early fall of 1882, when he was the guest of an American dentist who attended professionally the great Richard himself and inferior rulers who wore real, practical crowns. The boy was then 13 years old; he had no liking, no aptitude for music, and he was firmly resolved to be an architect, a man who has been defined as one that has artistic leanings, but has not enough sand to risk being poor. Siegfried studied this profession at Charlottenburg and Karlsruhe, he designed and built the mausoleum of his grandfather Liszt at Beyreuth, and he gave promise of an honorable career.

Instead of which, as Judge Boompointer would say, he has taken to conducting and composing. His symphonic poem, "Schusucht" (1895), has been played in New York.

Mr. Apthorp says that Wagner's comic opera "Der Baerenhaeuter" was first brought out in Karlsruhe, April 27, 1899. I wish that Mr. Apthorp would be more careful, for some people read these program-books and are inclined to regard them as gospel.

This opera was first produced at Munich Jan. 22, 1899.

(Let me here remark that Mr. Apthorp speaks on page 141 of the Rev. J. Troutbeck as though he were alive, when as a matter of fact he is dead).

Young Wagner is handicapped by the name of his father as well as by the commercial worship paid him by his mother. It disappoints many when the son of a great man shows that he, too, is above the common man; and when there is no cynical resentment at hereditary success, there is always the unfair standard of measurement, and the remark is made—"Yes, but he does not approach the ability of his father."

Siegfried does not show in this overture any pronounced musical skill or feeling. He is like a child who picks out tunes and then leaves them, pleased with each in turn. His tunes are more or less reminiscent when they are not actually trivial or vulgar. He has helped himself from the row of operas from "The Flying Dutchman" to the Trilogy. Is Humperdinck proud of his pupil? It is surprising that he allowed this score to pass him—that is, if he saw it. The young man said to himself "Hallo! Here is a big orchestra; let us experiment with it," and he tried this effect and he tried that, and Cosima said "Go on, my son; your name will carry you through; and all this will help Bayreuth." I wonder what Richard Wagner would say—or do, if he should hear this overture. Do you reply, "Siegfried is young yet; you should wait; his father was slow in achieving success"? But Siegfried was 29 when he wrote this opera and his father was at work on the "Faust" overture and "Rienzi" when he was between 26 and 29.

⁂

Mr. Mark Hambourg appeared for the first time in this country. His technic justifies the reputation that preceded him. He has great speed—too great at times, as in the finale last night, where he seemed to exult in swiftness simply for virtuoso effect; his technic is fluent, sure, eminently modern; he plays with consummate ease—and this is about all I can say in his favor after one hearing. His performance did not assure me of his possession of higher qualities. His touch was dry—but here I may do him apparent injustice. His singing of the melody did not go to the heart; and his phrasing was perfunctory and almost heartless. The performance was absolutely without color. I remember simply one thing, speed, speed, speed; speed in octaves, speed in running passages, speed in everything, as though he said to the orchestra in the finale, "Keep up with me if you can!" But let us hear him in a recital.

⁂

You might reasonably infer from Mr. Apthorp's account of Wilhelm Berger—who was born in Boston Aug. 9, 1861—that his chief compositions were songs; but Berger is a man of much more serious works. He has written three violin sonatas, a piano sonata, a piano quartet, a trio for strings, a string quintet, which took the prize offered by the "Verein Beethovenhaus" in 1898, and besides the prize composition mentioned by Mr. Apthorp for male chorus and orchestra, he has written "Gesang der Geister Ueber den Wassern" for chorus and orchestra and "Euphorion" (after Goethe's "Faust," Part II.) for solo voices, chorus and orchestra. He occasionally plays in chamber concerts in

This symphony, which I believe was played last night for the first time in America, was first performed in manuscript June 26, 1888, at the "Tonkuenstler-Versammlung" of the united German music societies at Mainz, when it was conducted by Emil Steinbach. Since then it has been played at Berlin, Meiningen, Eisenach, etc.

This symphony is for the most part of genuine interest. I had heard that the music was "well-made"—"conservatory work." I wish that music like it was turned out of more conservatories. No, this symphony was not painfully thought out, nor does it smell of the lamp. The attention is arrested at the very beginning, and for the most part is firmly held. The themes are agreeable, fresh, and in the first movemen there is a wealth of detail in the development. Perhaps the composer here, as in the third movement, is too garrulous, too much enamored of his voice, but in the repetition there is interesting orchestral variety. The second movement, a scherzo, is ingenious in modulation, piquant in melody, rhythm and orchestral treatment. The next movement, an andante, eminently melodious, is more commonplace and less authoritative, although thematic development shows the skilled musician just as the spirited finale with well contrasted episodes shows contrapuntal ability of a high order. This symphony is not a great work; it does not make pretensions to greatness; but it is clearly thought out and expressed; it is skillfully made; it is almost always interesting. Surely this is much to say of a symphony written at this late day.

The Symphony Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, N. Y., are headed with a large number of names well known to this city, and for November 16 the first concert is announced. Among the subscribers is President A. Augustus Healy of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, under which auspices there Mr. Howard Malcolm Ticknor of this city lectured so successfully last winter.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 5, 1899.

(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall consisted mainly of novelties, these being Siegfried Wagner's overture to his opera, "Der Barenhauter" ("The Man With the Bearskin"), and Wilhelm Berger's symphony in B flat, op. 71. The soloist was Mark Hambourg, the Russian pianist, who made his first appearance in Boston on this occasion in Rubinstein's fourth pianoforte concerto in D minor.

The overture by Siegfried Wagner (the only son of Richard Wagner) does not impress one at a first hearing of being anything more than a work which lacks invention, and the scoring of which is respectable but reminiscent of other works. Possibly there is something in the work which on a future hearing might be of interest, but at present it seems to be a case of a composer who is simply "the son of his father," and that may be the reason why the work has had several European hearings, besides the one in Boston.

The Berger symphony has points of interest; there are several excellent themes, which are developed at great length with much elaboration and with effective scoring. The fugal exposition in the last movement shows the composer to be of much scholastic attainment, and, taken as a whole, the symphony, while not a work of genius, apparently, is nevertheless of as much musical value as most of the recent works of its class. The performance of these new works by the orchestra was superb at every point. The soloist, Mr. Mark Hambourg, who is a stranger to this city, is a young man and a recent pupil of Leschetitsky. He has already made for himself an excellent European reputation.

He played the Rubinstein concerto superbly, so far as complete mastery of the technical difficulties of the work is concerned. His touch is at times rather unsympathetic, and the quality of tone inclined to be dry and unmusical. Perhaps it seemed so from the fact that there has been heard some wonderfully beautiful piano playing here this past week which still lingers in the memory. While Mr. Hambourg is at present immature in many respects in the artistic sense, there is the making of a pianist in him far above the average. He had a very flattering reception from the audience.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this coming week.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1899.

THE fourth Symphony concert was notable for its first presentation in America of Mark Hambourg, another young man who, by right of his qualifications, may take his place among the colossal pianists of the world. So it would seem, at least to those who witnessed his success of both Friday afternoon and Saturday night, upon which occasions he had the enormous audiences of the Boston Symphony at his feet instantly. Hambourg selected for his initial appearance Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor.

It is well known that the demands of this Concerto upon technic are most severe, and his technical equipment is astounding in its virility, its surety and its breadth. Agility and delicacy in scale passages are as marked in octaves or double notes of any kind as in simple scales, and his reading had the mental breadth of maturity impossible to conceive in one of his years.

That Hambourg is strongly magnetic is also unquestionable, for he held his hearers through every instant of his performance with an attention that can only be accorded to one who has the power to rivet it. There is something in Hambourg that is essentially individual, and yet in no way was his reading of the Concerto eccentric. He took the third movement at an unusual tempo, but in one to whom it is possible technically surely this is no fault, as it is, after all, a tremendously temperamental culmination of a work of such magnitude that no climax could be too great, and Hambourg's climax was tremendous, it was imposing—it was titanic.

Hambourg need not fear to challenge comparison with any of the pianists of the present day, for he can hold his own.

The accompaniment of the orchestra was adequate, and none was so enthusiastic and appreciative of this fact as Hambourg himself.

The orchestral numbers were Siegfried Wagner's overture to "Der Bärenhauter" and a Symphony in B flat major by William Berger. The overture is a distinct combination of Wagner père motifs and Wagner fils kindergarten reconstruction of same. Trivial, pretty, tiresome, yet amusing in a résumé of the work of his father's boy.

Apthorp tells us in the program book that Berger was born in Boston, Mass., in 1861, and is still living in Berlin. He only lived in America one year at that time, so could in no way have become contaminated with America's musical or unmusical influences. His studies were made under Friedrich Kiel.

The Symphony is good, straightforward, healthy writing, which is interesting and tuneful throughout, notwithstanding extreme length. That it would live into succeeding ages is doubtful, as there is nothing of such nature that would warrant it, for it is not especially original, although, be it well understood, for from reminiscent of anything—perhaps individuality rather than originality is what is lacking.

* * *

Is it necessary to state that it was admirably presented? No, not when it is understood that it was given by Gericke and his admirable band of artists, the Boston Symphony.

There will be no concerts next week, as the orchestra will be on tour. Hambourg is the soloist on this tour.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NOVEMBER ITINERARY FROM DATE.

Arrive New York, Depot Central Railroad of New Jersey, Wednesday, November 8, at 7 A. M.
Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, November 8, at 2:30.
Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, November 9, at 8 P. M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, November 10, at 8 P. M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Philadelphia, at 8:15 P. M., November 11.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 8, AT 2:30.

PROGRAM.

Overture to the Prometheus Bound of Æschylus, op. 38.................................. Goldmark
Concerto for piano, No. 4, in C minor........ Saint-Saëns
Capriccio Italien, op. 45.................... Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, op. 38........ Schumann
Soloist, Mark Hambourg.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 9.

PROGRAM.

Overture, Der Bärenhauter............. Siegfried Wagner
(First time.)
Maurische Rhapsodie....................... Humperdinck
(First time.)
Concerto for piano, No. 4, in D minor.......... Rubinstein
Symphony No. 6, in C minor, op. 58............ Glazounow
(First time.)
Soloist, Mark Hambourg.

DAILY ADVERTISER,
NOVEMBER 6, 1899.

MUSICAL MATTERS.

The Symphony Concert—Siegfried Wagner's Overture.

Once in a while a musical genius has a son who approaches the ability of his father. The great Alessandro Scarlatti was almost rivalled by his son Domenico; the great Bach gave rise to several lesser Bachs, to two of whom the word "Baechlein" could by no means be applied; indeed Burney said of C. P. E. Bach—"He is learned, I think, even beyond his father, whenever he pleases, and is far before him in variety of modulation,"—which was not true. Generally, however, it means obliteration to be born under the shadow of a great name, as witness the case of W. A. Mozart, junior, of Michael Haydn (brother of the famous Haydn), and now of Siegfried Wagner.

Siegfried Wagner was an architect; possibly he read Schlegel's famous remark, so often attributed to Mme. de Stael,—"Architecture is frozen music,'—and he proceeds to thaw it out.

It may have lost something in the process of liquefaction, or possibly the auditor wearied of seeing the leit-motif business carried on at the old stand, at all events, the overture to "Der Baerenhaeuter" carried no conviction with it and awakened no enthusiasm; the public were not inclined to accept Astyanax in the place of Hector.

Although one could easily detect the Beyreuth school in the work, everything seemed diluted and weakened; there was a little Siegfried blowing his horn, there was a more respectable Isolde, and there was also a suspicion of frankly melodic comic opera music. That the "ewig Weibliche" touches of the overture could not reach Wagnerian intensity was foreordained; the young Siegfried will do well not to attempt the per-fervid eroticism of his awful father.

Years ago the present writer made a journey to Munich to hear Richard Wagner's first opera—"The Fairies."

It would be difficult to imagine anything more suggestive of musical shreds and patches than that opera. Siegfried Wagner is some years older than his parent was when he committed this indiscretion, but he starts better. The orchestration is generally good, the contrasts often effective, but the rambling style, the incoherent babbling of short themes that lead nowhere, are flaws in the work.

Some of this incoherency might vanish on acquaintance with the opera itself, and one hesitates to pronounce decisive judgment; we would like to shelter ourselves, on this first hearing, behind a species of Dreyfus verdict—"Not proven, but with extenuating circumstances, and recommended to mercy!"

Now came a solo upon the piano-fortissimo! It was Rubinstein's fourth concerto, but Rubinstein manages to keep his favorite instrument well in the foreground, to make a solo out of a concerto, and on this occasion he was ably abetted by Mr. Mark Hambourg.

Mr. Hambourg is an artist of high standing; he has but recently emerged from the "prodigy" cocoon, and is tempted to flutter his wings in the field of virtuosity. His technique was far more in evidence than his poetic feeling. The first movement was rather prosaic; Rubinstein has not very much to say in this, and Mr. Hambourg did not do much more than deliver the goods.

The second movement was somewhat more poetic, a tender song-form with the old device of allowing the theme to appear the second time upon an orchestral instrument (the clarinette in this case) while the piano wreathed an embroidery of embellishments around it.

The finale bristled with technical difficulties and was played with an evident desire to astonish.

Here the instrumental Boanerges thundered along with irresistible might and at a cavalry charge pace, so that the movement was exciting in a high degree. At the end of the third round the piano had not been knocked out. There was much applause and the power of the artist was self-evident; but we hope to hear him in some other than this "King Cambyses vein" before we class him with our very great artists.

It is natural for a young man to glory in his strength, but we fancy that more subtlety is likely to enter into Mr. Hambourg's playing as the years go by.

What a series of novelties we are having at the symphony concerts this year! Each programme presents something absolutely new and generally these novelties are important. The Siegfried Wagner overture, which began this concert, may have been merely a curio, but the Berger symphony in B flat, which ended it, was something more. An unforced work in good form, finely developed (sometimes overmuch) and interestingly scored. The composer was born in Boston, which gave the work a double right to a Music Hall hearing.

The first movement was Addisonian in its correctness and classicality. It was pleasant to listen to a development that was normal and natural, and the absence of visible straining for effect made this intellectual movement a good augury for the work.

In the contrasts of the Scherzo, the introduction of slow episodes seems to intimate that the composer has studied his Brahms. The third movement was rather too prolix, the composer falling a victim to his ease of expression and making his treatment of themes considerably too long.

The finale copies the form of Mozart's "Magic Flute" overture, in so far that it begins with a fugal exposition which stands as chief theme, which returns, however, in the recapitulation, in a more homophonic state. The contrast between the chief and the subordinate theme is admirably effective and the grandiose treatment ushered in by a [illegible] is also commendable.

Yet the symphony is not, on the whole, an exciting one; it is well within the conservative lines; were it a little briefer it might be compared with the symphonies of Volkmann. In these days when almost every composer tries to make his works proclaim, "I am a Genius," it is refreshing to find a few marching along the beaten track and satisfied with being talents where Beethoven and Brahms have forbidden further displays of genius. And better a talent on the right road than a genius on the wrong one.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 5, 1899.

NEW SYMPHONY

By Wilhelm Berger, a Bostonian by Birth.

Mark Hambourg Makes His Debut in This Country.

"Baerenhaeuter" Overture by Wagner the Little.

(By Philip Hale.)

Thep rogram of the fourth Symphony concert last night in Music Hall, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture "Der Baerenhaeuter"........... Siegfried Wagner
(First time in Boston.)
Concerto for piano No. 4 in D minor.... Rubinstein
Mr. Mark Hambourg.
Symphony in B flat major, op. 71........ W. Berger
(First time in Boston.)

I met and talked with Siegfried Wagner at Dresden in the early fall of 1882, when he was the guest of an American dentist who attended professionally the great Richard himself and inferior rulers who wore real, practical crowns. The boy was then 13 years old; he had no liking, no aptitude for music, and he was firmly resolved to be an architect, a man who has been defined as one that has artistic leanings, but has not enough sand to risk being poor. Siegfried studied this profession at Charlottenburg and Karlsruhe, he designed and built the mausoleum of his grandfather Liszt at Beyreuth, and he gave promise of an honorable career.

Instead of which, as Judge Boompointer would say, he has taken to conducting and composing. His symphonic poem, "Schusucht" (1895), has been played in New York.

Mr. Apthorp says that Wagner's comic opera "Der Baerenhaeuter" was first brought out in Karlsruhe, April 27, 1899. I wish that Mr. Apthorp would be more careful, for some people read these program-books and are inclined to regard them as gospel.

This opera was first produced at Munich Jan. 22, 1899.

(Let me here remark that Mr. Apthorp speaks on page 141 of the Rev. J. Troutbeck as though he were alive, when as a matter of fact he is dead).

Young Wagner is handicapped by the name of his father as well as by the commercial worship paid him by his mother. It disappoints many when the son of a great man shows that he, too, is above the common man; and when there is no cynical resentment at hereditary success, there is always the unfair standard of measurement, and the remark is made—"Yes, but he does not approach the ability of his father."

Siegfried does not show in this overture any pronounced musical skill or feeling. He is like a child who picks out tunes and then leaves them, pleased with each in turn. His tunes are more or less reminiscent when they are not actually trivial or vulgar. He has helped himself from the row of operas from "The Flying Dutchman" to the Trilogy. Is Humperdinck proud of his pupil? It is surprising that he allowed this score to pass him—that is, if he saw it. The young man said to himself "Hallo! Here is a big orchestra; let us experiment with it," and he tried this effect and he tried that, and Cosima said "Go on, my son; your name will carry you through; and all this will help Bayreuth." I wonder what Richard Wagner would say—or do, if he should hear this overture. Do you reply, "Siegfried is young yet; you should wait; his father was slow in achieving success"? But Siegfried was 29 when he wrote this opera and his father was at work on the "Faust" overture and "Rienzi" when he was between 26 and 29.

⁂

Mr. Mark Hambourg appeared for the first time in this country. His technic justifies the reputation that preceded him. He has great speed—too great at times, as in the finale last night, where he seemed to exult in swiftness simply for virtuoso effect; his technic is fluent, sure, eminently modern; he plays with consummate ease—and this is about all I can say in his favor after one hearing. His performance did not assure me of his possession of higher qualities. His touch was dry—but here I may do him apparent injustice. His singing of the melody did not go to the heart; and his phrasing was perfunctory and almost heartless. The performance was absolutely without color. I remember simply one thing, speed, speed, speed; speed in octaves, speed in running passages, speed in everything, as though he said to the orchestra in the finale, "Keep up with me if you can!" But let us hear him in a recital.

⁂

You might reasonably infer from Mr. Apthorp's account of Wilhelm Berger—who was born in Boston Aug. 9, 1861—that his chief compositions were songs; but Berger is a man of much more serious works. He has written three violin sonatas, a piano sonata, a piano quartet, a trio for strings, a string quintet, which took the prize offered by the "Verein Beethovenhaus" in 1898, and besides the prize composition mentioned by Mr. Apthorp for male chorus and orchestra, he has written "Gesang der Geister Ueber den Wassern" for chorus and orchestra and "Euphorion" (after Goethe's "Faust," Part II.) for solo voices, chorus and orchestra. He occasionally plays in chamber concerts in Berlin.

This symphony, which I believe was played last night for the first time in America, was first performed in manuscript June 26, 1888, at the "Tonkuenstler-Versammlung" of the united German music societies at Mainz, when it was conducted by Emil Steinbach. Since then it has been played at Berlin, Meiningen, Eisenach, etc.

This symphony is for the most part of genuine interest. I had heard that the music was "well-made"—"conservatory work." I wish that music like it was turned out of more conservatories. No, this symphony was not painfully thought out, nor does it smell of the lamp. The attention is arrested at the very beginning, and for the most part is firmly held. The themes are agreeable, fresh, and in the first movemen there is a wealth of detail in the development. Perhaps the composer here, as in the third movement, is too garrulous, too much enamored of his voice, but in the repetition there is interesting orchestral variety. The second movement, a scherzo, is ingenious in modulation, piquant in melody, rhythm and orchestral treatment. The next movement, an andante, eminently melodious, is more commonplace and less authoritative, although thematic development shows the skilled musician just as the spirited finale with well contrasted episodes shows contrapuntal ability of a high order. This symphony is not a great work; it does not make pretensions to greatness; but it is clearly thought out and expressed; it is skillfully made; it is almost always interesting. Surely this is much to say of a symphony written at this late day.

The Symphony Concerts to be given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Brooklyn, N. Y., are headed with a large number of names well known to this city, and for November 16 the first concert is announced. Among the subscribers is President A. Augustus Healy of the Institute of Arts and Sciences, under which auspices there Mr. Howard Malcolm Ticknor of this city lectured so successfully last winter.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 5, 1899.
(Copyright, 1899, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of the fourth Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall consisted mainly of novelties, these being Siegfried Wagner's overture to his opera, "Der Barenhauter" ("The Man With the Bearskin"), and Wilhelm Berger's symphony in B flat, op. 71. The soloist was Mark Hambourg, the Russian pianist, who made his first appearance in Boston on this occasion in Rubinstein's fourth pianoforte concerto in D minor.

The overture by Siegfried Wagner (the only son of Richard Wagner) does not impress one at a first hearing of being anything more than a work which lacks invention, and the scoring of which is respectable but reminiscent of other works. Possibly there is something in the work which on a future hearing might be of interest, but at present it seems to be a case of a composer who is simply "the son of his father," and that may be the reason why the work has had several European hearings, besides the one in Boston.

The Berger symphony has points of interest; there are several excellent themes, which are developed at great length with much elaboration and with effective scoring. The fugal exposition in the last movement shows the composer to be of much scholastic attainment, and, taken as a whole, the symphony, while not a work of genius, apparently, is nevertheless of as much musical value as most of the recent works of its class. The performance of these new works by the orchestra was superb at every point. The soloist, Mr. Mark Hambourg, who is a stranger to this city, is a young man and a recent pupil of Leschetitsky. He has already made for himself an excellent European reputation.

He played the Rubinstein concerto superbly, so far as complete mastery of the technical difficulties of the work is concerned. His touch is at times rather unsympathetic, and the quality of tone inclined to be dry and unmusical. Perhaps it seemed so from the fact that there has been heard some wonderfully beautiful piano playing here this past week which still lingers in the memory. While Mr. Hambourg is at present immature in many respects in the artistic sense, there is the making of a pianist in him far above the average. He had a very flattering reception from the audience.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this coming week.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 8, 1899.

THE fourth Symphony concert was notable for its first presentation in America of Mark Hambourg, another young man who, by right of his qualifications, may take his place among the colossal pianists of the world. So it would seem, at least to those who witnessed his success of both Friday afternoon and Saturday night, upon which occasions he had the enormous audiences of the Boston Symphony at his feet instantly. Hambourg selected for his initial appearance Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor.

It is well known that the demands of this Concerto upon technic are most severe, and his technical equipment is astounding in its virility, its surety and its breadth. Agility and delicacy in scale passages are as marked in octaves or double notes of any kind as in simple scales, and his reading had the mental breadth of maturity impossible to conceive in one of his years.

That Hambourg is strongly magnetic is also unquestionable, for he held his hearers through every instant of his performance with an attention that can only be accorded to one who has the power to rivet it. There is something in Hambourg that is essentially individual, and yet in no way was his reading of the Concerto eccentric. He took the third movement at an unusual tempo, but in one to whom it is possible technically surely this is no fault, as it is, after all, a tremendously temperamental culmination of a work of such magnitude that no climax could be too great, and Hambourg's climax was tremendous, it was imposing—it was titanic.

Hambourg need not fear to challenge comparison with any of the pianists of the present day, for he can hold his own.

The accompaniment of the orchestra was adequate, and none was so enthusiastic and appreciative of this fact as Hambourg himself.

The orchestral numbers were Siegfried Wagner's overture to "Der Bärenhauter" and a Symphony in B flat major by William Berger. The overture is a distinct combination of Wagner père motifs and Wagner fils kindergarten reconstruction of same. Trivial, pretty, tiresome, yet amusing in a résumé of the work of his father's boy.

Apthorp tells us in the program book that Berger was born in Boston, Mass., in 1861, and is still living in Berlin. He only lived in America one year at that time, so could in no way have become contaminated with America's musical or unmusical influences. His studies were made under Friedrich Kiel.

The Symphony is good, straightforward, healthy writing, which is interesting and tuneful throughout, notwithstanding extreme length. That it would live into succeeding ages is doubtful, as there is nothing of such nature that would warrant it, for it is not especially original, although, be it well understood, far from reminiscent of anything—perhaps individuality rather than originality is what is lacking.

* * *

Is it necessary to state that it was admirably presented? No, not when it is understood that it was given by Gericke and his admirable band of artists, the Boston Symphony.

There will be no concerts next week, as the orchestra will be on tour. Hambourg is the soloist on this tour.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NOVEMBER ITINERARY FROM DATE.

Arrive New York, Depot Central Railroad of New Jersey, Wednesday, November 8, at 7 A. M.
Matinee at Carnegie Hall, Wednesday, November 8, at 2:30.
Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, November 9, at 8 P. M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Friday, November 10, at 8 P. M.
Concert at Academy of Music, Philadelphia, at 8:15 P. M., November 11.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, NOVEMBER 8, AT 2:30.

PROGRAM.

Overture to the Prometheus Bound of Æschylus, op. 38.....................................Goldmark
Concerto for piano, No. 4, in C minor........Saint-Saëns
Capriccio Italien, op. 45....................Tschaikowsky
Symphony No. 1, in B flat major, op. 38........Schumann
Soloist, Mark Hambourg.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 9.

PROGRAM.

Overture, Der Bärenhauter.............Siegfried Wagner
(First time.)
Maurische Rhapsodie.........................Humperdinck
(First time.)
Concerto for piano, No. 4, in D minor..........Rubinstein
Symphony No. 6, in C minor, op. 58............Glazounow
(First time.)
Soloist, Mark Hambourg.

ton Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The fourth Symphony Concert was given on Saturday evening in the Music Hall, the programme being:

Siegfried Wagner: Overture to "Der Bärenhäuter."
(First time in Boston.)
Rubinstein: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, opus 70.
Wilhelm Berger: Symphony in B-flat major, opus 71.
(First time in Boston.)
Mr. Mark Hambourg was the pianist.

After hearing the "Bärenhäuter" overture, one wonders what sort of an architect Siegfried Wagner would have made. As a composer of music, he is a little unsettling; he turns out to be the last thing I (at least) expected. If ever a young man had a right to brains and talent, by heredity, Siegfried Wagner has; and yet several foolish stories have been told of him. But he has certainly shown praiseworthy ambition in one matter: in his fixed determination that his visiting card should not be the most remarkable thing about him. Fate, to be sure, has been rather unkind to him in this particular; for his is probably the hardest visiting card in Europe to rise superior to; but his determination stands fast. If he, perhaps, showed no great wisdom in abandoning architecture for music, he has, in this "Bärenhäuter" overture, at least, shown considerable brains in not writing a single measure that could in any way recall his father. This is indeed surprising; but the fact stands that, in this overture, there is not a measure that in the least suggest Richard Wagner. There are reflections of Auber and Hérold in it, some of Berlioz, many of—whom shall we say? Perhaps Humperdinck? But of Richard Wagner there is nothing at all; the overture runs even straight counter to Richard Wagner's theories! And this is all that need be said of it; for it is flimsy, silly, poverty-stricken music.

The other novelty, Wilhelm Berger's symphony, is a horse of another color. It is, to be sure, a difficult work to classify; you cannot fairly call it "Kapellmeister-Musik," for it is not wholly that; at times it rises far above that sort of thing, even though it may, at other moments, fall below it. One is tempted to call it very "promising" indeed; only, as Mr. Berger is now thirty-eight, it is about time for him to stop promising. Still there are things in symphony—notably the second movement—that suggest that the composer might, with the next ten years or so, rise to a considerable height of power. The thematic material does not show great fertility of invention; in all four movements there is only one really haunting phrase: the little cantabile theme in the second. I, for one, can find no very distinct individuality nor style in the work; it is remarkably free from reminiscences of other composers or other compositions; you do not keep saying to yourself: "This is Schumann, and this, Brahms, and that, Wagner, and the other, Mendelssohn." The music reminds you of nobody in particular; and yet it has no recognizable individual character of its own. The instrumentation is not up to any very high present standard; at times, especially in the last movement, it is rather brutal and noisy; but it is distinctly modern scoring, and shows technical proficiency. The work is, for the most part, exceedingly elaborate; and this is perhaps why the composer has shown so little recognizable individuality in it; certain technical tasks are performed in pretty much the same way by everybody—except the great masters. It may go on record that the symphony had a succès d'estime; but, as Mr. Berger was born of German parents, and did not spend a year of his life in this country, the mere fact of his having been born in Boston does not seem quite enough to warrant giving it here.

Of Rubinstein's D-minor concerto there is nothing new to say at this date; enough that the composition has had enough in it to keep it alive, and tolerably "modern," for over thirty years! Of Mr. Hambourg's playing, however, a good deal might be said. This young man—he is only twenty-one or twenty-two—is, I own, something of a puzzle to me; I heard some excellent judges settle his hash off-hand last evening, and, as the Germans say, not leave a good hair on him; but his case does not seem to me really so simple as all that. I should very much like to be sure whether he takes himself seriously or not. It seems to me that there is a good deal in him to take quite seriously; that he has decided talent, temperament, and musical feeling; of technique he unquestionably has much, although not yet of the most highly polished sort. Still a man may have all this, and yet not take himself seriously; he may have more of an eye to the main chance than to doing his best as an artist. To be perfectly frank, it is very curious to note how this young man makes up and plays at Anton Rubinstein; I have seldom seen such a case of "blacking all over for Othello;" his stage name ought to be Rubinkiesel. Leaving aside mere externals, as not lying within my critical province (though I am not so sure as I once was that the appeal any artist makes to the eye is not artistically to be reckoned with), his playing is wonderfully like Rubinstein's. (Let me say, by the way, that this last clause is copyrighted, and its isolated use by passionate press-agents will be gerichtlich verfolgt). Mr. Hambourg has caught the Rubinstein manner with wonderful accuracy; he has also caught the Rubinstein exaggerations—those exaggerations which were bearable only with the great, authentic Rubinstein personality behind them, but seem like mere parody and caricature without such backing. I could not help feeling throughout that Mr. Hambourg's real ambition was, not to play either the pianoforte or the music as well as he could, but to play both as nearly like a great pianist as he could. Some things he did beautifully: in the second theme of the first movement he showed genuine fire; in the third theme, true grace. His playing of the slow movement was charming; not more distinguished than the music itself, perhaps, but full of feeling. Then, there is an [illegible] to him. I think his quality of tone in cantilena would have been exquisite, and his hammering in fortissimo unbearable, but for a circumstance precise mention of which is beyond my control; as it was, one could not tell much about his tone. Upon the whole, Mr. Hambourg makes upon me the impression of being a young man of very exceptional talent, and, at the same time, very young, green and foolish, sorely in need of a trustworthy musical guide to take the nonsense severely out of him. His success with the audience, if not record-breaking, fairly reached the top notch; he was rapturously applauded after every movement, and recalled again and again at the end. Now, it takes some genuine power to produce such a result; even admitting the well-known potency of hair, from Samson's time down to the present day, no one can seriously pretend that half a head of pendulous human hair could, of and by itself, have won all that thrilled and thrilling applause. The hair may have helped, but the playing itself must have been the chief agency.

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, Nov. 17, and Saturday evening, Nov. 18, there being neither rehearsal nor concert this week—is: Marschner, overture to "Hans Heiling;" Dvoràk, "Heidenlied" (first time in Boston); Schumann, Bilder aus Osten, opus 66 (scored by Reinecke); Beethoven, symphony No. 2, in D Major, opus 36.

W. F. A.

The Evening Bulletin

Tuesday, November 7, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

First Performance of the Season by Mr. Gericke's Orchestra Last Night.

The fifteenth Philadelphia season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was begun last night at the Academy of Music, the customary large and distinguished-looking audience being present and Mr. Gericke being again the conductor. This year there will be a double series of concerts—the "regular" season to be given on one Monday of each month for five consecutive months, and the "second series" to be given on Friday or Saturday of the same week—the programs being entirely different. This innovation has been compelled by the fact that for two or three seasons every reserved seat has been sold prior to the date of the first concert.

There were four numbers on last night's program and three of these were by Russian composers. It cannot be claimed that the result was inspiring. The audience, which was evidently inclined to be enthusiastic at first, became less so as the evening progressed and there were a good many palpable yawns during the symphony. Nor did the soloist, admirable as he was in many respects, serve to make the occasion notable.

The opening number was Siegfried Wagner's overture to his fairy opera, "The Man With the Bearskin," produced in April last at Karlsruhe. The composition is delightful. It would be surprising, indeed, if this son of his father and foster son to the tetralogy itself, was not thoroughly saturated with the music which tells the story of the Rhine-gold; and where the "waldweben" and the "horn motif" appear in this overture, but slightly changed, they seem quite in the picture. But the composition is far from ending there. It is a musicianly piece of work, generally coherent, usually dignified in spite of the absurd printed description copied from the fly leaf of the score, and it exhibits creative power which would command respect for the young composer even if he were not the great man's son.

Tchaiskowsky's Italian caprice was the second number, and while the Italian style was suggested at times, the interpreter was evidently a Cossack and the ruggedness of the Russian was constantly evident, though the masquerader was garbed like an Italian peasant; and, indeed, the result was not uninteresting.

The symphony was by Alexander Glazounoff, a young Russian, practically unknown here, although the work performed is his sixth symphony and bears the opus number 58. The result of a first hearing showed that the work is earnest and sincere; lacking inspiration, perhaps, and yet not without decidedly interesting and even fascinating passages. The symphonic form is not strictly followed, the second movement being a "theme and variations," which proved attractive to educated musicians and to the vast majority of the audience probably a little dull. It was a novelty, to be sure, and there is a considerable section of concert-goers who crave that which is new, but it is quite possible that a majority of last night's audience might have preferred the "Fifth," the "Jupiter" or the "Unfinished," although these are far from being novelties.

The playing of the orchestra was, as it ever is, a liberal education. Long ago it was accepted as the test and standard by which all other similar organizations could be measured. Yet even Achilles was not invulnerable, and it is a matter of fact that the brasses were on two separate occasions "out" last night.

The soloist was Mr. Mark Hambourg, a pianist whose age is quoted at twenty years, and who, indeed, looks but little more mature. He chose Rubinstein's Concerto No. 4 in D minor for his debut in Philadelphia, and therefore demanded criticism on his technical skill, because this work, written by one of the greatest masters of technic of his time, tests the performer's dexterity much, his intellectuality scarcely at all. It might be claimed that there are no indifferent pianists demanding public consideration any more. Unless the performer is very good indeed he has no opportunity of gaining public approval, so that performers are now all good, but some are better than others, and it is to the first of these to which young Hambourg at present belongs. In fact, he has not yet "arrived." His digital skill is great, his staccato passages excellent; but at times he lacks clarity of expression and his left-hand work is blurred. There is little chance to judge of a player's cantabile in this concerto, but at the opening of the second movement there are several measures of this character which were rendered pleasingly enough. But Mr. Hambourg is very young, he already possesses great skill and the soul will find vent when it has grown. He was very nervous last night, but seems an unaffected, modest young fellow. It is a pity that some one does not take the trouble to convince him that hair per se is not any more an evidence of genius than its lack is a guarantee of intellectual greatness, and that the artist who acquires the appearance of a Scotch terrier does not thereby assume a very dignified attitude either toward his art or his audience.

The North American
Daily Advertiser
and United States Gazette.

TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1899.
VOL. CXXIX. NO. 41.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Very Delightful Evening for Music-loving Philadelphians.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra opened its season last night at the Academy in one of the most brilliant programmes it has given here. Perhaps it was because the long vacation has renewed the sparkle of enjoyment in both hearers and players that it was so enjoyable, but certainly the strings never sounded so bold and fresh, the wind never seemed so buoyant, the brass so broad and noble, the whole orchestra so spontaneous.

Mr. Gericke's baton never felt so commanding, even while he appeared this time to free his men more than ever from the tyrannical subservience that formerly marked his reign. This is truest art in conducting, to command, and yet leave free, and those of us who remember him fifteen years ago are still marvelling at the rebirth of this one-time over-refined conductor. To-day he stands among the greatest of the world's great directors.

An Original Work.

The "Barenhauter Overture" was a surprise. It is a well-written and original work, that does not deserve the somewhat sneering criticism that has been given it. Of course, it shows somewhat the immaturity of the writer, but, though the "Eternal-Womanly" theme savors more than a little of Bellini, the work as a whole is very interesting, and makes one wish to hear the entire opera. It is a crushing gift sometimes to be a great man's son, never more dangerous than in this case; but those who have perceived the great improvement this year in young Wagner's conducting, since he first took the stick in his left hand, can expect some day a great work from the man whose first work is "Der Barenhauter." His father's first efforts were nothing like as promising.

The Prince of Darkness is musically represented by staccato in the wood wind, which seems to show him a rather jocose character, especially in the grotesque figures that are so cleverly brought in in the bassoons. The climaxes of the work in full orchestra are very effective, and came out under Gericke's freer rein with a resounding burst that was inspiring.

The Italian capriccio, Op. 45, by Tschaikowski, is an interesting study of a Russian writing his Italian thoughts in a very easy manner. Past master in orchestral effects and colors, Tschaikowski has in his fanciful work expressed the impressions of a warmer clime in a most effective manner. The inevitable Italian duet in thirds is here, but the trite device grows new with the keen pen that puts it first in simple form, then more involved, and finally uses it as theme in a great tulli in the whole orchestra.

The number appeals to every ear; to the most cultivated as a tour de force in welding somewhat commonplace and presumably Italian folk-songs into a musicianly composition; to others as a catchy "piece" that makes the feet go in the saltarello.

The symphony of Glazounoff, the second novelty on the programme, proved a most enjoyable work. While not characteristically Russian: except in the last movement perhaps, it is the work of a man who has something to say, and says it. It is not as big a message as Tchaikowski's suicidal pathetic symphony. But what would you? We cannot all reach the mountains, and healthy works, like this young man's, are good antidotes to the haunting memories that the haggard chords that palpitate at the end of the desolate last movement of the B minor symphony. And Glazounoff has other words to say.

Powerful Work.

At least it is to be hoped so, for this symphony, his sixth, is a strong work that promises more in the future. The close of the first movement is very strong. I don't know why Apthorp calls it defective. The day is rather late to do so, because the second theme does not return in the tonic key.

The second movement was charming and charmingly played. The second variation with the play of the wood wind was delicious, and gave opportunity to the flute, oboe and bassoon to show us what modern virtuosity in those instruments can accomplish. The third movement is, of course, the most popular. The graceful minuet—miscalled intermezzo—is delightful, and the suggestion of the return of the trio subject in the coda was very effective.

The fourth and last movement is written, as I said before, on Russian lines. The impression to the stranger to the Czar's command is one of great breadth and vigor. We call this Russian—I don't know specially why.

I have reserved Hambourg for the last—for he is the last ward in the piano world. He is a great artist. Ten years from now he will be a greater artist; but to-day, at twenty, he is already a great, an inspiring pianist. With a technique that stops at nothing, that can carry an accelerando through the difficult passages in sixths in the first movement, he is free to interpret as he pleases, and his treatment of the first movement was splendid.

The first theme, majestic, as it should be, slower than the orchestra, slower than I have ever heard any one else do it, and the second theme, tenderly, passionately. It was really great throughout. The second movement was not so good. It was too fast and lacked sentiment. The third movement was taken at great speed, and showed great breadth of treatment. It is, however, the least interesting of all the movements. We shall hear more of Hambourg, I hope.

HENRY G. THUNDER.

TELEGRAPH.
—PHILADELPHIA,
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1899.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The opening of the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night was, of course, a great event, though the throng did not equal that which has heretofore been in evidence on these occasions. This was natural enough in view of the radical change of procedure which the Orchestra makes this year. It is to double its customary number of concerts, dividing them into two separate series. If all the people who wanted to attend the opening had been at the Academy last night Broad street would have been filled up; as it was, a half of this crowd was diverted to Saturday night of this week, and so there was comparative comfort. But so far from showing any falling off of interest in these concerts the present arrangement indicates a vast advance. The entire house was sold for the first series before the doors were opened last night, and the indications are that nearly, if not fully, as great a triumph awaits the second set of concerts. It seems that the people cannot get sufficient of these matchless opportunities. A great deal of the rush is doubtless a mere following of fashion, but a huge amount of it is solid love of music, and desire to make the most from the most perfect form in which it is at present available to the American public. The management makes a mistake, however, in sacrificing the music for the sake of seating a few more people in the ordinary orchestra space. The effect produced by bringing the players forward on the built up platform is so much better than in that of the arrangement of last night, with the men pushed far back on the stage, that we hope to see the former seating of the orchestra restored. Withal, the improvised parquet seats were but slimly filled last night, so that the project was a failure all around.

The orchestra, if it was not heard as well as at other concerts, never played better. It gave a truly noble demonstration of the highest reach of the art, and Mr. Gericke again showed himself a past master in the faculty of directing and controlling the wonderful mass of tone. It was an exquisite satisfaction to hear such masterful work. It was, on the other hand, rather disappointing to find such perfect art given in large measure to music not worthy of the forces employed. The symphony by Glazounoff, a Russian composer until now unheard here, was singularly uninteresting, and fell as flat as the traditional pancake, and the overture, "Der Barenhauter," by Siegfried Wagner, was not much better, though being shorter it was more easily borne. Novelty is all very well, but there is no point in the "first time" on a programme unless it is worth while to do things the first time, or any time. The things named were certainly not worth while, and the symphony in particular was an infliction which we had done nothing to deserve. With this, what stores of real music there are—symphonies of Mozart and Haydn, among other works—which are never brought out, at least in Philadelphia, though the Boston Orchestra may do them at home. If we can have such things from Mr. Gericke, we will forego novelties.

Other things in the programme had more value—Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien" and especially Rubinstein's fine D Minor Pianoforte Concerto. The latter was the gem of the concert. We think it was in this work that Paderewski made his Philadelphia debut—at least, it was one of the first things he played here. The soloist last night was Mr. Mark Hambourg, a very competent young player, of whom nothing was known locally until this occasion, though after such a striking exhibition of virtuosity he is no longer a stranger. We would implore him, however, not to affiliate with the long-haired set. Let him look around upon such sane masters as Kneisel, Adamowski, and Schroeder, and realize that good music can be made without affectation. The spectacle he made with his hair forever in his eyes was unpleasing and made people wish to turn their gaze another way. But we acknowledge in the full Mr. Hambourg's abilities as a pianist, and the Rubinstein D Minor Concerto is surely one of the finest works extant for that instrument. The Tschaikowsky "Capriccio" is very original and pleasing, showing well the versatility of that gifted man. The programme of Saturday evening, opening the second series, includes Schumann's First Symphony, the "Melusine" Overture of Mendelssohn, and a new "Rhapsody" of Humperdinck. Saturday night would seem to have rather the best of it. Mr. Hambourg will be again the soloist, playing Saint Saens' Concerto in C Minor. It may be of concern to many to know that the sale of seats for single concerts of the second series opens on Thursday morning.

iladelphia Inquirer
DAY - - - - - NOVEMBER 7, 1899

BOSTON SYMPHONY

It Opens Its Fifteenth Philadelphia Season at the Academy of Music Last Evening

The fifteenth local season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was brilliantly opened at the Academy of Music last evening under the experienced direction of Mr. William Gericke, the man who more than any other raised the orchestra to its present high place in the ranks of similar organizations. There was the usual big crowd in the house, and the program had apparently been constructed for the purpose of showing that those who sometimes complain that Mr. Gericke is not sufficiently eclectic in his tastes do that gentleman an injustice. Of the four numbers which constituted the scheme of selection three were unfamiliar, and all were romantic, chromatic, declamatory and uncompromisingly modern.

There was an overture by Siegfried Wagner which was rather less Wagnerian than might be supposed, and which, being symmetrical in form, lucid in statement, melodious in utterance and dramatic in sentiment, produced a distinctly agreeable impression. Then there was the Italian Capriccio of Tschaikowsky, a composition with which certainly no fault can be found on the score of any lack of emphasis. Finally there came a symphony in C minor by Alexander Glazounoff, a Russian composer, with whom the musical public of this city has yet to become acquainted. As this is Symphony No. 6 with 53 as its opus number, one's first impression with regard to it is one of surprise that it should only now be receiving its first Philadelphia performance. After having heard it this feeling of surprise is considerably abated.

This symphony No. 6, opus 53, is no doubt a work of distinguished merit, otherwise it would hardly have had a hearing at a Boston Symphony concert, but it is, at least, on a first acquaintance, somewhat lacking in interest. It is in four movements, but its form otherwise is far from being strictly symphonic. It is rather in the nature of a suite in the looseness of its texture and in the absolute freedom which marks the development, or to be more accurate, the elaboration—for of development properly so called there is none—of its themes. It opens with a short, slow movement, followed at once by an impetuous allegro. Then comes a theme with variations all ingenious enough, but in the end somewhat wearisome. An allegretto in E flat major constitutes the third movement and the work closes with a movement which varies from andante maestoso to allegro moderato.

If we must have novelties once in a while, and it is no doubt desirable and even necessary that we should, if only to heighten our appreciation of the classic masterpieces, it is well that a symphony by Glazounoff should be presented, but the intervals for that kind of thing need not be too brief. It is hardly needful to say that this program was played to perfection, with that unfailing clarity of apprehension and eloquence of expression which have come to be expected from the Boston Symphony Orchestra as a matter of course.

The soloist was Mr. Mark Hambourg, a pianist who had not been heard here before, but who was quickly recognized as an executant of first-class ability. His selection was Rubinstein's familiar but always welcome concerto in D minor, which he rendered in a manner which made light of its enormous difficulties and brought out every beauty and emphasized every shade of meaning with sympathetic intelligence and extraordinary technical skill. Mr. Hambourg produces a beautiful tone, and while he plays with the utmost power when power is required, his style is also marked by a singular delicacy and grace. His performance produced a deeply favorable impression and was followed by reiterated recalls. It was in every respect a great success.

The first concert of the second series will take place next Saturday evening, when the program will include a pianoforte concerto by Saint-Saens and Schumann's first symphony. Mr. Hambourg will then be heard again.

THE RECORD
Philadelphia, November 7, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Russian Night at the Academy, With a Siegfried Wagner Extra.

The first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's fifteenth season in Philadelphia was given at the Academy of Music last evening, with the Overture to Siegfried Wagner's "Der Baerenhaeuter" ("Man With the Bearskin") and Alexander Glazounoff's Symphony No. 6 in C minor (op. 58) as the novelties. As the remaining two numbers on the programme were Rubinstein's concerto for pianoforte in D minor, Tchaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien," this initial evening with this master musical organization may be described as a "Russian Night's Entertainment." With the increasing vogue for Russian music we are sure to be introduced to many more new Slav composers besides Glazounoff before the season is over, and the pronunciation of Philippine and Transvaal village names will be as nothing compared to the jaw-twisting and sneezy sort of Russian cognomens which we will all have to learn. Glazounoff, who got a further introduction last night, is one of the most original and beautiful of contemporary composers of the land of the Czar, and as he is only 34 years old we may expect even greater works from him in the future.

Perhaps the peculiar curiosity of the evening attached to the Siegfried Wagner overture. Every one has heard so much of this first opera of the great Wagner's son and has heard such echoes of its success in Germany, where it was brought out in Karlsruhe on April 27 last, under the conductorship of Mottl. From the fly-leaf of the full score of this Overture Mr. Apthorp quotes, in his programme analysis-comment, the following:

> The Overture divides itself into five parts:
>
> I. Characterization of the Barenhaeuter. (Hans Kraft.) He goes out into the world full of joyous defiance, saucily challenging any one who may wish to do him harm. (Horn-call.)
>
> II. His call is answered by one whom Hans Kraft did not expect: by the incarnate Devil himself. ("Monsieur Horsefoot.") At first there is a whirring in the air—Hans listens; he calls again; the apparition grows clearer; the horn-call sounds more faintly, and the Devil worms his way boldly up to Hans.
>
> III. Then the "Eternal-Womanly" raises her hand protectingly over the innocent man. The theme follows the woman's form. (Luise.) Ecstatic delight of the happy Hans,
>
> IV. in which he is only too soon disturbed by the Devil, who creeps up impudently. (Fugato in the wood-wind, working-out.) A fight ensues between Hans Kraft and the Devil. Hans is having the worst of it, when the girl takes his part as guardian angel. The Devil, raging and threatening more and more fiercely, is at last overcome by the power of love.
>
> V. Hans, filled with gratitude and joy, comes out of the fight purified and strengthened.

"Wagnerian" is the adjective most applicable to this work of the dead master's son, which as a whole is very reminiscent of the music of the composer's father. Passage after passage could be matched out of the elder Wagner's scores, this recalling Siegfried's Waldweben, that the overture to Tannhaeuser. Sons of celebrated fathers labors under a grave disadvantage in the arts, and, to be just to the young composer, one most say that the work in question is both interesting and meritorious, the instrumentation being particularly beautiful and the themes well worked out.

The soloist of the evening, Mark Hambourg, is a very youthful pianist, of great technical ability. There is no claptrap about his playing, which is good, honest work of the highest character, full of expression and exquisite phrasing. Mr. Hambourg's hands are small as those of a woman, which makes his command of his instrument the more extraordinary; but there is masculine strength in the fingers, controlled by the temperament of a thorough artist. The Rubinstein concerto, which Mr. Hambourg interpreted last evening, is one of exquisite beauty, full justice to which was done by the talented young pianist.

Glazounoff's symphony sounds more like a German than a Russian composition. Its intermezzo in E flat major seems inspired with the spirit of Mozart, despite the fulness of its modern harmonies. If all this composer's works are of this order the more we hear of them the better, for the symphony in C minor is the work of a great master.

The sale of single tickets for the Boston Symphony Concert of next Saturday evening opens Thursday morning at No. 1103 Chestnut street.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Tuesday, Nov. 7, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

A Large Audience Welcomes the Opening of Their Fifteenth Season.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra commenced their fifteenth season in Philadelphia last night at the Academy of Music. The house was well filled, though the two upper galleries might have held a few more without being crowded. Still, it was a splendid audience, and the welcome that they gave the orchestra was one of extreme cordiality. Mr. Gericke, as last season, conducted. His programme was one to pique curiosity, rather than to suggest solid enjoyment, and in the outcome it is doubtful if the experiment afforded as enjoyable a concert as many that have gone before. Moreover, the impression could hardly be avoided that the orchestra was not living quite up to its own standard. That splendid unanimity of sentiment, that delicacy of phrasing, the responsive throb to the conductor's beat which used to be so characteristic of it, was not there to its accustomed extent. Perhaps it was due to the comparative novelty of some of the numbers of the programme which time will overcome. At any rate, that was the impression we received, and, while it is next to impossible for the orchestra to play anything but well, it is but right to record that their work in the beginning of their fifteenth season does not compare favorably with what was done by them in their fourteenth.

The following was the programme:

Siegfried Wagner, Overture, "Der Barenhauter." (First Time.)
Anton Rubenstein, Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 4, in D minor, Op. 70.
Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky, Cappriccio Italien, Op. 45.
Alexander Glazounoff, Symphony No. 6, in C minor,, Op. 58. (First Time.)

Siegfried Wagner's overture to "Der Barenhauter" was a distinctly pleasant surprise. So much has been said in derogation of his work; that it was thin, weak, unoriginal and what not, that one rather expected a diluted mixture of Strauss and Richard Wagner. Instead, we found it of delicate texture truly, and in parts a trifle weak, but it is poetic and fanciful in thought and skillfully orchestrated; a little reminiscent at times of the composer of "The Meistersinger," just as we should expect to see the nature of the father cropping out in the son, but it is by no means a slavish imitation of anybody. It has a great deal in it that is both original and beautiful, and, taken altogether, it is a charming work, and one that suggests great possibilities for its composer.

Mr. Mark Hambourg made his first bow to a Philadelphia audience in Rubinstein's D minor concerto. He has a certain facility of execution which has already enabled him to place one foot in the front rank among pianists; the other, however, lags behind as yet, for there is an absence of feeling in his playing that no amount of technical attainment will atone for. He uses his hands too much to the exclusion of his head, and his touch is undeniably hard. On the other hand, Mr. Hambourg is only 20, and for one so young he has achieved wonders. His faults are those that time will doubtless overcome. His staccato playing was exceedingly brilliant, and, as we have said before, his technical skill is considerable.

Tchaikovsky's Capriccio Italien drew a considerable amount of applause, though not unmixed with laughter. It is a bizarre affair that would suit an Exposition concert with its barbaric tinklings and doleful drummings, which are quite suggestive of a Slavonic "midway." However, it cannot be denied that its savage melodiousness has a way of tickling the ear, and could be enjoyed almost anywhere but at a symphony concert.

Of Glazounoff's symphony it is hard to speak at one hearing, but the general impression it makes is a favorable one. The third movement especially is a graceful and delightful piece of writing. Both the first and last movements have a flowing, rhythmic melodiousness that is very soothing and pleasing to the ear. The variations on the theme in the second movement, though cleverly written, are somewhat long drawn out, and make the work, especially at the end of a concert, somewhat tiring. It is probable that on a second hearing a great many new beauties would be developed that a first hearing overlooks.

The Philadelphia Press
TUESDAY, NOVEMBER 7, 1899.

AT THE SIGN OF THE RUSSIANS

Not counting Siegfried Wagner, and one need not insist on counting him, the first concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last evening was a matter of an evening with the Slav, with Rubinstein in the lead, his student, then companion, Tschaikowsky, following, and Glazounoff, one of the later generation of composers, who does not reveal the full eccentricities of the school, at the close, and with a younger generation still represented in the pianist, Mark Hambourg. Aside from the desire of the management to present the latest piano virtuoso, it was quite evident the programme was made to meet the supposed demand for novelties. Whether there is a genuine demand for novelties is a question; whether it ought to be catered to in undue proportion is another, easily answered in the negative.

If Siegfried Wagner seems rather attenuated in comparison with the proportions of his father he is not made to appear more resourceful when compared with the orchestra-taxing Russians. Hambourg, however, seemed perfectly in character as an interpreter of Rubinstein's concerto in D minor, since it does not put too much of a strain on the emotional and temperamental side of virtuosity, but does call for dynamic qualities and sonority and pianistic ability, all of which virtues young Hambourg possesses, in addition to the necessary shock of hair, without giving one a sense of a commanding individuality, or that a new prodigy has been heard and seen.

Save for the mane of coarse hair that is allowed to fall over the right side of the face, hiding the visage, there is no special affectation in the talented young Russian's work, which is along the line of the more or less familiar virtuoso type without reaching great heights. Force, vitality, climaxes by main strength, with pianistic graces well understood, make their appeal, and if the temperament develop in like proportion the Russian will be no discredit to his school nor his master.

If interest centered in the soloist it was in part because the Glazounoff symphony in C minor came last, when a certain relaxation had set in. It is not in its surface melodies peculiarly Russian, the barbaric color is not laid on so thick as might be expected, and though the orchestration is heavy and far removed from the classical model it is not so incoherently Slavic as to suggest at times purposed formlessness. The first movement is the most effective, though the second, with its themes and variations, is the most graceful and pleasing. The last is thickly written at times, and the dance is heavy-footed. So far as the Russian school went the most interesting and enjoyable work was the Tschaikowsky number, a capriccio Italien, though it is clear it is the Black Sea and not the Mediterranean that gleam and the sunny skies of the Dobiudscha that shine. This was interpreted in splendid form by the orchestra, all the fire and color, the nuance of expression and rhythm being worked out in all the choirs, the ensembles and climaxes sounding with splendid force and precision.

The orchestra also did its level best to make the Siegfried Wagner number, his overture to "Der Barenhauter," his fairy opera, interesting, but it was virtuosity wasted for the desperate efforts and musical characterization and sound imitation reduced effects to the thinnest texture, and it is clear that of the two who have grown up in the Wagnerian nursery, Humperdinck and Siegfried, that the former is the better man. It is worth while hearing such a number, even if it be only for the purpose of not being over-moved by it.

As the extraordinary popularity of the orchestra has made a second series of concerts necessary, the first is to be given on next Saturday evening, and the sale of tickets for the single performance will begin on Thursday morning, at 1103 Chestnut Street. The programme is as follows: Melusine overture, Mendelssohn; Moorish rhapsody, Humperdinck; concerto in C minor, Saint-Saens; Symphony No. 1, Schumann, Soloist Mark Hambourg.

PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 7, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Large and Brilliant Audience in Attendance at the First Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke conductor, gave the first of its ten concerts this season at the Academy of Music last night, presenting a programme with two musical novelties and a new soloist in the person of Mark Hambourg, the young pianist. The musical successes of the evening were confined to the first movement of the concerto which he played and the third movement of the symphony, Glazounoff's No. 6, in C minor. This affluent Russian gentleman musician writes in a most felicitous style, almost perfect in purity and form, with a modest amount of tone, color and weirdness for one of his nationality. His musical ideas suggest an influence from the very first vintage of Cliquot or some equally rare producer of roseate but unvital imaginings. There is little, if any, of the ruggedness which one has been taught to expect from the Slav composer, but, on the contrary, this work seems to be a genteel musician's apology for the vivid realism of his predecessors.

The work was played under Mr. Gericke's direction with a decided Teutonic interpretation. In fact, so thoroughly did this atmosphere seem to pervade this almost Russian programme that one was prone to remark that either the composer or director had made an error in the title of Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien," for Gericke's reading and accent marked the heavy heel of the Hollander with unmistakable rhythm.

The overture of Siegfried Wagner's "Der Barenhauter" opened the programme and was heard here for the first time. While it lacks in novelty of idea, it is scored with very clever and musicianly instrumentation and keeps within the realm of good music until it reaches a commonplace finale.

The young pianist, Hambourg, made a pronounced success. He thundered out the wonderful melody with which Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor, No. 4, opens and at once satisfied his hearers that he was a virtuoso of extraordinary ability. Later his consecutive thirds and fourths in theme with accompaniment by the same hand astonished the piano playing element of the audience. It was wonderful alike in certainty and balance. His tone, produced invariably with absolute relaxation, was beautifully colored, now open broad and free, and again covered with the nicety of a vocalist. His greatest success was attained on the heroism of the first movement and he succeeded as well as any of his predecessors ever did in making the overwrought second movement interesting. He was recalled repeatedly after the completion of the number, and his rendition of the Saint-Saens Concerto on Saturday night will be awaited with interest.

The orchestra has improved in the department of the second violins to an extent that the strings are now possessed of an almost perfect assimilation and balance in harmony, and in unison they are heard with much more authority than last year. The balance of the band remains the same in its general excellence, but the conservative methods of Mr. Gericke, with his stolid beat, absolute in its adherence to but one characteristic, seems to restrict the musicians without providing any adequate recompense for the sacrifice of buoyancy. The programme contained an unusual number of musical novelties, but their presentation, according to the conductor's reading, made them identical with an individual school.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.

THE EVENING SUN, per month .20
THE EVENING SUN, per year $2.00

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1899.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, now in its nineteenth season, opened the usual series of concerts in this city with the first matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The selections of music were familiar, and still more so was the excellence of the orchestra's performance. Yet Conductor Gericke had novelty to offer in a decidedly charged appearance of the stage, which definitely modified the musical results. A box scene was the new background of the platform and was designed to overcome the acoustic faults of a great hall in the matter of blending and qualifying the tone of the orchestra as a whole. The arrangement, apparently, was well devised, for in the matter of brilliance there could hardly have been an improvement in the results secured yesterday.

Especially interesting under the new arrangement was Tschaikowsky's orchestration of simple tunes in the "Capriccio Italien," op. 45. The programme's opening number was Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture, op. 38, and Schumann's symphony No. 1, in B-flat major, op. 38.

Mark Hambourg, the pianist, who was heard yesterday for the first time here, played the Saint Saëns pianoforte Concerto No. 4, in C minor, with dashing effect and was applauded for it. He will have opportunity for a display of more varied musicianly gifts at the concert this evening, when he will play the Concerto No. 4, in D minor, by Rubinstein.

At to-night's concert, also, the orchestra will be heard in three numbers new to its programmes. They are Siegfried Wagner's Overture to "Der Barenhauter," Humperdinck's "Maurische Rhapsodie" and Glazounow's symphony No. 6 in C minor, op. 58. The hour of the evening concert is 8:15 o'clock.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS

Broadway and Fulton St., New York.

THURSDAY EVENING, NOV. 9, 1899.

The satisfaction that comes from hearing good music admirably performed was afforded yesterday afternoon to the large audience attracted to Carnegie Hall by the first matinee of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. It was the first important orchestral concert of the season of 1899-1900, and it set a standard that one would fain see kept up by all its successors in New York this winter. That, however, would be asking the impossible, for Mr. Gericke and his men have attained a proficiency, emotional as well as technical, that must remain the wonder and admiration of music lovers, even though they know, in a general way, what favoring conditions and what far-sighted generosity on the part of the orchestra's founder, Mr. Higginson, have gone toward the gaining of such results.

After all, there is something peculiarly gratifying in listening to a concert at which anything below virtuosity is the rare exception, and at which thoroughness and exactness of execution are paired with high conceptions of the music's spirit and intelligent appreciation of its beauty. One feels musically stimulated, as though breathing a brighter, clearer, more invigorating atmosphere. The clean cut precision and the fascinating swing and rhythm, for example, of the finale of Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien," as Mr. Gericke and the orchestra played it, were absolutely delightful. This was a difficult passage, highly colored and of intricate design, whose effectiveness lay largely in the dash and the accelerating tempo at which it was performed. Conductor and orchestra fairly reeled it off, with dazzling success. Moreover, the audience was never in doubt as to their entire ability and firm intention to rise to every such demand made by the composer whose score happened to be on the conductor's desk. It was all so sure, so easy, so clearly within the powers of the Boston organization. Such orchestral playing is a lesson and a pleasure, at the same time, and of superlative value and interest in either aspect.

The programme yesterday began with Goldmark's overture, opus 38, to the "Prometheus Bound" of Aeschylus; next came the fourth Saint-Saens piano concerto in C minor, opus 44, followed by the Tschaikowsky "Capriccio Italien," opus 45, and Schumann's first symphony in B flat major, opus 38. As to length the list was admirable; as to arrangement, one could have wished that the Schumann symphony, with its rather sober scoring, might not have directly followed the scintillating Tschaikowsky piece, which, without of course approaching the other in its thematic strength, quite overpowered it in its gay and effective coloring. In this group of four compositions, the Goldmark overture and the symphony stood out as rich in inspiration; the leanness and a certain Gallic economy in the Saint-Saens music seemed more obvious yesterday than usual. The Frenchman's skill at the dissection and rearticulation of his material forces itself upon one's attention, often to the exclusion of the real beauty of some of his themes, and at best there is a good deal that seems artificial.

The balance between yesterday's programme and to-night's might better have been struck by transferring one of the three novelties included in the latter list to yesterday's concert. Three new works of such importance as the Siegfried Wagner overture, "Der Barenhauter," Engelbert Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" and Alexander Glazounow's sixth symphony, out of the list of four set for to-night, form too large a proportion of an evening's music.

The soloist yesterday was Mr Mark Hambourg, a young Russian pianist, who was heard for the first time in this city, and who made an excellent impression in the phases of his art called forth by the not over-grateful medium that he had chosen. His playing of the Saint-Saens concerto revealed a clear, strong touch, decision and breadth of style, a technique that responded to the most exacting requirements of the ingenious Frenchman's brilliant score, and the faculty of making all his work tell, without being obliged to achieve that result by mere force.

Mr. Hambourg, so far as could be determined from his first appearance, is a pianist who is likely to make his mark upon this season and perhaps upon future seasons. It will be interesting to note some other sides of his art at to-night's concert of the Boston Orchestra, when he will play the Rubinstein D minor concerto. The lyric was scarcely represented in his playing yesterday; New Yorkers will not know what Mr. Hambourg's real capabilities are until they hear him in recital, which it is hoped they will have opportunity to do ere long.

SAMUEL SWIFT.

The Commercial Advertiser.

By The
Commercial Advertiser Association.

THURSDAY AFTERNOON, NOV. 9, 1899.

Whatever faults may be found with Mr. Gericke, and he is not accepted so wholly without question in New York as he is in Boston, in one respect at least there is seldom room for criticism. He knows how to make an interesting programme and if now and then he falls a little below our expectations, such occasions are the exceptions that prove the rule. He may not give so many novelties as we ask for, although to-night there are two brand-new things on the programme, but he usually does select and arrange his pieces in such a manner that the concerts are never too long and the interest of the auditor never flags. No one could have asked for a better balanced, more appropriate programme than that which he offered for the first of the season's concerts yesterday afternoon. It was short, a bit over an hour and a half, genial in spirit, full of brightness and good humor, just the kind calculated to put into a sympathetically receptive state an audience which has nine other concerts before it. It began with Goldmark's Prometheus Bound overture, and ended with Schumann's first symphony, while in between came Saint-Saëns C minor Pianoforte Concerto, No. 4, and Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien."

As is always the case now when the Boston Orchestra comes to New York, Carnegie Hall was well filled with that part of the public which regards attendance at these concerts as obligatory a part of life as church going, perhaps more so. There was little room in the concert for dispraise, even if the work of the band throughout was not quite up to what it has done on other occasions. To be sure, the raggedness was confined chiefly to one choir, but we have come to have such an affection for the orchestra's brass that it was rather a shock to hear a blatant trumpet and an uncertain horn. Things which would be passed over unnoticed with other bands are always commented upon when they occur in the work of this. For the rest, however, all the marked excellences of the orchestra were emphasized by its absence of half a year, the magnificent resonance of its tone, heightened, perhaps, by the boxing in of the stage; the liquid brilliancy of its strings, the velvety softness of its wood-winds, the (for the most part) noble solidity of its brass, and the smooth perfection of finish in all its work.

Goldmark's Prometheus overture has not been played very lately, for some unknown reason, for it has all the characteristic charm of this composer when at his best. It may not suggest the distant grandeur of Æschylus, who "painted men as gods" and made Prometheus the noblest of them all, but it is bright, full of color and filled with warm emotionality. It is to be feared that Mr. Gericke and his New York public will never be at one in the treatment of this class of music. The serene calm of the Boston temperament when not wrought up on the subject of expansion finds a sympathetic nature in Mr. Gericke and approves thoroughly of the suave, polished, non-committal manner in which he handles things which are meant to thrill, to stir and to bite. Over here, a less refined and more strenuous atmosphere wants freer flowing blood, and when there is a point to be made wants it made and then clinched, else it feels that it has been defrauded of something. Mr. Gericke will never make a point if he can by any means avoid doing so, and when avoidance is impossible he takes his little hammer and blunts it as much as he can. That is why Goldmark's piece was not so telling as it might have been, and that is why all things of this nature lose force in his hands.

In the Tschaikowsky piece, on the other hand, there were no points to be made, nothing to be driven home. It was merely a show piece built on folk-song themes, pleasant enough in parts, but accomplishing its purpose when it has shown the virtuosity of the band. It was played brilliantly and well, save for the slips in the brass which occurred now and then, and it thoroughly accomplished its purpose, although no one would have felt great loss if it had stopped before it did. But in Schumann's lovely B-flat Major Symphony audience, conductor and band were thoroughly at one. No one can hear the symphony without loving it, and the more one hears it the greater becomes the affection. It was played as only the Boston Orchestra under the baton of Gericke can play it, and few there were in the audience that left before the end came.

The soloist was Mark Hambourg, a young pianist who made his first appearance in this city. Saint-Saëns's fourth concerto is somewhat timeworn, but there are in it many good things fitted to show what a pianist can do. On the whole, he made a favorable impression. He has strength, an abundant technique, which should prevent him from being slovenly in his work, as he was in the last movement; a big, resonant tone, a keen sense of rhythm, evident temperament and a fairly good command of color. His work was far from [illegible] in the [illegible] and at times he was very rough, but he seems to have the stuff in him from which good pianists are made. Nervousness, naturally attendant on a first appearance, may have had something to do with the lack of finish in his playing, and more will be known of him after to-night's concert.

The programme for to-night includes two novelties, Siegfried Wagner's Der Baerenhauter overture and Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody." The symphony, too, Glazounoff's C Minor, No. 6, will be new to most of the audience, having been played here but once, by the Philharmonics two years ago. Hambourg will play Rubinstein's D Minor Concerto, No. 4.

The World.

d by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1899.

A YOUNG GENIUS.

Pianist Hambourg's Success at the Boston Orchestra Concert.

Several things in the happiest of artistic conjunctions made the first of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon an event of exquisite pleasure.

The programme was admirable in its composition; Mr. Gericke's musicians exhibited their best qualities, technical and interpretative, and the new pianist, Mark Hambourg, proved to be a young genius. Hambourg has not yet attained his majority in years nor his maturity in artistic achievement. He is still inclined to be too impetuous; he is unwilling to curb his temperamental tendency to excessive vigor. In a few years he will realize the value of repose and repression; he will acquire the conviction that contrasts in tone-color and tone-volume are as effective if free from extreme emphasis. His faults are those of youth purely.

It is no exaggeration to dub this young Siegfried of the piano a genius. He has had a teacher—Leschetitsky—who has found him an apt pupil in the acquirement of a superlative technique, but his claims to present mastery of his art and to future eminence are based upon his natural gifts.

He has the sacred fire. He possesses musical sensibility in the highest degree. What he feels he expresses broadly, vigorously—at times a bit brutally—in the exuberance of his enjoyment of newborn virility.

His tone is big, impressive—a veritable proclamation of power. It suffers often from the excessive muscularity of his touch and becomes hard and flat. Of his technique it will suffice for the present to say that it is equal to any task that pianoforte music may set for it.

Saint-Saens's fourth concerto (C minor)—a concise, solid, brilliant composition—served to make the public acquainted with this new pianist. He played it with superb dash and with a positive degree of authority, and roused the audience to genuine enthusiasm. It is safe to predict that he will create a furore.

The Boston musicians have rarely asserted their claims to rank with the two or three great orchestras of the Old World more convincingly. The absolute precision in their technical execution, the instant obedience to the leader in changes of tempo, in variations of rhythm, in graduations of tone volume were fully exhibited. The homogeneity of the strings, the purity of tone of the reeds, the finished phrasing, all the qualities which have so often been praised, were all in evidence.

A broad interpretation was given to the first number—Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound" overture. Tschaikowsky's "Italian Caprice," a bit of fantasy, in which the composer—probably on a vacation—has done some very fine writing with trivial themes, was played with extreme virtuosity. Schumann's first symphony (B flat major), interpreted in a most sympathetic manner, ended this delightful function.

New-York Daily Tribune.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1899.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The first of the series of concerts to be given here this season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place in Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. The occasion introduced no new music to our hearing (there will be plenty of that at the second concert to-night), but it did introduce a new pianist and a new stage arrangement. Mr. Gericke is a stickler in the matter of acoustics. He has no regard for large rooms in which the sound of a band is always in danger of being dissipated and much of its tonal beauty lost. He loves homogeneity of tone, and euphony next to distinctness of utterance, and the stage of the music hall, though constructed for concert purposes, has seemed to him subversive of some of his best efforts. He has sought to remedy the acoustic deficiencies of the room by putting a box scene on the stage, and the impression created by yesterday's concert was that he had succeeded. Certain it is that the orchestra has never sounded as brilliant since it left Steinway Hall, of admirable memory, many years ago. The new arrangement indubitably lent interest to the virtuoso performance of yesterday, which was the playing of Tschaikowsky's "Italian Capriccio," a work built on commonplace tunes of a folksong character and redeemed by brilliant orchestration.

The pianist who effected his entrance on the Metropolitan platform on this occasion was Mr. Mark Hambourg. He disclosed himself as a dashing technician in Saint-Saëns's concerto in C minor, but we shall wait for his performance of Rubinstein's concerto in B minor before attempting an estimate of his powers.

The New York Times.
"All the News That's Fit to Print."
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOV. 9, 1899.

FIRST ORCHESTRA CONCERT

Season of the Boston Symphony Organization Opens Here.

MARK HAMBOURG INTRODUCED

Estimate of the Work of a Pianist of Whom Much Has Been Heard in Advance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first concert of its thirteenth season in the City of New York yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The entertainments of this body have in late years assumed the character of fashionable functions, so that there is always a large audience. Possibly it is not a thoroughly representative musical audience, but it is a very good one, and it supports an enterprise that ought to be supported. And so for this we should be very glad. The programme yesterday was one that must have appealed to every lover of good music. It was picturesque, sprightly, and easy of comprehension. It is just possible that there were dark moments in the piano concerto for all but the inner brotherhood, but where all pretend to belong to that sacred fraternity there can be no outward evidences of discontent.

The list was composed of the beautiful "Prometheus Bound" overture of Goldmark, the C minor piano concerto of Saint-Saëns, Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italienne," and Schumann's B flat symphony. This made a programme of the music of the modern era, all rich in rhythmic buoyancy and opulent in color. The piano concerto served to introduce to the local public Mark Hambourg, a pianist of whom much had been heard. He made a favorable impression yesterday, but will probably please the general hearer better to-night, when he is to play the more popular D minor concerto of Rubinstein. It was a great pleasure to hear again the Goldmark overture. This composer suffers from the immense popularity of his "Sakuntala," and is always in danger of being judged by that alone. The "Prometheus" is one of the noblest pieces of orchestral tone painting of our time, and it bears repetition well indeed. It is clear in construction, symmetrical, full of lovely contrasts of thought and expression, and goes far toward being a triumphant justification of the much-abused programme music.

As it was played yesterday it lost much of its wonted effect. Mr. Gericke, the conductor of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, is a man with definite ideas of the way in which such music ought to be interpreted, but his ideas are frequently disappointing to the warm-hearted. There is a classic finish, a repose, a poised continency in Mr. Gericke's readings of such works as the Goldmark overture, which leave the hearer in wonder as to whether he is unable to appreciate or the music is deficient in power to move. It is the perfect finish of the performance under the baton of this conductor which deceives the ordinary listener. The thing seems so correct that he cannot understand how it misses fire. But the initiated discerns that a shade too much repression of the power of the orchestra in one place and a bit of accelerando instead of ritardando in another are the factors in the reduction of a piece of emotional music almost to the sunny level of a Mozart symphony.

It should be said that the orchestra was not flawless in its performance of the overture. There were some seconds of unusual raggedness. That is to say, it was raggedness for this orchestra of point-lace finish; and it caused some wonder. In the Tschaikowsky caprice there was still more uncertainty. This time it was the brass which offended, and it must frankly be said that the trumpet playing was simply bad. The horns made one slip, but your French horn is an uncertain instrument and no man can play one without having an accident to his embouchure once in a while. The composition is one which is well suited to bringing out the smartness of an orchestra, and that is about all that it's good for. It does not belong to the class of works which gave the Russian master his fame, and it would trouble Mr. Vernon Blackburn to demonstrate from it the truth of his recent assertion that every phrase invented by Tschaikowsky bore the marks of genius.

After this cheap and empty piece the lovely symphony of Schumann came like the breath of a Summer morning. It is not now necessary to praise this familiar work, but it is a pleasure to be able to say that in the performance of it yesterday the Boston Symphony Orchestra was itself. The work was played with delightful buoyancy and with the perfect crispness and limpidity for which this organization has long been famous. Mr. Gericke's reading of the composition left nothing to be desired. It was that of a man who understood and appreciated the spirit of the music and who had made himself master of the score. The fact that hardly a person left the hall before the end of the work, which was the last on the programme, was sufficient evidence that it was heartily enjoyed. It takes something uncommon to persuade some persons to give up their precious privilege of rushing out in the course of the last movement.

No doubt the interest of the afternoon for the larger part of the audience centred in the playing of the pianist, Mr. Mark Hambourg. Though the reign of the virtuoso is always to be regretted, there are times when one readily forgives the public for going into spasms of enthusiasm over a personality. Yesterday afternoon was one of these times. Mr. Hambourg is worthy of all the applause he received and a little more. He is a pianist of uncommon power and influence. He has enormous technic, and he uses it as the means for the revelation of a splendid musical temperament. His tone is immense, and the strength of his fingers, wrists, and forearms will be the envy of many less gifted players. His runs, arpeggios, and rapid passages of chords yesterday were played with a clean-cut precision and a brilliant speed which were simply dazzling. His dynamic range proved to be large, though he did not indulge much in melting pianissimos. His tone seemed at times a little hard, but that was probably owing to circumstances beyond the reach of his technic.

He played the well worn C minor concerto of Sains-Saëns in a manner which made it sound like a new work. He galvanized its dead measures into a seeming life, and that is no small task, for it is an empty work, if ever there was one. But Mr. Hambourg is a most interesting pianist, and he made that concerto interesting through the sheer force of his masterly performance. It was not a composition to reveal in the player the possession of the highest qualities of the interpreter's art, but it must be said that Mr. Hambourg played the music in a musicianly manner, with fine rhythm and with many delicate nuances. Mr. Hambourg is welcome. He will be heard, whenever he plays, with the stimulation which comes from a strong musical personality, and he may, perhaps, hereafter show us that he can play other more noble compositions than that heard yesterday in an equally satisfying manner. It should be added that the accompaniment was given perfectly by the orchestra and Mr. Gericke.

The New York Press
DAILY EDITION.
New York, Thursday, Nov. 9, 1899.

YOUNG HAMBOURG AN ARTIST.

Youthful Russian Pianist Plays Successfully in Carnegie Hall.

Mark Hambourg, the young Russian pianist, played for the first time yesterday afternoon in Carnegie Hall. The Boston Symphony Orchestra assisted. Young as he is, Hambourg showed himself to be an artist of the highest attainments. He has great power, yet an exceeding delicacy of touch.

Hambourg chose Saint-Saens's concerto in C minor, and played it with such spirit that the big audience of music lovers called him out five times. It seems safe to say that not since Paderewski first astonished and delighted the American public has such a master of the popular instrument visited this country. Hambourg has an unaffected manner that won the audience at the start.

The orchestra, under the admirable leadership of Mr. Gericke, gave a most delightful reading of Goldmark's overture to "Promethus Bound," Tschaikowsky's fanciful "Italian Caprice," and Schumann's splendid symphony in B flat.

This evening the orchestra will play three novelties: Siegfried Wagner's overture to "Der Barenhauter," Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" and Glazounow's Sixth symphony. Hambourg will play Rubinstein's concerto in D minor.

NEW YORK HERALD.
NEW YORK, THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 9, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY MATINEE.

The concerts given in New York during the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, are among the agreeable musical features of the season. The orchestra is always sure of generous attendance and interested listeners.

At the matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall the programme included the overture to Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound," Saint-Saens' concerto for piano No. 4, Tchaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien," Opus 45, and Schumann's symphony No. 1, opus 38. The work of the orchestra throughout the afternoon was most admirable. Boston has always been very proud of this orchestra, and justly so. In the varied schools of music in which they were heard yesterday they were equally excellent, and even the hypercritical could hardly find any fault with their playing.

The soloist of the occasion was Mr. Mark Hambourg, who was at the piano in the Saint-Saens selection. While exhibiting abundant facility and a surprising digital dexterity, Mr. Hambourg was often deficient in delicacy, sentiment and sympathetic feeling. He surprised his hearers with the ease with which he mastered the difficulties of the keyboard, but seldom touched their hearts. He is clever, but his cleverness tends more toward technical perfection than artistic sentiment.

The Evening Sun.
Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
THE EVENING SUN, per month.....................................20
THE EVENING SUN, per year.....................................$2.00
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1899.

Carnegie Hall was filled last evening by the audience that the Boston Symphony Orchestra drew at its second appearance, which was also the first evening concert of its season here. The concert programme was rich in novelty. Engelbert Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody," the second number on the list proved to be a musicianly work, not displaying the variety of theme and color that some composers can offer in music of this sort, yet thoroughly interesting to the hearer and worthy of the composer of "Hansel und Gretel." It had the supreme advantage of being placed after Siegfried Wagner's overture to his opera, "Die Bärenhäuter," which opened the programme. For sheer thinness and cheapness of material, this overture has rarely had an equal among works performed by the Boston orchestra. But it served as a curiosity. The final number on the programme was a new symphony, the sixth, of Alexander Glazounoff. The second of its four parts was a theme and variations written with rare skill. The entire work was, of course, finely played. Mark Hambourg, who was again the soloist last evening, played Rubinstein's pianoforte concerto No. 4, in D minor, op. 70, with distinguished effect in the matter of clearness and force. He gave the final allegro at a terrific pace, but with perfect control, that brought down the house. He had the unusual good sense to decline repeated demands for an encore. The fact that the instrument which he used was not emblazoned with a maker's name also merited attention, not to say gratitude.

THE MAIL AND EXPRESS
Broadway and Fulton St., New York.
FRIDAY EVENING, NOVEMBER 10, 1899.

It is not often, here in New York, that one has to record a concert at which a surfeit of new music has been offered, but surfeit is the word to use in referring to last evening's entertainment by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall, when, out of four compositions, three were entirely new here and the fourth engaged the services as soloist of a pianist who had appeared but once before and whose work in what he played last night presented distinctly new considerations. It was too much; the audience, of the size and stamp familiar at Boston Symphony concerts, showed signs of fatigue, and although the length of the concert was only two hours many persons left the hall before it was over. The strain upon one's attention was too continuous for real enjoyment.

The three new compositions last night were the overture to Siegfried Wagner's "Der Barenhauter," Engelbert Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" and Alexander Glazounow's sixth symphony in C minor, opus 58. The other number on the programme was the Rubinstein D minor piano concerto, the soloist being Mr. Mark Hambourg, the young Russian pianist.

Of the new music, the Glazounow symphony proved most interesting. It savored strongly of the composer's nationality, so far as a single hearing could determine. There was what is usually called the Slavic melancholy in many of its themes, the sad fatalism alternating with fiery exaltation, and episodes of tender beauty. The simplicity and the freshness of the theme on which the variations constituting the second movement were based were in full accord with the other Russian characteristics. An unspoiled beauty marked this movement; it was normal, outspoken, eloquent.

This symphony is rather curious in form, as several of Tschaikowsky's have been. It begins with an adagio, followed by an allegro, both in C minor; the second movement is a theme and seven variations, in G major; the third is called an intermezzo, and takes the form of a scherzo, and it follows the second without a break. The fourth movement, in C major, begins andante maestoso and ends allegro moderato.

The thematic material on which the symphony is based is of interest and the composer has developed it in a personal and distinctive way. Heard after the Humperdinck music, the symphony seemed simple and purposeful; its wild outbreaks of sound meant something and its hushed pianissimi were of significance and played a part in the general plan.

Siegfried Wagner's overture to his comic opera, "The Man with the Bearskin," proved worth a hearing in spite of the rather unfavorable reports that came from across the water after the opera had been produced in Karlsruhe last April. The story of the opera is suggested, according to the composer's own analysis, in the overture. Hans Kraft (the Man with the Bearskin) goes out into the world challenging with his horn call any one who may wish to harm him. The Devil answers his call, his presence being announced by the whirring of violins and the shrill notes of oboes and flutes. The horn call is being fast overpowered by the Devil's music, when the "Eternal-Womanly" (which sounds not unfamiliar after the use made of this idea in Richard Wagner's music dramas) appears, and in the form of a calm and beautiful musical theme quells the tumult. Again the Devil attempts to capture Hans Kraft and nearly succeeds before the power of love, operating in the guise of the woman, completely baffles him and Hans "comes out of the fight purified and strengthened."

A single hearing of this overture gave the impression that its spirit and not a little of its expression, had been derived largely from the music of Richard Wagner, the young composer's father, and had been welded into form under the influence of the most modern writers for orchestra now at work, Richard Strauss and Engelbert Humperdinck. It was rather curious and sometimes amusing to hear bits of "Siegfried" and "Die Walkure" masquerading under the ornate garb of fin-de-siecle orchestration. Incidentally, it hinted at the move forward in the range and mechanism of this art, even since Richard Wagner's day. The overture to "Der Barenhauter" is not of much musical importance, but it was worth bringing out here and it would be worth playing again.

Of the "Moorish Rhapsody" of Humperdinck it is not so easy to speak. The composer had something to say, but last night's hearing brought the impression that he had been diffuse in uttering his ideas, especially in the last of the three movements. These movements are called, respectively, "Tarifa: Elegy at Sunrise," "Tangier: A Night in the Moorish Cafe," and "Tetuan: A Ride Into the Desert." The composition, which was suggested by a visit to Morocco and the north African coast, was first performed under Humperdinck's direction at the Leeds (England) Music Festival, in October, 1898. The work seems a compromise, and not always a successful one, between the subjective and objective use of the composer's impressions. It is partly a series of imitations or transcriptions of what Humperdinck must have heard in the course of hs visit, and when it becomes impossible to carry the literal any further, the composer breaks off into what may be truly termed rhapsodic musings over it all. This applies particularly, so far as it is fair to apply it at all after one hearing, to the second and third movements. There is not much about a sunrise that can be imitated in music and so in the first movement Humperdinck has kept his work free, or nearly so, from anything but his own personal expression, and [illegible] more purely musical interest.

The themes are, of course, generally Oriental in character, and they are developed with amazing skill and complexity. In musical beauty, however, it seems a drop from the composer's "Hansel and Gretel" prelude.

The new pianist, Mr. Hambourg, played the Rubinstein concerto with admirable technique and unfailing verve; he exhibited all the dash and spirit that his performance of the Saint-Saens concerto on Wednesday had indicated that he possessed and he reached a brilliancy quite remarkable. The first part of the second movement, in which the piano proclaims the first theme alone, at some length, revealed, however, what seemed a lack of sensuous beauty in his tone—an apparent deficiency in singing quality. Tenderness seems less a part of his artistic make up than one could wish, but he may disclose more of it in a recital before long.

The performance of the Rubinstein orchestral part, as in fact, of the orchestral music of the whole concert, was wholly delightful.

SAMUEL SWIFT.

The Evening Post.
New York, Friday, November 10, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

While the leading New York orchestra, conservative ever, has only one novelty on its prospectus for the year, the Boston Symphony Orchestra brought us last evening three, besides a new pianist, at one fell swoop. It would have been too much of a good thing had it been good throughout, which was not the case. Siegfried Wagner led the procession. He proves once more that there may be a great deal in a name. By any other name it is not likely that he would have succeeded so well as he has so far. His first opera, "Der Bärenhäuter" (The Man with the Bearskin), was the one successful operatic novelty in Germany last season. Though not produced till April 27, it had a number of performances in various German cities before the end of the season, its temporary success being, no doubt, due in part to the presence, in most cases, of the composer, whom everybody wanted to see, as being the only son of Richard Wagner. No less an authority than Dr. Hanslick has declared that "Der Bärenhäuter" is a better opera than Richard Wagner's juvenile "Fairies." That may be, but, if we compare Siegfried's opera with his father's "Rienzi," we may reasonably doubt whether the son will ever make a stir in the musical world. Certainly the overture to his opera, as played last evening, does not reveal any inspiration, though there are some pretty bits of orchestral coloring and several dramatic touches. The overture was well played, as were the other pieces, though there was a certain monotony in the atmosphere.

A much finer work is the "Moorish Rhapsody" of Siegfried Wagner's former teacher, Humperdinck. Though it lacks the inspiration and emotionality of the "Hänsel and Gretel" music, it is fresh and interesting, especially the first part, entitled "Tarifa: Elegy at Sunrise." There is less of local color than might have been expected in the second and third movements, which are entitled "Tangier: A Night in a Moorish Café," and "Tetuan: A Ride into the Desert." The annotator finds, in the last-named, suggestions of the heat of the sun's rays, the sand clouds of the desert, and the galloping of the horse; but inasmuch as there is no sand desert between Tangier and Tetuan, and no horse could possibly gallop on the wretched cow-path that connects the two cities, one suspects that, if those things were in the composer's mind, he wrote his rhapsody, as Schiller did his "William Tell," without having visited the scene of his story.

The third novelty, Glazounoff's sixth symphony, came at the end of so long a programme that it was placed at a disadvantage. If, nevertheless, it kept the interest of the audience from flagging, that was a tribute to its merit and to the playing of the band. It is thoroughly Russian music, original here and there, unfettered always, and occasionally wild but not tiresome, except in the last movement, which seems too much spun out.

Rubinstein's beautiful D minor concerto was chosen by Mr. Mark Hambourg for his number. He played it with dash and brilliant effect, but with too much inclination to hurry and desire to show off his accomplishments. That concerto is too great a composition to be used for such a purpose. It is saturated with deep feeling, and of that the new pianist revealed but little, not even in the slow movement. His tone is not mellow in the legato parts, and his runs and phrasing were not always as clear as might have been desired. He is a good pianist, but not a great one, which, however, is not strange, as Germany has never yet produced a great pianist. For some strange reason, the piano seems to be an instrument that refuses to yield its supreme charms except under the hands of a Slavic or a Hungarian wizard. Mr. Hambourg was cordially applauded and many times recalled.

The Commercial Advertiser.

By The Commercial Advertiser Association.

FRIDAY AFTERNOON, NOV. 10, 1899.

The second of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concerts brought out a larger audience than the first, and one which was considerably more enthusiastic. Mr. Gericke presented three novelties, all of them interesting in one way or another, and while one is disposed to growl a bit when he gives us so much that is new at one sitting, yet novelties are so unusual here that the best policy is to receive thankfully whatever is offered, conscious that if indigestion will follow overeating, there will be a long time in which to get well. The first new piece that was played is not likely to distress the digestive apparatus of any one. It was Siegfried Wagner's overture to his comic opera, Der Bärenhäuter, which has found a place on the German stage in various cities, notably Carlsruhe, Munich and Vienna, and is soon to be performed in Berlin. Such is the weight of a great name. Young Mr. Wagner's overture can be disposed of in as few words as his symphonic poem, "Sehnsucht," which was played here two years ago. The thematic material, what little there is in it that can be dignified by that term, is trivial and commonplace. Melody, properly speaking, there is none, except in one theme, where there is a reminiscence of that old and honorable tune that goes by the name of "The Irish Washerwoman." The programme which accompanies the overture says that the composer is depicting the strife between a good young man, the devil and the "Eternal-Womanly." The "Eternal-Womanly," of course, protects the young man, and the devil, after sundry grunts on the bassoons, disappears from sight. After hearing this piece one can well believe that Humperdinck stood over young Siegfried with watchful care when he scored his "Sehnsucht," because bad as that was its scoring was infinitely better than that of this overture, which is muddy, unbalanced and hollow. A well-known London critic who heard the preliminary rehearsals of the opera at Carlsruhe last spring said on his return that Mottl held his baton in his left hand and a blue pencil in his right while he was conducting, so that he might make corrections as he went along. That may be a slander arising from a natural resentment of young Wagner's desire to fill his father's shoes, but it is a plausible slander.

Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" was well worth hearing and will bear repetition. The impression left from last night was that it showed rather a falling off in spontaneity and genuine melodiousness from the Hänsel und Gretel and Königskinder music, but it is full of charm and has all the grace of scoring that characterizes the work of this composer. It is in three parts, "Tarifa, Elegy at Sunrise;" "Tangier, A Night in the Moorish Café;" and "Tetuan, A Ride into the Desert." Only in the second part do we find local color in abundance and that seemed last night to be the most effective of the three, with its quaint dance rhythms, the odd and unusual use of the bassoons and the delicate treatment of the wood winds. The first movement gave the band a chance to show the fine "oneness" of its strings in a long opening theme played on muted strings where the Boston men handled their violins as if they were a single instrument; and in the same movement was a rather weird and attractive theme played by the English horn. The last movement seemed not to have the distinction of the other two, and, while it exhibited the virtuosity of the band, did not leave a deep impression. What, however, was likely to strike the hearer most was the contrast between the scoring of this piece by the teacher and the scoring of the preceding one by the pupil. Here we had a masterly handling of the orchestra, balance, symmetry, varying tone-coloring and all the things that such a work should have. In the preceding overture everything had loose ends, great gaps were punctuated with muddled masses and of form there was none.

Glazounoff's C minor Symphony was also an interesting, if not a great work. In it was found all the skill the young Russians exhibit in the handling of their orchestra, which always results in a multitude of striking and sometimes original effects which go far toward concealing the poverty of the thematic material. Following in the footsteps of his elders of the same school Glazounoff departs freely from the traditional symphonic form and takes whatever liberties with it he thinks will make his work effective. In the first movement there is little working out and development of the themes properly speaking, and for the slow movement he has given us a series of variations on a pleasant theme, several of which are very attractive; but the whole movement suffers from being too long, as variations so often do in the hands of all but of genius. A great similarity between some of them made the effect of the whole rather monotonous. Instead of a scherzo he has a light and quite dainty intermezzo which moves briskly along without saying very much, and the last movement is made up wholly of two dance tunes, which are presented in [illegible] forms, now with one combination of instrument and now with another. The chief criticism here would be that there is too little contrast between the two themes, and even had this not been so the practical monopoly that the first enjoys would lessen the interest in the movement. In other words, with howsoever great skill a composer uses his material, if he is to hold his audience he must make sure that that material has lasting qualities, and in this Glazounoff has failed. As a change, however, the symphony was very welcome.

Mark Hambourg was again the soloist, playing Rubenstein's D minor Concerto. On the whole he did not please as well as he did on the previous day. He played the work with a magnificent dash and fire, and so long as the music called for these qualities he was entirely convincing, despite several affections which he would do well to get rid of. But when it came to the second movement, which called for depth and tenderness, he was far from what one asks for. His tone was hard and cold, even dull, and was deficient in the singing quality. He simply played the lovely melody instead of singing it on his piano as some others have done, and he played it without any of the delicacy and sentiment which is absolutely necessary if all of its beauty is to be revealed. At the same time, as was said in this column yesterday, he seems to have the stuff in him frim which great pianists are made. His technique is thorough, he has abundant strength and he seems to have the true musiciauly feeling. A greater experience ought to bring him those things he now lacks.

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

New York, Friday, Nov. 10, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Three New Works Brought Out, and Hambourg Plays Again.

Three novelties were presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night, at its first evening concert of the season, in Carnegie Hall. They were Siegfried Wagner's "Der Barenhauter" overture, Humperdinck's "Maurische Rhapsodie" and Glazounow's sixth symphony.

"Der Barenhauter" ("The Man with the Bearskin"), an opera, text and music by Richard Wagner's only son, was brought out in Europe in last April. The overture is supposed to be a characterization of the barenhauter and describes his fight with the devil and victory brought about by the power of love. It is interesting mainly because it was written by the son of the great poet-composer, and makes little impression through its own merit. It is scored ingeniously, and, naturally enough, shows strongly the influence of the composer's father. The orchestra got out all there was in it.

The Moorish rhapsody is in Humperdinck's usual style. It is in three separate movements: "Elegy at Sunrise," "A Night in the Moorish Café" and "A Ride Into the Desert." In the first part four themes are worked out with great skill. In the second, the babel in the café is illustrated closely, and there is much picturesque writing in the closing movement. The composition makes a favorable impression at first hearing. The exquisite playing of the violins in the first movement deserves special mention.

The most interesting, in some ways, of the new works brought out was Glazounow's symphony. But in this, as in other symphonic works by the young Russian, tone coloring by the orchestra is relied on, rather than really fine writing, for effect.

Mark Hambourg, the young Russian, was the soloist again. He played Rubinstein's always welcome and musicianly piano concerto in D minor. Hambourg's work in this more than sustained the expectations aroused by his playing of Saint-Saens's showy concerto on Wednesday. His technique in the last movement truly was dazzling. The instrument provided was a handicap on his work; its tone was hard and unsympathetic, and it required sledge-hammer blows to bring out the volume of tone needed. The slow movement was the least satisfactory, but we are inclined to lay it to the piano. While he may not at this time equal Paderewski (by whom all "romantic" pianists must be compared), in depth, Hambourg is only a boy, and we expect great things from him.

NEW YORK HERALD.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The programme of last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra opened with Siegfried Wagner's overture to "Der Baerenhaeuter" ("The Man with the Bearskin"), which was interesting as showing how a young man may inherit his father's ideas. For from under Siegfried's bearskin speaks the voice of Richard, with occasional promptings from grandfather Liszt.

The other orchestra pieces, Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody," is a fascinating piece of orchestral writing, and Gazounoff's C minor symphony contains much that is interesting.

Mark Hambourg played Rubinstein's fourth piano concerto in a technically flawless but emotionally uninteresting manner. With all his remarkable facility, his interpretation of the concerto lacked the graces of poetic imagery and those illuminating flashes which distinguish a genius from a technician.

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, NOV. 10, 1899.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Second Concert of the Season at Carnegie Hall Last Night.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra is continuing this season its lately adopted custom of giving its concerts in pairs, and the second of the first pair of the current series was given last night at Carnegie Hall. As was to be expected, the audience was larger than that at the first concert, which was a matinée. Furthermore, there was a more generous display of enthusiasm, for your matinée audience is a shy assembly and is not fond of exhibiting its impulses. The concert was one to evoke the applause of the musical, for it was interesting throughout. The programme bristled with novelties, and perhaps we shall later wonder why Mr. Gericke did not save at least one of them for the future. The list consisted of Siegfried Wagner's overture to his opera "Der Barenhäuter," Engelbert Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody," Rubinstein's D minor piano concerto, and Alexander Glazounow's C minor symphony.

All of the orchestral numbers were new to this public. The composers, however, are not unknown to the music lovers of this community. Siegfried Wagner is the son of his father, and he wrote an orchestral composition called "Sensucht," which the late Mr. Seidl made known to us to our discomfort. Humperdinck gave us the beautiful music of "Hansel und Gretel," for which we were duly grateful, and we have heard the fifth symphony of the Russian writer. That performed last night is his sixth. All this music belongs to the present time, the Wagner overture having been produced with the opera no longer ago than last April at Carlsruhe. It is said that Baireuth is threatened with it. But perhaps this misfortune may be averted, for the shrine of departed genius has already suffered much from young Siegfried's lately and immaturely developed industry in music.

It is hoped, in the name of the sacred shade which may linger around the precincts of Wahnfried, that the overture heard last night will not be inflicted on Baireuth. It proved to be a disjointed series of dislocated phrases, with here and there some feeble imitations of the music of the father and the father's predecessor. Weber. Wearisome and puerile in the extreme, this composition could never have been heard outside of Germany if it had not had the noble name of Wagner attached to it. If young Siegfried had any sense of humor, every time it is performed he would say, with Pooh-Bah, "Family pride, how do you like that, my buck?"

The important one of the three novelties proved to be the symphony of the Russian. It is not a great work, but it was worth hearing. Its composer has followed the methods of Tschaikowsky in its construction. The first movement begins with an introduction made out of the first theme of the allegro. Then the customary two leading themes are set forth. There is no repetition, and there is no working out in the old manner. The two themes are restated in different keys, and with varying orchestral setting, and the movement is brought to an end after a climax of tone. The second movement is the gem of the work. It consists of a theme with variations. These are very well made, especially the scherzando variation, and that which begins in canonic form. The third movement is a graceful intermezzo, in which there are some piquant bits of instrumentation, and the last is an orgie of tone color and syncopated rhythm. There is a good deal of briskness of movement and orchestral color in the composition, and on the whole it is more interesting than the same composer's fifth symphony.

Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" is in three movements, labeled "Tarifa, an Elegy at Sunrise"; "Tangier, a Night in the Moorish Café," and "Tetuan, a Ride into the Desert." All three of these movements show the composer's familiar mastery of orchestral idiom and instrumental color. The technic of the orchestration is great, and in the second movement there are some passages of fine originality and effectiveness. But the work as a whole is deficient in directness of purpose and in fecund thematic ideas. All three of these compositions were admirably played. The bassoons had an opportunity to distinguish themselves in the second movement of the Humperdinck work, and they showed that virtuosity which seems to be common in the Boston orchestra. It should be added that the strings, as usual, were altogether lovely in tone and in precision.

Mr. Mark Hambourg was again the solo player, and he quite carried the audience away with his wonderfully vigorous performance of the Rubinstein concerto. It was a dashing, forceful interpretation that he gave, and his terrific tempo in the last movement took one's breath away. No one else has played that movement so fast here, yet it did not fail in respect of clearness and crispness. It was a really brilliant piece of piano playing. Mr. Hambourg, however, disappointed those who hoped to hear from him the accents of tenderness in the second movement, and in the cantabile theme of the first. His tone proved in these to be dry and hard, and it must be confessed that at times he pounded the instrument in an inartistic manner. But he is yet a young man and he does not seem to have gained the control of his temperament necessary to that repose which is inseparable from the noblest playing. He was probably heard at his best in the Saint-Saëns concerto on Wednesday afternoon. But he is so full of vigor and his style is so instinct with life that he will always be heard with interest.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra Concert.

The New York season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra began auspiciously this year with the concerts on Wednesday afternoon and yesterday evening at Carnegie Hall. Three new compositions were on last evening's programme and at both concerts Mark Hambourg, a young pianist hitherto unknown here established his right to a place among the first of contemporary virtuosi. His number on Wednesday was the Saint-Saens Concerto in C minor and last evening he played Rubinstein's Concerto in D minor. On both occasions he was received with deserved enthusiasm by the audience. He possesses remarkable technical powers which are made subservient to his musical and intellectual feeling which seems to be interesting to an unusual extent. His playing in the last movement of the concerto last night was dazzling in strength and rapidity. The difficult octave passages, while they were not all clear, have, probably never been played here before with such astonishing virtuosity. M. Hambourg is still a young man and in the phases of his art that are least satisfying now is likely to develop greatly. He has the foundation in every respect for the highest success in his field.

Among the numbers new to the audience was the overture to Siegfried Wagner's opera "Der Baerehaeuter." The European vogue of the work is impossible to understand if this part is typical of the whole score. A trivial theme supplied its only melodic quality and the orchestration from which most was expected, proved to be without originality or ingenuity, affected and imitative. Far more satisfying was the "Moorish Rhapsody" of Engelbert Humperdinck, also heard here for the first time and announced already as a feature of the second Philharmonic concert. Its parts are richly orchestrated, without the color that such a composer as Saint-Saens, for instance, would have given to such a subject, and not abundant in ideas. But its themes are handled by a skilful and experienced hand and it is a musicianly and solid composition, which is likely to be heard in the future much more frequently than the younger Wagner's overture.

The programme closed with a performance of Alexander Glazounoff's Symphony in C minor, which has never been heard here before, although another symphony by the same composer was given at one of the last Philharmonic concerts conducted by Anton Seidl. It consists of a number of rather slight themes, laden with very effective and brilliant variations and harmonized with remarkable ingenuity. Its treatment is not strictly symphonic and it follows rather the form of a suite in four movements.

The orchestra under Wilhelm Gericke played with its accustomed finish, barring one defect of the same nature observed at the matinee. But that was trifling in view of the comparative perfection of the whole performance.

New-York Daily Tribune.

FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1899.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

It is evidently the policy of Mr. Gericke to produce his novelties while they are still fresh in the minds of his players. Four weeks of the Boston season have passed and have brought with them three novelties, all of which were exploited in a single concert here last night. It would scarcely be respectful to the composers to attempt a discussion of them out of hand, for even the poorest of the three pieces is backed by the dignity of a name that must always command respect, though it would seem just now as if those upon which rests the obligation to keep it in veneration were doing more than the enemy to bring it into disrepute. The name is Wagner, and he is either a shortsighted partisan or the personification of good natured indifference who can see it appended to so puerile a concoction as the overture to "Der Bärenhäuter" without a feeling of indignation. Siegfried Wagner outrages the memory of his father in putting forward such a work, and his champions insult the intelligence and candor of every lover of Wagner's lyric drama when they ask them to accept it for the sake of the composer's father.

That will suffice for a record of a first impression. The subject is one which can be left for maturer comment hereafter. Scarcely worthy of such consideration in itself, it gets it to-day because of its association with two other compositions which demand deliberate attention. These are Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" and Glazounow's Symphony in C Minor, which were the other novelties that had a hearing last night. To them we hope to recur hereafter.

Mr. Mark Hambourg, the solo performer of the evening's concert, as he was of the previous afternoon's, played Rubinstein's D minor concerto in a way that showed him to be a pianist equipped with all the technique, strength of finger and of limb and assurance that even these modern days can demand. There is plenty of occasion in Rubinstein's work to call for the display of all these things that an artist can put forward, and Mr. Hambourg never faltered in meeting the demands on his resources. Indeed, it would be difficult to recall a more dazzling and brilliant proclamation than his playing of the climax of the last movement. But there is something else in this concerto after all than an opportunity to exploit technique, and it was here that the artist fell short. He gave little evidence last evening that his vision penetrates the poetry of music, for surely if an artist cannot make the lovely song of the "moderato" second movement sensuously beautiful he has missed one of his most important functions. The truth is that Mr. Hambourg's tone is hard and unlovely, and that in the effort to obtain volume he forces his instrument beyond the limit of beauty. He has, too, a most unfortunate mannerism in letting his right hand wait upon his left in places where they have equal rights and duties—in chords that should not be played as arpeggios, and where his practice results in distortion and exaggeration. A female habit, Von Bülow calls it. It is not possible, from what Mr. Hambourg has shown this public so far, yet to put him among the great artists of the pianoforte. But his talent is unmistakable.

The World.
by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.
FRIDAY, NOVEMBER 10, 1899.
at the Post-Office at New York as Second-Class Mail

AN INTERESTING CONCERT.

Boston Orchestra's Novelties and Hambourg's Triumph.

Mark Hambourg, the remarkable young pianist, was heard for the second time at last night's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall. All that was said of him after his debut on Wednesday afternoon may be repeated. His playing of Rubinstein's fourth concerto (D minor), a composition which pianists with ardent temperaments—Carreno, Josef Hofmann, D'Albert and others—love to put on their programmes, was a superb illustration of the alliance of extreme virtuosity and vigorous pianistic expression.

He took the second half of the first movement, with its brilliant octave passages, at a most rapid tempo, and built up a climax of tremendous power; he accentuated broadly—almost vehemently—the theme of the second movement, and he fairly thundered the finale. The mechanics of his execution suggested a thorough contempt for the extreme difficulties of this composition.

His performance was a second revelation of the inborn qualities which this extraordinary adolescent possesses. His further appearances on the local concert stage will be awaited with intense interest.

The three orchestral numbers on the programme—a programme that was too long—were all novelties. The first was the overture to Siegfried Wagner's opera "Der Barenhauter." If this except is representative of the score proper, it is difficult to understand the great success of the opera in Germany. Some of the themes have a melodic but commonplace prettiness, but their treatment is simply pretentious. The orchestration is turgid and without significance. The young composer seems to have been anxious to employ every device which he knows or has heard of.

Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" is a brilliant bit of imaginative writing. It is full of characteristic color and rhythm and is scored ingeniously, captivatingly and effectively. But the opus has one grave fault—its prolixity. The thematic material is treated over and over again until it becomes tedious to the listener.

The [illegible] number was Glazounoff's Sixth Symphony (C minor. The Russian composer's inspiration was not particularly responsive when he worked on this composition, but he developed his matter with consummate skill. The scoring is solid, replete with striking ensembles and not lacking in the buoyant mass effects for which all Slavic musicians have a racial fondness.

The orchestra did its duty nobly. The horn-players were guilty of a few lapses, but the wonderful body of first violins covered itself with glory, especially in the long, expressive passage for muted first violins in unison, which opens Humperdinck's Rhapsody. The purity o their unied tone was preserved intact through the productions from pianisimi to fortissimi and back to pianissimi, ending in A high B

The purity of their united tone was preserved intact through the graduations from pianissimo to fortissimo and back to pianissimo, ending in a high B.

The Times
PHILADELPHIA, NOVEMBER 12, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

First Concert of the Second Series—A Large Audience—A Repetition of Hambourg's Success.

The programme of the first concert in the second series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under the direction of Wilhelm Gericke, presented last night at the Academy of Music was an improvement, so far as its build was concerned, upon the programme which preceded it last Monday evening. It had for novelty Humperdinck's Moorish Rhapsody and for its principal orchestral contribution Schumann's Symphony in D flat major No. 1. It presented as its opening number Mendelssohn's ever young overture, "The Fair Malusina," and Mark Hambourg, the soloist of the occasion, played Saint-Saen's Concerto No. 4, in C minor.

Humperdinck's composition has a valuable aid to an imaginary appreciation through the description provided in the programme written by W. F. Apthrop. To many, however, it will be remembered as a wonderful study in counterpoint, embellished and colored with a varied and thorough knowledge of instrumentation. As a musical composition, however, it appears without definite aim, or, in fact, any kind of musical architecture other than that which belongs to the rule of three.

The Saint-Saens concerto presented Hambourg's unusual talents in an altogether different light and displayed a power in legato that charmed his hearers. The conquest he made on Monday evening by the heroism of the opening movement of the concerto received added import from this other and more musical side, and any place he had previously won among the great pianists of the day was raised to a position occupied by the very few of this most select circle. The completeness of his technique heretofore noted needs no further comment, it is thoroughly satisfying in its completeness and always ample in its unobtrusiveness. His great charm is the charm of a poetic musician rather than that of a great virtuoso, although in this latter capacity, as remarked last Tuesday, he has few equals.

The symphony which ended the programme is a great favorite with the public and on this occasion it received a rendition which ranks with the most finished playing which the orchestra has done, and the reading of the score was the most thoroughly satisfying example of power which William Gericke has ever given here.

The audience was a very large one, and, if not equal to the full dimensions of the Academy of Music, at least was most encouraging, and left but little room to be filled. The next concert of the Orchestra is announced for December 11.

The Philadelphia Press
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 12, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

First Concert of the Second Series at the Academy of Music.

Virtuosity is always understood as the mise-en-scene, as it were, of a concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Of unsurpassed excellence in this particular, its abilities have never been better exhibited than they were last night under Mr. Gericke's baton. In consequence of this known condition one goes to a concert with a feeling that whatever happens will be for the best, and that the interpretation will aim at the highest ideals of artistic achievement. Whenever, therefore, the selections seem incompatible with this high scheme it must be evident that there is an intent in the method of the conductor which is well worth taking into account, since, if mere virtuosity were Mr. Gericke's gospel, the programme would be monotonously alike.

Ignoring for a moment the detailed claims of the first concert of the second series given at the Academy of Music last evening, and recalling Monday night's programme, if Mr. Gericke be occasionally bent on educating as well as amusing it is to be presumed the Glazounoff symphony was intended in the instructive sense, while Siegfried Wagner's feeble effort cannot but be viewed but as a contribution to the humoresque column, or as an answer to the curious, or as a sort of divertissment not much removed from the kind of thing that is rendered in between the acts at the theatres—not intended to be taken seriously, but "to pass the time." But at the theatre no one listens while at the Academy the crowded house is so deadly serious that it listens with all its ears, and is disposed to believe that because a composition is on the programme it is all right. Of course, Mr. Gericke might have so labeled the Siegfried number that when the devil began to snort among the bassoons some one would have smiled, but he did not and thereby many excellent people were cheated out of a genuine emotion.

Last night, however, all was smooth sailing. A new and more glorious rede was read. It was not so educational; just what the Slavic school of three periods could do was not the subject of orchestral exploitation, but there was developed a musical evening of rare enjoyment, when the subtle and delicious humor of romanticism took one into the fairyland of folk-lore through Mendelssohn's "Fair Melusina" overture; through modern romanticism into the desert where the lilt of the Moor and the lope of his steed were alike represented by Humperdinck, and then by the way of that romanticist of romanticists, Schumann, into the symphonic world of lovely ideals, all the more effective musically for their sheer abstraction, riding freely in the realm of form, and inspired by rather than dominated by definite episodes in life and nature. Moreover, the soloist virtuoso, Hambourg, was heard to better effect in Saint-Saens' concerto in C. minor and gave another exhibition of his power and his complete physical and brilliant technical grasp of the instrument, without revealing, however, that inner light of temperament that makes the individual command unreserved admiration. But it was not a soloists' night; it was the great orchestra that gave the truest enjoyment.

The orchestral feature was naturally Schumann's puissant and quoted symphony in B flat major, puissant in its massive effects and with a potency of the rarely beautiful in the way of color and figuration that is a delight to listen to, particularly so when it is evident the conductor is reading the score con amore and the whole heart. The novelty, and a worthy novelty at that, was Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody." It was not only enjoyable to hear it, but a pleasurable thing to record that the delicious promise of the overture to "Hansel and Gretel" with its somnolent dream music, its forest echoes, its hexentanz has not been falsified by his subsequent work. It is said that Humperdinck, who is the instructor of Siegfried Wagner, writes the latter's orchestral scores. If the work on the "Moorish Rhapsody" be contrasted with the "Barenhauter" overture, it must be clear that the master is not quite so self-sacrificing as anecdote makes him. When Humperdinck wants effects he knows how to get them and when he lets fantasy call for the bizarre, as in the second movement of the "Rhapsody," "A Night in a Moorish Cafe," he does a thing or two that he has not transferred to his pupil. The whole work is delightful from the ululating melody given out on the strings con sordini with which the first movement opens to the plaintive notes on the wood wind and the characteristic danse du ventre air in the second movement, on to the thump of the horses—at times they seem to be camels—in the finale. Humperdinck weaves a beautiful orchestral web. It has musical ideas for the warp and lovely color for the woof and in consequence the resultant weft is a work of art, which when read with the spirit and understanding given it last night, leaves nothing but delightful memories.

The Saints-Saens concerto followed Humperdincks and was well contrasted. In this work, which seemed to be more in Hambourg's line, his real virtuosity was beaten in on you, that is just it, a second hearing convincing you at heart of his great technical skill and his power and there were some amazing moments in the second movements. As his abilities are so marked it is a pity his mane is utilized to convey an impression of intense nervous, energy since it is so unnecessary and such a silly affectation. Even this cannot spoil his good work, and his reception was very cordial. The audience was large and the splendid turnout is a tribute to the orchestra as well as an indication of the real breadth of culture of Philadelphia's music-loving folks, and a vindication of the sound judgment of the orchestral management.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Monday, Nov. 13, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

A Large Audience Greets the Second of Their Series of Concerts.

Is there a musical public in Philadelphia? The impertinent question has been put into shape before now, and certain anomalous proceedings on the part of that hypothetical body have, perhaps, warranted the occasional uplifting of an eyebrow. It is not so long ago that Mme. Sembrich sang to empty benches at the Academy, and evidence of other misdemeanors might be adduced to show that such as the musical public is, its ways have at least been marked by the erratic genius which the hall mark of eccentricity is suposed to establish. The question, however, was put to the coldly yea or nay test when the Boston Symphony Orchestra decided to double the number of their concerts here, and the answer of the past week is a complete justification of the belief which the manager of that admirable organization has in the existence, not only of a musical public, but a public of sound and critical judgment.

The first of the series of this season's concerts, which took place last Monday, drew an audience which crowded the house downstairs and comfortably filled it upstairs. Last Saturday's concert completely filled the house both up and down stairs, with the trifling exception of four or five boxes on the grand tier, and the welcome which the orchestra received settled, for the present at any rate, the question as to whether or no there is a large music loving public in Philadelphia.

So close did these two concerts come together in point of time that they may fairly be considered together. It will be remembered that at the first concert two out of the four numbers were novelties, and at the second Humperdinck's Moorish Rhapsody was given for the first time. Three new numbers in two concerts! Those conservative souls to whose hearts Tennyson's Farmer Old Style's

> "I've 'ed my point o' ale ivry noight sin' I >   bean 'ere,
> An' I've 'ed my quart ivry market noight for >   foorty year," beats a responsive echo, may be shocked at Mr. Gericke's musical radicalism, but for our part we are glad to see him trying to escape from the rut of Beethoven's "Eroica" and Tschaikowsky's "Pathetique," Toujours Perdrix," as Wagstaffe well said, "is sickening." True, the success of innovations must depend upon their success, and unsuccessful innovation might destroy the demand for some time to come, but it is pleasant to have heard Siegfried Wagner's Barenhauter overture to have judged for ourselves. Glazounoff's Symphony finds ready objectors on its first hearing, because it does not conform to the symphonic form, but are we always to be shackled? Should theatres be illuminated with candles rather than with electricity because candles were correct form in Beethoven's time? Are composers never to break away from tradition and speak from their hearts as the thoughts come to the lips, without waiting like a master singer to "sole and heel the stanza?"

Humperdinck's Moorish Rhapsody, performed on Saturday, wants another hearing. Its opening is so fraught with the dread of what the strings are about to do that one is apt to sit on tenterhooks, but when you know that the last high note of the daybreak elegy is to be imagined and not played the danger of nervous prostration is removed, and at the end of the three movements one can reflect with pleasure that it was a graceful, dainty, poetic and altogether delightful piece of writing, even though it did follow after such an exquisite composition as Felix Mendelssohn-Bartholdy overture to the legend of "The Fair Melusina."

Mr. Gericke deserves all our thanks, and may his progressive spirit never grow less. It would, however, promote digestion better were he to place the symphony not later than second on the programme instead of making it the last number.

The soloist on Saturday was Mr. Mark Hambourg, who played Saint-Sæns's C minor concerto. He gave an even greater exhibition of technical skill than he did on the previous Monday in the Rubinstein concerto. His playing is marked by a virility that augurs well for the future, and he has fire and power; but his power is not tempered by judgment. Still, as we remarked before, Mr. Hambourg is only 20. If he has climbed so far up the ladder at this early stage, where will he be when his years have been doubled?

The playing of the orchestra, taken altogether, was a great improvement on their opening effort. There were no conspicuous slips in the brass, nor aberrations on the part of the trumpets. There still remains, however, something to catch up to equal the standard which they have accustomed us to.

ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

Mr. WILHELM GERICKE, Conductor.

Two Series of Five Concerts Each.

EVERY SEAT SOLD FOR 1st SERIES	Second Series.
	Saturday Ev'g, Nov. 11.
	Friday Ev'g, Dec. 15.
	Friday Ev'g, Jan. 19.
	Saturday, Ev'g, Feb. 24.
	Friday Ev'g, Mar. 23.

Solo Artists:
TERNINA, DOHNANYI, HAMBOURG,
JACKSON, KNEISEL, ADAMOWSKI,
And others to be announced.

Season ticket sale for 2d Series opens to-morrow (Monday) morning at 1103 Chestnut St. at 8.
F. R. COMEE, Ass't Mgr., C. A. ELLIS, Manager.

THE RECORD
Philadelphia, November 12, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Humperdinck's Moorish Rhapsody the Novelty of Last Evening.

Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody" was the sole novelty of last evening's concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at the Academy of Music. The first two movements of this interesting piece of music were played, under the composer's direction, at the Leeds, England, Musical Festival on October 7, 1898, and shortly after the work was given in its entirety in Germany. Three separate movements constitute this romantic composition, which is divided as follows: 1, Tarifa, "Elegy at Sunrise;" II, Tangier, "A Night in the Moorish Cafe;" III, Tetuan, "A Ride into the Desert."

There are passages that recall the "Hansel and Gretel" music, although the spontaneity of that delightful opera are missing. The opening theme of the first movement is a beautifully expressive passage for the united violins, almost awe-inspiring in its sad intensity, and the workng out of the subsequent themes is decidedly pastoral in character. The form is perfectly free.

The subject of the second movement is the wine-drinking and opium-smoking in a native cafe at Tangier, in the midst of which an itinerant singer arouses the crowd to a fury of enthusiasm by singing of the old glory of the Moors in Granada and Seville. After the song is over the drinkers and smokers fall back into their former lethargy.

The third movement, exceedingly elaborate in its orchestra scoring, is said by the annotator to contain suggestions of the heat of the sun, the sand clouds of the desert and the galloping of a horse.

Certainly the broken Crescendo may be interpreted as a blast of wind from the desert, and there is a figure such as is usually associated in programme music with galloping, but the cold fact remains that there is no desert between Tangier and Tetuan, and the roads are such over which the most venturesome horseman would fear to gallop, so that if the composer intended to represent these things his poetic fancy flew free of actuality.

But the "Moorish Rhapsody" is both fresh and interesting. As interpreted last evening it was a genuine pleasure to listen to it.

The soloist of the evening, as at Monday's concert, was Mark Hambourg, who confirmed the favorable impression he made upon his original appearance. His selection last evening was a concerto in C minor by Saint-Saens, an exceedingly difficult composition from a technical point of view, though not so beautiful as the Rubinstein concerto played on Monday. The other numbers on the programme were Mendelssohn's overture to "The Fair Melusina" and Schumann's exquisite symphony in B flat major, the "Spring" symphony, both of which, it is hardly necessary to state, were rendered with a full appreciation of what was in them.

The Evening Bulletin
Monday, November 13, 1899.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA

Beginning of the Second Series of Symphony Concerts on Saturday Night.

The first concert of the second series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given at the Academy on Saturday night was a delightful affair. While the house was not quite as well filled as on the previous Monday, when every seat was sold, the audience was very large, indeed, and, excepting a few boxes there were few empty places.

The program was thoroughly enjoyable, the opening number being Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture, which is essentially good music. Then there was a novelty by Humperdinck, composer of Hansel and Gretel, a Moorish rhapsody, full of color and alive with sentiment, and finally Schumann's first (better known as the "Spring") Symphony, which is a constant delight.

Never has the orchestra been heard to greater advantage. The playing of Mr. Gericke's splendid band, when judged by the standard it has itself set, was not beyond criticism on Monday last, but during this, the second concert, the playing was faultless. Finer programs we have had but a more thoroughly satisfactory rendition, never' It is surely a matter for sincere congratulation that we are this season to have two opportunities each month of listening to this incomparable organization

The soloist was again Mr Hambourg, who played St. Saens's piano concerto. No. 4. confirming the impresison gained on the occasion of his first appearance that he is possessed of amazing technical skill and when that is said all is said.

[43]

[illegible]

NOVEMBER 12, 1899

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Second Series Successfully Opened at the Academy of Music in the Presence of a Large Audience

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first in its second series of concerts at the Academy of Music last night under the direction of Mr. William Gericke, and in the presence of an audience which by its numbers and enthusiasm removed all doubt as to the popular success of the new enterprise. There had been some misgivings as to this among the friends of the orchestra, who feared that two symphony concerts by the same organization in a single week would fail to receive the support necessary to indemnify the management against loss. The advance sale and the experience of last night have served to show that these apprehensions were unfounded. It is evident that the excellence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is so well appreciated here that there are a great many people who are glad of an opportunity to hear it twice in the same week, so that what seemed at first the venturesome enterprise of the management has been justified and is likely to be rewarded.

From an artistic point of view the success of the concert was not less marked. A varied and attractive program had been arranged for the occasion. It included Mendelssohn's graceful and melodious overture of "Melusine," which was played by the orchestra with admirable delicacy of expression and lucidity of statement. The symphony was Schumann's inspired work in B flat major, and a more brilliant, masterful, luminous or convincing interpretation of this splendid music no one need desire or expect. Here was playing which had vitality and force and fire, and which communicated to the listener all the ardor and pathos and passion by which the composition is animated and inspired. It was a most impressive and soul-uplifting performance, one of those performances which are always remembered and made a standard for subsequent comparison. The novelty of the evening was the Moorish fantasia of Humperdinck which proved to be a work of much original and distinctive beauty. Whether it gained anything from the description which the program furnished of its intention, that is of the scenes which the composer was seeking to suggest, may well be doubted. Usually it is better to allow the hearer to construe the significance of what he hears according to his own impression, and Humperdinck's music is sufficiently interesting not to need the label which it bears. It is in a high degree imaginative and poetic, and it is constructed with consummate skill. It makes great demands upon the orchestra, especially in the string department, but to all its demands it is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Gericke's players were easily equal.

The soloist was Mr. Mark Hambourg, who confirmed without, however, deepening the favorable impression which he had previously made. He has a wonderful technique. How much more than that he possesses has not yet been demonstrated. It is true that Saint-Saens' concerto in C minor affords little or no opportunity for the display of anything beyond technique, but the fact that Mr. Hambourg should have selected it may have its significance. He apparently prefers to be heard in that kind of thing, and it may be that he has good reason for his preference. He certainly is an absolute master of the physical resources of the instrument. Whether he can also play in the way that goes to the heart remains to be made known.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV. 19, 1899.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dvorak's symphonic poem, "A Hero's Song," was the novelty presented at the symphony concerts last week. The other selections were Heinrich Marschner's overture to "Hans Heiling," Robert Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient" and Beethoven's second symphony. There was no soloist. The Marschner overture is very melodious and several of the themes are notably dainty and piquant, affording the violin contingent splendid opportunities for delicate and at times brilliant work. The story of the opera, "Hans Heiling," strongly suggests the legend of "Faust," and the overture also frequently calls to mind the more familiar composition. The satanic pictures, though, are not very dramatic, the lighter element of love seeming to predominate in the overture. In an introduction the horns and clarinet are work of commendation for their uniformly good work, the charming subsequent themes were splendidly given by the violins and the concluding prelude to the finale was smooth and spirited, the modulations being played in excellent harmony. The final coda went with brilliant effect.

The Dvorak poem, "A Hero's Lament," is written in a characteristic vein, the martial idea prevailing, and is the composer's latest published orchestral writing. The themes are decidedly Russian in type, and dissonant phrases are frequently in evidence. It's general character typifies the title admirably, and the orchestration is skilful and of a fairly difficult nature. Ample justice was given the poem by the orchestra, its ensemble work being specially praiseworthy in the fortissimo passages, which showed no trace of undue harshness in the brasses.

Schumann's oriental pictures, six subjects being illustrated, were charmingly interpreted, the delicate character of the compositions being most carefully preserved. The simple nature of the pieces did not lead to carelessness on the part of the men, and the whole number received conscientious consideration and execution. The program closed with a perfect presentation of the Beethoven second symphony, the beautiful conclusion theme of the second movement by the violins and cellos, and the whole of the third movement calling forth special commendation from the auditors.

Mr Franz Kneisel will be the soloist at this week's concerts and play Mr C. M. Loeffler's new composition, "Les Veillees de l'Ukraine." The other numbers will be "Overture in Italian Style," Schubert; "Till Eulenopiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss, and Brahm's fourth symphony.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1899.

Mark Hambourg.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its season with a matinée at Carnegie Hall last Wednesday afternoon, the programme comprising Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound," overture; Saint-Saëns' C minor pianoforte concerto; Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien;" and Schumann's Symphony, B flat major. Mark Hambourg was the soloist. We have been forced to listen of late, although the season has only started, to so much music that was mediocre in conception and execution that it was more than a relief to attend the concerts of Wilhelm Gericke and his orchestra, and to know that here at least there could be no disappointment. Mr. Gericke has certainly at his disposal one of the most perfect equipped orchestras in the world, and he himself is a musician to the finger-tips. That he is a little bit prosy at times is somewhat to be deplored, and it only goes to show that musical perfection is as rare as "blue roses." The best number was the Schumann symphony. Here and there, in the larghetto, Mr. Gericke's reading was at times a trifle flat, but in the scherzo he was as dainty and capricious as the most exacting could desire. Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien" was very beautifully played, so far as technical perfection went.

Mark Hambourg is still a very young man, hardly more than a boy, and has in him undoubtedly the making of a great pianist. His technique is wonderful, and he has that fulness of tone-production more or less peculiar to all Russian pianists. In sentiment, temperament, in fact, all the emotional qualities, he has still to develop and broaden out, but even now he is an extraordinary pianist. At present he suffers somewhat from over-practice. His technique is so marvellous that the most difficult passages come "too easily" to his fingers. And he is in love with his own fleetness of finger. This is no detriment to a young pianist; it is on the contrary an excellent quality in his future development. Nowadays a pianist cannot have too much technique, always provided it is not too utterly mechanical, as is, for instance, Rosenthal's. In the Saint-Saëns concerto there were passages wherein young Hambourg's fingers literally ran away with him. Nevertheless he still showed that his musical sentiment was true and broad, although yet undeveloped. At his age it could not be otherwise.

At the Thursday evening concert he played the D minor Rubinstein concerto, and again demonstrated his wonderful qualities of technique. The pianoforte he played on could have been better. The tone was not exactly poor, but it was woody, lacking in brilliance and singing qualities; in fact, lacking in exactly the qualities the Rubinstein concerto demands. The pianoforte Rubinstein used in Russia was a Becker, an instrument of superior tonal qualities, closely allied to the Steinway and Bechstein pianofortes in touch and tone. On either of these three pianofortes—which Rubinstein used by preference—the Rubinstein concerto, when played as Mark Hambourg played it, would have sounded majestic and orchestral. That it was somewhat muffled and lacking in brilliance was not the pianist's fault on Thursday last. In the cantabile of the second movement Hambourg was not great, but he was convincing; above all, his playing gave promise of much better things.

The other items on the Thursday programme were Siegfried Wagner's overture, "Der Barenhauter," Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody," and Alexander Glazounoff's Symphony No. 6. All of these were first performances, and I would add that three novelties on one programme are too many for complete enjoyment. To the Wagner and Humperdinck numbers people listened with attention and interest, but by the time the Glazounoff symphony was reached nearly all were too weary for the concentration of thought this beautiful work requires.

It would be folly to judge the Siegfried Wagner overture from a too severe standard, as it is the work of a very young man; and it is unfair to judge it as the work of Richard Wagner's son. Hearing it dispassionately, however, it cannot but be accepted as a very creditable production. That it is tinged with Wagnerism is only to be expected (what music is not nowadays?), and it is a point rather in its favor than against it; but outside of this the young composer shows decided originality, very excellent workmanship in tone color and orchestral effects generally, and a marked bent for broad and beautiful melody. The overture is more Berliozian than Wagnerian in design, and, although it is tedious and disappointing at times, it is, perhaps, rather because it is Richard Wagner's son's music than otherwise. It shows immaturity and that ambition which "o'erleaps itself," but as a first or early composition it is decidedly promising. The Humperdinck music was bright and interesting, but savored too much of earlier efforts. It was more or less a rehash of old sayings. Alexander Glazounoff's symphony suffered somewhat at the hands of the orchestra, particularly the last movement, which Gericke's conception rendered tedious. Glazounoff uses every known orchestral device, and many others of his own invention, so that this symphony is one of the most interesting and greatest of modern works. Therefore it was all the more to be regretted that two other novelties on the programme should have absorbed so much of the interest. It is a work that requires many hearings for a proper appreciation of its beauties, and a work that deserves a frequent place in concert programmes.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 142.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fifth in the Series Lacks the Interest of Predecessors.

Dvorak's "A Hero's Song" Somewhat Tedious—The Orchestration Its Best Feature—Reinecke's Arrangement of Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient."

For the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke presented the following programme:

Overture to "Hans Heiling"........Marschner
Symphonic poem, "A Hero's Song".....Dvorak
"Pictures from the Orient".........Schumann
(Arranged for orchestra by Karl Reinicke.)
Symphony No. 2, in D major........Beethoven

The programme was somewhat dull. It began and ended interestingly, but what came between those two points was less attractive. The Dvorak symphonic poem, which was new to Boston, is the most recent of its composer's published works. In most regards it is also the weakest.

In the absence of any description of what the "poem" is intended to convey, the listener is left to discover its meaning, and the task is a difficult one. The title, "A Hero's Song," renders no assistance, for there is little that is heroic, and less that suggests any intelligible song. Nor is the other title, "A Hero's Lament," under which the piece was originally produced in Vienna, more edifying, for the Bohemian folk-tunes, that provide its melodic staple, are more indicative of liveliness than of lamentation.

Dvorak's hero proved to be a very tiresome person, given to drooling exasperatingly over trifles, and with a sudden mingling of jerky bombast and misanthropic frivolity. He is a depressingly dyspeptic hero, a Czech gratiano, who sings an infinite deal of nothing—more than any man in Prague.

If this effort may be taken as a fair indication of Dvorak's present musical powers, it would appear that he has written himself out, and is "running emptyings." It is true that most modern orchestral works of an ambitious order are not easy of comprehension on a single hearing, but in this case there does not seem to be anything that would repay a second hearing for the purpose of gaining a more lucid idea of what it is all about. There is not a forcible, nor an original, nor a strongly individualized movement in the whole platitudinous "poem." The orchestration is its best feature, but even here the color is monotonous, unimpressive and not notably interesting. The pity of it all is that a composer of Dvorak's eminence should feel it incumbent on him to attempt to say something when he has really nothing important to say, and to be voluminously perfunctory over it.

Reinecke has scored the Schumann work sympathetically and charmingly, especially the first, the second and the fourth numbers; but after all it is open to question if those little pieces are not heard to the best advantage in the form and with the less pretentious coloring in which the composer permitted them to leave his hands. They were tenderly and delightfully read by Mr. Gericke, and exquisitely played by the orchestra.

A brilliant and uncommonly effective performance was given of the fine Marschner overture, which still bears its years lightly and freshly. The Beethoven symphony gave to the close of the concert a brightness that it sorely needed, and it was accorded an exceptionally thoughtful, finished and effective interpretation.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture "in the Italian style," Schubert; "Les Veillees de L'Ukraine," concert piece for violin and orchestra, by C. M. Loeffler, which will be given for the first time; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss, and symphony No. 4, in E minor, by Brahms. The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

First Performance Here of Dvorak's "Heldenlied."

A Symphonic Poem of Little Interest or Worth.

A Return to Beethoven, Schumann and Marschner.

The program of the fifth Symphony concert in Music Hall, last night, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Hans Heiling".......Marschner
Symphonic Poem, "A Hero's Song"..Dvorák
(First time in Boston.)
Pictures from the Orient...........Schumann
(Scored for Orchestra by Karl Reinecke.)
Symphony No. 2......................Beethoven

After Dvorák left Mrs. Thurber's conservatory and his pursuit of Congo-American folk-song, he composed five symphonic poems. Three of them, at least, are musical illustrations of dismal, cruel, ghostly ballads. No one of the five had been played in Boston before last night. "The Golden Spinning Wheel" was played in Chicago in 1897; "The Wild Dove" was played there last month. It is my impression that one or two of the set have been heard in other towns of this country.

"A Hero's Song" was performed for the first time and from manuscript at a Philharmonic concert in Vienna, Dec. 4, 1898. Mr. Apthorp says in the program-book, "Although called a symphonic poem on the title-page, there is no indication of its poetic subject, beyond the mere title." This is true; but the program-book in Vienna told the story of the composer's intention as it was told by him to Dr. Robert Hirschfeld, the compiler of the said book. Dvorák had no particular individual in mind as Beethoven had when he wrote the "Eroica"; nor did he have any thought of a hero in war. His hero is a hero of the intellect, whose "Idee," after stress and storm, triumphs gloriously. Hanslick gives the additional information that the music is supposed to tell the career or the development of a Slavonic rhapsodist or bard.

I do not believe that if Mr. Apthorp had published this in his program-book it would have made the music any more interesting or even tolerable and to be endured. It is the music of Dvorák in his most inconsequential mood. The piece is scrappy, loosely constructed, full of incredible cheapness, in thought and dress. The dirge near the beginning is not without effect, although originality does not contribute to it. You may say, if you are a devout Dvorákian, "But note the simplicity of genius." I refuse to note anything of the kind; there is the simplicity of twaddle. And the piece as a whole is twaddle, chiefly of the jingling kind.

⁂

There was natural curiosity to hear one of the latest works of a talented composer, who began to go to pieces as soon as he wrote by contract for England and was without pecuniary worries. Once in a while a thoughtful man in a moment of forgetfulness says to himself: "I should like to be alive 75 or 100 years from now to see what the men and women of that generation think of contemporaries of mine who are now making a devil of a fuss." I confess that I should like to know what position in music will be awarded this Bohemian. The carelessness, the indifference, the slouchiness shown by Dvorák of late years excites the suspicion that the brilliance of earlier and justly applauded works may, after all, be pinchbeck and the justice of applause a mere matter of personal, favorable prejudice.

⁂

With the exception of the gratification of this curiosity there was little in the concert last night to give pleasure. A few pages of the transcription of Schumann's piano pieces are of true beauty; but they were not played throughout with exquisite delicacy, and the dynamic indications were exaggerated; for the first violins, enamored of their marvelous tone, like to listen to themselves, as is natural, although it is not always commendable. By the way, what does the learned Dr. Reissmann mean when he says of these piano pieces—I quote from Miss Alger's translation: "The richer media here employed are once more subservient to distinct ideas, and we recognize an important ethical meaning, as well as masterly technic"?

⁂

There are orchestral, as well as piano pieces and songs by Beethoven, that should be reserved for historical or "educational" concerts.

⁂

You must be a romantic German, full of "Wehmuth" and "Sehnsucht," etc., etc., to enjoy the more pretentious music of Marschner, that comical fat figure, to quote from a letter of von Bülow. Baritones will no doubt continue to gain applause with "An jenem Tag," but the overture to "Hans Heiling" has gone the way of all flesh and most music.

Philip Hale.

The program of the Symphony public rehearsal and concert in Music Hall Friday afternoon at 2.30 and Saturday evening at 8 will include: Schubert's overture in Italian style; C. M. Loeffler's "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine" (Mr. Kneisel, violinist); R. Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Brahms's Symphony No. 4.

⁂

Philadelphia Inquirer
UNDAY . . . . . NOVEMBER 12, 1899

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERTS

The Second Series Successfully Opened at the Academy of Music in the Presence of a Large Audience

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave the first in its second series of concerts at the Academy of Music last night under the direction of Mr. William Gericke, and in the presence of an audience which by its numbers and enthusiasm removed all doubt as to the popular success of the new enterprise. There had been some misgivings as to this among the friends of the orchestra, who feared that two symphony concerts by the same organization in a single week would fail to receive the support necessary to indemnify the management against loss. The advance sale and the experience of last night have served to show that these apprehensions were unfounded. It is evident that the excellence of the Boston Symphony Orchestra is so well appreciated here that there are a great many people who are glad of an opportunity to hear it twice in the same week, so that what seemed at first the venturesome enterprise of the management has been justified and is likely to be rewarded.

From an artistic point of view the success of the concert was not less marked. A varied and attractive program had been arranged for the occasion. It included Mendelssohn's graceful and melodious overture of "Melusine," which was played by the orchestra with admirable delicacy of expression and lucidity of statement. The symphony was Schumann's inspired work in B flat major, and a more brilliant, masterful, luminous or convincing interpretation of this splendid music no one need desire or expect. Here was playing which had vitality and force and fire, and which communicated to the listener all the ardor and pathos and passion by which the composition is animated and inspired. It was a most impressive and soul-uplifting performance, one of those performances which are always remembered and made a standard for subsequent comparison. The novelty of the evening was the Moorish fantasia of Humperdinck which proved to be a work of much original and distinctive beauty. Whether it gained anything from the description which the program furnished of its intention, that is of the scenes which the composer was seeking to suggest, may well be doubted. Usually it is better to allow the hearer to construe the significance of what he hears according to his own impression, and Humperdinck's music is sufficiently interesting not to need the label which it bears. It is in a high degree imaginative and poetic, and it is constructed with consummate skill. It makes great demands upon the orchestra, especially in the string department, but to all its demands it is hardly necessary to say that Mr. Gericke's players were easily equal.

The soloist was Mr. Mark Hambourg, who confirmed without, however, deepening the favorable impression which he had previously made. He has a wonderful technique. How much more than that he possesses has not yet been demonstrated. It is true that Saint-Saens' concerto in C minor affords little or no opportunity for the display of anything beyond technique, but the fact that Mr. Hambourg should have selected it may have its significance. He apparently prefers to be heard in that kind of thing, and it may be that he has good reason for his preference. He certainly is an absolute master of the physical resources of the instrument. Whether he can also play in the way that goes to the heart remains to be made known.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, NOV. 19, 1899.

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Dvorak's symphonic poem, "A Hero's Song," was the novelty presented at the symphony concerts last week. The other selections were Heinrich Marschner's overture to "Hans Heiling," Robert Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient" and Beethoven's second symphony. There was no soloist. The Marschner overture is very melodious and several of the themes are notably dainty and piquant, affording the violin contingent splendid opportunities for delicate and at times brilliant work. The story of the opera, "Hans Heiling," strongly suggests the legend of "Faust," and the overture also frequently calls to mind the more familiar composition. The satanic pictures, though, are not very dramatic, the lighter element of love seeming to predominate in the overture. In an introduction the horns and clarinet are work of commendation for their uniformly good work, the charming subsequent themes were splendidly given by the violins and the concluding prelude to the finale was smooth and spirited, the modulations being played in excellent harmony. The final coda went with brilliant effect.

The Dvorak poem, "A Hero's Lament," is written in a characteristic vein, the martial idea prevailing, and is the composer's latest published orchestral writing. The themes are decidedly Russian in type, and dissonant phrases are frequently in evidence. It's general character typifies the title admirably, and the orchestration is skilful and of a fairly difficult nature. Ample justice was given the poem by the orchestra, its ensemble work being specially praiseworthy in the fortissimo passages, which showed no trace of undue harshness in the brasses.

Schumann's oriental pictures, six subjects being illustrated, were charmingly interpreted, the delicate character of the compositions being most carefully preserved. The simple nature of the pieces did not lead to carelessness on the part of the men, and the whole number received conscientious consideration and execution. The program closed with a perfect presentation of the Beethoven second symphony, the beautiful conclusion theme of the second movement by the violins and cellos, and the whole of the third movement calling forth special commendation from the auditors.

Mr Franz Kneisel will be the soloist at this week's concerts and play Mr C. M. Loeffler's new composition, "Les Veillees de l'Ukraine." The other numbers will be "Overture in Italian Style," Schubert; "Till Eulenopiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss, and Brahm's fourth symphony.

HOME JOURNAL.
NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, NOVEMBER 15, 1899.

Mark Hambourg.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra began its season with a matinée at Carnegie Hall last Wednesday afternoon, the programme comprising Goldmark's "Prometheus Bound," overture; Saint-Saëns' C minor pianoforte concerto; Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien;" and Schumann's Symphony, B flat major. Mark Hambourg was the soloist. We have been forced to listen of late, although the season has only started, to so much music that was mediocre in conception and execution that it was more than a relief to attend the concerts of Wilhelm Gericke and his orchestra, and to know that here at least there could be no disappointment. Mr. Gericke has certainly at his disposal one of the most perfect equipped orchestras in the world, and he himself is a musician to the finger-tips. That he is a little bit prosy at times is somewhat to be deplored, and it only goes to show that musical perfection is as rare as "blue roses." The best number was the Schumann symphony. Here and there, in the larghetto, Mr. Gericke's reading was at times a trifle flat, but in the scherzo he was as dainty and capricious as the most exacting could desire. Tschaikowsky's "Capriccio Italien" was very beautifully played, so far as technical perfection went.

Mark Hambourg is still a very young man, hardly more than a boy, and has in him undoubtedly the making of a great pianist. His technique is wonderful, and he has that fulness of tone-production more or less peculiar to all Russian pianists. In sentiment, temperament, in fact, all the emotional qualities, he has still to develop and broaden out, but even now he is an extraordinary pianist. At present he suffers somewhat from over-practice. His technique is so marvellous that the most difficult passages come "too easily" to his fingers. And he is in love with his own fleetness of finger. This is no detriment to a young pianist; it is on the contrary an excellent quality in his future development. Nowadays a pianist cannot have too much technique, always provided it is not too utterly mechanical, as is, for instance, Rosenthal's. In the Saint-Saëns concerto there were passages wherein young Hambourg's fingers literally ran away with him. Nevertheless he still showed that his musical sentiment was true and broad, although yet undeveloped. At his age it could not be otherwise.

At the Thursday evening concert he played the D minor Rubinstein concerto, and again demonstrated his wonderful qualities of technique. The pianoforte he played on could have been better. The tone was not exactly poor, but it was woody, lacking in brilliance and singing qualities; in fact, lacking in exactly the qualities the Rubinstein concerto demands. The pianoforte Rubinstein used in Russia was a Becker, an instrument of superior tonal qualities, closely allied to the Steinway and Bechstein pianofortes in touch and tone. On either of these three pianofortes—which Rubinstein used by preference—the Rubinstein concerto, when played as Mark Hambourg played it, would have sounded majestic and orchestral. That it was somewhat muffled and lacking in brilliance was not the pianist's fault on Thursday last. In the cantabile of the second movement Hambourg was not great, but he was convincing; above all, his playing gave promise of much better things.

The other items on the Thursday programme were Siegfried Wagner's overture, "Der Barenhauter," Humperdinck's "Moorish Rhapsody," and Alexander Glazounoff's Symphony No. 6. All of these were first performances, and I would add that three novelties on one programme are too many for complete enjoyment. To the Wagner and Humperdinck numbers people listened with attention and interest, but by the time the Glazounoff symphony was reached nearly all were too weary for the concentration of thought this beautiful work requires.

It would be folly to judge the Siegfried Wagner overture from a too severe standard, as it is the work of a very young man; and it is unfair to judge it as the work of Richard Wagner's son. Hearing it dispassionately, however, it cannot but be accepted as a very creditable production. That it is tinged with Wagnerism is only to be expected (what music is not nowadays?), and it is a point rather in its favor than against it; but outside of this the young composer shows decided originality, very excellent workmanship in tone color and orchestral effects generally, and a marked bent for broad and beautiful melody. The overture is more Berliozian than Wagnerian in design, and, although it is tedious and disappointing at times, it is, perhaps, rather because it is Richard Wagner's son's music than otherwise. It shows immaturity and that ambition which "o'erleaps itself," but as a first or early composition it is decidedly promising. The Humperdinck music was bright and interesting, but savored too much of earlier efforts. It was more or less a rehash of old sayings. Alexander Glazounoff's symphony suffered somewhat at the hands of the orchestra, particularly the last movement, which Gericke's conception rendered tedious. Glazounoff uses every known orchestral device, and many others of his own invention, so that this symphony is one of the most interesting and greatest of modern works. Therefore it was all the more to be regretted that two other novelties on the programme should have absorbed so much of the interest. It is a work that requires many hearings for a proper appreciation of its beauties, and a work that deserves a frequent place in concert programmes.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 142.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Fifth in the Series Lacks the Interest of Predecessors.

Dvorak's "A Hero's Song" Somewhat Tedious—The Orchestration Its Best Feature—Reinecke's Arrangement of Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient."

For the fifth concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke presented the following programme:

Overture to "Hans Heiling"........Marschner
Symphonic poem, "A Hero's Song".....Dvorak
"Pictures from the Orient"..........Schumann
(Arranged for orchestra by Karl Reinicke.)
Symphony No. 2, in D major........Beethoven

The programme was somewhat dull. It began and ended interestingly, but what came between those two points was less attractive. The Dvorak symphonic poem, which was new to Boston, is the most recent of its composer's published works. In most regards it is also the weakest.

In the absence of any description of what the "poem" is intended to convey, the listener is left to discover its meaning, and the task is a difficult one. The title, "A Hero's Song," renders no assistance, for there is little that is heroic, and less that suggests any intelligible song. Nor is the other title, "A Hero's Lament," under which the piece was originally produced in Vienna, more edifying, for the Bohemian folk-tunes, that provide its melodic staple, are more indicative of liveliness than of lamentation.

Dvorak's hero proved to be a very tiresome person, given to drooling exasperatingly over trifles, and with a sudden mingling of jerky bombast and misanthropic frivolity. He is a depressingly dyspeptic hero, a Czech gratiano, who sings an infinite deal of nothing—more than any man in Prague.

If this effort may be taken as a fair indication of Dvorak's present musical powers, it would appear that he has written himself out, and is "running emptyings." It is true that most modern orchestral works of an ambitious order are not easy of comprehension on a single hearing, but in this case there does not seem to be anything that would repay a second hearing for the purpose of gaining a more lucid idea of what it is all about. There is not a forcible, nor an original, nor a strongly individualized movement in the whole platitudinous "poem." The orchestration is its best feature, but even here the color is monotonous, unimpressive and not notably interesting. The pity of it all is that a composer of Dvorak's eminence should feel it incumbent on him to attempt to say something when he has really nothing important to say, and to be voluminously perfunctory over it.

Reinecke has scored the Schumann work sympathetically and charmingly, especially the first, the second and the fourth numbers; but after all it is open to question if those little pieces are not heard to the best advantage in the form and with the less pretentious coloring in which the composer permitted them to leave his hands. They were tenderly and delightfully read by Mr. Gericke, and exquisitely played by the orchestra.

A brilliant and uncommonly effective performance was given of the fine Marschner overture, which still bears its years lightly and freshly. The Beethoven symphony gave to the close of the concert a brightness that it sorely needed, and it was accorded an exceptionally thoughtful, finished and effective interpretation.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture "in the Italian style," Schubert; "Les Veillees de L'Ukraine," concert piece for violin and orchestra, by C. M. Loeffler, which will be given for the first time; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss, and symphony No. 4, in E minor, by Brahms. The soloist will be Mr. Franz Kneisel.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 19, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

First Performance Here of Dvorak's "Heldenlied."

A Symphonic Poem of Little Interest or Worth.

A Return to Beethoven, Schumann and Marschner.

The program of the fifth Symphony concert in Music Hall, last night, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was as follows:

Overture to "Hans Heiling".......Marschner
Symphonic Poem, "A Hero's Song"..Dvorák
(First time in Boston.)
Pictures from the Orient............Schumann
(Scored for Orchestra by Karl Reinecke.)
Symphony No. 2.....................Beethoven

After Dvorák left Mrs. Thurber's conservatory and his pursuit of Congo-American folk-song, he composed five symphonic poems. Three of them, at least, are musical illustrations of dismal, cruel, ghostly ballads. No one of the five had been played in Boston before last night. "The Golden Spinning Wheel" was played in Chicago in 1897; "The Wild Dove" was played there last month. It is my impression that one or two of the set have been heard in other towns of this country.

"A Hero's Song" was performed for the first time and from manuscript at a Philharmonic concert in Vienna, Dec. 4, 1898. Mr. Apthorp says in the program-book, "Although called a symphonic poem on the title-page, there is no indication of its poetic subject, beyond the mere title." This is true; but the program-book in Vienna told the story of the composer's intention as it was told by him to Dr. Robert Hirschfeld, the compiler of the said book. Dvorák had no particular individual in mind as Beethoven had when he wrote the "Eroica"; nor did he have any thought of a hero in war. His hero is a hero of the intellect, whose "Idee," after stress and storm, triumphs gloriously. Hanslick gives the additional information that the music is supposed to tell the career or the development of a Slavonic rhapsodist or bard.

I do not believe that if Mr. Apthorp had published this in his program-book it would have made the music any more interesting or even tolerable and to be endured. It is the music of Dvorák in his most inconsequential mood. The piece is scrappy, loosely constructed, full of incredible cheapness, in thought and dress. The dirge near the beginning is not without effect, although originality does not contribute to it. You may say, if you are a devout Dvorákian, "But note the simplicity of genius." I refuse to note anything of the kind; there is the simplicity of twaddle. And the piece as a whole is twaddle, chiefly of the jingling kind.

⁂

There was natural curiosity to hear one of the latest works of a talented composer, who began to go to pieces as soon as he wrote by contract for England and was without pecuniary worries. Once in a while a thoughtful man in a moment of forgetfulness says to himself: "I should like to be alive 75 or 100 years from now to see what the men and women of that generation think of contemporaries of mine who are now making a devil of a fuss." I confess that I should like to know what position in music will be awarded this Bohemian The carelessness, the indifference, the slouchiness shown by Dvorák of late years excites the suspicion that the brilliance of earlier and justly applauded works may, after all, be pinchbeck and the justice of applause a mere matter of personal, favorable prejudice.

⁂

With the exception of the gratification of this curiosity there was little in the concert last night to give pleasure. A few pages of the transcription of Schumann's piano pieces are of true beauty; but they were not played throughout with exquisite delicacy, and the dynamic indications were exaggerated; for the first violins, enamored of their marvelous tone, like to listen to themselves, as is natural, although it is not always commendable. By the way, what does the learned Dr. Reissmann mean when he says of these piano pieces—I quote from Miss Alger's translation: "The richer media here employed are once more subservient to distinct ideas, and we recognize an important ethical meaning, as well as masterly technic"?

⁂

There are orchestral, as well as piano pieces and songs by Beethoven, that should be reserved for historical or "educational" concerts.

⁂

You must be a romantic German, full of "Wehmuth" and "Sehnsucht," etc., etc., to enjoy the more pretentious music of Marschner, that comical fat figure, to quote from a letter of von Bulow. Baritones will no doubt continue to gain applause with "An jenem Tag," but the overture to "Hans Heiling" has gone the way of all flesh and most music.

Philip Hale.

The program of the Symphony public rehearsal and concert in Music Hall Friday afternoon at 2.30 and Saturday evening at 8 will include: Schubert's overture in Italian style; C. M. Loeffler's "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine" (Mr. Kneisel, violinist); R. Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," and Brahms's Symphony No. 4.

⁂

[illegible]

DAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1899

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Saturday Evening's Performance in Music Hall

The fifth Symphony concert was given in Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Marschner: Overture to "Hans Heiling," opus 80.
Dvorak: Symphonic Poem, "Heldenlied," opus 111.
(First time in Boston.)
Schumann: Bilder aus Osten, opus 66.
(Scored for Orchestra by Karl Reinecke.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 36.

There are some of us who hail with joy the "every fourth concert" in which no solo singer nor player takes part; if that March of Progress, of which we hear much, has so influenced our musical taste as to make the old Englisches Haus programme of Berlin in the fifties—consisting regularly of two symphonies and two overtures—seem no longer the ideal bill of fare for a concert evening, we still feel that the solo element is too often an intruder at a symphony concert, introducing a factor of personality rather disturbing to our musical mood. We feel that these purely orchestral concerts mark the high tides of the season.

Last Saturday, however, hardly brought what one would call a high-tide programme; on the contrary, it smacked somewhat of the off-night. I still can see no sound reason for Marschner's "Hans Heiling" overture being played in Boston in the year of grace 1899. There seems to me to be every reason why it should not be played. It is the work of a man by no means devoid of genius, but a work of merely temporal quality, with nothing of the eternal in it; from 1833—the year of its birth—up to the time when the Mendelssohn and Schumann "Davidsbündler" movement logically killed it, it had a fair right to an honorable position in the concert repertory; no one could rightly call it Kapellmeister-Musik then, for it gave evidence of a certain keenness of dramatic instinct on the composer's part, and the style in which he wrote had not lost its vitality. Yet, even then, a foreseeing critic might have said: "If it is not Kapellmeister-Musik now, it soon will be!" And now we find that all else in it has evaporated. Note, too, as I said when it was last given here, in the season of 1894-95, that, whatever reasons there may be for this overture's still being played occasionally in Germany, these reasons do not affect Boston at all. In Germany, especially in North Germany, the opera of "Hans Heiling" still holds the boards; the public has, to a certain extent, been brought up on it, and it has associations which make hearing the overture now and then worth while. But "Hans Heiling" has no associations for us, there is nothing to endear the overture to our hearts, and it has long since fallen into that dreariest estate any musical composition can lament being in, that of having a merely historical interest. Heinrich Marschner is one of those figures in history whom—as Zola once said of a far greater man—we willingly salute in passing by; it is perfectly right that we should thus take off our hats when the occasion presents itself. But every fresh hearing of his music lessens the respectfulness of our salute, and, if we hear much more of it, we shall stop bowing altogether.

After Marschner's "Hans Heiling" comes Dvorak's brand-new "Heldenlied." A symphonic poem, especially if it have so vague a title as "A Hero's Song," is naturally expected to appeal to the imagination suggestively; the first suggestion I got from this particular one was that few heroes would care to have Dr. Dvorak for their valet. The next suggestion was a brand-new theory of the folk-song—the work bristles with popular melodies—which I make bold to offer for a niche in the temple of fame beside that wonderful theory of "Moulds" promulgated by the author of "More Happy Thoughts." My theory is this: Considerable stress has been laid upon the anonymousness of the genuine folk-songs by earnest delvers in that field of research; the general impression seems to be that they were written by nobody in particular, but "growed" like Topsy. But now a light flashes in upon me; I suspect that even the most unimpeachably genuine folk-songs did not "grow" at all; they were regularly composed, just like other music, by individual composers, and have come down to us unfathered simply because the composers, in the consciousness of their guilt, sought in apparently modest anonymousness a prudent shelter from general execration.

These suggestions I got, partly from the music itself, partly from the title of the composition. But, in appreciating a work of poetic content, one should ignore no possible source of information about that content. And here I find one significant fact which may be of some help. When this youngest-born of Dr. Dvorak's was first played from MS. in Vienna, under Gustav Mahler, it bore the title "Heldenlage"—"A Hero's Complaint;" and, although the composer has since changed the title, it is not unfair to conclude from his first christening of his work that its poetic intent is not unmitigatedly joyous. Yet, even by the light of the earlier title, I fail to read very far into the poetic descriptiveness of the music. I still ask, exactly what was the hero's complaint? A certain prevailing wheeziness in the orchestration points to its being of a catarrhal nature; yet there are other traits in the music that indicate with equal definiteness that it should be diagnosed as distinctly gastric. Perhaps it was a consciousness of this deplorable vagueness of musical characterization that led Dr. Dvorak to change his title, so that an innocent public should not be harrassed with doubts.

The most remarkable feature of this new work seemed to me to be the orchestration; I could not help thinking of that old fact in acoustics which was impressed upon our youthful minds in college: that, when two [illegible] organ-pipes are made to [illegible] together, under certain conditions, [illegible]-waves issuing from the one inter[illegible] those issuing from the other, so [illegible] result is silence. Had the orches[illegible] you would have said [illegible] instrument seemed to half-cancel some other instrument; the harder the string-players scraped, the more strenuously the wind-people blew, in what appeared to be meant for a fortissimo, the more did the result seem like sonorous hasty-pudding, cracked wheat, oat meal—anything you please that is mushy and refuses to be cut in slices. Pianissimo, mezzo-forte, and fortissimo were asthmatically wheezing! For the rest, this "Heldenlied" seems to be a straw showing that the wind is blowing in the Raff direction with Dvorak; not that the music itself suggests Raff in any way, but that one begins to see reason for fearing that, in a decade or so more, there will be hardly anything left of all Dr. Dvorak's musical baggage. What we have heard from him of late—ever since the "New World" symphony, in fact—seems but a wanton challenge to the Tooth of Time; the "Heldenlied" certainly seems a choice and tempting tidbit; swallowable at a gulp. And it is no Jupiter, to come up again!

After Marschner's blameless tediousness and Dvorak's flaunting nothin'-at-all, Reinecke's orchestral version of Schumann's "Bilder aus Osten" had a more than usually good chance. These six little movements by Schumann, originally written for pianoforte for four hands, surely deserve a place among his finer, more deeply felt things in the genre line; inspiration and execution are equally on a very high plane. I should much like to hear Mr. de Pachmann play the set, with an able second. But transcribing a work of this sort for orchestra is a risky business. In the first place, the question always arises: has the original inspiration, with all its profundity of feeling, with all its poetic beauty, sufficient bulk and calibre to wear the orchestral dress as to the manner born? Then there is the additional danger of the thing's seeming too much like a suite—a form of orchestral composition which is not precisely growing in favor just now. When one sees a suite on a programme nowadays, the first thing one is impelled to ask is: "What! the whole of it?"—not in the most hopeful mood. When I first heard these "Bilder aus Osten"—in 1884—it seemed to me that Reinecke had made a thorough mistake. This feeling was not removed in 1887.

But last Saturday evening I felt differently. True, the thing did sound too much like a suite; I could well have spared half of it; but, taking each number by itself, I could not feel that the orchestral setting, per se, did it any harm. This is putting it rather mildly, for there is no real object in scoring a pianoforte piece for orchestra, unless you can do it good thereby; as a mere exhibition of skill in orchestration, it withdraws itself from artistic consideration. It can truly be said that there were moments when one felt that the orchestra did add to the beauty of expression; but such moments were, upon the whole, comparatively few. It struck me, not that the task was unworthy in itself, so much as that Reinecke was not the man for it. When a man has a merely ephemeral talent, you generally find that talent to be ephemeral all through; a composer's orchestration dies just as quickly as anything else. Per contra, if a man's genius is more than ephemeral, and he is at the same time a master of the orchestra, his scoring will retain its vitality, its individual zest, as long as his works themselves continue alive. Take such of Mendelssohn's works as are still fresh, the instrumentation remains one of their greatest charms. Now, Reinecke was, for his day, a pretty sure master of the orchestra; half a century ago, you would have thought his scoring only a jot inferior to Mendelssohn's, if that. But, like the rest of his talent, its virtue was only ephemeral; its charm is all gone now.

In these "Bilder aus Osten" you keep feeling how much better Schumann himself would have scored them. Schumann, to be sure, was no impeccable orchestral craftsman; his scoring was often clumsy. But, though he may not have scored with skill, he did score with inspiration; his weakness was purely technical, and you feel that, however much he may have failed completely to realize his intention, the intention itself was instinct with beauty and genius; his scoring might often have been better done, but it was always apposite to his thought, and really helped the music to say what he had to say in its own individual way. Reinecke's scoring of these little pieces, on the other hand, seldom does this; at moments it does, as I have said, but, for the most part, it sounds old, lifeless, and smacks of mere professional routine. It has gone the way of all flesh.

The playing of Beethoven's D major symphony was a dream of sympathetic beauty and poetry. It was more than right, it was masterly! And here is music which not only does not show the first wrinkle of age, but upholds the old form in which it was written as with a hand of steel, making it, too, seem ever young and lovely. Call the D major symphony academic? Academies galore may have founded themselves on it, but it has that in it before which academies had best tremble, for its atmosphere is not wholesome for them to breathe. It can dance blithely at all their funerals!

The next programme is: Schubert; overture in the Italian style, in C major, opus 170; Loeffler, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," for violin and orchestra; Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche;" Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

W. F. A.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1899.

The Symphony Concert—Dvorak's "Pisen Bohatyrska."

There is no denying that the concert of Saturday seemed dull; nor was this occasioned by the lack of a soloist, for some of the most interesting concerts of the long series have been purely orchestral, but it was probably due to the character of the second and third numbers.

The programme began pleasantly enough with Marschner's overture to "Hans Heiling" (the opera is a more serious and Teutonic "Iolanthe"), which was performed to perfection and won hearty applause. The only other spontaneous outburst of enthusiasm was caused by the Larghetto of Beethoven's second symphony, which was gloriously played and received applause almost to the encore point.

Marschner is seldom heard in our concert-rooms nowadays, yet he certainly deserves rescuing from oblivion. He is a very strong reflection of Weber. Gade, because of his playing moon to the Mendelssohnian sun, was often called, in mild sarcasm, "Mrs. Mendelssohn;" in like manner we have here a "Mrs. Weber." He has the very trick of the Weber horns, connoisseurs may remember that almost every Weber score has more horns than a dilemma.

The "Hans Heiling" overture is, however, less dramatic than Weber's work, although it was refreshing to listen to an overture that gave a clear-cut sonata-allegro form, with every theme in its proper place and its regular key; form here did not seem a fetter but an added beauty.

Now followed "Pisen Bohatyrska," which was not as deadly as its name, save in the way of dulness. It is one of the latest of Dvorak's compositions, and its title signifies "A Hero's Song" or "The Lament of a Hero."

It is evident that Dvorak is trying to follow in the footsteps of his great teacher, Smetana, and bring forth some national music for his native Bohemia. He does not reach the height attained by his master. Smetana's gold was purified in the crucible of Sorrow; he suffered poverty, deafness, the loss of dearly-loved relatives, and he felt keenly the down-trodden condition of his own country (Bohemia); these tortures fanned his genius, strengthened his musical works, and sent him into a madhouse to end his days.

Prosperity is but a poor nurse for composition, and the well-nurtured Dvorak is not so great a composer as the struggling musician of 25 years ago. He has become too cosmopolitan to write great national works such as Smetana created.

Our "Hero" in this case has some little Ossianic brooding at the outset, but becomes very prolix and garrulous before he ends his tale. He gives us a medley of Czech tunes, he mutters a little of war, and (to alter Shakespeare to our purpose) he capers nimbly about to the lascivious pleasing of a flute. He seems passionately fond of a little figure of five notes which he reiterates and develops with some obstinacy. The work left the auditor entirely cold. The bardic crown in this particular field of composition still remains with Smetana.

And now a dreamy German gentleman came forward with a chibouk and a turban, and endeavored to persuade us that he was an Oriental. Schumann's "Bilder aus Osten"—"Pictures From the Orient"—is one of the ethnological mistakes of music. These errors are not few in the classical repertoire; Beethoven's "Turkish March" could picture Hoboken quite as well as Constantinople; Mozart's "Alla Turca" in his A major piano sonata is not a whit more oriental; only St. Saens, as witness his "Suite Algerienne" and his "La Brise," seems to have caught the peculiar melancholy tone of the East.

Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient" were originally piano duets. They have been delicately scored for orchestra by Karl Reinecke, but even when we add Capellmeister Reinecke to Schumann the result is not a convincing Arab; there is more of the flavor of Leipzig than of the desert in the pretty pictures.

Of course one may not demand an actual presentation of Arabic or Turkish music in our repertoire, the scale-form (divided in smaller intervals than our own) forbids that. The Chinese is the only Oriental scale that lends itself perfectly to our system, and "There is a Happy Land," or "Auld Lang Syne," or "Ye Banks and Braes o' Bonnie Doon" would be readily accepted by the Chinese as representations of their music, while the Russian composer Arensky has emphasized the kinship of the two systems by stealing an entire Chinese melody ("Tsin-fa") and using it in one of his piano etudes.

But we refrain from a discourse upon Oriental music in general and content ourselves with saying that Schumann's pretty pictures and Reinecke's instrumentation were not in line with their subject, although very agreeable music per se.

Beethoven's second symphony is of the first period, the time when the great symphonist had not fully unfolded his pinions, when he was still under the influence of Haydn.

The layman is too apt to accept Beethoven's nine symphonies as the perfection of this form, forgetting that the 1st, 2nd and 6th symphonies are comparatively hillocks in this chain of Alps. Yet there are points in the 2nd symphony that go far beyond Haydn, as for example the resolute finale which replaces the mere joviality of the Haydn endings, and the Scherzo which here for the first time formally takes the place of the Minuet.

We have already stated that the Larghetto won the chief triumph of the entire concert. It requires something of genius to make a development of themes interesting in so slow a tempo, yet Beethoven has succeeded in doing this here and in a manner that does not [illegible] power of the slow m[illegible] 4th, or 7th symphon[illegible] less one of the great [illegible] of the symphonic repertoire.

Mr. Gericke properly accentuated the contrast between the Scherzo and its Trio. We always feel that, in adopting such an old-fashioned theme and such ancient orchestration (oboes and bassoons) in the first theme of this Trio, Beethoven desired to impress the difference between the old song-form which constituted the formal Minuet, and the freer Scherzo with which he wished to supersede it.

Yet even Beethoven's minuets are not of Haydn formality; the minuet of the first symphony and that of the third, are Scherzos in disguise. Only in the 8th symphony does Beethoven allow a formal minuet to enter into his symphonic scheme.

The bold, brusque character of the finale of this symphony is another innovation. Haydn was influenced in his finales by the fact that the old composers had ended their instrumental cycle form, the Suite, with a rollicking Gigue (or "Jig") and tried to preserve some of this jollity in his symphonies.

Mazart obediently followed this plan, but Beethoven, after trying it once, in his first symphony, gave it up as unsuited to the dignity of the form, and here, in the 2nd symphony, we have the first instance of a new departure which was to lead to other experiments, as the variations of the Heroic symphony, the joining of the finale to the Scherzo in the 5th symphony, and finally in the great chorale and variation work with orchestra and voices in the 9th symphony.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY.

The first number on the programme for the fifth concert was the overture to the romantic opera, Hans Heiling by Heinrich Marschner, a contemporary and devoted follower of Weber, whose influence upon him was so decided as to almost overbear the individuality of his work. The opera, founded on a legend dealing with gnomes, whose king, Hans Heiling, enamoured of a peasant girl, resigns his crown to become a mere mortal; however his sacrifice is useless for the girl prefers her commonplace lover to him whom she suspects of belonging to another and supernatural sphere, and he finally returns to his domain as Prince of the Earth Spirits. The effect of the overture is bright and gay, and the clear horn calls with much wood-wind accompaniment were decidedly Weberish, and, like his music, most agreeable to hear.

The symphonic poem by Dvorak was first played in Vienna last winter under the title, "A Hero's Lament"—and is its composer's latest published orchestral work. It seems to open with the lament over the hero followed by narrations of his martial deeds to which he was incited by thoughts of home and country whose national airs are woven most inspiringly into the song.

The orchestration is brilliant, and parts of the composition are thoroughly interesting and original. Mr. Gericke seemed to bring out all its salient points with the best effect, and the audience received it, apparently, with approval. Dvorak is so thoroughly in earnest and is such an original thinker of musical thoughts, a master of form, not slavishly or even Sclavishly subservient to it, that one always brings away an impression of pleasure after listening to his music.

Schumann's pictures from the Orient, a series of pianoforte pieces for four hands, orchestrated by Reinicke, are charming conceptions and quite effective for orchestra, although scarcely adapted to such recessivily "full dress" appearance.

Beethoven's 2d Symphony was completed in 1802 when he was at Heiligenstadt, near Vienna, from May to October. About this time is the date of the letter known as "Beethoven's Will," in which he alludes to his deafness in the most affecting manner.

No trace of this melancholy is found in this 1802 Symphony which shows that he could, in his creative world, triumph over the oppressing and depressing influences of his actual every day existence. The first sketches were made in note-books of two or three quires of large oblong music-paper as brown and coarse as grocer's wrapping-paper, roughly sewn together. He wrote three complete scores of this Symphony which were lost. Accidents frequently occurred in the establishments of composers; three of Schubert's large works were used by the maid to light the fire, and Beethoven himself "after many searches and much hard language, discovered that large portions of his Mass in D had been used to wrap up boots."

This Symphony is as fresh and beautiful as when it first came into being nearly one hundred years ago and will continue to gladden the souls of all true musicians for a hundred years to come, especially if it can have such a perfect interpretation as was given us to enjoy at this time.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1899

FIFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

Saturday Evening's Performance in Music Hall

The fifth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Marschner: Overture to "Hans Heiling," opus 80.
Dvorak: Symphonic Poem, "Heldenlied," opus 111.
(First time in Boston.)
Schumann: Bilder aus Osten, opus 66.
(Scored for Orchestra by Karl Reinecke.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 2, in D major, opus 36.

There are some of us who hail with joy the "every fourth concert" in which no solo singer nor player takes part; if that March of Progress, of which we hear much, has so influenced our musical taste as to make the old Englisches Haus programme of Berlin in the fifties—consisting regularly of two symphonies and two overtures—seem no longer the ideal bill of fare for a concert evening, we still feel that the solo element is too often an intruder at a symphony concert, introducing a factor of personality rather disturbing to our musical mood. We feel that these purely orchestral concerts mark the high tides of the season.

Last Saturday, however, hardly brought what one would call a high-tide programme; on the contrary, it smacked somewhat of the off-night. I still can see no sound reason for Marschner's "Hans Heiling" overture being played in Boston in the year of grace 1899. There seems to me to be every reason why it should not be played. It is the work of a man by no means devoid of genius, but a work of merely temporal quality, with nothing of the eternal in it; from 1833—the year of its birth—up to the time when the Mendelssohn and Schumann "Davidsbündler" movement logically killed it, it had a fair right to an honorable position in the concert repertory; no one could rightly call it Kapellmeister-Musik then, for it gave evidence of a certain keenness of dramatic instinct on the composer's part, and the style in which he wrote had not lost its vitality. Yet, even then, a foreseeing critic might have said: "If it is not Kapellmeister-Musik now, it soon will be!" And now we find that all else in it has evaporated. Note, too, as I said when it was last given here, in the season of 1894-95, that, whatever reasons there may be for this overture's still being played occasionally in Germany, these reasons do not affect Boston at all. In Germany, especially in North Germany, the opera of "Hans Heiling" still holds the boards; the public has, to a certain extent, been brought up on it, and it has associations which make hearing the overture now and then worth while. But "Hans Heiling" has no associations for us, there is nothing to endear the overture to our hearts, and it has long since fallen into that dreariest estate any musical composition can lament being in, that of having a merely historical interest. Heinrich Marschner is one of those figures in history whom—as Zola once said of a far greater man—we willingly salute in passing by; it is perfectly right that we should thus take off our hats when the occasion presents itself. But every fresh hearing of his music lessens the respectfulness of our salute, and, if we hear much more of it, we shall stop bowing altogether.

After Marschner's "Hans Heiling" comes Dvorak's brand-new "Heldenlied." A symphonic poem, especially if it have so vague a title as "A Hero's Song," is naturally expected to appeal to the imagination suggestively; the first suggestion I got from this particular one was that few heroes would care to have Dr. Dvorak for their valet. The next suggestion was a brand-new theory of the folk-song—the work bristles with popular melodies—which I make bold to offer for a niche in the temple of fame beside that wonderful theory of "Moulds" promulgated by the author of "More Happy Thoughts." My theory is this: Considerable stress has been laid upon the anonymousness of the genuine folk-songs by earnest delvers in that field of research; the general impression seems to be that they were written by nobody in particular, but "growed" like Topsy. But now a light flashes in upon me; I suspect that even the most unimpeachably genuine folk-songs did not "grow" at all; they were regularly composed, just like other music, by individual composers, and have come down to us unfathered simply because the composers, in the consciousness of their guilt, sought in apparently modest anonymousness a prudent shelter from general execration.

These suggestions I got, partly from the music itself, partly from the title of the composition. But, in appreciating a work of poetic content, one should ignore no possible source of information about that content. And here I find one significant fact which may be of some help. When this youngest-born of Dr. Dvorak's was first played from MS. in Vienna, under Gustav Mahler, it bore the title "Heldenlage"—"A Hero's Complaint;" and, although the composer has since changed the title, it is not unfair to conclude from his first christening of his work that its poetic intent is not unmitigatedly joyous. Yet, even by the light of the earlier title, I fail to read very far into the poetic descriptiveness of the music. I still ask, exactly what was the hero's complaint? A certain prevailing wheeziness in the orchestration points to its being of a catarrhal nature; yet there are other traits in the music that indicate with equal definiteness that it should be diagnosed as distinctly gastric. Perhaps it was a consciousness of this deplorable vagueness of musical characterization that led Dr. Dvorak to change his title, so that an innocent public should not be harrassed with doubts.

The most remarkable feature of this new work seemed to me to be the orchestration; I could not help thinking of that old fact in acoustics which was impressed upon our youthful minds in college: that, when two contiguous organ-pipes are made to "speak" together, under certain conditions, the sound-waves issuing from the one interfere with those issuing from the other, so that the result is silence. Had the orchestra been a chorus, you would have said other's throats. Every instrument seemed to half-cancel some other instrument; the harder the string-players scraped, the more strenuously the wind-people blew, in what appeared to be meant for a fortissimo, the more did the result seem like sonorous hasty-pudding, cracked wheat, oat meal—anything you please that is mushy and refuses to be cut in slices. Pianissimo, mezzo-forte, and fortissimo were asthmatically wheezing! For the rest, this "Heldenlied" seems to be a straw showing that the wind is blowing in the Raff direction with Dvorak; not that the music itself suggests Raff in any way, but that one begins to see reason for fearing that, in a decade or so more, there will be hardly anything left of all Dr. Dvorak's musical baggage. What we have heard from him of late—ever since the "New World" symphony, in fact—seems but a wanton challenge to the Tooth of Time; the "Heldenlied" certainly seems a choice and tempting tidbit, swallowable at a gulp. And it is no Jupiter, to come up again!

After Marschner's blameless tediousness and Dvorak's flaunting nothin'-at-all, Reinecke's orchestral version of Schumann's "Bilder aus Osten" had a more than usually good chance. These six little movements by Schumann, originally written for pianoforte for four hands, surely deserve a place among his finer, more deeply felt things in the genre line; inspiration and execution are equally on a very high plane. I should much like to hear Mr. de Pachmann play the set, with an able second. But transcribing a work of this sort for orchestra is a risky business. In the first place, the question always arises: has the original inspiration, with all its profundity of feeling, with all its poetic beauty, sufficient bulk and calibre to wear the orchestral dress as to the manner born? Then there is the additional danger of the thing's seeming too much like a suite—a form of orchestral composition which is not precisely growing in favor just now. When one sees a suite on a programme nowadays, the first thing one is impelled to ask is: "What! the whole of it?"—not in the most hopeful mood. When I first heard these "Bilder aus Osten"—in 1884—it seemed to me that Reinecke had made a thorough mistake. This feeling was not removed in 1887.

But last Saturday evening I felt differently. True, the thing did sound too much like a suite; I could well have spared half of it; but, taking each number by itself, I could not feel that the orchestral setting, per se, did it any harm. This is putting it rather mildly, for there is no real object in scoring a pianoforte piece for orchestra, unless you can do it good thereby; as a mere exhibition of skill in orchestration, it withdraws itself from artistic consideration. It can truly be said that there were moments when one felt that the orchestra did add to the beauty of expression; but such moments were, upon the whole, comparatively few. It struck me, not that the task was unworthy in itself, so much as that Reinecke was not the man for it. When a man has a merely ephemeral talent, you generally find that talent to be ephemeral all through; a composer's orchestration dies just as quickly as anything else. Per contra, if a man's genius is more than ephemeral, and he is at the same time a master of the orchestra, his scoring will retain its vitality, its individual zest, as long as his works themselves continue alive. Take such of Mendelssohn's works as are still fresh, the instrumentation remains one of their greatest charms. Now, Reinecke was, for his day, a pretty sure master of the orchestra; half a century ago, you would have thought his scoring only a jot inferior to Mendelssohn's, if that. But, like the rest of his talent, its virtue was only ephemeral; its charm is all gone now.

In these "Bilder aus Osten" you keep feeling how much better Schumann himself would have scored them. Schumann, to be sure, was no impeccable orchestral craftsman; his scoring was often clumsy. But, though he may not have scored with skill, he did score with inspiration; his weakness was purely technical, and you feel that, however much he may have failed completely to realize his intention, the intention itself was instinct with beauty and genius; his scoring might often have been better done, but it was always apposite to his thought, and really helped the music to say what he had to say in its own individual way. Reinecke's scoring of these little pieces, on the other hand, seldom does this; at moments it does, as I have said, but, for the most part, it sounds old, lifeless, and smacks of mere professional routine. It has gone the way of all flesh.

The playing of Beethoven's D major symphony was a dream of sympathetic beauty and poetry. It was more than right, it was masterly! And here is music which not only does not show the first wrinkle of age, but upholds the old form in which it was written as with a hand of steel, making it, too, seem ever young and lovely. Call the D major symphony academic? Academies galore may have founded themselves on it, but it has that in it before which academies had best tremble, for its atmosphere is not wholesome for them to breathe. It can dance blithely at all their funerals!

The next programme is: Schubert, overture in the Italian style, in C major, opus 170; Loeffler, "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," for violin and orchestra; Richard Strauss, "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche;" Brahms, symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98. Mr. Franz Kneisel will be the violinist.

W. F. A.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 20, 1899.

The Symphony Concert—Dvorak's "Pisen Bohatyrska."

There is no denying that the concert of Saturday seemed dull; nor was this occasioned by the lack of a soloist, for some of the most interesting concerts of the long series have been purely orchestral, but it was probably due to the character of the second and third numbers.

The programme began pleasantly enough with Marschner's overture to "Hans Heiling" (the opera is a more serious and Teutonic "Iolanthe"), which was performed to perfection and won hearty applause. The only other spontaneous outburst of enthusiasm was caused by the Larghetto of Beethoven's second symphony, which was gloriously played and received applause almost to the encore point.

Marschner is seldom heard in our concert-rooms nowadays, yet he certainly deserves rescuing from oblivion. He is a very strong reflection of Weber. Gade, because of his playing moon to the Mendelssohnian sun, was often called, in mild sarcasm, "Mrs. Mendelssohn;" in like manner we have here a "Mrs. Weber." He has the very trick of the Weber horns, connoisseurs may remember that almost every Weber score has more horns than a dilemma.

The "Hans Heiling" overture is, however, less dramatic than Weber's work, although it was refreshing to listen to an overture that gave a clear-cut sonata-allegro form, with every theme in its proper place and its regular key; form here did not seem a fetter but an added beauty.

Now followed "Pisen Bohatyrska," which was not as deadly as its name, save in the way of dulness. It is one of the latest of Dvorak's compositions, and its title signifies "A Hero's Song" or "The Lament of a Hero."

It is evident that Dvorak is trying to follow in the footsteps of his great teacher, Smetana, and bring forth some national music for his native Bohemia. He does not reach the height attained by his master. Smetana's gold was purified in the crucible of Sorrow; he suffered poverty, deafness, the loss of dearly-loved relatives, and he felt keenly the down-trodden condition of his own country (Bohemia); these tortures fanned his genius, strengthened his musical works, and sent him into a madhouse to end his days.

Prosperity is but a poor nurse for composition, and the well-nurtured Dvorak is not so great a composer as the struggling musician of 25 years ago. He has become too cosmopolitan to write great national works such as Smetana created.

Our "Hero" in this case has some little Ossianic brooding at the outset, but becomes very prolix and garrulous before he ends his tale. He gives us a medley of Czech tunes, he mutters a little of war, and (to alter Shakespeare to our purpose) he capers nimbly about to the lascivious pleasing of a flute. He seems passionately fond of a little figure of five notes which he reiterates and develops with some obstinacy. The work left the auditor entirely cold. The bardic crown in this particular field of composition still remains with Smetaná.

And now a dreamy German gentleman came forward with a chibouk and a turban, and endeavored to persuade us that he was an Oriental. Schumann's "Bilder aus Osten"—"Pictures From the Orient"—is one of the ethnological mistakes of music. These errors are not few in the classical repertoire; Beethoven's "Turkish March" could picture Hoboken quite as well as Constantinople; Mozart's "Alla Turca" in his A major piano sonata is not a whit more oriental; only St. Saens, as witness his "Suite Algerienne" and his "La Brise," seems to have caught the peculiar melancholy tone of the East.

Schumann's "Pictures from the Orient" were originally piano duets. They have been delicately scored for orchestra by Karl Reinecke, but even when we add Capellmeister Reinecke to Schumann the result is not a convincing Arab; there is more of the flavor of Leipzig than of the desert in the pretty pictures.

Of course one may not demand an actual presentation of Arabic or Turkish music in our repertoire, the scale-form (divided in smaller intervals than our own) forbids that. The Chinese is the only Oriental scale that lends itself perfectly to our system, and "There is a Happy Land," or "Auld Lang Syne," or "Ye Banks and Braes o' Bonnie Doon" would be readily accepted by the Chinese as representations of their music, while the Russian composer Arensky has emphasized the kinship of the two systems by stealing an entire Chinese melody ("Tsin-fa") and using it in one of his piano etudes.

But we refrain from a discourse upon Oriental music in general and content ourselves with saying that Schumann's pretty pictures and Reinecke's instrumentation were not in line with their subject, although very agreeable music per se.

Beethoven's second symphony is of the first period, the time when the great symphonist had not fully unfolded his pinions, when he was still under the influence of Haydn.

The layman is too apt to accept Beethoven's nine symphonies as the perfection of this form, forgetting that the 1st, 2nd and 6th symphonies are comparatively hillocks in this chain of Alps. Yet there are points in the 2nd symphony that go far beyond Haydn, as for example the resolute finale which replaces the mere joviality of the Haydn endings, and the Scherzo which here for the first time formally takes the place of the Minuet.

We have already stated that the Larghetto won the chief triumph of the entire concert. It requires something of genius to make a development of themes interesting in so slow a tempo, yet Beethoven has succeeded in doing this here and in a manner that does not [illegible]

If the Larghetto does not attain the power of the slow movements of the 3rd, 4th, or 7th symphonies, it is none the less one of the great slow movements of the symphonic repertoire.

Mr. Gericke properly accentuated the contrast between the Scherzo and its Trio. We always feel that, in adopting such an old-fashioned theme and such ancient orchestration (oboes and bassoons) in the first theme of this Trio, Beethoven desired to impress the difference between the old song-form which constituted the formal Minuet, and the freer Scherzo with which he wished to supersede it.

Yet even Beethoven's minuets are not of Haydn formality; the minuet of the first symphony and that of the third, are Scherzos in disguise. Only in the 8th symphony does Beethoven allow a formal minuet to enter into his symphonic scheme.

The bold, brusque character of the finale of this symphony is another innovation. Haydn was influenced in his finales by the fact that the old composers had ended their instrumental cycle form, the Suite, with a rollicking Gigue (or "Jig") and tried to preserve some of this jollity in his symphonies.

Mazart obediently followed this plan, but Beethoven, after trying it once, in his first symphony, gave it up as unsuited to the dignity of the form, and here, in the 2nd symphony, we have the first instance of a new departure which was to lead to other experiments, as the variations of the Heroic symphony, the joining of the finale to the Scherzo in the 5th symphony, and finally in the great chorale and variation work with orchestra and voices in the 9th symphony.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOV. 19, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY.

The first number on the programme for the fifth concert was the overture to the romantic opera, Hans Heiling by Heinrich Marschner, a contemporary and devoted follower of Weber, whose influence upon him was so decided as to almost overbear the individuality of his work. The opera, founded on a legend dealing with gnomes, whose king, Hans Heiling, enamoured of a peasant girl, resigns his crown to become a mere mortal; however his sacrifice is useless for the girl prefers her commonplace lover to him whom she suspects of belonging to another and supernatural sphere, and he finally returns to his domain as Prince of the Earth Spirits. The effect of the overture is bright and gay, and the clear horn calls with much wood-wind accompaniment were decidedly Weberish, and, like his music, most agreeable to hear.

The symphonic poem by Dvorak was first played in Vienna last winter under the title, "A Hero's Lament"—and is its composer's latest published orchestral work. It seems to open with the lament over the hero followed by narrations of his martial deeds to which he was incited by thoughts of home and country whose national airs are woven most inspiringly into the song.

The orchestration is brilliant, and parts of the composition are thoroughly interesting and original. Mr. Gericke seemed to bring out all its salient points with the best effect, and the audience received it, apparently, with approval. Dvorak is so thoroughly in earnest and is such an original thinker of musical thoughts, a master of form, not slavishly or even Sclavishly subservient to it, that one always brings away an impression of pleasure after listening to his music.

Schumann's pictures from the Orient, a series of pianoforte pieces for four hands, orchestrated by Reinicke, are charming conceptions and quite effective for orchestra, although scarcely adapted to such recessivily "full dress" appearance.

Beethoven's 2d Symphony was completed in 1802 when he was at Heiligenstadt, near Vienna, from May to October. About this time is the date of the letter known as "Beethoven's Will," in which he alludes to his deafness in the most affecting manner.

No trace of this melancholy is found in this 1802 Symphony which shows that he could, in his creative world, triumph over the oppressing and depressing influences of his actual every day existence. The first sketches were made in note-books of two or three quires of large oblong music-paper as brown and coarse as grocer's wrapping-paper, roughly sewn together. He wrote three complete scores of this Symphony which were lost. Accidents frequently occurred in the establishments of composers; three of Schubert's large works were used by the maid to light the fire, and Beethoven himself "after many searches and much hard language, discovered that large portions of his Mass in D had been used to wrap up boots."

This Symphony is as fresh and beautiful as when it first came into being nearly one hundred years ago and will continue to gladden the souls of all true musicians for a hundred years to come, especially if it can have such a perfect interpretation as was given us to enjoy at this time.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1899.

LOEFFLER.

A Revised Edition of His "Veillees de l'Ukraine."

Mr. Franz Kneisel's Fine Performance of It.

R. Strauss, Brahms and Schubert at the Symphony.

The program of the sixth Symphony concert in Music Hall last night, Mr. Gericke, conductor, was:

Overture in the Italian Style, in C major ....Schubert
"Nights in the Ukrain," concert piece for violin and orchestra ....Loeffler
I. Introduction: Pastoral.
II. A Night in May (The Drowned Girl—Runa).
IV. The Parobki amuse themselves.
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Op. 28 ....Strauss
Symphony No. 4, in E minor..........Brahms

Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's piece for violin and orchestra, entitled "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," was written at Wayland in the summer of 1891, and it was first played by the composer and orchestra, under Mr. Nikisch, Nov. 21, of that year. It then consisted of four movements—Introduction and Pastorale, Rune, Dumka, Finale.

Last summer at Medfield, Mr. Loeffler rewrote the work, and he made many and serious changes. The third movement was omitted last night.

Mr. Apthorp says in the program book:

"The original title of this composition 'Les Veillées de l'Ukraine'—is exceedingly difficult to render into English; we have no word that expresses the exact meaning of 'veillée'; 'vigil' comes nearest to it, but that has certain associations which the French 'veillée' has not. A 'veillée' is merely a sitting up late into the night, a not going to bed."

Now Littré defines "veillée" as the sitting up of several persons together during the time that is intended for sleep, and "especially the assemblage of villagers or artisans at night who talk together while they sit up to work." "Veillée" also means the action of watching the sick at night. Mr. G. H. Wilson, who compiled the program book of Nov. 21, 1891, was not easily disturbed by any question of translation. He gayly wrote: "A collection of short tales by the Russian author Gogul (sic), bearing the title 'Les Veillées de l'Ukraine,' which, freely translated, we will call 'Fireside Stories of Ukraine,'—a place in Russia—suggested to Mr. Loeffler for musical treatment."

These tales of the Ukraine are grave and gay, and as in so many Russian stories, there is sadness even in the gayety. No wonder that they appealed to Mr. Loeffler and suggested music to him. It is not easy to remember distinctly the details of a composition like that violin suite after one hearing and at the end of eight years, but my general recollection is that the suite was then diffuse and a little garrulous in spite of the many beauties which it contained; and I remember that the finale then seemed the most firmly-knit movement During the last eight years Mr. Loeffler has studied much, and he has gained steadily in mastery of his art. The suite as it now stands—I refer only to the movements played last night—is characteristic of Mr. Loeffler, even though there is no touch of the macabre in which he often finds delight and which he expresses poignantly. There is no bitterness in the melancholy; there is no hopelessness in the mild splendor of the Ukraine night; there is no mockery of the merriment. Here is purely imaginative music that is gentle in sadness and, although there is the expression of village sport, there is no accompanying smell of vodka.

The solo violin is used as an orchestral not merely as a virtuoso instrument, and yet only a virtuoso in the true meaning of the word should play it. Not that the solo part is ungrateful; on the contrary, it is tuneful and effective, although at times the audience may be diverted from the soloist by surprising orchestral combinations and lose for a moment the thread of the story. There are few musicians who are so curious in orchestral experiments; there are few, still fewer, who succeed so triumphantly in experiments that seem at first too daring, or hopeless. Mr. Loeffler is fastidious in everything; melody, harmony, orchestral dress; his fastidiousness is not finical; it is the desire of the true artist to do his best, to find the one, the only harmonic and orchestral expression for his thought, to steer clear of the conventional, the academic, to leave behind him only that of which he is not ashamed. In such a spirit worked Flaubert.

This suite is crowded with exquisite detail. It is as the dream of a passionate collector of precious stones who sees his cabinets complete, with gems long sought, rare, of many colors, from those that dazzle to those that are quietly pure. How simply this composer shuns the commonplace! And yet this apparent simplicity is the result of long and anxious hearing, experience, imagination and infinite rejection. How beautiful the few introductory measures of the second movement! How different timbres melt into each other and there is the calm watched by the moon.

Mr. Kneisel played not only with extreme finesse. Purity and poetic quality of tone; unostentatious possession of flawless technic; sympathetic sharing in the mood, the "stimmung" of his colleague; rhapsodic freedom in song such as characterizes the melodies of the dwellers in Little Russia; embroidery that seemed the accidental thought of the moment—these were some of the qualities of his admirable performance.

⁂

Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" was first performed at a Gürzenich concert in Cologne, Nov. 5, 1895. It was first played here Feb. 22, 1896. That same night Maurel, Saville, Lola, Beeth and others appeared in "Falstaff" at Mechanics' Building, and many of us did not hear Strauss's tune until it was led last evening by

When Dr. Wüllner, the conductor at Cologne, asked the composer for an explanatory program of the "poetical intent" of this piece, Strauss replied: "It is impossible for me to furnish a program to 'Eulenspiegel'; were I to put into words the thoughts which its several incidents suggested to me, they would seldom suffice and might even give rise to offence. Let me leave it therefore, to my hearers to crack the hard nut which the Rogue has provided for them. By way of helping them to a better understanding, it seems sufficient to point out the two 'Eulenspiegel' motives, which, in the most manifold disguises, moods, and situations, pervade the whole up to the catastrophe, when, after he has been condemned to death, Till is strung up to the gibbet. For the rest, let them guess at the musical joke which a Rogue has offered them."

Several German critics have tried to "crack the hard nut." Thus Mr. Klatte wrote an elaborate analysis that was published in the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, Nov. 8, 1895. He finds that the opening measures indicate the folk-character of the story and say "Once upon a time"; then the thematic material is exposed so that the hearer is enabled "to recognize the pranks and droll tricks which the crafty schemer is about to bring before our eyes." Till wanders through the land as an adventurer with tattered clothes; he rides into the market of a city: "Clink! clash; clatter! A confused sound of broken pots and pans, and the market-women are put to flight!" And now Till is an unctuous priest; and now a Don Juan at whom, however, women laugh; therefore he hates the human race; he mocks professors, doctors, and all Philistines; he hoaxes; he lies; and at last he is brought before the Cadi. Sentence is pronounced; "the descending leap of a minor seventh in the bassoons, horns, trombones, and tuba betokens his death." And Till becomes a legendary person. The people tell of him and his exploits: "Once upon a time * * * But that he was a merry rogue and a thorough devil of a fellow seems to be expressed by the final eight measures given out fortissimo by the full orchestra."

I am not favorably inclined toward the extraction of sunbeams from cucumbers. This analysis reminds me of the opening sentence of John Phoenix's masterly discussion of "The Plains: ode symphonie," by Jabez Tarbox. "The symphonie opens upon the wide and boundless plains in longitude 115 W., latitude 35 degrees. 21 minutes, and 3 seconds N. and about 60 miles from the west bank of Pitt River. These data are beautifully and clearly expressed by a long (topographically) drawn note from an E flat clarinet."

Strauss's letter to Wüllner is enough, especially if you have read the adventures of his hero. It is a vulgar book, full of practical jokes that are regarded by the German mind as indescribably funny. Many of these jokes are of a Rabelaisian nature, and perhaps it is not well to inquire too carefully into Strauss's scheme.

The work itself is of genuine interest throughout, and many pages are of rare musical strength and charm. There is here a rhythmic as well as a harmonic boldness that has been surpassed only by the Strauss of "Thus Spake Zarathustra." (And are we not to hear his still later works, "Don Quixote" and the "Heldenleben" symphony?) He has enlarged the possibilities of orchestral expression, and yet in "Till" there is nothing that is hopelessly involved or cryptic. Furthermore, there is throughout the spirit of popular legend. However vulgar the hero may be, there is no superfluity of naughtiness in the music; for any attempt at realism does not go beyond the boundaries of art.

⁂

The orchestra played the piece by Strauss superbly, and it was led with great insight and full appreciation by Mr. Gericke, who also conducted Mr. Loeffler's suite with infinite pains. Possibly a little more rehearsal might have improved the performance of the latter's difficult score, but as it was the performance gave much pleasure. The overture of Schubert was, in its way, amusing, and the symphony by Brahms no doubt thrilled his passionate admirers.

Philip Hale.

The program of the Symphony Public Rehearsal, Music Hall, Friday afternoon at 2.30, and concert Saturday at 8 P. M., will be as follows: Overture "Egmont," Beethoven; Grieg's piano concerto (Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler); Brahms's Hungarian dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6; Tschaikowsky's symphony No. 3, in D major.

The announcement that Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist at the Symphony rehearsal on Friday, when he played the exquisite composition of Mr. C. M. Loeffler, was the signal for a tremendous audience at Music Hall, when the auditorium was taxed to its utmost capacity. Among the many people present were Mrs. Franz E. Zerrahn, Mrs. William H. Alline, Dr. William Sturgis Bigelow, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. Edward S. Grew, Mrs. Gerard Bement, Miss Carter, Mrs. Frank Spaulding, Mrs. Frederic P. Vinton, Mr. Eliot Pratt, Mrs. Arthur A. Haserick, Mr. Ernst Perabo, Mr. Eben D. Jordan and his young daughter, Mrs. William Stoddart, Father Bodfish, Mrs. Thomas O. Rogers, Mrs. Fitzroy Kelly, Mrs. Benjamin F. Pitman, Miss Stackpole, Miss Tyler, Mrs. Frank S. Chick, Miss Jones, Mr. Taylor, Mrs. Neal Rantoul, Mrs. James B. Forsythe, Miss Parker, Miss Cabot, Mr. and Mrs. Eliot, Miss Morrison, Mrs. Burr Porter, Mr. and Mrs. Lee and others.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 148.

SUNDAY, NOVEMBER 26, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Loeffler's Composition the Novelty of the Programme.

One of His Most Graceful Works, Distinctly Poetical in Feeling—Mr. Kneisel's Admirable Performance of the Solo Part—Intelligent Work of Orchestra.

The programme for the sixth concert of the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture in the Italion style, op. 170..Schubert
"Night in the Ukrain," for violin and orchestra.....................C. M. Loeffler
"Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks"...... R. Strauss Symphony No. 4, E-minor..............Brahms

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist.

Mr. Loeffler's composition was the novelty of the programme. A version of the work was performed by the composer on the evening of Nov. 21, 1891, within a few days of exactly eight years ago. It was then announced as a suite. Since then it has been extensively revised, almost remodelled, and is now presented as a morceau de concert, or concert piece, which is, perhaps, a more felicitous title.

It is in four movements, of which but three were performed. The first is named "Pastoral," the second, a slow movement, "A Night in May" (The Drowned Girl, Runa), and the third "The Parobki Amuse Themselves." These descriptive indications doubtless place the work in the category of programme music, but it is perfectly lucid, as music pure and simple, and no running commentary is needed to make it understandable in this aspect. It may rank as one of the most graceful and genial works of the composer that have been heard here. It is strongly and distinctly poetical in feeling; in common with M. Loeffler's other music it is marked by vigorous and original individuality; the orchestration is of rare beauty, and the part of the solo instrument has not the remotest trace of the familiar set devices that have done service so long in violin concertos.

It is steadily brilliant, and the technique is decidedly the composer's own. Nor does the solo instrument stand out apart from the orchestra, but takes its due place as a prominent feature in a well balanced and self-consistent whole. This is all admirable.

On the other hand, and dealing with details, it may be urged that the orchestration is often so elaborate that it clouds the solo part, and very frequently renders it difficult to hear what is set down for it; that the upper range of the first string is employed with a persistence and devoted so steadily to light and brilliant figures that before all is over an effect of sameness is imparted to the work as a whole. One at length yearns for more of contrast in the shape of broad and well marked cantabile on the lower strings. It is, however, certain that Mr. Loeffler knew exactly what results he desired to produce, and perhaps these were among them, and that a better acquaintance with the composition would cause these seeming shortcomings to appear essential elements in his plan.

The slow movement is affluent in noble pathos and poetic tenderness. The finale has an inspiriting dance rhythm, and its leading theme bears all the marks of a Russian origin. On the whole the Parobki amuse themselves with little of sturdy rhythmic emphasis, but the musical effect is daintily charming, and before it is all over there is force and accent sufficiently stirring. The fine musicianship of the composer, his independence of conventionality and the thoroughness of his mastery of his art are convincingly displayed from the opening to the close of the work. The instrumentation may be again referred to by way of acknowledging its freshness, its refinement, its clearness and the rich fancy in which it abounds.

Mr. Kneisel's performance of the solo part was exquisitely elegant. It is hugely difficult, but the ease, fluency and certainty of his flawless technique, it is hardly necessary to say, were wholly equal to every demand. He evidently played as if he were in love with his task, and that his efforts were swayed by and gave evidence of the highest artistic aspiring will be taken for granted. Perfection of intonation, of phrasing, of nuance and of style were all there. The applause and the recalls when all was over were stormily enthusiastic for player and composer, and the success of both was decided by the spontaneity and the fervor of the acclaim that greeted them.

The Strauss work made a far stronger effect, and became infinitely more clear under the brilliant and remarkable interpretation that Mr. Gericke accorded it than was the case of its earlier performances here. Then it seemed a matter of eccentric noisiness, in which the professed mirthfulness of the composition had to be taken for granted. As given last night it was full of brightness, was as clear as crystal, as far as its meaning is concerned, and, wonderful to relate, was really delightful in its way. If the difficult task of proving humorous possibilities in purely orchestral music was ever overcome, it is surely in this work when it is read in Mr. Gericke's fashion. Its performance was a splendid triumph of orchestral virtuosity.

Schubert's Italian overture, which is not so very Italian after all, was worth hearing again for its geniality and the grace and dainty color of its presentation. The Brahms symphony was of exceptional worth, in both its reading and its playing. Mr. Gericke entered into its spirit with the keenest sympathy, and the result was a large and as noble a performance as the work has ever had here. And, by the way, a word of warm recognition must not be omitted for the care and the effectiveness with which M. Loeffler's beautiful score was treated by both conductor and orchestra.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte, op. 16, Grieg; Hungarian dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6, Brahms; symphony No. 3, Tschaikousky, first time. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler is to be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, NOV 26, 1899.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr Loeffler's concert piece for violin and orchestra was the only novelty on the symphony program last week. It was the first performance of "Ukraine Nights" since it had been partially rewritten by Mr Loeffler, who played it in its original form several seasons ago. Yesterday Mr Kneisel was the soloist. The other program numbers were Franz Schubert's "Overture in Italian Style," "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss and Brahms' fourth symphony. Mr Loeffler's work is a little pastoral tone poem, illustrating excerpts from the prose of the Russian Nicolai Gogol, and showing in sequence the simple diversions of the country girls and boys, moonlight in the Ukraine forest, the stillness of the night, the pilgrimage of the hero, Lenko, and the visions conjured up by the reflections in depth of the lake.

The form of the various movements are free, and the descriptive is given largely to the solo instrument, which runs almost through the entire work, the orchestra forming, as it were, a background to the story told on the violin. It is a composition of much delicacy, and the melodic grace and the dramatic episode at the close is beautifully worked out, especially on the solo instrument. Mr Kneisel's tone is sweet and true at all times, and throughout yesterday's performance his execution and finger work was seemingly flawless. The simple themes were given forth with a finished daintiness that charmed his auditors, and with the exception of a lacking in power at times, his interpretation was all that could be desired. Mr Loeffler and Mr Kneisel were each called to the platform several times to respond to the plaudits of the large audience.

The Schubert overture is a light, tripping bit of composition, brilliant in its finale and suggestive of the Italian style of music so prevalent at fetes and outdoor celebrations. The orchestra played the piece in a spirited and buoyant vein and with its usual skill. The Strauss "Merry Pranks" went all right, the humorous side of the work being capitally shown by the conversations and repeats played by the different instruments, the phrases all following without perceptible break. The Brahms symphony received its proper treatment, the harmonic difficulties being smoothly surmounted and the frequent complexity and chaos of keys terminating with a return to harmony in form and theme which revealed the team work of the orchestra in its highest efficiency.

Mrs Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the soloist this week. The program will be as follows: Overture, "Egmont," Beethoven; concerto for pianoforte in A minor, Grieg; Hungarian dances, Brahms; symphony No. 3, in D major, Tschaikowsky, first time.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, NOVEMBER 26, 1899.

SIXTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The sixth Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall, with Franz Kneisel as the soloist. The first number of the programme was Schubert's overture in the Italian style, Op. 170, in C major. This overture, composed about 1817, has not been heard here for some years, but was at one time quite a favorite. It suggests the Italian style of Rossini, a composer much admired by Schubert, and is a work exceedingly pleasing in character, though not one of this composer's immortal efforts.

Mr. Kneisel played a sort of fantasia for violin by C. M. Loeffler, entitled "Nights in the Ukraine," in three movements. The composer, who is a member of the orchestra, has done some of his usual clever orchestral scoring, many of the effects being exceeding fantastic. The themes are mainly Russian melodies, which are worked out at great length by the solo violin and the orchestra. Mr. Kneisel played in his usual admirable manner, and both he and the composer were rewarded by enthusiastic applause by the audience.

Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Banks," a marvellous bit of music "farce comedy," in which is employed nearly every known orchestral device, was played in marvellous manner, and as a "trick performance" could hardly be surpassed.

The contrast between this and the final number, which was Brahms's fourth symphony, was startling, but it was good to hear the "real thing" in music after so much travesty on the art. The work was most enjoyable and admirably performed.

Mme. Fanny Bloomfield-Ziesler will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this coming week in Grieg's concerto for pianoforte in A minor. Tschaikowski's third symphony in D is promised, for the first time in Boston.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, NOV. 27, 1899.

The Symphony Concert—Mr. Loeffler's Russian Suite.

It was a field night for technical display and jugglery of rhythms, a concert in which our orchestra conquered more difficulties than would suffice for three programmes.

Yet matters began in a gentle and melodic manner that did not presage the rocks and whirlpool ahead. Schubert's "Overture in Italian Style," C major, Op. 170, is tuneful even to the Lortzing degree, and suggested the "Pop" concerts and their geniality. Of course such a work won its full share of applause and it was a good foil to the heavier music which followed.

Mr. C. M. Loeffler is very popular in his own city and anything which he presents is sure of respectful attention. His "Nights in the Ukraine" would, however, compel attention anywhere, for it contains many striking themes developed in a musicianly manner.

Its position on the programme had an advantage and a disadvantage; coming after the utter simplicity of Schubert's work the orchestration was bound to seem especially rich, but the tremendous orchestral work of Richard Strauss which followed made a juxtaposition which few composers would covet. But Mr. Loeffler scores with a master hand and his orchestration need not fear comparison even with that of the ultra-moderns.

The contents of the work were more interesting than some of the compositions of this musician that we have recently heard; we do not care for Mr. Loeffler's meditations on Death and the Tomb; we cannot become enthusiastic about the lingering demise of Tintagiles, or the dance of skeletons, or other mortuary and funereal subjects; but here we have a tangible, coherent and graphic subject, treated without any prolixity (at least with one movement omitted, as was the case on this occasion) and an employment of a set of folk-themes that transfuses red blood into the veins of latter day pessimism.

Mr. Loeffler has been especially successful in his development of Russian themes; we recall a masterly treatment of the "Volga Sailor's Song" in one of his chamber-music compositions, and the presentation of themes in the present work was even more successful.

The Ukraine (the word means "frontier") is that part of European Russia which consists of Kharkoff, Kieff, Podolia and Poltava; the themes were taken from this "Little Russia," as it is called, but were not the most melodic of the region; it was more to the purpose, however, to find the violin (for this work is a free violin concerto) treated with careful skill that prevented it from becoming a mere virtuoso instrument, yet did not allow it to become submerged in the orchestra; the interweaving of solo instrument with orchestra calls for unstinted praise.

The second movement shows Mr. Loeffler somewhat influenced by the style of Berlioz; we find here a Russian Childe Harold, portrayed by a violin instead of a viola. This resemblance by no means suggests plagiarism, for Mr. Loeffler is original in all of his work. The contrasts of a resigned melancholy and a wild bacchanalian revelry are typical of Russian and of much other Slavonic music.

The finale pictured the "Young men amusing themselves." They seemed to amuse themselves, at first, by whistling fragments of "Yankee Doodle," with an imperfect acquaintance with our melody. It is interesting to discover resemblances to the old melody in far-away Russia; we have already found the entire first period of the tune used in Germany (as a very vile "Gassenhauer") and in Holland (as a nursery song).

The finale swept the gamut of emotion from lofty grandeur to tricksy playfulness, the devices of treatment being interesting and ingenious.

Viewed as pure music we find this the best of Mr. Loeffler's compositions, interesting throughout, full of legitimate contrast, not too morbid, skilfully scored and uniting the solo instrument well with the orchestral forces, although the themes are somewhat denationalized in the process of developing.

Viewed from the violin standpoint, there is also much to praise, and all the technical points of the instrument, harmonics, skips, runs, even passages "sull' ponticello," are brought into play, yet the solo part never becomes mere display.

Mr. Franz Kneisel was the soloist and he gave the work of his colleague with loving care; his performance was, so far as we could judge, flawless. It was therefore quite natural to find the soloist and the composer sharing in a popular triumph. The whole difficult work was splendidly performed.

Now came a mountain peak of orchestral difficulty; after the Russian young men had amused themselves, Till Eulenspiegel, and Richard Strauss, began to amuse themselves also. The performance of the almost impossible work was a memorable triumph for Mr. Gericke and his orchestra.

Never in our life have we had such a revelation of the possibilities of the technique of the modern orchestra and the extreme difficulties which the modern composers delight in gathering together. The terrifically complex composition became lucid, the conductor guided us through the complicated labyrinth, one could even perceive the Rabelaisian humor of the whole thing; the little, mischievous motive of Eulenspiegel skipped from under the attempts to crush it, with flea-like elusiveness, and the contrasts of reproving pomposity and absolute insouciance could not have [illegible] brought out.

It was a revelation of the possibilities of the modern school. It is certain that such St. Vitus dances amount to nothing unless played to perfection; with the modern execution it must be "Aut Caesar aut nullus," but when perfect performance is accorded the result is more tangible than we had imagined. There are more things twixt piccolo and contra-bassoon than are dreamt of in our philosophy!

That this composition is the work of a genius is evident, but it is so full of surprises that the critic would be superhuman to be able to fully comprehend it at once. Whether such fearful complexity is necessary for such a result in art may yet be doubted; the great Nasmyth steam hammer can crack an egg-shell, but it is nevertheless not employed in cracking egg-shells.

The score is adorned with everything from bass-clarinette and contra-bassoon to a watchman's rattle. Steam whistles and dynamite cartridges still remain to be used by the composer who desires to push further on. The musical dictionary of the future will certainly give the following definitions:—

"Rhythm—Four or five different subdivisions of the measure which must be employed simultaneously.

"Key—Any succession of tones, but the succession which is indicated by the signature must be avoided, especially at the close.

"Tune—The beginning of a melody; this ought to be sparingly employed and should never be brought to a conclusion."

From the subtleties of Strauss to the subleties of Brahms was a long step; about like progressing from Bernard Shaw to Milton, from spice and epigram to dignity and learning. It was the right thing at the wrong time, for by this number the audience were tired of study and wanted relaxation; Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" overture would have caused a popular uprising at about this moment.

The Brahms E minor symphony demands close attention and can never attain the popularity of the more simple second symphony by the same composer. Yet the wonderful figure development of the first movement was not wholly lost, and the marvellous modal treatment in the slow movement did not allow masterly ingenuity to obscure melodic beauty. Brahms's scherzos are not things of joy, but the energy of the third movement, which stands for a scherzo, was finely caught up.

"Variatio Delectat!" But we doubt whether the general public will re-echo the sentiment in the case of all of Brahms's variations. He follows the later Beethoven in taking his variation-forms over the border line of Development. The idea of ending a symphony with variations was Beethoven's protest against the pretty rondos with which Haydn and Mozart often used to end their cycle forms, a joviality borrowed from the concluding Jig of the Suite.

The use of an old dance for this is Brahms's own innovation. The bombastic Passacaglia suited well to variation, but a simpler dance than this model was surely never written! One may doubt the derivation of this grandiloquent dance from the Spanish words "Pasar" and "Calle," which would imply running the streets, but believe it to come from the Italian "Passo Gallo" since. "The Rooster-step" would well describe the prancing way in which it was originally danced. Louis C. Elson.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the sixth Symphony Concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Schubert: Overture in the Italian Style, in C major, opus 170.
C. M. Loeffler: "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," Morceau de Concert pour Violon et Orchestre.
Richard Strauss: "Till Eulenspiegels lustige Streiche," opus 28.
Brahms: Symphony No. 4, in E minor, opus 98.
Mr. Franz Kneisel was the violinist.

It is a good many years since the Schubert overture was last played here; Mr. Paur gave its very inferior companion in D major in the season of 1894-95, and about all one found interesting in it was the stretto, afterwards used by the composer, and with hundred-fold effect, in the first movement of his great C-major symphony. When the present overture, in C major, was a regular repertory piece at the old concerts of the Harvard Musical Association, I must own to not liking it particularly; I even found it unpleasant. But times change, and our taste changes with them; last Saturday evening I found the piece delightful. It seems to me that the legend of its having been written in imitation of Rossini, in the heat of a first enthusiasm, cannot be entirely apocryphal; there are Rossinian suggestions in some of the themes which seem so evident as to have even something of the humorous in them. One can fancy Schubert slyly saying "Et ego!" as he wrote them down. The Italian form of this overture has long been considered, and with considerable justice, from one point of view, essentially an inferior one; it is commonly known by a disrespectful diminutive, as the "sonatina" form. Fétis is quite sniffy about it; he says—of the Italian opera overture in general—"Rossini cuts the Gordian knot. He does not make the second part, but confines himself to the introduction of a few chords, in order to return to the primitive key, and then repeats, almost exactly, the whole of the first part in another key." But, before despising this proceeding, as merely an easy way out of a well-known difficulty, we should, it seems to me, consider whether there be no intrinsic musical fitness in it; looking into the matter carefully, do we find that the sort of thematic material Rossini and his Italian contemporaries put into their overtures is capable of being worked up into a really good second part, or "free fantasia," in a natural, unforced way? It seems to me that it cannot, that it does not lend itself to this sort of working-out; and that the rather primitive form, far from being a worthy subject for contempt, acquires a certain artistic dignity by being just the form best adapted to the thematic contents of the Italian overture. Schubert here handles it with easy mastery, as to the manner born. I find this overture thoroughly charming; it was exquisitely played.

And now we have had Richard Strauss's "Eulenspiegel" for the second time. If caution is ever a valuable quality in the critic, its exercise is especially in place when he has to do with Richard Strauss. Ever since this young composer's suite "In Italien," opus 16, was played here on Dec. 22, 1888, he has well maintained the impression he unmistakably made then: of being somebody. Nothing of his has yet been given here that has not made one feel him to be a composer to be taken very seriously; you may like and admire him, you may abominate him, but you cannot be indifferent to him nor pooh-pooh him. He has always had, and still has, a good deal of the ugly duckling about him, and ugly ducklings do not invariably grow up into swans; this is true enough. But then we should remember, per contra, that it is only the ugly duckling that ever does grow up into a swan; take the whole list of swans we know: from old Bach to Wagner, they were all ugly ducklings once; not a soul of them, not even Felix Mendelssohn, wore a smooth white swan's plumage, nor arched his neck gracefully at first. Call Richard Strauss the ugliest duckling of the lot; this is just the point that should commend caution to the critic!

Strauss is one of those true originals who make conventional terminology ridiculous; the standard terms in the musical lexicon are helpless in face of him, for they fail utterly to give you any true idea of him. Say, as has been said of his latest "Heldenleben," that "four distinct suspensions are sounded simultaneously with their four real notes in it"; enough to make an academician's hair stand on end, if you will, but not in the least to the point. It has no more to do with the artistic quality of the "Heldenleben" than pointing out the once-famous cross-relation has to do with the artistic quality of Mozart's C-major quartet. All one can justly say of it is that it is something new! The interesting question is: Does Strauss make it pay? He may be a madman; but are you so sure that, twenty-five years hence, all the world will not be mad with his madness? Consider Wagner, and—go slow!

When the "Eulenspiegel" was first given here, in February, 1896, I thought it thoroughly vile. Last Saturday it delighted me! Was it all a difference in the rendering? I hardly think so, though some difference of that sort may have been an item not to be ignored. But I think the most efficient difference must have been in myself. Since then I have heard, not only more of Richard Strauss, but more of Rimsky-Korsakoff, Tchaikovsky, Vincent d'Indy, Loeffler and other men of our day; through them I have been led to look more sympathetically into Liszt, the essential gist of Berlioz has become more plain to me; in a word, I have worked my way farther into the musical spirit of our time. I have stopped asking for things which Strauss cannot give me—and would be a person of small importance, if he could—and have all the more appreciativeness for what he has to offer. I feel more at home in his peculiar idiom, mainly because I have a better understanding of what he has to say; you do not catch the spirit of a language from its grammar, but from what its great writers have said in it. I cannot say now that "Eulenspiegel" strikes me particularly forcibly as a piece of refined humor; musical humor is a tickl[illegible] is not very clear, and has a tendency to fall into burlesque and farce; a good deal of the "fun" in "Eulenspiegel" seems distinctly farcical; well, what of it? I have no objection to farce, if recognized as such; this thing of Strauss's may not be a musical counterpart of "Sydney Smith at his best;" but that does not trouble me in the least, let it be farce, if it likes. What quite reconciles me to its farcicality is that, along side of all this element in it, I find an enormous amount of truly musical beauty. For the first time have I appreciated what people mean by Strauss's fine sense for orchestral color; hitherto I have found him wonderful, but a thought over-strident and ear-shocking; the "Eulenspiegel" now seems to me a wondrously beautiful kaleidoscope, a true enchantment to the sensual ear. The use the composer makes of his old "rogue's tune" is fairly ideal; he develops hints at beauty in it that fairly bewitch one. The performance was a wonder; it beggars praise.

The Brahms symphony was admirably read and played. It came in just the right place on the programme; what preceded it acted as the proper foil, it did not kill it in the least. The symphony made more than ever the impression of a great and beautiful work, full of genuine stuff.

Of Mr. Loeffler's "Veillées de l'Ukraine" I am impelled to speak with more than usual admiration, if with my usual reservation. One of the hardest lessons to learn is not to ask a man to get out of his own skin. Mr. Loeffler is not only a violinist, he has absorbed the quintessence of his instrument into his very blood; as Sardou sees everything according to the optics of the stage, so does Mr. Loeffler seem to feel and think through the violin. To me, on the other hand, the violin is but an instrument like another; I make the same demands upon it—not the same, perhaps, but as severe—that I do upon other instruments; the first of which demands is that I shall hear it without effort. Now, in a piece like "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine," I do not hear it without effort; I can hear it, yes, but have to strain every auditory nerve to the uttermost to do so, and get my impression of the music only through this constant sense of effort. It may be worth the trouble, indeed, I find it richly worth it; but the sense of physical effort is there, all the same, and discounts my enthusiasm. I cannot help wishing Mr. Loeffler to get out of his skin, and write purely orchestral works; I know the wish is foolish, but wisdom has no effect upon my instincts.

Still I must do with Mr. Loeffler what I have to do with all other composers: take him as I find him. The impression made upon me by this remodelled "Veillées de l'Ukraine"—both at preliminary rehearsals and at the concert—is so strong and compelling that I can only give it unreservedly. The thing seems to me a work of genius from beginning to end; the composer speaks an exotic dialect, exotic even to himself, if you come to that, but he speaks it with the grace, assurance and accent of a native, and I understand him. This time Mr. Loeffler has succeeded in taking me willingly with him into that atmosphere of high nervous tension which he breathes habitually, and I find it suited to my lungs. While with him, I feel that I can make the cross-relation my daily bread, and thrive on it. In "Les Veillées de l'Ukraine" everything seems natural, primesautier, and unforced; it all hangs together, and has patent meaning. Here I find what seems to me true and complete mastery; the composer never appears to hesitate for an instant; you feel him to be looking round neither for ideas nor phrases. The former he has already in abundance, the latter come of themselves. For poetic beauty and poignancy of conception, for supreme virtuosity of execution, this last completed composition of Mr. Loeffler's is indeed a wonder. It is a living picture in which I, at least, can feel no flaw. Mr. Kneisel played it admirably, with his wonted totality of conception and perfection in detail. The applause at the end was worthy of the effort.

The next programme is: Beethoven, overture to "Egmont," opus 84; Grieg, concerto for pianoforte, in A minor, opus 16; Brahms, Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6; Tchaikovsky, symphony No. 3, in D major, opus 29 (first time in Boston). Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler will be the pianist.

W. F. A.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 3, 1899.
([illegible] Company.)

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT

The seventh concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given last evening in Music Hall. Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the soloist.

[illegible]
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 4, 1899.

Symphony Concert—A Tschaikowsky Composition.

The Uitlanders had their innings at the symphony concert of Saturday, and Norway, Hungary and Russia contributed to the exotic feast, but Beethoven was the musical grace before these strong viands.

The "Egmont" overture is one of the best musical tributes to Liberty; human liberty and universal brotherhood were Beethoven's chief ideals, and the Heroic symphony, the ninth symphony and this overture, show their crystallization into music.

The "Egmont" overture seems rather a conservative score nowadays, yet it was radical enough when it was written. The violinists complained bitterly of being forced up to four-lined C, as they were in this composition, and held such alpine excursions as fit only for solo work. The famous piccolo passages in the Coda show that if "Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell" she also screamed lustily when Egmont was decapitated. The important instrument was brilliantly played and gave to the final cadences just the proper "elan."

The trumpets gave their fanfares with adequate power. The passages, although effective, are by no means difficult, in fact there is not a very trying trumpet passage in any of Beethoven's works, the "Leonora" signals being the only very important phrases for the instrument. The overture was played with great effect and one may cordially recognize the freedom from exaggeration which made the reading more delightful than many that we can recall. The applause after the performance was decidedly spontaneous.

Grieg's piano concerto in A minor does not wear well; it is rather eccentric in some of its effects and does not attain the coherency which one may demand in this form. It received a fictitious value through the verve and dash with which Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler played it. The pianist completely won her audience; her work was of a breadth and power distinctly masculine, yet the fioriture of the Adagio were given with commendable delicacy. The bravura of her trills and double trills recalled the fortissimo trillist to whom this work is dedicated,—Edmund Neupert,—and in her martial rendering of the first movement Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler often recalled the lamented Norwegian pianist.

But even the excellent work of the artist could not wholly conceal the fact that the work was not well mortised together; there were alternate layers of solo and orchestral work, there were piano themes with orchestral accompaniment, but a symphonic blending of the two forces was rarely apparent; the ideal concerto should be a symphony with a thread of obbligato work running through it; this concerto only attained this in its second movement and even here by the rather conventional device of giving themes to the orchestra and embellishing them on the solo instrument. There were points of beauty in the concerto, but they were what Addison would have called in-so-far that they were not developed and allowed to unfold themselves symmetrically; the triumph won was rather for the pianist than for the composition.

> "The pale, unripened beauties of the North."

And now came three Hungarian Dances which Mr. Gericke played upon his orchestra as a soloist might play upon his instrument. We have spoken so often of the growth of our orchestra to an ever higher standard that it is but just that we should emphasize the fact that its conductor has also progressed.

In the old days we recognized Mr. Gericke as the man who was building for us "the orchestra of the future," was was gathering and disciplining the forces of our musical army, who was a classicist to the finger-tips, but too conservative in his programmes and a musician who dreaded the clash and clangor of the ultra-moderns. We still find him a noble reader of the classic scores, but after the many novelties of the present season we perceive that he is broadly catholic in his repertoire, and the absolutely marvellous performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" at the preceding concert, and the caprice of the "Hungarian Dances" at this, show that he is en rapport with the new school as with the old; if the orchestra has grown its leader has also developed.

Exquisite was the oboe work in the second of these Brahms numbers, and the naive character was added to by quaint rhythmic constructions, syncopation of the Metre, and an organ-point upon the kettle-drum that was remarkably effective. The third of the set we liked least, since it exploited the same kind of caprice that Liszt has given us too frequently in his Rhapsodies,—t flavor of the circus.

The kettle-drum had a field-night at this concert; it ushered in Grieg's Concerto in an obbligato passage, it made its presence felt in the Hungarian Dances, and now it gave a picturesque monotony to the beginning of Tschaikowsky's third symphony, heard for the first time in Boston.

The Russians may renounce Tschaikowsky as often as they please as not being truly Muscovite in his musical expression, we shall still maintain that his melancholy has a flavor that is of the Orient and that his tendency to sorrow is not akin to the affected Occidental morbidness which is a flaw in the modern school.

Like the old Puritans, Tschaikowsky takes a keen delight in being miserable. The introduction to the present symphony is a gloomy threnody which is made very impressive by an organ-[illegible] a repeated note upon kettle-drum [illegible]basses. The pizzicato of the [illegible] movement is one of its finest [illegible]

[illegible] the impressive reiteration of contrabasses and kettle-drum. The Allegro which followed was tawdry by comparison with the dirge-like introduction, and showed the Russian using something very like the American "rag-time." The movement ended with a fine display of counterpoint, but even this lost something by the weak character of the cantus firmus.

One must give special and emphatic praise to the bassoons in this symphony. Tschaikowsky brings this grotesque instrument into bold relief in several parts of the work; in the second, third, and the final movements the bassoon had obbligato passages that were very important and were exquisitely performed. The second movement was a "Tedesca," a dance which seemed to be the connecting link between Waltz and Minuet. It was graceful and its sauvity lost nothing in the performance. After this moment of happiness the composer returns to his troubles (with Mrs. Gummidge-like lachrymosity) and gives an impressive elegy, which has a pathetic reiteration not unlike the effect gained by Beethoven in the slow movement of the seventh symphony. It is a musical presentation of the poet's lines,—

"One fatal remembrance,
One Sorrow that throws
Its black shade alike
O'er our joys and our woes."

a brooding rather than a poignant grief.

The Scherzo was omitted (for this is a five-movement symphony) which may have occasioned the preponderance of sadness which we find in the work as presented.

The finale was learnedly contrapuntal and presented a fugato that reminded, in the order of the entrances, of the first fugue of the "Welltempered Clavichord," and was admirably played by the strings. Here, too, the bassoon was given further opportunity (although not in the fugal work) and the use of the wood-wind was typically Tschaikowskian.

The symphony is a strong one, and only confirms our opinion that Tschaikowsky is the best outcome of the Russian school up to the present date of writing.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 156.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Noble Interpretation of the "Egmont" Overture.

Mr. Gericke's Masterly Efforts Rewarded by Rounds of Applause—Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler Wins Favor as a Soloist—Mr. Hambourg's Recital.

The programme for the seventh of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Overture, "Egmont"	Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, op. 16	Grieg
Hungarian dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6	Brahms
Symphony No. 3, in D-major, op. 29	Tschaikowsky

(First time in Boston.)

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler. There was a very large audience.

Mr. Gericke gave a noble interpretation of the "Egmont" overture. It was solid, brilliant and impressive, and none the less interesting because it did not seek to discover new effects nor lay undue stress on trivial points in search of novel readings. The closing movement was wrought up with thrilling fire and emphasis. A stirring round of applause rewarded the effort.

A like success attended the performances of the Brahms dances. It is not easy to recall when they were ever before given here with the spirit, the effective accent and the graceful and fascinating piquancy that Mr. Gericke imparted to them, and the clearness and spontaneity with which the orchestra acquitted itself.

It can hardly be said that the presentation of the symphony added anything to the reputation of the composer, and is overshadowed immeasurably by the "Pathetique" in largeness of style, individual originality, depth of thought and skill in treatment. It is in five movements, of which the fourth, the scherzo, was omitted in this performance. The work is wholly clear as a first hearing, but with the exception of the second movement, which oscillates between a minuet and a German "laud-

No New Year's Table is complete without a bottle of Dr. Siegert's Angostura Bitters, the great South American tonic

---

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Tschaikowsky's Third Symphony the Novelty.

A Work Far Inferior to Those Following It.

Mrs. Zeisler Played Grieg's Piano Concerto.

By Philip Hale.

The program of the Seventh Symphony Concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Music Hall, last night, was as follows:

Overture "Egmont"	Beethoven
Piano concerto in A minor	Grieg
Hungarian Dances, 1, 2, 6	Brahms
Symphony No. 3, in D minor	Tschaikowsky

(First time in Boston.)

Tschaikowsky's third symphony was first played at Moscow, Nov. 19, 1875. The first performance in this country was at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of New York, Adolph Neuendorff conductor, Feb. 8, 1879. Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" had been performed by this society Dec. 21, 1878; his "Romeo and Juliet" April 22, 1876, under Carl Bergmann. The third symphony was first played in London at the Queen's Hall, Henry J. Wood conductor, Sept. 27, 1899.

I yield to no one in my admiration for the genius of Tschaikowsky. I believe with Mr. Runciman that the "Pathetic" symphony is the most modern thing we have, and far more romantic than anything written by Weber, Berlioz, or Wagner. "As a voice, a new force in music neither Brahms nor Schumann can be compared with him other than unfavorably." And I feel with Mr. Runciman, when I hear his great works "the new throb, the new thrill."

Mr. Vernon Blackburne goes still farther, and I quote from the Pall Mall Gazette these words excited by the performance of the third symphony in London.

⁂

"The work has the greatness of Tschaikowsky upon its every page. This is one of the rare musicians who never leave you for a moment in doubt as to their worth in the bulk. A simple voluntary signed by Beethoven, for example, will in its brief exposition prove the wonder and the greatness of that signature; and we are fain to make the same comparison in regard to Tschaikowsky. Yet we are not prepared to say that this symphony is the utterance of the man at his tip-top best. That ineffable sixth symphony, that amazing fifth symphony (finer, but not so specially noble), remain to prove their superiority over every other composition set down by the same hand, dictated by the same brain. And yet it seems that it was impossible for Tschaikowsky to write without showing the mettle, the wondrous fibre in which his genius worked out its destiny. The Symphony in D, which Mr. Wood has just given to a London public for the first time, has wonderful openness and frankness in expression. Just listening to the quiet and sad moments of it you would say that, though its bravery was patent, its sorrow was a loose. The brilliance of its vitality, the wonder of its quickness, the fine open-air feeling of its bold and assured self-confidence, confront you at every point, save when the composer is pretending to cry, and then he is unconvincing. Is it not strange? Here is the man who in his ultimate work ran beyond the tears of even this sad time, who in the last movement of his last symphony showed the absolute unhappiness of the most unhappy possibility of an unhappy age, and in this earlier work you can scarce believe that the man is sincere unless he is deliberately laughing in your face. We do but record a personal impression, and therewith we confess our faith that this Russian composer was of the salt of the earth. Mr. Wood has been, during recent days, giving Tschaikowsky to London in various forms of composition in which he is practically unknown, and we have noted that each new production has only served to confirm the impression which we have recorded of the persistent and enduring element of greatness which abides in the very essence of this composer's work. It is a point on which we do well to insist. At this time we give our hours to wait for the performance of some work which we fear may prove less worthy of the composer than we had hoped. With the dead Tschaikowsky it is very different. Mr. Wood is proving to us almost day by day that we need have no such fear; that every phrase which the man completed, rounded, endued with his own fine temperament, became a living and moving utterance, a permanent influence, being, as it certainly was, the splendid expression of a rare and subtle spirit."

⁂

Now Mr. Blackburne is no fetish worshiper, nor is he a man inclined to accept blindly the work in bulk of any composer. I quote his words in full because they are criticism of a high order and because I was disappointed in the symphony.

It is true that we did not hear the scherzo, and it is not fair to judge of any symphony at first hearing, unless it is performed as the composer wrote it. After the work is known, cut as freely as you please, provided you cut out all that is tedious.

But to me the symphony was interesting chiefly on account of the suggestions and the premonitions of what Tschaikowsky did in later years.

What Mr. Blackburne first says is not true either of Beethoven or Tschaikowsky, or for that matter of Handel, Bach or Mozart. Nor do I find "greatness upon every page." On the contrary, there are prosaic and dull moments, and there are passages where the composer is evidently sparring for wind. The first movement is not distinguished by breadth, beauty of theme, or any striking orchestral device. It suffers from anxious development. It is as though Tschaikowsky had determined to be scholastic, to show what he had learned and to say it all in one movement. At the very start he arouses a mood and his method is peculiarly individual, but after the introduction the allegro is thematically commonplace and, for the most part, contrapuntally futile. The second movement [illegible] "Tedesca," is not without [illegible]

[illegible] convincing. The finale, as the first movement, suffers from over-elaboration. No, I do not find Tschaikowsky, the gorgeous, the inspired Oriental that delighted in rhythm and color, I do not find the weaver of spells, the supreme neurose in every page of this symphony. Nor can Mr. Blackburne with all his charm of language persuade me that the third symphony is "the splendid expression of a rare and subtle spirit."

⁂

The concert was extremely interesting. Mr. Gericke read the overture to "Egmont" without the exaggeration and the affectation dear to certain conductors. Wüllner and some others used to slacken the pace and thereby change the character of the sarabande measures containing the heavy chords which are fancied by lovers of panoramic music to depict the cruelty of Alva. Nikisch took all manner of sentimental liberties with the harmonies just before the coda. The straightforwardness, the simplicity, the naturalness of Mr. Gericke's reading made the overture all the more impressive. And how delightful were the dances by Brahms!

⁂

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler gave an admirable performance of Grieg's beautiful and effective concerto, a performance characterized in turn by brilliance, tenderness, and strength, a performance that was alive and glowing with romantic feeling.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 3, 1899.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The soloist at the symphony offering last week was that brilliant and strongly effective pianist, Mrs Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler. She is better worth hearing than ever. Her performance of Grieg's concerto in A minor, No. 16, gave excellent opportunity for the display of that wonderful technical skill and great power contrasted with marvelous daintiness of expression which mark her as one of the most noteworthy among the women artists of our time in pianoforte playing. The orchestra under Mr Gericke's baton accompanied Mme Bloomfield Zeisler in a most appreciative and thoroughly delightful way. Not without cause did the soloist make special acknowledgment to the skilled players and their watchful director at the close of the Norwegian's exacting concerto. With the audiences, the success of the artist as a matter of course was complete.

Beethoven's noble "Egmont" overture, nobly played, introduced the program. After the Grieg concerto—perhaps as a sort of relief for the heavy work to follow—three of Brahm's delightful Hungarian dances were given. The orchestra seemed to take delight in them as much as the auditors. Certainly they could not have found more graceful or more keenly appreciative interpretation. Originally composed for four hands on the piano, the author, in conjunction with Albert Parlow, has orchestrated these dances with rare skill. Symphony-goers gave enthusiastic evidence of liking them.

Tschaikowsky's symphony in D major, No. 29, was heard for the first time in this city. It is somewhat singular that, while the New York Philharmonic society gave it as long ago as Feb 7, 1879, Boston should have waited more than 20 years for an opportunity to hear it, considering the spread of the Tschaikowsky cult. It is certainly a long work for a symphony program, but it gives abundant proof of originality in treatment, and abounds in peculiar effects. The "elegiac theme," so to speak, in the third movement, is perhaps the most interesting episode. Coming from a Russian, it is not strange that, in this symphony, folk-song melodies are frequently introduced. These are treated in a very unique and unconventional way. Indeed, Tschaikowsky shows himself in his symphony steadily original and often interesting. As a matter of course the orchestra "worked as one" to bring out every possible effect.

Mme Marcella Sembrich is to be heard at the Symphony concerts this week and great assemblages may be counted upon. The artist is to sing an aria from Mozart's "Flight from the Seraglio." The orchestra's selections will be Dræseke's "Jubilee" overture (first time) three movements, from Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet;" Johann Strauss' "Spring Voices" and Liszt's Rhapsody, No. 1, in F.

[48]

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 4, 1899.

Symphony Concert—A Tschaikowsky Composition.

The Uitlanders had their innings at the symphony concert of Saturday, and Norway, Hungary and Russia contributed to the exotic feast, but Beethoven was the musical grace before these strong viands.

The "Egmont" overture is one of the best musical tributes to Liberty; human liberty and universal brotherhood were Beethoven's chief ideals, and the Heroic symphony, the ninth symphony and this overture, show their crystallization into music.

The "Egmont" overture seems rather a conservative score nowadays, yet it was radical enough when it was written. The violinists complained bitterly of being forced up to four-lined C, as they were in this composition, and held such alpine excursions as fit only for solo work. The famous piccolo passages in the Coda show that if "Freedom shrieked when Kosciusko fell" she also screamed lustily when Egmont was decapitated. The important instrument was brilliantly played and gave to the final cadences just the proper "elan."

The trumpets gave their fanfares with adequate power. The passages, although effective, are by no means difficult, in fact there is not a very trying trumpet passage in any of Beethoven's works, the "Leonora" signals being the only very important phrases for the instrument. The overture was played with great effect and one may cordially recognize the freedom from exaggeration which made the reading more delightful than many that we can recall. The applause after the performance was decidedly spontaneous.

Grieg's piano concerto in A minor does not wear well; it is rather eccentric in some of its effects and does not attain the coherency which one may demand in this form. It received a fictitious value through the verve and dash with which Mrs. Fannie Bloomfield-Zeisler played it. The pianist completely won her audience; her work was of a breadth and power distinctly masculine, yet the floriture of the Adagio were given with commendable delicacy. The bravura of her trills and double trills recalled the fortissimo trillist to whom this work is dedicated,—Edmund Neupert,—and in her martial rendering of the first movement Mme. Bloomfield-Zeisler often recalled the lamented Norwegian pianist.

But even the excellent work of the artist could not wholly conceal the fact that the work was not well mortised together; there were alternate layers of solo and orchestral work, there were piano themes with orchestral accompaniment, but a symphonic blending of the two forces was rarely apparent; the ideal concerto should be a symphony with a thread of obbligato work running through it; this concerto only attained this in its second movement and even here by the rather conventional device of giving themes to the orchestra and embellishing them on the solo instrument. There were points of beauty in the concerto, but they were what Addison would have called in-so-far that they were not developed and allowed to unfold themselves symmetrically; the triumph won was rather for the pianist than for the composition.

"The pale, unripened beauties of the North."

And now came three Hungarian Dances which Mr. Gericke played upon his orchestra as a soloist might play upon his instrument. We have spoken so often of the growth of our orchestra to an ever higher standard that it is but just that we should emphasize the fact that its conductor has also progressed.

In the old days we recognized Mr. Gericke as the man who was building for us "the orchestra of the future," was was gathering and disciplining the forces of our musical army, who was a classicist to the finger-tips, but too conservative in his programmes and a musician who dreaded the clash and clangor of the ultra-moderns. We still find him a noble reader of the classic scores, but after the many novelties of the present season we perceive that he is broadly catholic in his repertoire, and the absolutely marvellous performance of "Till Eulenspiegel" at the preceding concert, and the caprice of the "Hungarian Dances" at this, show that he is en rapport with the new school as with the old; if the orchestra has grown its leader has also developed.

Exquisite was the oboe work in the second of these Brahms numbers, and the naive character was added to by quaint rhythmic constructions, syncopation of the Metre, and an organ-point upon the kettle-drum that was remarkably effective. The third of the set we liked least, since it exploited the same kind of caprice that Liszt has given us too frequently in his Rhapsodies,—t flavor of the circus.

The kettle-drum had a field-night at this concert; it ushered in Grieg's Concerto in an obbligato passage, it made its presence felt in the Hungarian Dances, and now it gave a picturesque monotony to the beginning of Tschaikowsky's third symphony, heard for the first time in Boston.

The Russians may renounce Tschaikowsky as often as they please as not being truly Muscovite in his musical expression, we shall still maintain that his melancholy has a flavor that is of the Orient and that his tendency to sorrow is not akin to the affected Occidental morbidness which is a flaw in the modern school.

Like the old Puritans, Tschaikowsky takes a keen delight in being miserable. The introduction to the present symphony is a gloomy threnody which is made very impressive by an organ-point, a repeated note upon kettle-drum and contrabasses. The pizzicato of the latter instrument is one of its finest [illegible] horn [illegible] Weber's touch is almost equalled here in the impressive reiteration of contrabasses and kettle-drum. The Allegro which followed was tawdry by comparison with the dirge-like introduction, and showed the Russian using something very like the American "rag-time." The movement ended with a fine display of counterpoint, but even this lost something by the weak character of the cantus firmus.

One must give special and emphatic praise to the bassoons in this symphony. Tschaikowsky brings this grotesque instrument into bold relief in several parts of the work; in the second, third, and the final movements the bassoon had obbligato passages that were very important and were exquisitely performed. The second movement was a "Tedesca," a dance which seemed to be the connecting link between Waltz and Minuet. It was graceful and its sauvity lost nothing in the performance. After this moment of happiness the composer returns to his troubles (with Mrs. Gummidge-like lachrymosity) and gives an impressive elegy, which has a pathetic reiteration not unlike the effect gained by Beethoven in the slow movement of the seventh symphony. It is a musical presentation of the poet's lines,—

"One fatal remembrance,
One Sorrow that throws
Its black shade alike
O'er our joys and our woes."

a brooding rather than a poignant grief.

The Scherzo was omitted (for this is a five-movement symphony) which may have occasioned the preponderance of sadness which we find in the work as presented.

The finale was learnedly contrapuntal and presented a fugato that reminded, in the order of the entrances, of the first fugue of the "Welltempered Clavichord," and was admirably played by the strings. Here, too, the bassoon was given further opportunity (although not in the fugal work) and the use of the wood-wind was typically Tschaikowskian.

The symphony is a strong one, and only confirms our opinion that Tschaikowsky is the best outcome of the Russian school up to the present date of writing.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 156.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

A Noble Interpretation of the "Egmont" Overture.

Mr. Gericke's Masterly Efforts Rewarded by Rounds of Applause—Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler Wins Favor as a Soloist—Mr. Hambourg's Recital.

The programme for the seventh of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall last evening was:

Overture, "Egmont" ....Beethoven
Concerto for pianoforte, op. 16..........Grieg
Hungarian dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6.....Brahms
Symphony No. 3, in D-major, op. 29...... Tschaikowsky
(First time in Boston.)

The soloist was Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler. There was a very large audience.

Mr. Gericke gave a noble interpretation of the "Egmont" overture. It was solid, brilliant and impressive, and none the less interesting because it did not seek to discover new effects nor lay undue stress on trivial points in search of novel readings. The closing movement was wrought up with thrilling fire and emphasis. A stirring round of applause rewarded the effort.

A like success attended the performances of the Brahms dances. It is not easy to recall when they were ever before given here with the spirit, the effective accent and the graceful and fascinating piquancy that Mr. Gericke imparted to them, and the clearness and spontaneity with which the orchestra acquitted itself.

It can hardly be said that the presentation of the symphony added anything to the reputation of the composer, and is overshadowed immeasurably by the "Pathetique" in largeness of style, individual originality, depth of thought and skill in treatment. It is in five movements, of which the fourth, the scherzo, was omitted in this performance. The work is wholly clear as a first hearing, but with the exception of the second movement, which oscillates between a minuet and a German "laud-

No New Year's Table is complete without a bottle of Dr. Siegert's Angostura Bitters, the great South American tonic

---

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 3, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Tschaikowsky's Third Symphony the Novelty.

A Work Far Inferior to Those Following It.

Mrs. Zeisler Played Grieg's Piano Concerto.

By Philip Hale.

The program of the Seventh Symphony Concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Music Hall, last night, was as follows:

Overture "Egmont"...............Beethoven
Piano concerto in A minor...............Grieg
Hungarian Dances, 1, 2, 6............Brahms
Symphony No. 3, in D minor...Tschaikowsky
(First time in Boston.)

Tschaikowsky's third symphony was first played at Moscow, Nov. 19, 1875. The first performance in this country was at a concert of the Philharmonic Society of New York, Adolph Neuendorff conductor, Feb. 8, 1879. Tschaikowsky's "Francesca da Rimini" had been performed by this society Dec. 21, 1878; his "Romeo and Juliet" April 22, 1876, under Carl Bergmann. The third symphony was first played in London at the Queen's Hall, Henry J. Wood conductor, Sept. 27, 1899.

I yield to no one in my admiration for the genius of Tschaikowsky. I believe with Mr. Runciman that the "Pathetic" symphony is the most modern thing we have, and far more romantic than anything written by Weber, Berlioz, or Wagner. "As a voice, a new force in music neither Brahms nor Schumann can be compared with him other than unfavorably." And I feel with Mr. Runciman, when I hear his great works "the new throb, the new thrill."

Mr. Vernon Blackburne goes still farther, and I quote from the Pall Mall Gazette these words excited by the performance of the third symphony in London.

⁂

"The work has the greatness of Tschaikowsky upon its every page. This is one of the rare musicians who never leave you for a moment in doubt as to their worth in the bulk. A simple voluntary signed by Beethoven, for example, will in its brief exposition prove the wonder and the greatness of that signature; and we are fain to make the same comparison in regard to Tschaikowsky. Yet we are not prepared to say that this symphony is the utterance of the man at his tip-top best. That ineffable sixth symphony, that amazing fifth symphony (finer, but not so specially noble), remain to prove their superiority over every other composition set down by the same hand, dictated by the same brain. And yet it seems that it was impossible for Tschaikowsky to write without showing the mettle, the wondrous fibre in which his genius worked out its destiny. The Symphony in D, which Mr. Wood has just given to a London public for the first time, has wonderful openness and frankness in expression. Just listening to the quiet and sad moments of it you would say that, though its bravery was patent, its sorrow was a loose. The brilliance of its vitality, the wonder of its quickness, the fine open-air feeling of its bold and assured self-confidence, confront you at every point, save when the composer is pretending to cry, and then he is unconvincing. Is it not strange? Here is the man who in his ultimate work ran beyond the tears of even this sad time, who in the last movement of his last symphony showed the absolute unhappiness of the most unhappy possibility of an unhappy age, and in this earlier work you can scarce believe that the man is sincere unless he is deliberately laughing in your face. We do but record a personal impression, and therewith we confess our faith that this Russian composer was of the salt of the earth. Mr. Wood has been, during recent days, giving Tschaikowsky to London in various forms of composition in which he is practically unknown, and we have noted that each new production has only served to confirm the impression which we have recorded of the persistent and enduring element of greatness which abides in the very essence of this composer's work. It is a point on which we do well to insist. At this time we give our hours to wait for the performance of some work which we fear may prove less worthy of the composer than we had hoped. With the dead Tschaikowsky it is very different. Mr. Wood is proving to us almost day by day that we need have no such fear; that every phrase which the man completed, rounded, endued with his own fine temperament, became a living and moving utterance, a permanent influence, being, as it certainly was, the splendid expression of a rare and subtle spirit."

⁂

Now Mr. Blackburne is no fetish worshiper, nor is he a man inclined to accept blindly the work in bulk of any composer. I quote his words in full because they are criticism of a high order and because I was disappointed in the symphony.

It is true that we did not hear the scherzo, and it is not fair to judge of any symphony at first hearing, unless it is performed as the composer wrote it. After the work is known, cut as freely as you please, provided you cut out all that is tedious.

But to me the symphony was interesting chiefly on account of the suggestions and the premonitions of what Tschaikowsky did in later years.

What Mr. Blackburne first says is not true either of Beethoven or Tschaikowsky, or for that matter of Handel, Bach or Mozart. Nor do I find "greatness upon every page." On the contrary, there are prosaic and dull moments, and there are passages where the composer is evidently sparring for wind. The first movement is not distinguished by breadth, beauty of theme, or any striking orchestral device. It suffers from anxious development. It is as though Tschaikowsky had determined to be scholastic, to show what he had learned and to say it all in one movement. At the very start he arouses a mood and his method is peculiarly individual, but after the introduction the allegro is thematically commonplace and, for the most part, contrapuntally futile. The second movement "alla Tedesca," is not without a melancholy [illegible] but the composer did the same [illegible] much better in later works. The [illegible] movement with the exception of [illegible] preluding and the closing section is commonplace. As Mr. Blackburne says, "The composer is pretending to cry, and then he is unconvincing." The finale, [illegible] first movement, suffers from over-elaboration. No, I do not find Tschaikowsky, the gorgeous, the inspired Oriental that delighted in rhythm and color, I do not find the weaver of spells, the supreme nevrose in every page of this symphony. Nor can Mr. Blackburne with all his charm of language persuade me that the third symphony is "the splendid expression of a rare and subtle spirit."

⁂

The concert was extremely interesting. Mr. Gericke read the overture to "Egmont" without the exaggeration and the affectation dear to certain conductors. Wüllner and some others used to slacken the pace and thereby change the character of the sarabande measures containing the heavy chords which are fancied by lovers of panoramic music to depict the cruelty of Alva. Nikisch took all manner of sentimental liberties with the harmonies just before the coda. The straightforwardness, the simplicity, the naturalness of Mr. Gericke's reading made the overture all the more impressive. And how delightful were the dances by Brahms!

⁂

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler gave an admirable performance of Grieg's beautiful and effective concerto, a performance characterized in turn by brilliance, tenderness, and strength, a performance that was alive and glowing with romantic feeling.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, DEC. 3, 1899.

SEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The soloist at the symphony offering last week was that brilliant and strongly effective pianist, Mrs Fanny Bloomfield Zeisler. She is better worth hearing than ever. Her performance of Grieg's concerto in A minor, No. 16, gave excellent opportunity for the display of that wonderful technical skill and great power contrasted with marvelous daintiness of expression which mark her as one of the most noteworthy among the women artists of our time in pianoforte playing. The orchestra under Mr Gericke's baton accompanied Mme Bloomfield Zeisler in a most appreciative and thoroughly delightful way. Not without cause did the soloist make special acknowledgment to the skilled players and their watchful director at the close of the Norwegian's exacting concerto. With the audiences, the success of the artist as a matter of course was complete.

Beethoven's noble "Egmont" overture, nobly played, introduced the program. After the Grieg concerto—perhaps as a sort of relief for the heavy work to follow—three of Brahm's delightful Hungarian dances were given. The orchestra seemed to take delight in them as much as the auditors. Certainly they could not have found more graceful or more keenly appreciative interpretation. Originally composed for four hands on the piano, the author, in conjunction with Albert Parlow, has orchestrated these dances with rare skill. Symphony-goers gave enthusiastic evidence of liking them.

Tschaikowsky's symphony in D major, No. 29, was heard for the first time in this city. It is somewhat singular that, while the New York Philharmonic society gave it as long ago as Feb 7, 1879, Boston should have waited more than 20 years for an opportunity to hear it, considering the spread of the Tschaikowsky cult. It is certainly a long work for a symphony program, but it gives abundant proof of originality in treatment, and abounds in peculiar effects. The "elegiac theme," so to speak, in the third movement, is perhaps the most interesting episode. Coming from a Russian, it is not strange that, in this symphony, folk-song melodies are frequently introduced. These are treated in a very unique and unconventional way. Indeed, Tschaikowsky shows himself in his symphony steadily original and often interesting. As a matter of course the orchestra "worked as one" to bring out every possible effect.

Mme Marcella Sembrich is to be heard at the Symphony concerts this week and great assemblages may be counted upon. The artist is to sing an aria from Mozart's "Flight from the Seraglio." The orchestra's selections will be Dræseke's "Jubilee" overture (first time) three movements, from Berlioz' "Romeo and Juliet;" Johann Strauss' "Spring Voices" and Liszt's Rhapsody, No. 1, in F.

FADED TEXT

ston Transcript

MONDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1899

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Seventh Concert at Music Hall

The programme of the seventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, was:

Beethoven: Overture to Goethe's "Egmont," opus 84.
Grieg: Concerto for pianoforte, in A minor, opus 16.
Brahms: Three Hungarian Dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6. (Scored for orchestra by the composer and Parlow.)
Tchaikovsky: Symphony No. 3, in D major, opus 29. (First time in Boston.)

Mrs. Fanny Bloomfield-Zeisler was the pianist.

An admirable programme, but with one flaw in it; the listener was practically used up by the time the new Tchaikovsky symphony came, and could not give it the due freshness of attention. Yet it is easy to see that the four numbers could not well have been given in any other order. Beethoven's "Egmont" overture is as good to begin a concert with as to end it; it works equally well as an appetizer and as a final bouquet. But, if the symphony had come first, it would undoubtedly have killed the rest of the programme; besides, it would, in any case, have been hard on Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler to put so long a number before her appearance. If the symphony had come immediately after the concert, the Brahms dances would have made no effect at all. There was really no place for the symphony on the programme; although its general character harmonized perfectly well with that of the other numbers, its length and newness militated against its producing its legitimate effect without injuring something else. One may say, in general, that a new, unheard symphony should come regularly at the beginning of a concert; such a work demands that sort of attentive listening that can be given only when the audience is fresh. But, on the other hand, a long symphony should, in common decency, never come before a solo piece. The only way out of the difficulty seems to be to reserve entirely new symphonies for purely orchestral programmes; this is their proper place.

The "Egmont" overture was read and played to perfection; it was good to hear a true Beethovenish Allegro again, an Allegro robbed of none of its native dash and impetuosity by "modern," would-be-dignified moderation. And how well Mr. Gericke showed that he appreciated the true spirit of Wagner's suggestion about the second theme! He managed to accentuate the allusion to the opening saraband theme of the introduction, without breaking the back of the main tempo by undue dragging. Here was a "classical" reading that in no wise veiled the romantic and dramatic character of the work, and exhibited no taint of the merely academic.

The Brahms dances are old friends, and were welcomed as such. We have now heard six of this set of twenty-one—Mr. Paur gave Nos. 15, 17 and 21 five seasons ago—and it is curious to note how Brahms's genius for assimilation enabled him to reflect the true Magyar spirit with more faithful accuracy than Liszt ever did in his rhapsodies, with all his Hungarian blood. Mr. Gericke read the dances as only a Viennese could have done; they were the very thing itself! And how admirably the orchestra carried out his intention!

What can I say of the Tchaikovsky D major symphony? I have said already that such a work deserves to be listened to with fresh, untired ears. Mine were not fresh, and the impression I got was all too vague. One thing was evident: Tchaikovsky need not have signed his work; no one could have mistaken the authorship. But this symphony was an early work of the composer's; when he wrote it his genius had not soared up to the "Romeo and Juliet," "Pathétique" and E-flat minor quartet level. A good deal in the first and last movements speaks of festal pomp and joyousness, but with something of a suggestion of the perfunctoriness of "official" festivity. The Polacca theme of the finale has little character; it is more of a passage than a theme. To me Tchaikovsky here shows more strength in his working-out than in his thematic invention; many of the working-out passages are full of life and vigor, decidedly what the Germans call "gelungen." There is undeniable charm in the two middle movements—only four were given in all, the fourth being omitted—but they seem thoroughly unsymphonic in character. Upon the whole, one would like to hear this symphony again and under more favorable conditions. Persons fond of weighing New York against Boston may be interested to reflect upon the fact that this symphony was given in New York just twenty years ago, and we hear it for the first time now! But our pride can salve over this wound by considering that, twenty years ago, probably not one individual out of a hundred in any audience could understand two measures of the work.

Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler well maintains her record as a record breaker; every time she comes back to us she does better than the last. What she did last Saturday evening with the Grieg concerto calls for more than common notice. She not only did great work, but, as the event proved, had a great opportunity. This is worth thinking of.

Grieg's A minor concerto was first played in this city by Mr. Frederic Boscovitz at one of Theodore Thomas's concerts on Oct. 28, 1874; it was played again by Mr. William H. Sherwood at a symphony concert of the Harvard Musical Asociation on Jan. 3, 1878; Mr. Sherwood repeated it at one of the earliest concerts by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Mr. Henschel, in 1881 (I think, at the second concert; it was the first instrumental solo ever played in the series). At first the concerto made a tolerably brilliant impression, but somehow did not seem to wear well; people in general were pretty sniffy about it. The unfortunate resemblance between the theme of the first movement and the corresponding theme in Schumann's A minor concerto was undoubtedly for much in creating an impression that Grieg had not much of his [illegible] Moreover, it brought the con[illegible] comparison with Schumann's, [illegible] in a way not at all to its advantage. The concerto long stood in most people's minds as an intrinsically second-rate work; men like Mr. H. T. Finck, who saw true genius in it, were exceptional.

But now, after the course of Tchaikovsky, Rimski-Korsakoff, Richard Strauss, and other extreme modernists we have been through, and especially after last Saturday's performance of the work, with Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler at the pianoforte, and Mr. Gericke at the orchestral helm, we begin to see that, in the old Boscovitz and Sherwood days, this concerto of Grieg's was a good twenty years in advance of the times. We then took it quite by the wrong side, looked for things in it that were not there, and overlooked things that were. We can now see the work in an entirely different light; we have at last got abreast of it! After seeing what the Kneisels did with Grieg's G minor quartet, and comparing the effect they made with it with what the Listemanns had done years before, this need not seem particularly surprising. But the more masterly and sympathetic performances are not to be credited with the whole difference; the altered musical feeling of the public is for much in the matter. The G minor quartet and the A minor concerto have not only been shown to us as they really are, but we have acquired the capacity for appreciating them for what they are.

Last Saturday's performance of the concerto, by Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler and the orchestra, was indeed a wonder! Strange, too, in one way; for Grieg is one of the most inveterately masculine of men, and Mrs. Bloomfield pushes femininity of conception and feeling to extremes; she is not only a woman all through, but seems tacitly to acknowledge and glory in it; she never attempts to ape virility. But just herein lay the rare perfection of the situation: in the singular capacity of the very feminine woman of Southern blood for doing full justice to the work of the entirely masculine Northern man. Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler not only brought to light, but emphasized in no common way, the most essential gist of the pianoforte concerto, as a musical form; this is the diametrical oppositeness in character of the pianoforte and the orchestra. As a composer, Beethoven emphasized this as no concerto-writer ever has since; recognizing that the pianoforte could do best just what the orchestra could not, and vice versa. Beethoven would continually produce the most startling effects by letting each one of these two forces take the same theme, or passage, absolutely in its own way; one can say that, to do full justice to Beethoven's pianoforte concertos—especially to the great ones in G major and E-flat major—each one of these two forces must maintain its own individuality, even to the point of the pianist's having an apparently different conception of the work from the orchestral conductor. Each one has his own version of the thing to impress upon the listener.

How far Grieg has followed Beethoven in this I will not attempt to determine. But Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler accentuated the idea to perfection. Every time she came in with a pharse, after the orchestra had played it, she seemed to be saying: "No; not so, but so!" Her playing of the pianoforte part was like a rhapsody of her own on thoughts and feelings suggested by the orchestra. It was infinitely poetic! And Grieg, of all men, ought not to object; for this is just what he himself did, in his second pianoforte parts to Mozart sonatas, in which he made no attempt to imitate Mozart's style, but expressed his own modern Scandinavian feelings about Mozart's music entirely in his own modern Scandinavian way. I do not see how the intrinsic poetry of Grieg's concerto could have been better brought out than by Mrs. Bloomfield-Zeisler and Mr. Gericke. Between them, they gave the work as few of us may ever have the luck to hear it given again. The pianist had a complete triumph.

The next programme is: Draeseke, Jubilee overture (first time in Boston); Mozart, aria from "Die Entführung aus dem Serail;" Berlioz, three movements from the "Roméo et Juliette" symphony, opus 17; Johann Strauss, "Frühlingsstimmen;" Liszt, Hungarian rhapsody No. 1, in F. Mme. Sembrich will be the singer. W. F. A.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 10, 1899.

MME. MARCELLA SEMBRICH

The announcement that Mme. Sembrich of the Grau opera company would be the soloist at the eighth Symphony concert given in Music Hall last evening was sufficient to bring together one of the largest audiences ever seen at a Symphony concert in Boston, not only every seat, but all the standing room being occupied.

The orchestral numbers were also especially attractive, being the "Jubilee Overture" by Felix Draeseke (first time in Boston); three movements from Berlioz's Dramatic Symphony "Romeo and Juliet," op. 17, and Liszt's "Rhapsody No. 1," in F major.

Mme. Sembrich was heard in Mozart's aria "Che pur aspro al Cuore" from "il Seraglio" and recitative "Sediziose Voci" and aria "Casta Diva" from Bellini's "Norma."

Her performance last evening was well nigh faultless, and after each number the enthusiasm was remarkable. Recall followed recall, and the rule of "no extra numbers" was once more broken. Mme. Sembrich sang a selection with piano accompaniment by Mr. Gericke after her first number, and a waltz song with orchestral accompaniment, and a vocal mazurka with her own piano accompaniment.

The orchestra gave a fine performance of the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony, and the same can be said of the Liszt rhapsody.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this coming week. For the next time, Dec. 22 and 23, Paderewski will make his appearance in Beethoven's concerto in E flat No. 5.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 11, 1899.

The Symphony Concert — A Sembrich Night.

"C'est magnifique, mais ce n'est pas la Guerre!" Which being paraphased for this occasion, may be rendered,—it was all very jolly but it was not very symphonic.

There was a crowd present, limited only by the size of the hall, and a few hundred more admission tickets could have been sold, if the management had only known where to put the holders. It was quite evident that the multitude was not called together by a desire to hear Herr Draeseke's new overture. Nor did Berlioz or Liszt move these masses to any ecstatic manifestations of delight. It was Sembrich alone who drew such a gathering, and she received more applause than all the classical composers that have ever been heard in Music Hall.

There was a flavor of festivity over the entire programme, which began with a Jubilee overture, continued with a picture of the dancing at the Capulets (not to speak of the vocal numbers) and ended with the paprika of Liszt.

Draeseke's "Jubilee Overture" reminds by its title of the "Jubilee Overture" by Weber, and its climax brings in the German version of the English national anthem, somewhat in the way that Weber does. The work is well written but does not inspire the auditor, in spite of the large forces used, for the score is an exceptionally full one. The work was worth one hearing and strikes one as solid but not remarkable music.

Then came Sembrich, and the floodgates of enthusiasm were opened. The seldom heard aria—"Che pur Aspro al Cuore"—from Mozart's "Il Seraglio," was her first number. Weber said of this opera, "Here I see what the bright years of youth are to every man; a time of blossom and exuberance which be can never hope to reach again. As time goes on defects are eradicated, but with them many a charm is rooted up also. I venture to affirm that in this opera Mozart had reached the full maturity of his powers as an artist, and that his further progress was only in knowledge of the world. Of such operas as 'The Marriage of Figaro' and 'Don Giovanni' we might have had many more, but with all the desire in the world he never could have achieved another 'Seraglio.' "

What the most theatrical of great composers said of the whole opera is quite true of the aria here in question; it has defects, but it has also a certain exuberance that has its own peculiar charm, and declamation, bel canto, and fioritura, were all displayed in their turn in the showy work. At first there was a trace of effort in the work of the great singer, although the vocal fireworks were secure, even in the highest register; the signs of effort soon wore away and the lustre of the succeeding numbers was undimmed.

The concert was an exception to the general rule, and encores were not only permitted but prepared for. A piano was at hand although no piano work was upon the programme, and its mysterious presence was explained when Mr. Gericke sat down to accompany the first encore—Mozart's "Das Veilchen"—which was sung with an arch simplicity that was altogether delightful.

By the time her second great number was reached Mme. Sembrich was in her best voice, and the old scena from "Norma" became a vocal lesson of the highest order. The tenderness of "Casta Diva," the brilliancy of "Bello a me ritorno," made a contrast of much power. The audience responded to the display of vocal brilliancy with a rapturous series of recalls which passed all counting.

Finally the awaited encore came, this time Strauss's "Voices of Spring." From the style of this work we gather that the voices of Spring are in the very highest register and have had excellent vocal training. The final trill and high note sponged out all memory of the symphonic writers for the time being; cheers, actual cheers, such as a Bryan or a McKinley might evoke by crowns of thorns or skilful evasions of sound money statements, burst forth with astounding fervor.

A high note, like charity, may cover a multitude of sins, but here there were no vocal sins to cover; nevertheless the note was accepted at much more than its face value by the excited public. It has ever been so in music; even when both are present the public prefer the astonishing to the beautiful; in the old Greek games the trumpeter who stunned the audience with his power always received the prize, and more than one Hellenic vocalist died because of excessive exertion in his songs. We are not vastly different from the ancient Athenians; even in modern Athens the subtile points of Calve counted less than the pyrotechnic work of Sembrich.

But Sembrich is a musician to the finger-tips, and can shine in better schools than mere "agilita," and she immediately showed this by singing Chopin's "Wish" ("Were I a birdling") with much expression and in its original Polish.

And now we dismiss the great singer and her triumph and pass on to the orchestral adjuncts of this vocal concert. Three movements from Berlioz's very free symphony, "Romeo and Juliet" were performed. Wagner has said: "Whenever a composer attempts to be a painter in music, he will succeed in producing neither good music nor a good picture." But Berlioz has managed to do both in this symphony.

There was unquestionably an enjoyable social function at the Capulets according to this music, and if there was a melancholy oboe out in the garden, it did not mar the general festivities. This personification of Romeo's sadness was exquisitely played, and the pizzicato of the violoncellos was excellently balanced against it.

But at times Berlioz allows the demon of ingenuity to strangle the voice of spontaneous feeling; "He ciphered with notes," said Wagner, and the carefully planned union of the themes of the Larghetto and the Allegro in this movement goes far to prove the accusation true.

In the "Scene d'Amour," the musical portrayal of the famous balcony scene, there is more of true passion than we can find in any other of Berlioz's compositions. It is one of the many instances of a dialogue between two instruments representing a pair of lovers. Berlioz himself made several of these, notably the conversation between an English horn and an oboe (shepherd and shepherdess) in his Fantastic Symphony. Here we have Romeo as a violoncello, Juliet as violin and flute. "Music is Love in search of a word," says the poet (Sydney Lanier), and orchestral music comes very near to spoken words in this successful picture. The performance left nothing to be desired.

How grateful musicians ought to be that Shakespeare allowed Mercutio to speak of the "fairies' midwife" and her chariot of spinner's legs, grasshopper's wings and spider's web. It gives their entire orchestra a chance, and Gounod and Berlioz have seized their opportunity and set Queen Mab to remarkable music. The violins gave their long trills with much delicacy and the horns were the ideal of the horns of elfland.

The concert ended with a brilliant performance of the Liszt Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1, in F, in which flute and harp deserve especial mention, but all did well and brought a most exciting concert to an appropriately peppery end.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY GLOBE
DECEMBER 10. 1

SEMBRICH AT THE SYMPHHONY.

The atendance at Music hall, with Mme Sembrich as the distinguished soloist, was itself the most convincing demonstration of the popularity of the great artist in Boston. There were no vacant seats, and very litle unoccupied standing room when she appeared on the stage at the afternoon rehearsal, and if ever soloist "captured" her audience Sembrich did. She was in the best of spirits, and the best of voice, and to listen to her singing was always an unalloyed delight. Indeed, in grace, ease, fluency and daintiness of expression, she almost surpassed herself. For once, a great operatic artist found great opportunities on the concert stage.

So remarkable for purity of tone and consummate skill was her opening air, from Mozart's "Seraglio," with its wealth of fioriture music delightfully offered, that director Gericke and his artists joined in the plaudits which summoned Sembrich again and again. With charming grace the artist acceded to the insistent demand of her hearers, and gave a "taking" German song, to Mr Gericke's own accompaniment at the pianoforte.

For her second program selection, Mme Sembrich chose the celebrated air "Casta Diva," from Bellini's "Norma," with the preceding recitative. It scarcely need be noted that the florid music of Bellini was admirably adapted to display to the finest advantage the artist's voice, now to be heard at its best. Once moro she was recalled time and again, and with great enthusiasm, by director, players and audience. Her recall number, "Fruhlingsstimmen," by Johann Strauss, was sung con amore, disclosing new tone treasures, evidencing still further Mme Sembrich's marvellous ease in surmounting vocal difficulties, and her rare power in sympathetic expression. Such demonstrations of good will and regard as she won are gained seldom indeed on any stage, either in opera or concert.

The orchestra's selections were of unusual interest. A novelty opened the program—a "Jubilee" overture, by Felix Draeseke, composed for the celebration at Dresden, of the jubilee of the king of Saxony. It made an excellent impression. Perhaps those who believe in a real "Anglo-Saxon" alliance liked best the introduction of the melody of "God Save the Queen"—which certainly is quite as much Saxon as English.

Three movements from Berlioz' dramatic symphony "Romeo and Juliet" all interpreted with a sureness, certainty and poetic appreciation that could not well be surpassed—and the exacting Hungarian rhapsody No. 1, in F, by Franz Liszt, rounded out the purely orchestral selections. But despite all the brilliancy of the playing under Mr Gericke's guiding hand, Sembrich's high success overshadowed it all.

There will be no symphony rehearsal and concert this week, our famous orchestra being booked for triumphs elsewhere. Paderewski is engaged for soloist on the orchestra's reappearance here Dec 22-23. The great pianist is assigned Beethoven's cantata in E flat. The symphony in F by Cæsar Franck and Haydn's "Oxford" symphony are also to be heard.

—Madame Marcella Sembrich received an ovation Friday afternoon at the Symphony rehearsal. The house was crowded in every part, and the audience most enthusiastic. In response to repeated appearances after her first number, she responded with a German song, the accompaniment played upon the piano by Mr Gericke. After her second number, "Casta Diva," from Norma, she was recalled again and again, and for an encore sang an Italian aria, accompanied by the orchestra. Mme Sembrich was dressed in black net embroidered with big bouquets of pink roses, and her hat was black velvet, with white ostrich tips. A few in the audience were Mrs Montgomery Sears, Mrs John C. Fairchild, Mrs James H. Beal, Mrs Oliver W. Mink, Mrs William Hooper, Mrs Everett Morss, Mrs Francis H. Peabody, Mr Charles Gardner, Mr Eben D. Jordan, Mrs Philip H. Sears, Mrs Oliver Ames, Miss Elise Fay, Dr Sturgis Bigelow, Mrs Gertrude Franklin Salisbury, Mrs J. T. Batchelder, Mr Augustus Lowell, Mrs Pratt, Miss Minnie Ames, Miss Henrietta Dana and Mr James P. Stearns.

DECEMBER 10, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Jubilee Overture by Draesecke Heard Here for First Time.

Written at the Behest of the City of Dresden for the 70th Birthday of the King of Saxony—Mme. Sembrich's Singing Worthy of the Highest Admiration.

For the eighth of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, the programme was:

Jubilee overture.................Felix Draesecke
Aria, "Che pur aspro al cuore"..........Mozart
Three movements from "Romeo and Juliet."
Berlioz
Aria, "Casta Diva"....................Bellini
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1, in F..........Liszt

The soloist was Mme. Sembrich.

The auditorium was crowded to overflowing, those in attendance and occupying the standing room forming of themselves a fair-sized audience.

The overture, which was given for the first time in Boston, was written by order of the city of Dresden for the celebration of the 70th birthday and the 25 years' jubilee of the King of Saxony. The composer, who has attained to eminence in his own country, and who is over threescore years of age, is practically unknown here. The overture in question is his opus 65. It is, as the occasion called for, flamboyantly massive in character, and on the whole, much given up to noisiness, but it is exceedingly effective in its way, is richly and skilfully scored, and something better than the average run of compositions that are made to order. It shows admirable musicianship, especially in the "working out," and the closing climax is immensely exciting in its fire and its imposing body of tone. The performance accorded it was brilliant and stirring.

The movements selected from the Berlioz dramatic symphony were the festival in Capulet's palace, the balcony scene and the "Queen Mab" scherzo. Mr. Gericke's readings were exquisitely fine. Nothing more beautiful in regard to both interpretation and performance can be easily imagined than the treatment of the surpassingly poetic balcony scene. Conductor and players were in their best vein, and the result was an exemplification of the unequalled perfection to which the orchestra has attained. No less charming in its way was the conception and presentation of the tricksy, thistle-down scherzo. The whole vocabulary of praise might be justly bestowed upon the splendid emphasis and brilliancy with which the Liszt rhapsody was given

Of Mme. Sembrich's contribution to the concert it is impossible to write, except in a spirit of the most enthusiastic admiration. In all that she did, the skill, intelligence and discretion of the supreme were constantly in evidence. The Mozart aria is, perhaps, one of the most exacting demands ever made by composer on singer. It not only bristles with difficult vocal technique, but it lies almost constantly in the higher range of the voice, and rare, indeed, is the artist who goes through the ordeal of singing it without showing the fatigue consequent on the effort before it is half over. It not only requires a large sostenuto style, but faultless skill in flexible coloratur and facility in broad dramatic expression. Mme. Sembrich's performance of it showed her full and easy possession of all these requirements, and a superb artistic intelligence that, of all the eminent sopranos, who are heard here from time to time, appears to be her's alone. That the audience should have applauded her without limit and recalled her again and again was inevitable.

Then occurred a scene rare at these concerts, for the artist was permitted to respond to an encore, for which she gave Mozart's exquisitely perfect little song, "The Violet," which she sang with a tender simplicity and a grace of expression indescribably beautiful, and to which Mr. Gericke played the pianoforte accompaniment with infinite grace and delicacy. Her singing of "Casta Diva" was a faultless example of all that is pure, fascinating and moving in the art of singing. In style phrasing, perfection of legato and truth of intonation it was an object lesson of the highest value to every singer who may have heard it. The florid work of the second movement was done with consummate ease, flexibility and clearness. The performance compelled the audience to another frenzy of plaudits, which in turn compelled the artist to yield to another encore. This time she replied with Strauss' waltz-song, entitled "Fruhlingstimmen," written by the composer expressly for her. Her singing of it was by turns as dainty, as brilliant and as charmingly piquant as it was when she sang it here before, and it aroused fully as fervid an acclaim.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Symphony in F, by Cesar Francke; concerto for pianoforte in E flat, by Beethoven, and Oxford symphony in G, by Haydn. The soloist is to be Mr. Ignace Paderewski.

[illegible] have been expected with [illegible] Sembrich for the soloist, there was a crush, and a big one, at the Symphony rehearsal, Friday afternoon. The "rush" people were there hours before the doors were opened, patiently waiting in the cold. It was a splendid audience for the famous prima donna to sing to, and she evidently felt the inspiration, for she was in superb form. She wore black moire, on which were woven American Beauty roses, in clusters. The sleeves of the bodice were of jetted lace, and the square-cut yoke was filled with the same. Her toque, a [illegible] flat shape, was of black velvet [illegible] lace, with three white plumes [illegible] some handsome diamonds. [illegible] was recalled eight times [illegible] aria, and in response, [illegible] the accompaniment for [illegible] encore later on the [illegible] She sat in the front [illegible] the right balcony and stood the gaze of publicity with a great deal of aplomb. She was in black with white satin bodice over which a Persian lamb Eton jacket opened. Her white felt hat was covered with black plumes. The wife of the famous pianist would be picked out, we think, in a crowd anywhere for her decidedly attractive and distinguished appearance. She has dark hair and eyes with rich coloring. She is above medium height and rather thick set. Although not a young woman she gives the impression of having great vitality and perfect health.

Some of those in the crush Friday afternoon were the Hon. and Mrs. Charles S. Hamlin, just back from their visit at Mrs. Hamlin's home in Albany; Mr. George Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. Bayard Thayer, Mrs. Seth Sprague, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Storrow, Mrs. Gerard Bement, Mrs. Alfred Winsor, Mrs. Dudley Fay with her sister, Mrs. George Silsbee, Mrs. Augustus Lowell, Maj. H. L. Higginson, Mrs. Agassiz, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew C. Wheelwright, Mr. Joseph Tilton, Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Jordan, Mrs. Dumaresq, Mr. and Mrs. Franz Zerrahn, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mr. James P. Stearns, Dr. Sturgis Bigelow, Miss Mary Coolidge, Mrs. F. R. Spalding, Mr. Weldon Hunt, Mrs. John Osborn, the Rev. Fr. Bodfish, Mr. and Mrs. George Inches, Dr. Lawrence, Mr. Edmund Dwight and Mrs. Apthorp. Mme. Nordica, who dropped in to hear Mme. Sembrich, of whom she is personally very fond, was magnificent in her broadcloth costume with her splendid silver fox furs. Last night for the Symphony concert Mme. Sembrich wore pink moire, with hand-painted roses and lace, a Parisian built costume which was very smart. Her jewels were diamonds and sapphires. There will be no rehearsal or concert this week. For the next Paderewski will be the soloist.

Mr. and Mrs. F. R. Comee entertained a party of 18 at their apartments at the Charlesgate on Friday evening, to celebrate their wooden wedding. Supper was served at the University Club.

The Boston Traveler
Dec 11
Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.
307 Washington Street.

THE SYMPHONY.

Unprecedented Enthusiasm Over Mme. Sembrich, the Soloist—First Boston Performance of Draeseke's "Jubilee" Overture.

Nineteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eighth concert. Marcella Sembrich, soloist. The programme:

Jubilee Overture..........................Draeseke
(First time in Boston.)
Aria, "Che pur aspro al cuore," from
"Il Seraglio"................................Mozart
Three Movements from the Dramatic
Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"........Berlioz
I. Romeo alone; Grand Fete at
Capulet's House.
II. Balcony scene.
III. Queen Mab, Scherzo.
Recitative, "Sediziose voci," and Aria,
"Casta Diva," from "Norma"..........Bellini
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1, in F............Liszt

The last time that Mme. Sembrich sang in Music Hall was on the afternoon of Nov. 26, 1897 There was a beggarly audience present, an audience of insulting size for an artist of her great reputation and worth. She had sung in the same place three days before, so the excuse that she had long been abroad was not valid. She was as fine a singer then as now. On Saturday evening her appearance filled every seat in the auditorium and packed the outer aisles to suffocation. And why? Because Mme. Sembrich has since 1897 obtained a resounding New York reputation as an operatic star. These facts are a sufficient commentary on Boston's claim to being a "musical" city.

Of course, Mme. Sembrich deserved all the outpouring of enthusiasm that was hers. She sang the difficult Mozart aria with marvelous beauty of phrasing, purity of tone and brilliancy of execution. An extraordinary scene followed. The audience—a Symphony audience—became tumultuous, and that rare thing, an encore, was inevitable. It took the form of a Mozart song, "The Violet," most beautifully done. Later, after a glowing performance of the "Casta Diva," Mme. Sembrich gave the Strauss walt song, "Fruhlings-stimmern," in the most airy and fascinating style. Still the people would not let her go, and she added Chopin's Polish song, "Were I a Birdling," to her own piano accompaniment.

Although Sembrich overshadowed all else, there were other stirring things on the programme. Draeseke's overture was an honest and hearty piece of writing, with some rich and sonorous orchestration and clever handling of the theme variously known as "America," "God Save the Queen," and a German air. It is not great music, yet time was by no means wasted in listening to it.

The beautiful and poetic "Romeo and Juliet" music of Berlioz, by the side of which Gounod's stuff sounds poor and mean, was played with the utmost elegance and depth of sentiment, and the Liszt rhapsody had a fine and inspiring reading. It was a concert to be remembered.

WILDER D. QUINT.

The program of the eighth Symphony concert in Music Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Jubilee Overture..........................Draeseke
(First time in Boston.)
Aria, "Che pur aspro al cuore," from
"Il Seraglio"................................Mozart
Three Movements from the Dramatic
Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"..
Berlioz
I. Romeo alone; Grand Fete at
Capulet's House.
II. Balcony scene.
III. Queen Mab, Scherzo.
Recitative, "Sediziose voci," and Aria,
"Casta Diva," from "Norma"....Bellini
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1, in F.......Liszt
(Scored for Orchestra by the Composer and Doppler.)

The Jubilee Overture was written by order of the city of Dresden for the celebration of the 70th birthday and the 25 years' jubilee of the King of Saxony. It sounds as though it had been written to order. I wonder if the King really enjoyed it?

Perhaps he liked the tune "Wer ist der Ritter hochgeehrt," which the composer took from Marschner's "Templer und Jüdin." And he surely recognized his national hymn, which was orchestrated so that it sounded like "America" sung by the spectators at a foot ball game. Draeseke worked hard. I hope he was suitably rewarded.

The beautiful music by Berlioz was undoubtedly too long for those who wished to hear "Casta Diva." It was Sembrich's night. I doubt if even the pious Brahmsite would have listened patiently to a symphony by the Master between the arias.

It is a rare pleasure to hear Sembrich sing anything—and yet what an intrinsically dull tune that aria of Mozart is! Such airs have gone into the limbo, where the singers of that period may be found with their illustrious predecessors, the male sopranos, and the "first men", and the various gentlemen that trilled so admirably. The little song of Mozart that followed—that cameo cantata—is worth a wilderness of such arias. "Casta Diva" is still beautiful—when it is sung by Sembrich, and as it is on the printed page.

Yes, it was a prima donna night. The encores had been rehearsed, and after Sembrich had added Johann Strauss's "Fruehlings stimmen" to the program, she sang to her own accompaniment a Polish song of Chopin that is now chiefly known through Liszt's transcription.

And what shall be said of the incomparable mistress of bel canto at this late day! She must be sick of praise. You know her charm, the exquisite finish of her art. You realize that this singer is an accomplished musician. And you also feel that here is no icy brilliance, no vainglorious dazzle. The tones are the tones of a woman of flesh and blood, not of a machine which is the triumph of a singing master, and which is exhibited for a medal at a world's fair or attracts attention in a freak museum. And it is this sweet and gracious and generous womanhood that distinguishes Marcella Sembrich and sets her apart in affairs of coloratura.

⁂

There will be no concert next week. The program of the concert Dec. 23 will include César Franck's symphony in F.; Beethoven's piano concerto in E flat (Mr. Paderewski, pianist); Haydn's Oxford symphony in G.

Philip Hale.

NEW MUSIC HALL.

Rapid Progress on the Structure at Corner of Massachusetts and Huntington Avenues.

Work upon the new Music Hall building at the corner of Massachusetts Avenue and Huntington Avenue has progressed rapidly in the last month. Foundations have been completed some time, the wall on the Massachusetts Avenue side of the structure is raised to its height and the cornice is in place. On the other sides the walls are rapidly nearing completion. The iron framework for the first floor is in place and half the framework for the second floor is up.

The stone steps leading to the main entrance from the sidewalk on Huntington Avenue are in place, but are covered with planks to save chipping which might result from the constant moving of heavy objects over them. The eight stone pillars at the main entrance are in position, and stone cutters are now carving the capitals. All staging which is necessary in building the roof is practically finished and towers far above the walls. A temporary roof of planks is being put together in anticipation of early snowstorms and to allow the inside work to go on uninterrupted.

DECEMBER 11, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The eighth Symphony Concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Draeseke: Jubel-Ouvertüre (first time in Boston).
Mozart: Aria, "Che pur aspro al cuore," from "Il Seraglio."
Berlioz: Three Movements from the Dramatic Symphony, "Roméo et Juliette," opus 17.
Bellini: Resitative, "Sediziose voci," and Aria, "Casta Diva," from "Norma."
Liszt: Rhapsodie hongroise No. 1, in F.
Mme. Sembrich was the singer.

Draesek's overture, written by order of the city of Dresden for the seventieth birthday of the king of Saxony, turns out to be, like many another occasional composition, pretty weak. The music in itself is dull, and the orchestration singularly ineffective; toward the end there are one or two snatches of "Heil dir im Siegerskranz" (alias, "God Save the Queen") which one would have thought harmonised by some very chauvin Frenchman—out of revenge for 1870.

The movements from Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette" were exquisitely played, especially the adagio and the "Reine Mab"; the allegro ("Fete chez Capulet") was given with the highest finish, but, as it seemed to me, rather dryly; there was a certain primness of accent, and the thing lacked dash and brilliancy. But the wonderful balcony scene was shown forth in all its gracious poetry; what a haunting theme that is! and what a picture the movement presents to the inner eye!

The Mozart aria—written at twenty-five—is a wonderful combination of bravura and dramatic fire; one might call it dramatized bravura. Mme. Sembrich sang it in a way that was simply marvellous; never had the perfection of her art shown itself in a finer light; her singing was at once forcibly dramatic and thoroughly musical; a more exhaustive conception and execution could hardly be imagined. Of course, everyone, Mr. Gericke included, knew beforehand that there would be no getting through with Mme. Sembrich without encores; so the usual Symphony Orchestra rule had to be waived, and the greedy audience allowed to hear its fill. She sang Mozart's "Das Veilchen" as only she sings it. Equally fine, on a somewhat higher plane of poetic feeling, was her singing of Bellini's "Casta Diva." That wondrous melody, so full of genius and beauty, had long been lacking to the glory of our concerts; it was good to have it sung at last—and sung as gloriously as it was by Mme. Sembrich. It was a pity, though, to have it so ruthlessly pruned down for concert use. The flute ritornello to the savatina could well be spared; it takes the moonlight of the stage duly to emphasize the poetry of that solitary flute tone. But those entrancing choral intermezzi, with their melodious waves rising and falling beneath the sparkle of the singer's fioriture, are sadly missed. Of course they were omitted on account of there being no chorus. But it seems to me that, in view of the true greatness of this wonderful aria, and of the infrequency with which the opera itself is given on the stage nowadays, a really worthy concert arrangement might be made of it by some congenial adept in orchestration. Bellini's scoring might be duly reenforced in these intermezzi, to make up for the absence of a chorus, and the aria thus given entire. It is worth thinking of. The applause after the aria was so persistent that Mme. Sembrich had to give another encore piece; this time the Strauss waltz originally announced on the programme, the same one with which she turned all heads in the music lesson in the "Barbiere" last year. Her singing of it was again a wonder. After it I left the hall, to go to the Boston Theatre and get a taste of Mozart's "Don Giovanni"; but, as matters looked when I left, Mme. Sembrich seemed to be in for still another encore.

W. F. A.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROGRAMS.

New York, Wednesday Afternoon, December 13, 1899.

Overture, Egmont................................Beethoven
Concerto for violoncello..............................Dvorák
Three movements from Romeo and Juliet..........Berlioz
Rhapsody No. 1, in F....................................Liszt
Soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

New York, Thursday Evening, December 14, 1899.

Overture to the legend of The Fair Melusina,
op. 32..Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin, Nights in the Ukrain.........Loeffler
(First time.)
Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, op. 28........R. Strauss
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 36............Beethoven
Soloist, Franz Kneisel.

Itinerary.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, to-day, December 13, at 2:30.
Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, December 14, at 8 P. M.
Concert at Academy of Music, December 15, at 8:15 P. M., Philadelphia.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 16, at 8 P. M.
Infantry Hall, Providence, Wednesday evening, December 20.
Music Hall, Boston, Friday afternoon, December 22.
Music Hall, Boston, Saturday evening, December 23.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 163.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Jubilee Overture by Draesecke Heard Here for First Time.

Written at the Behest of the City of Dresden for the 70th Birthday of the King of Saxony—Mme. Sembrich's Singing Worthy of the Highest Admiration.

For the eighth of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, the programme was:

Jubilee overture..............Felix Draesecke
Aria, "Che pur aspro al cuore"..........Mozart
Three movements from "Romeo and Juliet."
Berlioz
Aria, "Casta Diva"......................Bellini
Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1, in F.........Liszt

The soloist was Mme. Sembrich.

The auditorium was crowded to overflowing, those in attendance and occupying the standing room forming of themselves a fair-sized audience.

The overture, which was given for the first time in Boston, was written by order of the city of Dresden for the celebration of the 70th birthday and the 25 years' jubilee of the King of Saxony. The composer, who has attained to eminence in his own country, and who is over threescore years of age, is practically unknown here. The overture in question is his opus 65. It is, as the occasion called for, flamboyantly massive in character, and on the whole, much given up to noisiness, but it is exceedingly effective in its way, is richly and skilfully scored, and something better than the average run of compositions that are made to order. It shows admirable musicianship, especially in the "working out," and the closing climax is immensely exciting in its fire and its imposing body of tone. The performance accorded it was brilliant and stirring.

The movements selected from the Berlioz dramatic symphony were the festival in Capulet's palace, the balcony scene and the "Queen Mab" scherzo. Mr. Gericke's readings were exquisitely fine. Nothing more beautiful in regard to both interpretation and performance can be easily imagined than the treatment of the surpassingly poetic balcony scene. Conductor and players were in their best vein, and the result was an exemplification of the unequalled perfection to which the orchestra has attained. No less charming in its way was the conception and presentation of the tricksy, thistle-down scherzo. The whole vocabulary of praise might be justly bestowed upon the splendid emphasis and brilliancy with which the Liszt rhapsody was given

Of Mme. Sembrich's contribution to the concert it is impossible to write, except in a spirit of the most enthusiastic admiration. In all that she did, the skill, intelligence and discretion of the supreme were constantly in evidence. The Mozart aria is, perhaps, one of the most exacting demands ever made by composer on singer. It not only bristles with difficult vocal technique, but it lies almost constantly in the higher range of the voice, and rare, indeed, is the artist who goes through the ordeal of singing it without showing the fatigue consequent on the effort before it is half over. It not only requires a large sostenuto style, but faultless skill in flexible coloratur and facility in broad dramatic expression. Mme. Sembrich's performance of it showed her full and easy possession of all these requirements, and a superb artistic intelligence that, of all the eminent sopranos, who are heard here from time to time, appears to be her's alone. That the audience should have applauded her without limit and recalled her again and again was inevitable.

Then occurred a scene rare at these concerts, for the artist was permitted to respond to an encore, for which she gave Mozart's exquisitely perfect little song, "The Violet," which she sang with a tender simplicity and a grace of expression indescribably beautiful, and to which Mr. Gericke played the pianoforte accompaniment with infinite grace and delicacy. Her singing of "Casta Diva" was a faultless example of all that is pure, fascinating and moving in the art of singing. In style phrasing, perfection of legato and truth of intonation it was an object-lesson of the highest value to every singer who may have heard it. The florid work of the second movement was done with consummate ease, flexibility and clearness. The performance compelled the audience to another frenzy of plaudits, which in turn compelled the artist to yield to another encore. This time she replied with Strauss' waltz-song, entitled "Fruhlingstimmen," written by the composer expressly for her. Her singing of it was by turns as dainty, as brilliant and as charmingly piquant as it was when she sang it here before, and it aroused fully as fervid an acclaim.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The next programme is: Symphony in F, by Cesar Francke; concerto for pianoforte in E flat, by Beethoven, and Oxford symphony in G, by Haydn. The soloist is to be Mr. Ignace Paderewski.

As might have been expected with Mme. Sembrich for the soloist, there was a crush, and a big one, at the Symphony rehearsal, Friday afternoon. The "rush" people were there hours before the doors were opened, patiently waiting in the cold. It was a splendid audience for the famous prima donna to sing before, and she evidently felt the inspiration, for she was in superb form. She wore black moire, on which were woven American Beauty roses, in clusters. The sleeves of the bodice were of jetted lace, and the square-cut yoke was filled with the same. Her toque, a broad, flat shape, was of black velvet and white lace, with three white plumes. She wore some handsome diamonds. Mme. Sembrich was recalled eight times after the first aria, and in response, Gericke played the accompaniment for her song. For the encore later on she Second in interest that afternoon to Mme. Sembrich was Mme. Paderewski. She sat in the front row in the right balcony and stood the gaze of publicity with a great deal of aplomb. She was in black with white satin bodice over which a Persian lamb Eton jacket opened. Her white felt hat was covered with black plumes. The wife of the famous pianist would be picked out, we think, in a crowd anywhere for her decidedly attractive and distinguished appearance. She has dark hair and eyes with rich coloring. She is above medium height and rather thick set. Although not a young woman she gives the impression of having great vitality and perfect health.

Some of those in the crush Friday afternoon were the Hon. and Mrs. Charles S. Hamlin, just back from their visit at Mrs. Hamlin's home in Albany; Mr. George Putnam, Mr. and Mrs. Bayard Thayer, Mrs. Seth Sprague, Mr. and Mrs. Charles Storrow, Mrs. Gerard Bement, Mrs. Alfred Winsor, Mrs. Dudley Fay with her sister, Mrs. George Silsbee, Mrs. Augustus Lowell, Maj. H. L. Higginson, Mrs. Agassiz, Mr. and Mrs. Charles P. Curtis, Mrs. Matthew Luce, Mr. and Mrs. Andrew C. Wheelwright, Mr. Joseph Tilton, Mr. and Mrs. E. D. Jordan, Mrs. Dumaresq, Mr. and Mrs. Franz Zerrahn, Mr. Carl Zerrahn, Mr. James P. Stearns, Dr. Sturgis Bigelow, Miss Mary Coolidge, Mrs. F. R. Spalding, Mr. Weldon Hunt, Mrs. John Osborn, the Rev. Fr. Bodfish, Mr. and Mrs. George Inches; Dr. Lawrence, Mr. Edmund Dwight and Mrs. Apthorp. Mme. Nordica, who dropped in to hear Mme. Sembrich, of whom she is personally very fond, was magnificent in her broadcloth costume with her splendid silver fox furs. Last night for the Symphony concert Mme. Sembrich wore pink moire, with hand-painted roses and lace, a Parisian built costume which was very smart. Her jewels were diamonds and sapphires. There will be no rehearsal or concert this week. For the next Paderewski will be the soloist.

Mr. and Mrs. F. R. Comee entertained a party of 18 at their apartments at the Charlesgate on Friday evening, to celebrate their wooden wedding. Supper was served at the University Club.

The Boston Traveler
Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.
307 Washington Street.

Dec 11

THE SYMPHONY.

Unprecedented Enthusiasm Over Mme. Sembrich, the Soloist—First Boston Performance of Draeseke's "Jubilee" Overture.

Nineteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; eighth concert. Marcella Sembrich, soloist.

The programme:
Jubilee Overture........................Draeseke
(First time in Boston.)
Aria, "Che pur aspro al cuore," from
"Il Seraglio".............................Mozart
Three Movements from the Dramatic
Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"........Berlioz
I. Romeo alone; Grand Fete at
Capulet's House.
II. Balcony scene.
III. Queen Mab, Scherzo.
Recitative, "Sediziose voci," and Aria,
"Casta Diva," from "Norma"........Bellini
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1, in F..........Liszt

The last time that Mme. Sembrich sang in Music Hall was on the afternoon of Nov. 26, 1897 There was a beggarly audience present, an audience of insulting size for an artist of her great reputation and worth. She had sung in the same place three days before, so the excuse that she had long been abroad was not valid. She was as fine a singer then as now. On Saturday evening her appearance filled every seat in the auditorium and packed the outer aisles to suffocation. And why? Because Mme. Sembrich has since 1897 obtained a resounding New York reputation as an operatic star. These facts are a sufficient commentary on Boston's claim to being a "musical" city.

Of course, Mme. Sembrich deserved all the outpouring of enthusiasm that was hers. She sang the difficult Mozart aria with marvelous beauty of phrasing, purity of tone and brilliancy of execution. An extraordinary scene followed. The audience—a Symphony audience—became tumultuous, and that rare thing, an encore, was inevitable. It took the form of a Mozart song, "The Violet," most beautifully done. Later, after a glowing performance of the "Casta Diva," Mme. Sembrich gave the Strauss walt song, "Fruhlings-stimmern," in the most airy and fascinating style. Still the people would not let her go, and she added Chopin's Polish song, "Were I a Birdling," to her own piano accompaniment.

Although Sembrich overshadowed all else, there were other stirring things on the programme. Draesoke's overture was an honest and hearty piece of writing, with some rich and sonorous orchestration and clever handling of the theme variously known as "America," "God Save the Queen," and a German air. It is not great music, yet time was by no means wasted in listening to it.

The beautiful and poetic "Romeo and Juliet" music of Berlioz, by the side of which Gounod's stuff sounds poor and mean, was played with the utmost elegance and depth of sentiment, and the Liszt rhapsody had a fine and inspiring reading. It was a concert to be remembered.

WILDER D. QUINT.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 10, 1899.

The program of the eighth Symphony concert in Music Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Jubilee Overture........................Draeseke
(First time in Boston.)
Aria, "Che pur aspro al cuore," from
"Il Seraglio"..........................Mozart
Three Movements from the Dramatic
Symphony, "Romeo and Juliet"..
Berlioz
I. Romeo alone; Grand Fete at
Capulet's House.
II. Balcony scene.
III. Queen Mab, Scherzo.
Recitative, "Sediziose voci," and Aria,
"Casta Diva," from "Norma"....Bellini
Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1, in F........Liszt
(Scored for Orchestra by the Composer and Doppler.)

The Jubilee Overture was written by order of the city of Dresden for the celebration of the 70th birthday and the 25 years' jubilee of the King of Saxony. It sounds as though it had been written to order. I wonder if the King really enjoyed it?

Perhaps he liked the tune "Wer ist der Ritter hochgeehrt," which the composer took from Marschner's "Templer und Jüdin." And he surely recognized his national hymn, which was orchestrated so that it sounded like "America" sung by the spectators at a foot ball game. Draeseke worked hard. I hope he was suitably rewarded.

The beautiful music by Berlioz was undoubtedly too long for those who wished to hear "Casta Diva." It was Sembrich's night. I doubt if even the pious Brahmsite would have listened patiently to a symphony by the Master between the arias.

It is a rare pleasure to hear Sembrich sing anything—and yet what an intrinsically dull tune that aria of Mozart is! Such airs have gone into the limbo, where the singers of that period may be found with their illustrious predecessors, the male sopranos, and the "first men", and the various gentlemen that trilled so admirably. The little song of Mozart that followed—that cameo cantata—is worth a wilderness of such arias. "Casta Diva" is still beautiful—when it is sung by Sembrich, and as it is on the printed page.

Yes, it was a prima donna night. The encores had been rehearsed, and after Sembrich had added Johann Strauss's "Fruehlings stimmen" to the program she sang to her own accompaniment a Polish song of Chopin that is now chiefly known through Liszt's transcription.

And what shall be said of the incomparable mistress of bel canto at this late day! She must be sick of praise. You know her charm, the exquisite finish of her art. You realize that this singer is an accomplished musician. And you also feel that here is no icy brilliance, no vainglorious dazzle. The tones are the tones of a woman of flesh and blood, not of a machine which is the triumph of a singing master, and which is exhibited for a medal at a world's fair or attracts attention in a freak museum. And it is this sweet and gracious and generous womanhood that distinguishes Marcella Sembrich and sets her apart in affairs of coloratura.

* * *

There will be no concert next week. The program of the concert Dec. 23 will include César Franck's symphony in F.; Beethoven's piano concerto in E flat (Mr. Paderewski, pianist); Haydn's Oxford symphony in G.

Philip Hale.

NEW MUSIC HALL.

Rapid Progress on the Structure at Corner of Massachusetts and Huntington Avenues.

Work upon the new Music Hall building at the corner of Massachusetts Avenue and Huntington Avenue has progressed rapidly in the last month. Foundations have been completed some time, the wall on the Massachusetts Avenue side of the structure is raised to its height and the cornice is in place. On the other sides the walls are rapidly nearing completion. The iron framework for the first floor is in place and half the framework for the second floor is up.

The stone steps leading to the main entrance from the sidewalk on Huntington Avenue are in place, but are covered with planks to save chipping which might result from the constant moving of heavy objects over them. The eight stone pillars at the main entrance are in position, and stone cutters are now carving the capitals. All staging which is necessary in building the roof is practically finished and towers far above the walls. A temporary roof of planks is being put together in anticipation of early snowstorms and to allow the inside work to go on uninterrupted.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1899

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The eighth Symphony Concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Draeseke: Jubel-Ouvertüre (first time in Boston).
Mozart: Aria, "Che pur aspro al cuore," from "Il Seraglio."
Berlioz: Three Movements from the Dramatic Symphony, "Roméo et Juliette," opus 17.
Bellini: Recitative, "Sediziose voci," and Aria, "Casta Diva," from "Norma."
Liszt: Rhapsodie hongroise No. 1, in F.
Mme. Sembrich was the singer.

Draesek's overture, written by order of the city of Dresden for the seventieth birthday of the king of Saxony, turns out to be, like many another occasional composition, pretty weak. The music in itself is dull, and the orchestration singularly ineffective; toward the end there are one or two snatches of "Heil dir im Siegerskranz" (alias, "God Save the Queen") which one would have thought harmonised by some very chauvin Frenchman—out of revenge for 1870.

The movements from Berlioz's "Roméo et Juliette" were exquisitely played, especially the adagio and the "Reine Mab"; the allegro ("Fete chez Capulet") was given with the highest finish, but, as it seemed to me, rather dryly; there was a certain primness of accent, and the thing lacked dash and brilliancy. But the wonderful balcony scene was shown forth in all its gracious poetry; what a haunting theme that is! and what a picture the movement presents to the inner eye!

The Mozart aria—written at twenty-five—is a wonderful combination of bravura and dramatic fire; one might call it dramatized bravura. Mme. Sembrich sang it in a way that was simply marvellous; never had the perfection of her art shown itself in a finer light; her singing was at once forcibly dramatic and thoroughly musical; a more exhaustive conception and execution could hardly be imagined. Of course, everyone, Mr. Gericke included, knew beforehand that there would be no getting through with Mme. Sembrich without encores; so the usual Symphony Orchestra rule had to be waived, and the greedy audience allowed to hear its fill. She sang Mozart's "Das Veilchen" as only she sings it. Equally fine, on a somewhat higher plane of poetic feeling, was her singing of Bellini's "Casta Diva." That wondrous melody, so full of genius and beauty, had long been lacking to the glory of our concerts; it was good to have it sung at last—and sung as gloriously as it was by Mme. Sembrich. It was a pity, though, to have it so ruthlessly pruned down for concert use. The flute ritornello to the cavatina could well be spared; it takes the moonlight of the stage duly to emphasize the poetry of that solitary flute tone. But those entrancing choral intermezzi, with their melodious waves rising and falling beneath the sparkle of the singer's fioriture, are sadly missed. Of course they were omitted on account of there being no chorus. But it seems to me that, in view of the true greatness of this wonderful aria, and of the infrequency with which the opera itself is given on the stage nowadays, a really worthy concert arrangement might be made of it by some congenial adept in orchestration. Bellini's scoring might be duly reenforced in these intermezzi, to make up for the absence of a chorus, and the aria thus given entire. It is worth thinking of. The applause after the aria was so persistent that Mme. Sembrich had to give another encore piece; this time the Strauss waltz originally announced on the programme, the same one with which she turned all heads in the music lesson in the "Barbiere" last year. Her singing of it was again a wonder. After it I left the hall, to go to the Boston Theatre and get a taste of Mozart's "Don Giovanni"; but, as matters looked when I left, Mme. Sembrich seemed to be in for still another encore.

W. F. A.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

PROGRAMS.

New York, Wednesday Afternoon, December 13, 1899.
Overture, Egmont..............................Beethoven
Concerto for violoncello............................Dvorák
Three movements from Romeo and Juliet..........Berlioz
Rhapsody No. 1, in F.................................Liszt
Soloist, Alwin Schroeder.

New York, Thursday Evening, December 14, 1899.
Overture to the legend of The Fair Melusina,
op. 32.................................Mendelssohn
Concerto for violin, Nights in the Ukrain.........Loeffler
(First time.)
Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks, op. 28........R. Strauss
Symphony No. 2, in D major, op. 36............Beethoven
Soloist, Franz Kneisel.

Itinerary.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Matinee at Carnegie Hall, to-day, December 13, at 2:30.
Concert at Carnegie Hall, Thursday evening, December 14, at 8 P. M.
Concert at Academy of Music, December 15, at 8:15 P. M., Philadelphia.
Concert at Academy of Music, Brooklyn, Saturday, December 16, at 8 P. M.
Infantry Hall, Providence, Wednesday evening, December 20.
Music Hall, Boston, Friday afternoon, December 22.
Music Hall, Boston, Saturday evening, December 23.

[illegible] LEDGER

Tuesday, Dec. 12, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The usual large and enthusiastic audience again greeted the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening. The opening number—Brahms's Symphony No. 4, in E minor—was delightfully played throughout, with slight exceptions on occasions in the first allegro movement, where the perfect unison one has come to associate with the famed orchestra was not fully maintained. In the Andante movement, however, the full beauty of the exquisitely soft and ever recurring theme was magnificently developed, and in the joyous allegro following on, strings and wind were as one.

The soloist for the occasion was the well known and ever popular Mr. Alwin Schroeder, and the selection for violoncello and orchestra was Dvorak's concerto in B minor. As one of the last compositions written by Dr. Dvorak before leaving this country, it bears double attraction in being heard for the first time at these concerts, and as the soloist was also an intimate friend of the composer, he not only helped him greatly in many of the bravura passages, but also wrote many of them himself.

In the second movement, Adagio in G major, the theme developed and caught up again and again by wind and strings is exceedingly beautiful and decidedly the centre of attraction in the concerto. Mr. Schroeder's playing left nothing to be desired, and he was enthusiastically recalled time and again. Richard Strauss's Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks sounded both mischievous and merry, a capricious mixture of broad fun and soft pathetic strain of volkslied. An interesting text, too, as to the possibilities of orchestral gymnastics. The closing number, Felix Draesecke's Jubilee Overture, in D major, composed and performed in Dresden on the occasion of the twenty-five years' jubilee of the King of Saxony, is martially noisy. The introduction of the air familiar to all here as America, and also England's national air, rather neutralized its claim to novelty, being heard here for the first time.

On the whole, too much of one school, and the programme of the coming Friday concert promises welcome variety.

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, DEC. 14, 1899.

Boston Orchestra's Second Afternoon Concert — Gossip of the Theatre.

The second concert of the afternoon series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The audience was not what one is accustomed to see at the entertainments of this organization. It was by no means as large as a concert of this kind deserves, and the only inference was that the business of Christmas shopping was too strong an opposition to the delicate art of music. The programme was a sufficiently good one to have drawn a larger audience in the better part of the Winter. The orchestral numbers were the "Egmont" overture of Beethoven, the familiar three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony of Berlioz (perhaps intended as an introduction to the approaching opera season,) and the first Hungarian rhapsody of Liszt. The solo piece was the violoncello concerto of Antonin Dvorak, with Alwin Schroeder as the soloist.

The Dvorak concerto had not been played before at these concerts, though it had been performed by Mr. Schroeder in this city. It is not a composition that lends itself to the memory, however, for it is written in a style which puts the solo instrument into the background rather than pushes it forward. In spite of the fact that Mr. Schroeder himself assisted the composer in the preparation of the work and wrote some of the passages himself, it cannot be said that the music is altogether favorable to the display of the 'cello. The themes are largely treated by the orchestra, and, while this gives a peculiar richness to the score, it does not make the solo part one in which a virtuoso is likely to make a pronounced success. Mr. Schroeder is such a fine artist that when he is not at his best it is an occasion for the expression of sympathy and not of annoyance. Yesterday he did not do himself justice. He played sadly out of tune in much of the first movement and his ornamental passages were neither clean nor musical. He must have been very nervous, for he is well known to be a master of his instrument. In the slow movement and the finale he was more at his ease, but his performance was on the whole distinctly below his own high level.

The orchestra was in superb form yesterday. In spite of that long and wearisome night ride from Baltimore, which precedes every afternoon concert here, the men played with splendid spirit and the airy scherzo of the Berlioz composition never went with more lightness and certainty of touch. As for the Liszt rhapsody, that was a veritable tour de force, and there were some delightful surprises in Mr. Gericke's reading of the music. To make so hackneyed a piece—every pianist has it in his repertory as the "Hungarian Fantasia"—interesting is a feat of which any conductor might well be proud. At to-night's concert there will be an entirely different programme, and Mr. Kneisel will appear as the soloist in a new composition by Mr. Loeffler.

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, FRIDAY, DEC. 15, 1899.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Second Evening Concert at Carnegie Hall Last Night.

The second evening concert of the fourteenth season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in this city took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The audience was one of the size and brilliancy which it is usual to see at these concerts, and that it was made up largely of the steadfast friends of the orchestra was manifested by the applause which followed the solo number, composed by one member of the band and played by another. The concert was one of those delightful entertainments which the Boston men provide so often for our delectation and for which we are duly grateful to them.

The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's overture to "The Fair Melusine," Charles Martin Loeffler's concert piece for violin and orchestra, entitled "Nights in the Ukraine," Richard Strauss's indescribable composition called "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" and Beethoven's second symphony. The novelty of the evening was Mr. Loeffler's piece, in which his deskmate, Mr. Franz Kneisel, took the solo part. The work was written some years ago, and was played by the composer in the early days of the Boston Orchestra. The content of the three movements is set forth in three excerpts from the prose writings of the Russian, Nicolai Gogol. They are too long for reproduction here. These excerpts begin with the relation of the manner in which the Russian peasants while away the long Winter nights after the outdoor work is done. Rude and boisterous sport and the dance are the main features of these "sitting-up nights," as they are called, and Mr. Loeffler has endeavored to embody in music the spirit of the festivities.

He has made three movements, of which the first is called a pastoral, the second "The May Night," and the third "The Parobki Amuse Themselves." The "Parobki" means the young fellows of the peasantry, who in old times in this country would have been called the "young bucks." The composer's purpose was plaintly to make music pictures, or, what is inevitable when this is attempted, mood pictures. He has followed closely the schedule laid out in the writings which he has chosen to illustrate, and the natural result is that his work is not in any of the accepted forms, but in one which he has made for his purpose. There can be no quarrel with him on this ground, for the right of the composer of romantic music to make forms to suit his emotional or descriptive plan is now conceded. It is undeniable that the hearer who tries to follow Mr. Loeffler's work without any attention to the things which he has set out to illustrate will be confused, but that is no proof that the music is not well made. On the contrary, it is extremely well put together.

Indeed it may be said that in this composition, as well as in others, Mr. Loeffler has shown immense cleverness in the structural part of his labor. He has used Russian themes, and has used them with a fine feeling for their color and their significance. He has made mood pictures which are as full of the Russian character as if they had been the diversions of a Davidoff or a Borodine. The sadness, the tenderness, and the rude barbarism of Little Russia breathe through these scenes, and the orchestral tints are eloquent. Mr. Loeffler is a decadent of the decadents, and he revels in the musical production of the vast barren spaces of the Ukraine and the tragic melancholy of the people. His violin part is formidably difficult, but its place in the general scheme is well defined, and it has something to say. On the whole, then, this may be set down as a clever and interesting composition, though it will not please the sticklers for well-defined patterns in music. Mr. Kneisel played the solo part with finish and sympathy. Both he and Mr. Loeffler were warmly applauded by the audience.

It is not necessary to deal at length in this place with the composition of Mr. Richard Strauss played last night. It was fully discussed when it was first performed here. Such music is unfit for publication. It does not increase one's respect for the art of composition. It leaves a bad taste in the mouth. Certainly some of Till Eulenspiegel's pranks would not bear description in prose, and there is no use of making their nature so plain through the medium of ugly music. For some of this music is appallingly ugly, and without any good excuse. There is no reason why music should apparently wallow in the mire.

After this obstreperous thing the second symphony of Beethoven came with a most gracious modesty of art into the presence of the assembly. This music, if it is not of the mightiest pattern of its maker, is at least clean and decent, and one can listen to it with self-respect. It was played with charming clarity and smoothness by the orchestra. And the meed of praise must not be withheld from the playing of the Strauss monstrosity. It was a veritable triumph of orchestral virtuosity. So be it. If tubas and bassoons and English horns must misbehave themselves, it is a blessing to have them do it with an air of gallantry and an assumption of virtue.

The [illegible] Press

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brahms, Dvorak, Strauss and Draesecke Interpreted by the Orchestra.

Symphony first, concerto second, orchestral tour de force third and overture last, represent the ideal balancing of compositions at a symphony concert, for attention is apt to lag under the best of conductors and with the best of symphonies if it be given last of all and late, when you have been sated with numbers whose themes and tonal qualities will not banish. The concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last evening at the Academy of Music, under Mr. Gericke, met this test, and as a result an evening with the moderns was spent most agreebly, in that the programme moved from the Brahms symphony in E minor to the Jubilee overture of Draesecke of a military, occasional type with increasing emphasis and to a certain climax.

One came fresh and unperturbed musically to the symphony, which, while saturated with the spirit of the romantic school that dared to do what it would, still revealed that control of the formal media that gives a sense of classic reserve, particularly in the first movement. This symphony is not only interesting for the melodic beauty of the second movement and the spirit of the third and originality of the fourth, but its length is so well proportioned that it does not tax one by the too evident love of working out musical ideas to the uttermost variation of expression possible. The andante, with its strange Oriental lilt and tang, is the one movement that is eloquent of the beauty of singing melody, and the loving rendering it received from Mr. Gericke, and this applies to the entire symphony, did much to spread the gospel of Brahms among a not irresponsive audience. It is true the plaint has been raised we are twenty-five years behind Germany in an appreciation of Brahms, but it is not quite so bad as that, and we are rapidly changing.

The Dvorak concerto for 'cello in B minor, heard for the first time here, was not only grateful in itself, being a composition of even balance and beautiful in color, but in that it gave Schroeder, the 'cellist, a great favorite here, a hearing as a soloist. Schroeder worked with Dvorak over the concerto and wrote some of the cadenzas, but with great art wisdom there is nothing intrusive in the way of exploitation of technical gymnastics, and the result is a work in which the soloist's skill reaches results through expression and not mere agility. The themes in all three movements are not unlike in color to some of those in the "New World" symphony. There was probably no intention of again complimenting "America," but at the same time one may read between the lines, as it were. The adagio was marked by a passionate strenuousness—the personality of the performer was made possible here—and the cantilena for the solo instrument was bound up in combinations with certain of the choirs in a delicious manner. No one, particularly with Schroeder at the 'cello, could question the domination of the solo instrument, and yet there was no over-accentuation, but splendid poise of orchestra and soloist on even wing. This is high art in composition and calls for high art in interpretation, which was not wanting.

The hors d'oeuvre, as it were, was "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." "Till" was kept somewhat in bounds by Mr. Gericke, and the alternations of somnolent stretches and callathumpian exuberance was not made as rough and boisterous as is sometimes done. Mr. Gericke brings out the form rather than the broken fury of Strauss, and in doing this given an interesting reading to this curious composition. Its smoother passages were suavely sung, but the explosions lacked dynamite. The closing overture by Draesecke, not amazingly original, celebrating a Saxon jubilee, what with its triumphal character, its fragments of "God Save the King," which tune is claimed, and rightly, by other peoples besides the British and Americans, as a national air, brought the concert to a spirited close. On Friday evening the programme consists of overture to "Hans Heiling," Marschner; concerto for violin, "Nights in the Ukrain," Loeffler; Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1, Liszt; Symphony No. 2, Beethoven.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.

THE EVENING SUN, per month................. .20

THE EVENING SUN, per year..................$2.00

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1899.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's matinee at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon was recognized as an occasion of importance, even coming as it did within five days of the opera season's opening and within twelve days of Christmas. Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture, three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" and Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1 were the selections for orchestra alone, and one of the orchestra's members, Alwin Schroeder, was heard in the solo part of Dvorak's Concerto for Violoncello. The effects of nervousness and much travel conspired with some peculiarities of the composition itself to mar the solo performance. Mr. Schroeder merited, therefore, all the more praise for making his part in the earlier movements of the concerto effective in spite of handicaps. The orchestra played the Beethoven and Berlioz music with that beauty of tone which usually marks its work and with that serenity which amounts to a mannerism with Conductor Gericke. More spirited interpretations of the two works have been heard here, but the same could not be said of the programme's final number. The pleasure of the audience in that Liszt rhapsody performance was absolutely unalloyed, for the Boston orchestra was at its best. It remains to be recorded that Christmas shopping apparently made sad inroads upon the usually large attendance at these matinees. The orchestra will give its second evening concert of the season at Carnegie Hall to-night, with complete change of programme.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 16, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT

A Beautiful Programme and a Highly Successful Performance.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra somewhat resumed its previous artistic reputation by the short programme of last night given as the second concert of its second series. The music which preceded the Beethoven Symphony was more in accord with that class of programme music which is supposed to belong to symphony concerts, even if its musical affinity was more or less incongruous.

Modern music was amply represented by Loeffler's concert piece for violin and orchestra, and a new reading of Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1, in F, which might quite properly be entitled Liszt's "Leipsic" Rhapsody.

The Marschner overture from Hans Heiling, which opened the concert, was played with due regard for the dignity of its musical form, but the stateliness which was and is its principal ingredient assumes a certain degree of monotony even under the most favorable circumstances, and these were its circumstances last night.

Apart from the first two movements of the symphony the chief interest of the concert centered around Loeffler's comparatively new work, "Night in the Ukrain," for solo violin and orchestra, with Franz Kneisel as soloist. The first, second and fourth movements of this composition were given, the third being omitted.

As a composition the greatest credit should go to the young writer for the beauty of the first two movements. The pastoral especially has many enchanting passages and a suggestive yet delicate simplicity of thought. The solo instrument is given no virtuoso prominence, but the work is built upon the most thorough musical lines, the integrity of which demands a perfect assimilation of reading. This it most happily received, and the high musical art of the soloist was never more noticeable than in its commendable self-abnegation.

The Liszt Rhapsody was greatly enjoyed by the audience, in spite of the fact that its accent was lethargic, especially where the strings were made to play the sixteenth and thirty-second notes, when they preceded long notes by way of syncopation, with the heel of the bow instead of the buoyant, full sweep which marks the tradition of Hungarian rhythm.

William Gericke is plainly enough a Beethoven score worm. It is evident with every phrase he plays of this master's writing that the study and research of the great master's writing has been of the most minute description, and it was never made so plainly apparent as in the trio last night. If Beethoven made a master score in this movement out of the most trivial material, Gericke's reading added to the sublimity of the writing. As before intimated, the opening movement and the larghetto received a truly delightful presentation, and the programme, short and all as it was, for the time being, at least, dispelled the hideous musical proportions of Monday evening's concert.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, DECEMBER 12, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY

Being organized and maintained for the avowed purpose of elevating the musical standard of the different municipalities which now most profitably support it, the programme presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music last night, as the second in its first series of concerts, was a travesty upon its musical principles.

Two such pedagogical writings as the Brahms Symphony No. 4, in E minor, and the Dvorak Concerto for Violoncello, would of themselves tax the standard of a far better programme, but when these numbers are supplemented by a vaudeville composition like Strauss' writing termed "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," whose only merit lay in its wonderful trick of instrumentation, and conclude with a jubilee overture which substitutes noise for music, one may wonder whether the original purpose of the orchestra has been abandoned.

As a musical programme that presented by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last night was the most inconsequent ever heard here under dignified auspices.

The playing of the orchestra was quite another thing, and was fairly up to the limit of its executive ability within the restrictions maintained by Wilhelm Gericke's unyielding precision of beat.

The second movement of the symphony was the principal—if not the only complete—musical delight of the evening, and any elasticity of nuance which the conductor permitted graced its presentation. The operatic ensemble of the third movement was given with the same degree of boisterous noise which the Strauss climaxes permitted, and, like it, only needed a "tom-tom" to reach the border of a burlesque. It seemed to find most favor with the audience, and this fact may tend to somewhat redeem the programme in public appreciation.

Alwin Schroeder was the soloist in the violincello concerto and, except for the brilliancy with which he played the third movement, was not in his usual artistic form. During the early part of the work his attack was undecided and his tone on the nearer strings unmellow, not to say hard.

The overpowering regretfulness of the truth as it must be written and emphasized in the hope of preventing a repetition makes it impossible to speak in detail of the few musical pleasures of the symphony or the splendid conclusion of the first movement in the concerto and the Friday evening concert with its presentation of the Beethoven Symphony No. 2, preceded by Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody No. 1, may be expected to dispel the evil musical illusions of last night.

New-York Daily Tribune

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1899.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The second evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra, which took place in Carnegie Hall yesterday, restored to their proper place the pegs that had been set down by some of the happenings on Wednesday afternoon. Mr. Gericke and his men were keyed up to the occasion last night, and the most inveterate caviller who heard the concert must have counted the day lost to him, so far as the pleasures of faultfinding were concerned. So if he had a spark of love for music in his soul his compensation was ample, however, for not only did he hear such gentle and ingratiating classics as Mendelssohn's "Melusina" overture and Beethoven's second symphony played with exquisite finish, tonal beauty and what the Germans call "Schwung," but he also heard a new composition that was doubly heart-warming from the fact that its composer and the performer of its solo part were both admired members of the organization.

The piece was Mr. C. M. Loeffler's suite for violin and orchestra, entitled "Nights in the Ukraine," the national characteristics of which The Tribune attempted to expound to its readers last Sunday. Whence Mr. Loeffler's fondness for the folk music of Russia springs does not appear. It may have come from his sojourn in the country of the Czar, his association with the admirable band which a Russian prince used to maintain at Lugano, or an innate love for the most expressive and adaptable folk music in the world; in any event he has associated himself with the most aggressive and successful coterie of composers in existence in his efforts to show the value of folk melodies in the composition of the higher forms. There were echoes of those melodies in his sextet, for strings which Mr. Kneisel and others of his colleagues introduced to us some years ago, and also in a concert piece for violoncello, which has been played in Boston by Mr. Schroeder, but not here. These experiments, if they can be called such, were tentative and timid, however, compared with the suite heard last night, which aimed to give musical illustration to the spirit of Gogol's collection of sketches, and tales called in French "Veillées d'Ukraine," dealing with the nocturnal merrymakings which make up so significant a part of the social life of the Russian peasantry. Mr. Loeffler's work is less happy in uttering the moods of Gogol's book than in disclosing the beauty and adaptability of the Russian folk tunes which he has employed. In the latter respect his suite is most commendable and lovely. His harmonic and orchestral treatment of the themes is felicitous in the highest degree. He does not lift the solo instrument into the prominence which is dear to the soul of the ordinary solo player, but combines it with his orchestra so as to make it a potent voice in the exposition of the contents of his work; yet the rights of the virtuoso are not forgotten; they are simply turned into a channnel which carries them to higher purposes than those cherished by the merely selfish solo player. For this reason it was highly gratifying last night to observe how amicably the honors which were generously showered on the work were shared by Mr. Loeffler and his colleague, Mr. Kneisel. The latter played with complete devotion, and all his exquisite skill and taste were expended in giving beautiful utterance to his old companion's thoughts. The audience were heartily appreciative, and the composer was enthusiastically applauded, Mr. Kneisel being twice recalled, though there could be no thought of a supplementary solo.

After this suite the orchestra distinguished itself by a brilliant performance of Richard Strauss's marvellously ingenious and witty musical joke entitled "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks."

Philadelphia Inquirer

SATURDAY - - - - DECEMBER 16, 1899

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Second Concert in the Boston Symphony Orchestra's Second Series

The feature of the very excellent and enjoyable concert which the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave at the Academy of Music last evening, under the direction of Mr. William Gericke, and to the obviously keen satisfaction of a large and appreciative audience, was the admirable performance which it included of the second symphony of Beethoven. Although this lovely composition is in his first manner, when Beethoven was still under the influence of Mozart, and lacks the grandeur of the Eroica or the C minor, it is so bright, so brilliant, so spontaneous, and so sympathetic a work that to hear it anything like well played is an abiding joy, and last night it was played to perfection.

The interpretation of it was one of the few which one never forgets, whose memory no length of concert-going offaces, which become a permanent standard for all subsequent comparison. It was so clear, so eloquent, and so symmetrical; so transparent in its texture, so well balanced in all its parts; at once so strong, so simple as it sounded and so sweet. It cannot be said that any one movement was rendered with a finer art and a more absolute adequacy than any other. Perhaps the andante, one of the most enchanting slow movements that Beethoven ever wrote, was the most delicious in its lingering charm, but the scherzo in its different way was not less impressive, and the whole performance was an unalloyed delight.

The other orchestral numbers were Marschner's gay and vigorous overture to "Hans Heiling," which went with a splendid swing, and the first Hungarian rhapsody of Liszt.

The soloist was Mr. Franz Kneisel, who played in a tone which, while small, was singularly round and true, and with a wholly impeccable execution, a concerto for the violin, written by his associate in the orchestra, Mr. Charles M. Loeffler, entitled "Nights in the Ukrain," and illustrative of scenes described by Gogol in his book of that name. It cannot truthfully be said that Mr. Loeffler's music made a very deep impression. It is written in a manner which shows an intimate knowledge of the solo instrument, and there is not a little cleverness in the way in which the Russian atmosphere is suggested and Russian melodies worked in to give the desired local coloring; but a composition of so much importance cannot be judged at a single hearing, and if it scarcely seemed to attain its end a better acquaintance with the score might convey a different impression. The title promised a great deal and the expectation was somewhat disappointed.

The Evening Bulletin

Saturday, December 16, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

The Most Delightful Concert of the Present Season at the Academy.

The Boston Symphony concert last night at the Academy of Music was an altogether delightful occasion. The program was a happy mixture of the classical and modern, and the glorious orchestra was at its artistic best, which means that it was very nearly perfection. We had an overture by quaint, tuneful old Marschner and a symphony by Beethoven to contrast with a rhapsody by Liszt and a concerto by Loeffler.

The overture to Marschner's opera "Hans Heiling" was the first number on the program, and although not a novelty, it served as a very charming introduction to the more solid portion of the bill of fare. The orchestra itself supplied both the composer and the soloist of the succeeding number. Mr. Loeffler, one of the first violins of the orchestra, is already known to fame as a composer, and has also appeared more than once as a solo player. This time, however, the executant was the composer's co-laborer, Mr. Kneisel, the concertmeister of the band, a musician favorably known to the musical public of this city in a variety of aspects. "Nights in the Ukraine" is the title of the work which Mr. Loeffler modestly terms a "concert piece for violin and orchestra." While it is more likely to have been composed within the confines of Boston Common than on the steppes of Little Russia, the composer has cleverly utilized several Russian airs so that the work does not lack what may well pass for local color. As originally written the concerto was in four movements, but the third was omitted last night, and with wisdom, because the composition is of very uneven merit. The first movement (andantino) is quite uninteresting, while the second is full of melodic ideas beautifully expressed and created a most favorable impression. It is dreamy, yet virile, displaying a vivid fancy, and the orchestration is cleverly written. The concluding movement (allegro giocoso) is well scored and gave Mr. Kneisel an opportunity of displaying his virtuosity. His playing indeed was very satisfying throughout, and he was evidently very much in sympathy with the composer's ideas.

Liszt's first Hungarian rhapsody is not generally regarded as the best of the fifteen he wrote, but it is wonderfully vital, vivid and full of color. There is no dance music as stirring as that of the Czardas, except, perhaps, the Scottish reel, and Liszt makes free use of this now madly-rollicking, now half-melancholy music in his rhapsodies. The rendition of the number was simply perfect.

The symphony was Beethoven's second, and it was pleasant to contrast the sane, straightforward methods of the great master with the development of modern musical thought as exhibited by Brahms in last Monday's symphony. With Beethoven the music is first, technique is simply a means to an end. Melody is nothing to be ashamed of, but is, indeed, regarded as the highest expression of harmony. For nearly a century this delightful work has made millions of true music-lovers happy by its joyous youthfulness, and when some of the labored expressions of what is to-day modern music of the most "intense" character are relegated to the dustiest shelf it will bestow the same exquisite pleasure that it did last night. Mr. Gericke seems to interpret Beethoven with a keener and more loving insight than during his earlier sojourn among us, and, indeed, he has done nothing finer than his interpretation of the slow movement, which was played with the hearts as well as with the instruments of the orchestra. It moved the great audience profoundly. Mr. Gericke is to be most heartily congratulated on the success of the concert from every point of view. The next concert will take place on January 15.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, December 12, 1899.

Second Regular Boston Symphony Concert at the Academy.

The notable event of the second concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's original series at the Academy of Music, last evening, was the playing of Antonin Dvorak's Concerto for Violoncello, in B minor (Op. 104), with Alwin Schroeder as soloist. Mr. Schroeder is heard only too seldom in this city as a soloist, and it is well that Conductor Gericke has adopted in his case, and in that of Messrs. Kneisel and Loeffler, the somewhat new policy of bringing the individual talent of his superb forces into more conspicuous relief. We remember enjoying Mr. Schroeder in another Dvorak number at the Academy some time ago. It was an exquisite little forest idyl, and at this expert's bow all its sylvan daintiness and poesy was mirrored forth. One saw a tone picture of memorable beauty. To us Mr. Schroeder seems, indeed, to be the prince of American 'cellists. He himself wrote many of the bravura passages for the 'cello in the Dvorak Concerto interpreted by him, last night, in such masterly style. The orchestral novelty of the occasion was Felix Draesecke's Jubilee Overture in D major (Op. 65), written by that Coburg maestro for the City of Dresden, for the celebration of the seventieth birthday and Silver Jubilee of the King of Saxony. It is a pompous performance elaborately scored for festival orchestra.

It would go better with the original score, but proved an enjoyable number last evening. The national air is played by the trombones, while the two German folk-songs were heard on winds and violins at first, and then on these together. The second movement of the 'cello concerto was the most beautiful, but altogether it was one of the finest works of its kind we have ever heard. In the Brahms Symphony, the last movement seemed as though it should have been the first. The Strauss curiosity was as crazy as ever.

Charles Martin Loeffler's violin concerto, "Nights in Ukrain," to be rendered by Franz Kneisel as soloist on Friday evening next, is eagerly awaited by music-lovers. It consists of an A minor andantino Introduction, an A major allegro moderato Pastoral, a G minor lento movement, entitled "A Night in May (The Crowned Girl)," and an A major allegro giocoso movement described as "The Parobki amuse themselves."

The North American

Daily Advertiser and United States Gazette.

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1899.

VOL. CXXIX NO. 74.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA

Exceptionally Fine Programme Rendered in a Perfect Manner.

The second concert of the second series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented a most interesting programme last night, performed in a perfect manner. The Marschner Overture to "Hans Heiling" is a very melodious and well-written work on the old lines, of course, but far more welcome than the more pretentious work of Draescke given at Monday's concert. It is full of vigor and sustained interest from the slow introduction ti the close.

Special importance centred in Loeffler's "Ukraine Night," for solo violin and orchestra, given here for the first time, and played by Franz Kneisel, the concertmeister. It proved a charming work throughout, original, spontaneous and brilliant. The first movement, pastorale, gives effective work to the solo instrument as well as to the orchestra. It is thoroughly open-air in effect, both in the introduction suggestive of the desolate fields in winter and in the piquant oboe theme that forms the theme of the allegro.

The second movement is intended to suggest the moonlight night in the midst of a forest. Some beautiful effects of tone coloring helped one to accept the idea, the contrast of open and closed horns in the simple theme that begins it being specially good. The soft rising arpeggio in the harp ending on a single soft horn note that seemed to be but the harp's last note singing on was a novel and charming bit of orchestration. The wind, and, above all, the bassoon, had much grateful writing entrusted to them. In fact, though the work is called a concert piece for violin and orchestra, the latter plays a far more important part in it than it does in many standard concertos.

The last movement was a merry making that gave a dashing close to the composition.

Mr. Kneisel played the solo part beautifully. He never sounded so free and unstudied—in fact, it is the best work he has ever done here. His always pure and artistic tone borrowed a warmth that is not always there, and his abundant technique made the difficulties of the work seem easy. His harmonics at the close of the second movement were of exquisite beauty. The hearty applause that greeted the work brought forward the composer, Mr. Kneisel's desk brother, for a warm and well-deserved recognition from the audience.

The Liszt rhapsodie showed once again the greater breadth of Mr. Gericke—the new Gericke. The virtuoso bit went with an elan and sparkle that was fascinating, and gave the solo flute and clarinet a chance for technical work that was done to perfection. The inevitable glissando on the harp on the diminished seventh chord was atoned for by a touch of Mr. Loeffler's violin that was very welcome.

It is a rude sobering to come back to a symphony after such a Hungarian dash, and it remains a serious question if it is the proper place to put any symphony after a brilliant show piece full of the vigorous syncopations with which magyar elbows nudge you in these Liszt rhapsodies. The Beethoven Symphony was nevertheless most beautifully played—most perfectly played—with a leaping life springing out of the gay last movement as young as when it surprised Vienna, nearly a hundred years ago—with its unmistakably Beethovenish charm in the wonderful larghetto—with a humor as joyous in the scherzo (the world's first scherzo) as when it first probably disconcerted the critics by ousting the old minuet from its place in the symphony. Nor may the first movement and the beautiful introduction be forgotten in saying this word of recognition of the performance, though it is hard to do anything at a Boston Symphony concert except praise and then praise again.

HENRY GORDON THUNDER.

The New York Press

DAILY EDITION.

New York, Friday, December 15, 1899.

NOVELTY BY THE SYMPHONY.

Orchestra Plays an Interesting Work of One of Its Members.

It was an interesting programme the Boston Symphony Orchestra presented last night in Carnegie Hall, comprising Mendelssohn's overture to the legend of "The Fair Melusina;" "Nights in the Ukrain," by Charles Martin Loeffler; "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," Richard Strauss, and Beethoven's Second Symphony.

The number which aroused the most interest was Loeffler's composition (a concert piece for violin and orchestra), which was played here for the first time. Mr. Loeffler is a member of the orchestra. "Nights in the Ukrain" is a cleverly written work. It was received with much favor, and Franz Kneisel played the solo part in his usual excellent style. The harp accompaniment in the second part, "A Night in May," was particularly effective. The composition is a fanciful one, and is orchestrated with great skill.

Of the other numbers it is not necessary to speak in detail, as they are rather familiar. The playing of the orchestra, admittedly the best in the country, was of the customary finished character. Mr. Gericke conducted.

On last Wednesday afternoon the programme was as follows: Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Dvorak's 'cello concerto in B minor (in which Alwin Schroeder was the soloist); three movements from the "Romeo and Juliet" symphony by Berlioz, and Liszt's First Hungarian Rhapsody.

The North American

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 12, 1899.

VOL. CXXIX NO. 71

BRAHMS' SYMPHONY FINELY RENDERED

Intricate Passages Were Played to Perfection by the Boston Orchestra.

Brahms' Symphony in E Minor was the important part of last night's concert given by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the Academy of Music, under Gericke's baton. It is at once the last word in symphony of the great composer, as well as of his classic school. The first movement, taken at a very moderate pace, indeed, was a marvel of clearness; the intricate bits of wood playing sounded easy and charmingly spontaneous. Something of the vigor of the movement seemed to be absent on account of the tempo, but the suave character of the initial theme makes it most consistent.

The second movement was equally well done, the phrasing of the violas in the repetition of the theme being most artistic.

The third movement had a real al fresco touch that was most refreshing. How simple is the idea of the contra-tempo phrasing of the first lead, and yet how effective!

The last movement was fully up to the others in perfection, though it is the least spontaneous and interesting of them all. This, in spite of the beautiful episode for flute in minor, followed by the trombones in major.

The new concerto of Dvorak, which received its first performance here, was looked for with interest. The first movement is a little disappointing, but the second and third atoned for this to large extent. Even the first movement, if transformed into a work for orchestra alone, would probably show more meaning. Schroeder played it well, true artist that he is, though he seemed nervous at first, and most of his highest notes were false. His technique in sixths and octaves is astonishing.

Richard Strauss' "Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" renewed the interesting impression it made here a few years ago. It went with astonishing verve. This young German is a veritable orchestra virtuoso writer, even if he has been guilty of painting his own life in his newest work, "A Hero's Life!"

The Draesecke overture is a rather brilliantly-colored work of not great value. It would take little alteration to make it suitable as an American composition, since the "Star-Spangled Banner" is strongly suggested, "Suwanee River" less closely so, and "My Country, 'Tis of Thee," occurs entire.

HENRY GORDON THUNDER.

PUBLIC LEDGER

Philadelphia, Saturday, Dec. 16, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Franz Kneisel is Warmly Welcomed as the Soloist.

The second concert this week by the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place at the Academy of Music last night in the presence of an audience that fairly filled the house. The chief interest of the occasion centered in the playing by Mr. Kneisel of Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Nights in the Ukrain." It is not often that Mr. Kneisel is heard as a soloist, for the reason that his position as first violin of the Boston Symphony Orchestra and leader of the Kneisel Quartette keep him too busy. Occasionally he is heard alone in the drawing room concerts that form an offshoot of the operatic season, and now and again has played in a concerto for violin and piano at the chamber concerts of the quartette that bears his name, but last night he made, if we are not mistaken, his first appearance as a soloist with the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Philadelphia. Mr. Loeffler, who occupies the desk next to Mr. Kneisel in the orchestra, has in his "Nights" collated several typical Russian melodies and woven them together in a very picturesque suite for violin and orchestra.

His music has not the barbaric wealth of color or savage roughness that one finds in Tchaikowsky or the typical Slav composers. Its polish savors rather of modern Russian, but it has the characteristic twang of melancholy in the second movement, and in the fourth (the third was omitted) the festive strains of the merrymakers, the general gayety and laughter of the peasantry was admirably suggested. Mr. Kneisel gave it an exquisite interpretation; his tone is one of singular purity and sweetness, and his intonation was absolutely faultless. He was recalled again and again, to bow his acknowledgments before a delighted audience.

The other numbers were Heinrich Marschner's overture to "Hans Heiling," op. 30; Liszt's Hungarian Rhapsody, No. 1, in F, and Beethoven's second symphony in D major, op. 36. The symphony dragged in places, though excellently well played on the whole, and the overture was well given; but the best work of the evening by the orchestra was done in the Liszt Rhapsody, which was given with a verve and a crispness and yet an elegance that was most inspiriting.

[illegible] un.

[illegible] DE[illegible] 15, 1899.

[illegible]TON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

"Nights in the Ukrain" Played Here for the First Time.

[illegible]oston Symphony Orchestra played last [illegible] Carnegie Hall Charles Martin Loef[illegible]uite for violin and orchestra, "Nights in [illegible]krain," which had not been heard here [illegible]. The composition has found a place on [illegible]gramme of the Boston Orchestra in years [illegible], but not its present form. Mr. Loeffler [illegible] written the work, which is supposed [illegible]strate some prose descriptions by Nicolai [illegible]ol of Russian peasant life. To this end the [illegible]poser has made use of some folk melodies [illegible] give the work a strong national char[illegible] and impart this quality to it more [illegible]ly than the harmonies do. The three [illegible]ments played last night were interesting [illegible]y lacked, at times, spontaneity and in[illegible]ion. The work stands far above the [illegible]e of compositions produced by native [illegible]s and is immeasurably superior to some [illegible]ositions recently put forward in preten[illegible]ashion.

[illegible]nz Kneisel, who played the violin part [illegible]ight, distinguished himself in the second [illegible]ment, although he played throughout [illegible]urity of tone and in other respects with [illegible]ity and appreciation that left nothing to [illegible]sired.

[illegible] Loeffler's suite was followed by an[illegible] number in which the composer's [illegible]rts to produce certain effects [illegible]d never be lost sight of for [illegible]moment. This was Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." As that [illegible]ll manner and form, nobody complains that [illegible]ontaneity is always absent from it. As an [illegible]enious musical burlesque depicting inci[illegible]nts in the life of a rogue, it assuredly creates [illegible]ertain definite effects whether or not they be [illegible]gitimately within the sphere of music. The [illegible]chestra's performance of this number was [illegible]ond praise. An exhibition of such skill [illegible]stified the composition if nothing else did.

Beethoven's Symphony in D Major, which is to be played this winter by the Philharmonic Society, closed the concert. It began with Mendelssohn's overture to the legend of "The Fair Melusina," which has lately been the exclusive property here of the Boston players.

The Press

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven Beautifully Interpreted by M. Geriche—The Loeffler Novelty.

The real pleasure last evening at the Academy of Music was the interpellation of Beethoven's second symphony in D major by M. Geriche and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other members were interesting, but they were not satisfying. Amiel says that the "difficulty of life, the inflexibility of their autocratic regime, the heavy and mournful sky, the inexorable climate—all these harsh fatalities have left their mark upon the Muscovite race! Certainly they have left their mark on the national music, though one is not so sure that Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Nights in the Uhraine" realized all this in his concert piece for violin and orchestra. The wealth of Russian folk melodies tempts the composer, but unless he weaves them into a coherent web to exhibit his word-pictures or tone pictures, coherent in form, their beauty is in vain, their color meaningless!

Mr. Loeffler has written certain clever movements, but they were bare to the bones at times and uninteresting at others. The most poetic was the second movement, "The Night in May," but it would seem that the romantic composer of to-day, heir to all the wealth of method in word and tone painting, with the abilities of Mr. Loeffler, might arrive at some more important turn in the road of art than that reached by his "Russian Up-Sittings at Night." Mr. Kneisel was the soloist and interpreted his seat-mate's composition with true art sympathy. As was the case in Dvorak's 'cello concerto, the solo instrument was not over-accentuated, but was evenly balanced with the orchestra.

But after all, it was the symphony that was worth remembering. Marschner's "Hans Heiling" overture, was a slight affair, well rendered; Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody, No. 1, in F, a fine bit of stirring genre work, read in splendid style, but it served chiefly to prove that even at his earliest, when classicism was still strong within him, Beethoven possessed the potent claim of the great art. And all this Mr. Gericke made clear.

NEW YORK JOURNAL.

DECEMBER 15, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS WARMLY GREETED.

Harmonious Concert Piece by Loeffler Is Played for the First Time.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra kept up its reputation for the skilful presentation of new music and the well drilled interpretation of old favorites in its last night's programme. The character of the audience which filled Carnegie Hall, to say nothing of the long double line of carriages in the street outside, showed that the concerts of this organization are still regarded as among the musical events of the year.

The composition which received its first production last night was Charles Martin Loeffler's concert piece for violin and orchestra, the solo part being played by Franz Kneisel, who is the first violin of the orchestra. The piece is an endeavor to put into music a description of Nicolai Gogol's mystic pictures of Russian life. It was very harmonious and admirably rendered.

It is not often that one hears Mendelssohn's "Fair Melusina," which is known as an overture, but which is really a symphony. This and other parts of the programme were beautifully played.

The [illegible] World.

by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK [illegible] New York.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1899.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a superb exhibition of virtuosity at their concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. One of the four numbers on the programme called for extreme technical skill and a quick and sympathetic obedience to the leader's commands—the excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.

In this work Mr. Gericke's players gave an exhibition of everything that an orchestra ought to have and ought to be. The composition is complex in construction. It may be said to test every capability. There are obligati for almost every first instrument; there are passages in which one or the other of the several contingents—the strings, the reeds, the brass—have mass effects in unison. Difficult bits in the mechanics of each instrument are presented to them for ensemble execution. In fact, Berlioz has scorned the proposition that all orchestral players are not soloists. The performance of this opus may be recorded as one of those upon which the orchestra's fame may rest. A Liszt rhapsody was brilliantly but soberly performed. It is the one known in its pianoforte form as the Hungarian Fantaisie. Mr. Gericke's reading was more dramatic and less stormy than the one presented recently by young Hambourg, the pianist. There was also a slight departure from custom in the disposition of the accent in the characteristic Hungarian rhythm which is incessantly employed by the composer.

The solo number was a concerto for 'cello by Dvorak—a work of exquisite melodic beauty, scored in rich orchestral color and noticeable for its use of a figure which the composer uses in his "New World" Symphony. The concerto was played by Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cellist of the orchestra. In the first movement he was uncertain in pitch and his tone was a little ragged but in the second and third movements he played like a master. In its finish, its subordination of technique to expression, its beautiful cantabile, its perfection of phrasing, Mr. Schroeder's work had that quality which in his piano playing Mr. Paderewski possesses.

The World.

by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK R New York.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1899.

SECOND BOSTON CONCERT.

Interesting Violin Composition Played by Mr. Kneisel.

The interesting feature of the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, last evening, was the composition for violin and orchestra, written by C. M. Loeffler, and played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The composer is one of the first violins of the orchestra, sharing the first desk with Mr. Kneisel. He is an ultra-modern in musical writing. In his works he aims at tone-reproductions of moods, emotions and character and his language is the one which modern expansion of musical expression has enriched. In this particular opus he has not utilized as many of the newer devices as are to be found in others of his compositions, but then it is an earlier effort.

In form this piece is a suite. It pictures certain phases of Russian life—the nocturnal gatherings of a social character which form part of the pleasures of Russia. In its chain of melodic themes the folk-song of rustic Russia is plentifully tapped. In its construction and harmonic development it is an admirable work. It is full of originality. It has freshness, spontaneity and, above all, the convincing evidence that like a true artist the composer writes only when he has something to say and is in the disposition to express himself without effort.

Mr. Kneisel played the suite intelligently, sympathetically and artistically, but without the force, the assertiveness and the vigor and volume of tone which it demands of the soloist. The high qualities which make Mr. Kneisel a concert master hors ligne and a chamber music exponent of the rarest merit, hamper him in solo work, in which there must be individual domination.

The orchestra again displayed its super-excellence in the other numbers of the programme. Mendelssohn's "Fair Melusina" overture was played with exquisite suavity. In Richard Strauss's musical joke, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," with its succession of instrumental tours de force, the players exhausted the technical possibilities. In the performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony the superb precision and tone—homogenity of the strings—asserted themselves.

Mr. Gericke's reading of the symphony was a little dry. In the larghetto his tempo was slightly fast.

NEW YORK JOURNAL.

DECEMBER 14, 1899.

DVORAK'S CONCERTO PLAYED BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

When Dr. Antonin Dvorak went away he left as his last composition—a sort of legacy to this country—a concerto for violoncello known as Op. 104. That concerto was played by Alwin Schroeder and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the society's second matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall and played in excellent fashion.

Mr. Schroeder's playing is delightful. The work which Dvorak planned for him, and to which he added as co-composer, is most exacting, but Mr. Schroeder put into its interpretation striking facility of execution, grace, force and tenderness.

The work of the orchestra, under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, was thoroughly satisfying and brilliant, the full orchestral numbers including three numbers from the "Romeo and Juliet" suite of Hector Berlioz.

[illegible]

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1899.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Each visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings with it a season of delight, but all the performances of the model band are not equally admirable. Mr. Gericke and his men are but human, and it is only natural that the vicissitudes of a week of itinerancy should occasionally disclose unhappy effects, though, it must be confessed that, as a rule, the Boston players are in finest fettle in New-York. Yesterday afternoon's concert, while not one of their best achievements, was yet replete with delightful features, chief of which was the performance of the first and second movements of Dvorak's violoncello concerto, with the solo instrument in the masterly hands of Mr. Alwin Schroeder. That the playing of the last movement cannot be reckoned unreservedly among the features that warmed the hearts of the listeners, save in its cantabile moments, is due largely to the character of the music, which at times strays sadly from the idiom of the violoncello. Still, on the whole, Mr. Schroeder showed himself as the calm, convincing, sympathetic and masterful player that he is. The orchestral numbers were the overture to "Egmont," the three instrumental movements from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," and a transcription of Liszt's fourteenth Hungarian rhapsody. The pure intonation of the band was again a balm to the ear, but the Beethoven and Berlioz music has often been played here with greater fervor.

The Sun.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1899.

Boston Symphony's Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra distinguished itself especially at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon by a brilliant performance of three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet." It is impossible to conceive a rendering of the second movement superior in its delicacy, sentiment and beauty to that which the Boston players gave under Wilhelm Gericke's direction. The first movement too was as remarkable an exhibition of orchestral virtuosity, but it was in the music of the balcony scene that a result was reached that seemed as near perfection as human endeavor could be. The complaint sometimes made that the finish of the playing is a disadvantage in certain kinds of music did not hold here, as no quality was lacking that could add effectiveness to the performance.

The Egmont overture, which opened the programme, was played with the excellence that is to be attributed to every performance of these players, and the Liszt rhapsody in F was deficient only in qualities that are customarily associated with it. Mr. Gericke's reading has its merits and the performance of the orchestra was faultless in accordance with that interpretation. But the spirit and fire that are characteristic of the rhapsodies cannot be supplanted by any other quality and make the effect their composer intended.

Alwin Schroeder was the soloist of the day in Dvorak's concerto for violincello in B minor. Leo Stein introduced this composition to New York audiences several years ago, after having studied it under the composer's direction at Prague. It was praised then for the melodic beauty of its second movement, although the instrumentation is in some places too bizarre. Mr. Schroeder played the first two movements with the greatest sympathy, understanding and technical skill. His tone was warm and full, and his interpretation of the music full of poetic charm and beauty. It was only in the last movement, less interesting in itself, that his performance fell below this high standard.

Dec BOSTON POST, 19

The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

TO HEAR PADEREWSKI.

An unusually large number of eager ticket purchasers were lined up in Music Hall corridors early yesterday morning and throughout the greater part of the day, attracted by the opening of the sale of seats to hear Ignace Paderewski, the Polish pianist, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, with the Symphony Orchestra.

On Dec. 27 Paderewski will have a recital of his own in Music Hall. At the Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat.

The demand yesterday was for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening symphony tickets, and the crowd was admirably handled and sent away satisfied with the tact and courtesy of the officials, both inside and outside of the box office. Of course some were disappointed in not getting the seats they particularly wished, but they concluded they were fortunate to get any at all when they realized the enormous demand.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1899

There were many disappointed at the box office of Music Hall yesterday in not being able to secure tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, when Mr Paderewsgi will be the soloist. His only two afternoon recitals will be on Dec. 27 and 30, and those who were unable to hear this peerless artist with the Symphony will undoubtedly avail themselves of the recitals, for which tickets are now on sale.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concerts last week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were more remarkable in their excellence than ever. There were two novelties, a violoncello concerto by Dvorak and a violin concerto by Loeffler; Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, Liszt and Richard Strauss made up the rest of the programme. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is certainly unsurpassed in its work by any European orchestra and only equalled by a few. It is a musical organization that Americans have just reason to be proud of, for its aim is the highest excellence in music, and its aim is reached. At the Wednesday afternoon concert Alwin Schroeder played the Dvorak concerto. The piece is finely orchestrated, and would make an excellent orchestral number with the solo violoncello part given to violoncelli, were there artists who could play it. The first movement, in spite of some few distinguishing melodic phrases, is dreary and uninteresting, and is written without any regard whatever for the solo instrument. The second movement, an adagio, is charming and full of poetry, and there is a dash of piquancy to the third and last movement that is most captivating. Mr. Schroeder was nervous or else careless in the first movement. His playing was out of tune and his technique faulty, but the character of the music excused this. The entire first movement is not violoncello music, and its difficulty for the player is enormous. Mr. Schroeder probably realized this more completely Wednesday afternoon than formerly and the knowledge affected his playing. In the adagio he was delightful, and it was here, for the first time in this piece, that he had a chance to put in fine work. Mr. Schroeder is a great artist, and his tone and technique were never more exquisite than in this adagio. In the finale he also had an opportunity to show what the violoncello in the hands of a master can do, and the fine, broad scherzo-like phrase that opened the movement was as crisp and cleanly cut as could be desired. Throughout the concerto the orchestration is full, rich, and sonorous, and it was delightfully given by the orchestra.

Hector Berlioz's Symphony was well played from a technical point of view, but it was not sufficiently Berliozian, that is, not sufficiently bizarre. Conductors brought up in the German school seldom get their orchestras to give Berlioz in true style, and Mr. Gericke is no exception to this rule. Both Berlioz and Russian music for this reason seldom receive justice, since our best orchestral leaders are German. The performance was letter, or rather note-perfect, but the spirit was lacking. Mr. Gericke and his men made up for this in the Liszt rhapsody. This was magnificently given. There are no words to express the finesse, the exquisite finish, the dash, swing, abandon of the orchestra's playing. It was, in one word, superb. Not a trace of that blatant vulgarity so easy to find in these rhapsodies when played by inferior artists, was visible. A Liszt rhapsody and an enthusiastic and delighted audience! Mr. Gericke and his men have every reason to rejoice at the miracle.

At the Thursday evening concert Loeffler's "Night in the Ukrain," for violin and orchestra, was the novelty. Mr. Loeffler has not succeeded in writing Russian music. His sadness means dreariness; his mirth, noise; and what should be the music of the balaliaka, (not balaika as in programme), was monotonous. Mr. Kneisel played, as he always plays, exquisitely, but Russian themes are not played as German lieder, and both soloist, orchestra and composer, were as men groping in the dark, blind to the helping light of Gogol's poetic genius. The orchestra apparently played Richard Strauss's music, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" beautifully. That it didn't sound beautifully was not their fault. It will probably sound more beautiful twenty years hence, if played then. The Beethoven symphony was finely given, and, altogether, it may be said of this second visit of the Boston Orchestra that it was more successful than ever, and again we take off our hats to the finest orchestra in America, and perhaps in the world.

A. McA.

The Sun.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Loeffler's "Nights in the Ukrain" Played Here for the First Time.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played last night at Carnegie Hall Charles Martin Loeffler's suite for violin and orchestra, "Nights in the Ukrain," which had not been heard here before. The composition has found a place on the programme of the Boston Orchestra in years gone by, but not its present form. Mr. Loeffler has rewritten the work, which is supposed to illustrate some prose descriptions by Nicolai Gogol of Russian peasant life. To this end the composer has made use of some folk melodies which give the work a strong national character and impart this quality to it more strongly than the harmonies do. The three movements played last night were interesting if they lacked, at times, spontaneity and inspiration. The work stands far above the average of compositions produced by native writers and is immeasurably superior to some compositions recently put forward in pretentious fashion.

Franz Kneisel, who played the violin part last night, distinguished himself in the second movement, although he played throughout with purity of tone and in other respects with a facility and appreciation that left nothing to be desired.

Mr. Loeffler's suite was followed by another number in which the composer's efforts to produce certain effects could never be lost sight of for a moment. This was Richard Strauss's "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks." As that is all manner and form, nobody complains that spontaneity is always absent from it. As an ingenious musical burlesque depicting incidents in the life of a rogue, it assuredly creates certain definite effects whether or not they be legitimately within the sphere of music. The orchestra's performance of this number was beyond praise. An exhibition of such skill justified the composition if nothing else did.

Beethoven's Symphony in D Major, which is to be played this winter by the Philharmonic Society, closed the concert. It began with Mendelssohn's overture to the legend of "The Fair Melusina," which has lately been the exclusive property here of the Boston players.

The Press

SATURDAY, DECEMBER 16, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Beethoven Beautifully Interpreted by M. Geriche—The Loeffler Novelty.

The real pleasure last evening at the Academy of Music was the interpellation of Beethoven's second symphony in D major by M. Geriche and the Boston Symphony Orchestra. The other members were interesting, but they were not satisfying. Amiel says that the "difficulty of life, the inflexibility of their autocratic regime, the heavy and mournful sky, the inexorable climate—all these harsh fatalities have left their mark upon the Muscovite race! Certainly they have left their mark on the national music, though one is not so sure that Mr. Charles Martin Loeffler's "Nights in the Uhraine" realized all this in his concert piece for violin and orchestra. The wealth of Russian folk melodies tempts the composer, but unless he weaves them into a coherent web to exhibit his word-pictures or tone pictures, coherent in form, their beauty is in vain, their color meaningless!

Mr. Loeffler has written certain clever movements, but they were bare to the bones at times and uninteresting at others. The most poetic was the second movement, "The Night in May," but it would seem that the romantic composer of to-day, heir to all the wealth of method in word and tone painting, with the abilities of Mr. Loeffler, might arrive at some more important turn in the road of art than that reached by his "Russian Up-Sittings at Night." Mr. Kneisel was the soloist and interpreted his seat-mate's composition with true art sympathy. As was the case in Dvorak's 'cello concerto, the solo instrument was not over-accentuated, but was evenly balanced with the orchestra.

But after all, it was the symphony that was worth remembering. Marschner's "Hans Heiling" overture, was a slight affair, well rendered; Liszt's Hungarian rhapsody, No. 1, in F, a fine bit of stirring genre work, read in splendid style, but it served chiefly to prove that even at his earliest, when classicism was still strong within him, Beethoven possessed the potent claim of the great art. And all this Mr. Gericke made clear.

NEW YORK JOURNAL.

DECEMBER 15, 1899.

BOSTON SYMPHONY IS WARMLY GREETED.

Harmonious Concert Piece by Loeffler Is Played for the First Time.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra kept up its reputation for the skilful presentation of new music and the well drilled interpretation of old favorites in its last night's programme. The character of the audience which filled Carnegie Hall, to say nothing of the long, double line of carriages in the street outside, showed that the concerts of this organization are still regarded as among the musical events of the year.

The composition which received its first production last night was Charles Martin Loeffler's concert piece for violin and orchestra, the solo part being played by Franz Kneisel, who is the first violin of the orchestra. The piece is an endeavor to put into music a description of Nicolai Gogol's mystic pictures of Russian life. It was very harmonious and admirably rendered.

It is not often that one hears Mendelssohn's "Fair Malusina," which is known as an overture, but which is really a symphony. This and other parts of the programme were beautifully played.

The World.

by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1899.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The musicians of the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a superb exhibition of virtuosity at their concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon. One of the four numbers on the programme called for extreme technical skill and a quick and sympathetic obedience to the leader's commands—the excerpts from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet" Symphony.

In this work Mr. Gericke's players gave an exhibition of everything that an orchestra ought to have and ought to be. The composition is complex in construction. It may be said to test every capability. There are obligati for almost every first instrument; there are passages in which one or the other of the several contingents—the strings, the reeds, the brass—have mass effects in unison. Difficult bits in the mechanics of each instrument are presented to them for ensemble execution. In fact, Berlioz has scorned the proposition that all orchestral players are not soloists. The performance of this opus may be recorded as one of those upon which the orchestra's fame may rest. A Liszt rhapsody was brilliantly but soberly performed. It is the one known in its pianoforte form as the Hungarian Fantaisie. Mr. Gericke's reading was more dramatic and less stormy than the one presented recently by young Hambourg, the pianist. There was also a slight departure from custom in the disposition of the accent in the characteristic Hungarian rhythm which is incessantly employed by the composer.

The solo number was a concerto for 'cello by Dvorak—a work of exquisite melodic beauty, scored in rich orchestral color and noticeable for its use of a figure which the composer uses in his "New World" Symphony. The concerto was played by Mr. Alwin Schroeder, the first 'cellist of the orchestra. In the first movement he was uncertain in pitch and his tone was a little ragged but in the second and third movements he played like a master. In its finish, its subordination of technique to expression, its beautiful cantabile, its perfection of phrasing, Mr. Schroeder's work had that quality which in his piano playing Mr. Paderewski possesses.

The World.

by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK R
New York.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 15, 1899.

SECOND BOSTON CONCERT.

Interesting Violin Composition Played by Mr. Kneisel.

The interesting feature of the second concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra, at Carnegie Hall, last evening, was the composition for violin and orchestra, written by C. M. Loeffler, and played by Mr. Franz Kneisel.

The composer is one of the first violins of the orchestra, sharing the first desk with Mr. Kneisel. He is an ultra-modern in musical writing. In his works he aims at tone-reproductions of moods, emotions and character and his language is the one which modern expansion of musical expression has enriched. In this particular opus he has not utilized as many of the newer devices as are to be found in others of his compositions, but then it is an earlier effort.

In form this piece is a suite. It pictures certain phases of Russian life—the nocturnal gatherings of a social character which form part of the pleasures of Russia. In its chain of melodic themes the folk-song of rustic Russia is plentifully tapped. In its construction and harmonic development it is an admirable work. It is full of originality. It has freshness, spontaneity and, above all, the convincing evidence that like a true artist the composer writes only when he has something to say and is in the disposition to express himself without effort.

Mr. Kneisel played the suite intelligently, sympathetically and artistically, but without the force, the assertiveness and the vigor and volume of tone which it demands of the soloist. The high qualities which make Mr. Kneisel a concert master hors ligne and a chamber music exponent of the rarest merit, hamper him in solo work, in which there must be individual domination.

The orchestra again displayed its super-excellence in the other numbers of the programme. Mendelssohn's "Fair Melusina" overture was played with exquisite suavity. In Richard Strauss's musical joke, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks," with its succession of instrumental tours de force, the players exhausted the technical possibilities. In the performance of Beethoven's Second Symphony the superb precision and tone—homogenity of the strings—asserted themselves.

Mr. Gericke's reading of the symphony was a little dry. In the larghetto his tempo was slightly fast.

NEW YORK JOURNAL.

DECEMBER 14, 1899.

DVORAK'S CONCERTO PLAYED BY SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

When Dr. Antonin Dvorak went away he left as his last composition—a sort of legacy to this country—a concerto for violoncello known as Op. 104. That concerto was played by Alwin Schroeder and the Boston Symphony Orchestra at the society's second matinee yesterday in Carnegie Hall and played in excellent fashion.

Mr. Schroeder's playing is delightful. The work which Dvorak planned for him, and to which he added as co-composer, is most exacting, but Mr. Schroeder put into its interpretation striking facility of execution, grace, force and tenderness.

The work of the orchestra, under the leadership of Wilhelm Gericke, was thoroughly satisfying and brilliant, the full orchestral numbers including three numbers from the "Romeo and Juliet" suite of Hector Berlioz.

New-York Daily Tribune.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1899.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Each visit of the Boston Symphony Orchestra brings with it a season of delight, but all the performances of the model band are not equally admirable. Mr. Gericke and his men are but human, and it is only natural that the vicissitudes of a week of itinerancy should occasionally disclose unhappy effects, though, it must be confessed that, as a rule, the Boston players are in finest fettle in New-York. Yesterday afternoon's concert, while not one of their best achievements, was yet replete with delightful features, chief of which was the performance of the first and second movements of Dvorak's violoncello concerto, with the solo instrument in the masterly hands of Mr. Alwin Schroeder. That the playing of the last movement cannot be reckoned unreservedly among the features that warmed the hearts of the listeners, save in its cantabile moments, is due largely to the character of the music, which at times strays sadly from the idiom of the violoncello. Still, on the whole, Mr. Schroeder showed himself as the calm, convincing, sympathetic and masterful player that he is. The orchestral numbers were the overture to "Egmont," the three instrumental movements from Berlioz's dramatic symphony, "Romeo and Juliet," and a transcription of Liszt's fourteenth Hungarian rhapsody. The pure intonation of the band was again a balm to the ear, but the Beethoven and Berlioz music has often been played here with greater fervor.

The Sun.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 14, 1899.

Boston Symphony's Concert.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra distinguished itself especially at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon by a brilliant performance of three movements from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet." It is impossible to conceive a rendering of the second movement superior in its delicacy, sentiment and beauty to that which the Boston players gave under Wilhelm Gericke's direction. The first movement too was as remarkable an exhibition of orchestral virtuosity, but it was in the music of the balcony scene that a result was reached that seemed as near perfection as human endeavor could be. The complaint sometimes made that the finish of the playing is a disadvantage in certain kinds of music did not hold here, as no quality was lacking that could add effectiveness to the performance.

The Egmont overture, which opened the programme, was played with the excellence that is to be attributed to every performance of these players, and the Liszt rhapsody in F was deficient only in qualities that are customarily associated with it. Mr. Gericke's reading has its merits and the performance of the orchestra was faultless in accordance with that interpretation. But the spirit and fire that are characteristic of the rhapsodies cannot be supplanted by any other quality and make the effect their composer intended.

Alwin Schroeder was the soloist of the day in Dvorak's concerto for violincello in B minor. Leo Stein introduced this composition to New York audiences several years ago, after having studied it under the composer's direction at Prague. It was praised then for the melodic beauty of its second movement, although the instrumentation is in some places too bizarre. Mr. Schroeder played the first two movements with the greatest sympathy, understanding and technical skill. His tone was warm and full, and his interpretation of the music full of poetic charm and beauty. It was only in the last movement, less interesting in itself, that his performance fell below this high standard.

D[illegible] BOSTON POST, [illegible]

The Representative Democratic Paper

OF NEW ENGLAND.

TO HEAR PADEREWSKI.

An unusually large number of eager ticket purchasers were lined up in Music Hall corridors early yesterday morning and throughout the greater part of the day, attracted by the opening of the sale of seats to hear Ignace Paderewski, the Polish pianist, next Friday afternoon and Saturday night, with the Symphony Orchestra.

On Dec. 27 Paderewski will have a recital of his own in Music Hall. At the Symphony concerts on Friday and Saturday he will play Beethoven's concerto in E flat.

The demand yesterday was for Friday afternoon and Saturday evening symphony tickets, and the crowd was admirably handled and sent away satisfied with the tact and courtesy of the officials, both inside and outside of the box office. Of course some were disappointed in not getting the seats they particularly wished, but they concluded they were fortunate to get any at all when they realized the enormous demand.

Boston Transcript

TUESDAY, DECEMBER 19, 1899

There were many disappointed at the box office of Music Hall yesterday in not being able to secure tickets for the Boston Symphony Orchestra this week, when Mr. Paderewsgi will be the soloist. His only two afternoon recitals will be on Dec. 27 and 30, and those who were unable to hear this peerless artist with the Symphony will undoubtedly avail themselves of the recitals, for which tickets are now on sale.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:

WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1899.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The concerts last week of the Boston Symphony Orchestra were more remarkable in their excellence than ever. There were two novelties, a violoncello concerto by Dvorak and a violin concerto by Loeffler; Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Berlioz, Liszt and Richard Strauss made up the rest of the programme. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is certainly unsurpassed in its work by any European orchestra and only equalled by a few. It is a musical organization that Americans have just reason to be proud of, for its aim is the highest excellence in music, and its aim is reached. At the Wednesday afternoon concert Alwin Schroeder played the Dvorak concerto. The piece is finely orchestrated, and would make an excellent orchestral number with the solo violoncello part given to violoncelli, were there artists who could play it. The first movement, in spite of some few distinguishing melodic phrases, is dreary and uninteresting, and is written without any regard whatever for the solo instrument. The second movement, an adagio, is charming and full of poetry, and there is a dash of piquancy to the third and last movement that is most captivating. Mr. Schroeder was nervous or else careless in the first movement. His playing was out of tune and his technique faulty, but the character of the music excused this. The entire first movement is not violoncello music, and its difficulty for the player is enormous. Mr. Schroeder probably realized this more completely Wednesday afternoon than formerly and the knowledge affected his playing. In the adagio he was delightful, and it was here, for the first time in this piece, that he had a chance to put in fine work. Mr. Schroeder is a great artist, and his tone and technique were never more exquisite than in this adagio. In the finale he also had an opportunity to show what the violoncello in the hands of a master can do, and the fine, broad scherzo-like phrase that opened the movement was as crisp and cleanly cut as could be desired. Throughout the concerto the orchestration is full, rich, and sonorous, and it was delightfully given by the orchestra.

Hector Berlioz's Symphony was well played from a technical point of view, but it was not sufficiently Berliozian, that is, not sufficiently bizarre. Conductors brought up in the German school seldom get their orchestras to give Berlioz in true style, and Mr. Gericke is no exception to this rule. Both Berlioz and Russian music for this reason seldom receive justice, since our best orchestral leaders are German. The performance was letter, or rather note-perfect, but the spirit was lacking. Mr. Gericke and his men made up for this in the Liszt rhapsody. This was magnificently given. There are no words to express the finesse, the exquisite finish, the dash, swing, abandon of the orchestra's playing. It was, in one word, superb. Not a trace of that blatant vulgarity so easy to find in these rhapsodies when played by inferior artists, was visible. A Liszt rhapsody and an enthusiastic and delighted audience! Mr. Gericke and his men have every reason to rejoice at the miracle.

At the Thursday evening concert Loeffler's "Night in the Ukrain," for violin and orchestra, was the novelty. Mr. Loeffler has not succeeded in writing Russian music. His sadness means dreariness; his mirth, noise; and what should be the music of the balaliaka, (not balaika as in programme), was monotonous. Mr. Kneisel played, as he always plays, exquisitely, but Russian themes are not played as German lieder, and both soloist, orchestra and composer, were as men groping in the dark, blind to the helping light of Gogol's poetic genius. The orchestra apparently played Richard Strauss's music, "Till Eulenspiegel's Merry Pranks" beautifully. That it didn't sound beautifully was not their fault. It will probably sound more beautiful twenty years hence, if played then. The Beethoven symphony was finely given, and, altogether, it may be said of this second visit of the Boston Orchestra that it was more successful than ever, and again we take off our hats to the finest orchestra in America, and perhaps in the world. A. McA.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1899.

Unable to Pay Debts.

Anna Millar Asks for Relief.

FILES A PETITION IN THE FEDERAL COURT TO BE DECLARED A BANKRUPT—HER LIABILITIES PLACED AT $7,500, WITH NO AVAILABLE ASSETS.

Miss Anna Millar, manager of the Chicago Orchestral Association, made famous by Theodore Thomas, has declared herself a bankrupt, and has asked the Federal Court to relieve her of $7,500 of indebtedness. Her assets she enumerates as an ordinary wardrobe of clothes, worth not more than $100, and $100 worth of other personal property, but these two items are exempt under the law. A protest will be made, it is said, by the principal creditors, who hold that Miss Millar has at present a good income as manager of Mr. Thomas' orchestra, and that therefore she is not a bankrupt in the meaning of the law.

The petition in bankruptcy was filed by her attorney, Ralph H. Thatcher. Miss Millar was not in her office in the Auditorium tower, nor in her home, 13 Aldine square, when inquirers called for her. The members of her family said they did not know she had declared herself a bankrupt.

Schedule of Indebtedness.

The items of indebtedness enumerated in the petition are as follows:

H. W. Huttig, Muscatine, Ia., seven notes aggregating	$2,745.00
Musical Courier Company, New York, advertising	2,400.00
Blumenberg Press, New York, printing	490.45
Standard Embossing Company, Chicago, printing	337.00
Richardson & Foos, New York, printing	121.45
Brentano's, New York, printing and stationery	84.00
N. L. Weil, Chicago, ladies' tailor	95.00
Margaret Dennison, Muscatine, Ia., one note	195.00
W. J. Champion, Chicago, alley "L" advertising	90.00
Knickerbocker & Cost, Chicago, livery	38.50
Musical Record, Chicago, advertising	120.00
Brentano's, Chicago, books and stationery	23.49
Hollister Brothers, Chicago, printing	75.50
Arcade Livery, Chicago, livery	18.00
Teresa Carreño, Berlin (no account)	250.00
Register Life Insurance Company, Davenport, Ia., one note	225.00
Musical America, New York, advertising	50.00
A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago, books, &c.	13.95
Maison Nouvelle, Chicago, merchandise	12.00
G. Schirmer & Co., New York, merchandise	15.30
Ed. Schuberth, New York, merchandise	4.90
Total	$7,504.54

Cause of Her Embarrassment.

From most of these bills the creditors believe that the greater part of the indebtedness was incurred in touring European musicians through America. Mr. Thatcher, her attorney, said yesterday he had been given to understand that Miss Millar was unable to pay the scheduled indebtedness because of an unfortunate real estate investment she had made several years ago, which amounted almost to a swindle. The bankruptcy petition recites that almost all of the indebtedness was incurred in September, 1897, and October, 1898.

The financial troubles of Miss Millar will in no way, it is said, affect the financial condition of the Chicago Orchestra.

OUR Chicago representative has refrained from referring to this matter for reasons not necessary to explain, and we republish the above from the Times-Herald of that city of December 5. This company's account is not correctly itemized, nor has it any standing in the above list, as our transactions were not made with Miss Millar but with the manager of the Orchestral Association of Chicago. From the above statement and from what is generally known in Chicago musical circles there was really no reason for Miss Millar to have made such a serious step as a relief through bankruptcy; she is said to have acted on advice, but no advice is good that suggests the total disregard of experienced business judgment. Bankruptcy is a stain that becomes larger by inverse ratio; that is, the smaller the sum involved the greater the stain. Deducting the errors in the above list that we know (and there may be others) Miss Millar owed less than $5,000, of which nearly $2,800 is due to one person. All the small sums could readily have been adjusted with a little diplomacy and the larger creditor in Muscatine could have been consulted and, surely, he would have preferred most anything to the driving of Miss Millar into bankruptcy.

It was a fatal error. The questions that now arise are of more eventfulness to the Chicago Orchestral Association than to Miss Millar, whose career is virtually closed in such a bungling fashion as to make her useless from a business point of view. If any protest is to be made against these proceedings on the ground that Miss Millar has a good income at present we would advise against it, for she is a woman and should not be forced out of employment for any petty feelings. She needs her income more than any of the small creditors need their money; all of us should feel sorry for her for not having had the moral courage to step out and consult her creditors openly and ask for an arrangement. That was what she should have done. She should have taken them into her confidence instead of taking their confidence and then she could have avoided this fearful step.

No doubt the wealthy men of the Chicago Orchestral Association will see to it that she retains her position. The Association gave her complete control and for that reason she probably and no doubt involved the Association, although neither side may have been conscious of it at the time. Future developments will disclose the true condition.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL, Mornings, $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), 10 Pages, $1.00 per annum, in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Performance by the Orchestra and Baermann, Pianist.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last evening. Again, as at the two preceding concerts, brilliancy was the characteristic feature of the programme and of the playing. The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann, the Boston pianist.

The audience was perhaps a shade smaller than usual, on account, doubtless, of the many social features and the business pressure which the Christmas season brings in its train. But if not large, it was thoroughly representative of the musical culture of the city, and keenly awake to the fine quality of the tone-feast which was provided for its enjoyment.

Although the programme contained four numbers, the concert was concluded at half-past 9. This admirable brevity has been a feature of this season's performances. An hour and a half is an excellent length for a concert of solid music, which may easily prove fatiguing to the hearer if spun out for the space of two hours. Last night's programme included the following numbers:

Overture, "Hans Heiling" . Heinrich Marschner
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54
.... Robert Schumann
I. Allegro affettuoso (A minor).
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso (F major).
III. Allegro vivace (A major).
Three Hungarian dances, Nos. 1, 2 and 6
.... Johannes Brahms
(Scored for orchestra by the composer and Albert Parlow.)
I. Allegro molto (G minor).
II. Allegretto (F major).
VI. Vivace (D major).
Symphony No. 3, in D major, op. 29.....
.... Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky
(First time at these concerts.)
I. Introduzione e Allegro:
Moderato assai (Tempo di marcia funebre (D minor).
Allegro brilliante (D major).
II. Alla Tedesca:
Allegro moderato e simplice (B-flat major).
III. Andante:
Andante elegiaco (D minor).
V. Finale:
Allegro con fuoco (Tempo di Polacca) (D major).

The feature of the programme was the first performance here of Tschaikovsky's third symphony in five movements, of which the first three and the last were played. It is hardly necessary to say that the first hearing of a symphony by the great Russian composer is no ordinary event, or to point out the fact that his music is far too deep to be adequately analyzed upon such slight acquaintance. Only impressions can be recorded. Briefly, it may be noted that this D major symphony does not impress the hearer as forcibly as the great "Pathetique" or one or two of the others. Yet it is unmistakably an original, coherent and powerful work. Were it presented as the opus I of a new composer it could hardly fail to create a profound sensation. As it is, the authorship of the work would not easily be mistaken by anyone familiar with Tschaikovsky's style, even were no name appended. The character of the themes, the means by which they are elaborated, the richness and originality of the instrumentation, even the solemn dignity, touched with a tint of vagueness, of the introduction, are all thoroughly characteristic and familiar. Not that Tschaikovsky's invention is so poor that he repeats himself, but simply that he impresses his personality upon his music as forcibly as did Handel or Schumann. The work presented last night is rich in thematic material, largely drawn, apparently, from the field of Russian folk-song, the melodies are blended and contrasted with a master-hand, and there is effective climax. The performance was unexceptionable.

The remaining orchestral numbers of the programme, while somewhat brief, were extremely interesting, and aided materially in lending to the concert the tone of brilliancy already referred to. The set of Hungarian dances by Brahms, based upon national Magyar melodies, were very fascinating in their virile freedom of movement and their irresistible swing. The orchestral setting with which these dances, originally composed for piano, have been provided by the composer and Albert Parlow, is a most noteworthy and effective one. Again Mr. Gericke and his players distinguished themselves by a sympathetic reading and a performance full of fire.

Schumann's A-minor concerto for piano, which Mr. Baermann chose for his solo number, is a favorite with many pianists, and one of the most brilliant works of its genre. Of Mr. Baermann's performance it is almost enough to say that it was quite up to the level of his reputation, which is of the highest. The work calls for exceptional clearness of finger work, for sonority of tone and for elegant phrasing. In each of these particulars the pianist was thoroughly satisfactory. His playing was that of a refined and mature artist, gifted at once with ample technical endowments and clear insight into the meaning of the composer. The accompaniment was by no means a perfect one. Nevertheless, Mr. Baermann was given a flattering reception and justly recalled.

The fourth concert of the symphony series will be given at Infantry Hall on the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 31.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1899

PADEREWSKI ARRIVES IN BOSTON

Many Calls Are Made Upon the Pianist Who Says He Is Glad to Be in This City Again

Quite a flutter of excitement attended the arrival at the Brunswick this morning of Paderewski, the famous pianist. As he passed through the corridor he warmly greetd old acquaintances and recognizing the manager, Herbert Barnes, he rushed up and gave him a prolonged handshake. The pianist is looking in the best of health. Although quite a number called to see Paderewski and his wife, very few were admitted. At about eleven o'clock Mr. Montgomery Sears was received. With Pederewski besides his valet is the man who stands between him and the world, Count Goerlitz of London, and another London friend, Mr. W. Atlington. Count Goerlitz is a cosmopolitan, and a most polished and fascinating social leader. He is the one who arranges all those delightful little dinners that Paderewski sometimes delights in. The count has travelled extensively and last summer went all through the war region in Southern Africa.

Pederewski likes Boston very much, and said today that he was very glad to be here again. He expressed much astonishment over the queer lawns and the balmy weather. Whether he remains in quiet seclusion while here or not will be as he wills, for already he has received hosts of invitations to Yule-tide festivities. He makes his first appearance at the rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall tomorrow afternoon.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1899

PHYSICAL ENDURANCE AND PADEREWSKI

Since Ten This Morning Hundreds Have Awaited the Opening of the Doors

One of the great sights of the day was the rush on the part of the twenty-five cent ticket holders to hear Paderewski, the pianist, at the symphony rehearsal this afternoon. Even at ten o'clock a great number made their appearance, and although they knew that the concert would not begin until 2.30 o'clock, not a soul was daunted. It was not very long after ten o'clock before the Hamilton-street and the Winter-street entrances were thronged. The crowds took the long wait philosophically; many had fortified themselves with a lunch; those unaccompanied by a friend had taken a book, and more than one sensible woman deliberately sat down on the floor and with patience bided the time before the gates would be open. Every Friday afternoon the second balcony is given to the holders of the twenty-five cent admission tickets.

As every other seat in the house, except these, are owned by season ticket holders, there is nothing available to the public but these seats, and if Paderewski is to be heard there is no other way but to "rush." Various names they have given to these tickets, and at the ticket window one hears calls for "rehearsal tickets," "twenty-five cent tickets," "standee's" and "Grab Seats." The number of tickets sold in this manner is limited to the capacity of the hall, and those who do not get a balcony seat stand on the floor, or sit on the stage steps.

At exactly 1.30 today assistant manager Comee gave the signal. Some one shouted in a stentorian voice heard at the four entrances, "All Right," and in a trice the hundreds, with a rush like that of a college eleven making a guards back play, burst through the gates and in a tumultuous throng were hurrying up the stairs. The great empty hall echoed and reëchoed with the rushing tread until it sounded like the roar of Niagara. Those who led the rush kept smartly to the front, and as the excitement grew peals of laughter rang out until it seemed as though a laughing chorus was the opening of the Symphony concert. When the second balcony had been reached and the seats claimed in a twinkling, triumph was exultantly waved in handkerchief signals between friends divided by the hall.

There was an unusual rush today for the left side of the hall. Why? Because the hands of the pianist are to be seen from the left side. In selling these tickets the man at the window was besieged with "I want to see his hands," or "which side am I to go for that?" until his head reeled.

At last one woman came along and announced "I want to see his feet" (she had eyes for his pedaling). "Thank heavens!" said the ticket seller devoutly, as with a sigh of relief he pushed out a ticket and admonished, "Go to the left to see his feet."

Inside of one minute and a half from the time the gates were opened every one of those music lovers who had waited in the entrance for hours were seated in the balcony and on the stage steps. There for one hour they sat until the concert began. Hundreds were turned away disappointed because they could not secure a rush ticket.

[illegible]

SUNDAY, DEC. 24, [illegible]

PADEREWSKI AT THE SYMPHONY.

The first appearance here of Ignace Paderewski since his return from Europe drew out immense audiences at the symphony rehearsal and concert. In fact the seating and standing capacities of Music hall were tested to their limits, and for a week before his arrival the notices that "all tickets had been sold," which met the gaze of hundreds of would-be purchasers were amply justified in the statements. After an absence of about three years the pianist came back to Boston a trifle stouter, the same luxuriant orange hair wreathing his thoughtful face, and with his genius unimpaired. The pianist evidently has lost none of his artistic powers as a performer and virtuoso, and certainly the charm of his personality is as potent as ever, if the unmistakable tributes of admiration shown at the concerts augur aright. They were the same demonstrations that have marked his former appearances, the excess of feminine delight being specially in evidence. The seldom vouchsafed encore was conceded after numerous recalls at the close of the concerto, and this at a symphony performance speaks volumes because of its rarity.

The program was as follows: Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Beethoven's fifth concerto for pianoforte, and Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor. Paderewski's interpretation of the concerto was masterly throughout. Whether he is a greater artist now than when he was here before must be a matter of personal opinion, for the plane that he then reached was so lofty that criticism was almost disarmed. And yet his performance of the concerto seemed to be an achievement in advance of his previous efforts. The opening cadenza in the first movement was as brilliant as one could imagine, and the difficult ascending scales in the latter part were played with a delicacy and finish exquisite in every respect.

The characteristic traits of contrasts between the solo instrument and the orchestra were never in doubt, the pianist catching the true spirit of the work and not charging it with an individuality inconsistent with the composer's ideas. In the second and third movements, which are really connected, the arpeggio work was wonderfully clear and facile and all of the elaborate figuration was beautifully shown in the finger tracery of the gifted man. It is unnecessary to speak of Paderewski's technique, phrasing, energy or quality of tone; a master in all he surely is and needs no further praise. His welcome was of exceptional warmth and at the close the demonstrations by his auditors amounted to a furore.

The orchestral work in the concerto was magnificent, Mr Gericke and his band being thoroughly in sympathy with their portion of the interpretation. The Gluck overture was given with good effect, the different sentiments being expressed in an artistic manner, and the performance of the Cesar Franck symphony is to be commended, the work by the wind instruments in particular in the closing movement. But it was Paderewski the auditors came to hear and, for once at least, the orchestra to the majority of the attendants was of minor importance.

This week's program will comprise Moszkowski's suite No. 1, in F, Horatio Parker's "Northern Ballad," first time here, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

BOSTON POST,

The Representative Democratic Paper OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 24, 1899.

PADEREWSKI THE STAR.

Audience Seemingly Cared for Little Else at the Symphony Concert.

Ignace J. Paderewski was the soloist at the Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening, and the magic of his name was sufficient to bring together the largest evening audience of the present season.

He has apparently gained in popularity, for not only was every seat occupied, but hundreds of ladies as well as gentlemen were standing. As further evidence that it was Paderewski chiefly who was the centre of interest, at the conclusion of his concerto many left the hall without waiting to hear the Franck Symphony.

The Polish pianist has changed but little in personal appearance or mannerisms since he was last in Boston. The shock of chrysanthemum-yellow hair, the incipient mustache, the movements of his chair until he has attained the proper linear distance from the keyboard, and the nervous rubbing of his hands when not actually engaged in playing, are still the prominent features of his performance and seemed to please his enraptured audience as much as ever.

His number was Beethoven's concerto No. 5 in E flat. It is not a work that offers exceptional opportunities for brilliancy, nor yet the display of especially fine phrasing, the orchestra playing nearly as important a part as the solo instrument. Yet withal the music is exquisitely sweet, with much that is melodic as well as inspiring.

The two other numbers on the programme were Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, both of which were admirably done. The programme this week for the rehearsal and concert will include Moszkowski's Suite No. 1 in F, D. W. Parker's "Northern Ballad" and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony No. 6.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 13, 1899.

Unable to Pay Debts.

ANNA MILLAR ASKS FOR RELIEF.

FILES A PETITION IN THE FEDERAL COURT TO BE DECLARED A BANKRUPT—HER LIABILITIES PLACED AT $7,500, WITH NO AVAILABLE ASSETS.

Miss Anna Millar, manager of the Chicago Orchestral Association, made famous by Theodore Thomas, has declared herself a bankrupt, and has asked the Federal Court to relieve her of $7,500 of indebtedness. Her assets she enumerates as an ordinary wardrobe of clothes, worth not more than $100, and $100 worth of other personal property, but these two items are exempt under the law. A protest will be made, it is said, by the principal creditors, who hold that Miss Millar has at present a good income as manager of Mr. Thomas' orchestra, and that therefore she is not a bankrupt in the meaning of the law.

The petition in bankruptcy was filed by her attorney, Ralph H. Thatcher. Miss Millar was not in her office in the Auditorium tower, nor in her home, 13 Aldine square, when inquirers called for her. The members of her family said they did not know she had declared herself a bankrupt.

SCHEDULE OF INDEBTEDNESS.

The items of indebtedness enumerated in the petition are as follows:

H. W. Huttig, Muscatine, Ia., seven notes aggregating	$2,745.00
Musical Courier Company, New York, advertising	2,400.00
Blumenberg Press, New York, printing	490.45
Standard Embossing Company, Chicago, printing	337.00
Richardson & Foos, New York, printing	121.45
Brentano's, New York, printing and stationery	84.00
N. L. Weil, Chicago, ladies' tailor	95.00
Margaret Dennison, Muscatine, Ia., one note	195.00
W. J. Champion, Chicago, alley "L" advertising	90.00
Knickerbocker & Cost, Chicago, livery	38.50
Musical Record, Chicago, advertising	120.00
Brentano's, Chicago, books and stationery	23.49
Hollister Brothers, Chicago, printing	75.50
Arcade Livery, Chicago, livery	18.00
Teresa Carreño, Berlin (no account)	250.00
Register Life Insurance Company, Davenport, Ia., one note	225.00
Musical America, New York, advertising	50.00
A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago, books, &c	13.95
Maison Nouvelle, Chicago, merchandise	1[illegible].00
G. Schirmer & Co., New York, merchandise	15.30
Ed. Schuberth, New York, merchandise	4.90
Total	$7,504.54

CAUSE OF HER EMBARRASSMENT.

From most of these bills the creditors believe that the greater part of the indebtedness was incurred in touring European musicians through America. Mr. Thatcher, her attorney, said yesterday he had been given to understand that Miss Millar was unable to pay the scheduled indebtedness because of an unfortunate real estate investment she had made several years ago, which amounted almost to a swindle. The bankruptcy petition recites that almost all of the indebtedness was incurred in September, 1897, and October, 1898.

The financial troubles of Miss Millar will in no way, it is said, affect the financial condition of the Chicago Orchestra.

OUR Chicago representative has refrained from referring to this matter for reasons not necessary to explain, and we republish the above from the Times-Herald of that city of December 5. This company's account is not correctly itemized, nor has it any standing in the above list, as our transactions were not made with Miss Millar but with the manager of the Orchestral Association of Chicago. From the above statement and from what is generally known in Chicago musical circles there was really no reason for Miss Millar to have made such a serious step as a relief through bankruptcy; she is said to have acted on advice, but no advice is good that suggests the total disregard of experienced business judgment. Bankruptcy is a stain that becomes larger by inverse ratio; that is, the smaller the sum involved the greater the stain. Deducting the errors in the above list that we know (and there may be others) Miss Millar owed less than $5,000, of which nearly $2,800 is due to one person. All the small sums could readily have been adjusted with a little diplomacy and the larger creditor in Muscatine could have been consulted and, surely, he would have preferred most anything to the driving of Miss Millar into bankruptcy.

It was a fatal error. The questions that now arise are of more eventfulness to the Chicago Orchestral Association than to Miss Millar, whose career is virtually closed in such a bungling fashion as to make her useless from a business point of view. If any protest is to be made against these proceedings on the ground that Miss Millar has a good income at present we would advise against it, for she is a woman and should not be forced out of employment for any petty feelings. She needs her income more than any of the small creditors need their money; all of us should feel sorry for her for not having had the moral courage to step out and consult her creditors openly and ask for an arrangement. That was what she should have done. She should have taken them into her confidence instead of taking their confidence and then she could have avoided this fearful step.

No doubt the wealthy men of the Chicago Orchestral Association will see to it that she retains her position. The Association gave her complete control and for that reason she probably and no doubt involved the Association, although neither side may have been conscious of it at the time. Future developments will disclose the true condition.

PROVIDENCE JOURNAL.
PUBLISHED BY THE
PROVIDENCE JOURNAL COMPANY,
Nos. 209 and 213 Westminster St.
DAILY JOURNAL—Mornings, $6.00 per annum, $1.50 for three months, 50 cents one month.
SUNDAY JOURNAL, $2.00 per annum.
MANUFACTURERS AND FARMERS JOURNAL (Mondays and Thursdays), 10 Pages, $1.00 per annum, in advance.
THE EVENING BULLETIN, $6.00 per annum.
☞ Postage free to mail subscribers whose payment of subscription is made in advance.

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1899.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brilliant Performance by the Orchestra and Baermann, Pianist.

The third concert of the season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra was given in Infantry Hall last evening. Again, as at the two preceding concerts, brilliancy was the characteristic feature of the programme and of the playing. The soloist was Mr. Carl Baermann, the Boston pianist.

The audience was perhaps a shade smaller than usual, on account, doubtless, of the many social features and the business pressure which the Christmas season brings in its train. But if not large, it was thoroughly representative of the musical culture of the city, and keenly awake to the fine quality of the tone-feast which was provided for its enjoyment.

Although the programme contained four numbers, the concert was concluded at half-past 9. This admirable brevity has been a feature of this season's performances. An hour and a half is an excellent length for a concert of solid music, which may easily prove fatiguing to the hearer if spun out for the space of two hours. Last night's programme included the following numbers:

Overture, "Hans Heiling"..Heinrich Marschner
Concerto for pianoforte in A minor, op. 54
..........................Robert Schumann
I. Allegro affettuoso (A minor).
II. Intermezzo: Andantino grazioso (F major).
III. Allegro vivace (A major).
Three Hungarian dances, Nos. 1. 2 and 6
..........................Johannes Brahms
(Scored for orchestra by the composer and Albert Parlow.)
I. Allegro molto (G minor).
II. Allegretto (F major).
VI. Vivace (D major).
Symphony No. 3, in D major, op. 29.....
..................Peter Ilyitch Tchaikovsky
(First time at these concerts.)
I. Introduzione e Allegro:
Moderato assai (Tempo di marcia funebre (D minor).
Allegro brilliante (D major).
II. Alla Tedesca:
Allegro moderato e simplice (B-flat major).
III. Andante:
Andante elegiaco (D minor).
V. Finale:
Allegro con fuoco (Tempo di Polacca) (D major).

The feature of the programme was the first performance here of Tschaikovsky's third symphony in five movements, of which the first three and the last were played. It is hardly necessary to say that the first hearing of a symphony by the great Russian composer is no ordinary event, or to point out the fact that his music is far too deep to be adequately analyzed upon such slight acquaintance. Only impressions can be recorded. Briefly, it may be noted that this D major symphony does not impress the hearer as forcibly as the great "Pathetique" or one or two of the others. Yet it is unmistakably an original, coherent and powerful work. Were it presented as the opus I of a new composer it could hardly fail to create a profound sensation. As it is, the authorship of the work would not easily be mistaken by anyone familiar with Tschaikovsky's style, even were no name appended. The character of the themes, the means by which they are elaborated, the richness and originality of the instrumentation, even the solemn dignity, touched with a tint of vagueness, of the introduction, are all thoroughly characteristic and familiar. Not that Tschaikovsky's invention is so poor that he repeats himself, but simply that he impresses his personality upon his music as forcibly as did Handel or Schumann. The work presented last night is rich in thematic material, largely drawn, apparently, from the field of Russian folk-song, the melodies are blended and contrasted with a master-hand, and there is effective climax. The performance was unexceptionable.

The remaining orchestral numbers of the programme, while somewhat brief, were extremely interesting, and aided materially in lending to the concert the tone of brilliancy already referred to. The set of Hungarian dances by Brahms, based upon national Magyar melodies, were very fascinating in their virile freedom of movement and their irresistible swing. The orchestral setting with which these dances, originally composed for piano, have been provided by the composer and Albert Parlow, is a most noteworthy and effective one. Again Mr. Gericke and his players distinguished themselves by a sympathetic reading and a performance full of fire.

Schumann's A-minor concerto for piano, which Mr. Baermann chose for his solo number, is a favorite with many pianists, and one of the most brilliant works of its genre. Of Mr. Baermann's performance it is almost enough to say that it was quite up to the level of his reputation, which is of the highest. The work calls for exceptional clearness of finger work, for sonority of tone and for elegant phrasing. In each of these particulars the pianist was thoroughly satisfactory. His playing was that of a refined and mature artist, gifted at once with ample technical endowments and clear insight into the meaning of the composer. The accompaniment was by no means a perfect one. Nevertheless, Mr. Baermann was given a flattering reception and justly recalled.

The fourth concert of the symphony series will be given at Infantry Hall on the evening of Wednesday, Jan. 31.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, DECEMBER 21, 1899

PADEREWSKI ARRIVES IN BOSTON

Many Calls Are Made Upon the Pianist Who Says He Is Glad to Be in This City Again

Quite a flutter of excitement attended the arrival at the Brunswick this morning of Paderewski, the famous pianist. As he passed through the corridor he warmly greetd old acquaintances and recognizing the manager, Herbert Barnes, he rushed up and gave him a prolonged handshake. The pianist is looking in the best of health. Although quite a number called to see Paderewski and his wife, very few were admitted. At about eleven o'clock Mr. Montgomery Sears was received. With Pederewski besides his valet is the man who stands between him and the world, Count Goerlitz of London, and another London friend, Mr. W. Atlington. Count Goerlitz is a cosmopolitan, and a most polished and fascinating social leader. He is the one who arranges all those delightful little dinners that Paderewski sometimes delights in. The count has travelled extensively and last summer went all through the war region in Southern Africa.

Pederewski likes Boston very much, and said today that he was very glad to be here again. He expressed much astonishment over the queer lawns and the balmy weather. Whether he remains in quiet seclusion while here or not will be as he wills, for already he has received hosts of invitations to Yule-tide festivities. He makes his first appearance at the rehearsal of the Boston Symphony Orchestra in Music Hall tomorrow afternoon.

Boston Transcript

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 22, 1899

PHYSICAL ENDURANCE AND PADEREWSKI

Since Ten This Morning Hundreds Have Awaited the Opening of the Doors

One of the great sights of the day was the rush on the part of the twenty-five cent ticket holders to hear Paderewski, the pianist, at the symphony rehearsal this afternoon. Even at ten o'clock a great number made their appearance, and although they knew that the concert would not begin until 2.30 o'clock, not a soul was daunted. It was not very long after ten o'clock before the Hamilton-street and the Winter-street entrances were thronged. The crowds took the long wait philosophically; many had fortified themselves with a lunch; those unaccompanied by a friend had taken a book, and more than one sensible woman deliberately sat down on the floor and with patience bided the time before the gates would be open. Every Friday afternoon the second balcony is given to the holders of the twenty-five cent admission tickets.

As every other seat in the house, except these, are owned by season ticket holders, there is nothing available to the public but these seats, and if Paderewski is to be heard there is no other way but to "rush." Various names they have given to these tickets, and at the ticket window one hears calls for "rehearsal tickets," "twenty-five cent tickets," "standee's" and "Grab Seats." The number of tickets sold in this manner is limited to the capacity of the hall, and those who do not get a balcony seat stand on the floor, or sit on the stage steps.

At exactly 1.30 today assistant manager Comee gave the signal. Some one shouted in a stentorian voice heard at the four entrances, "All Right," and in a trice the hundreds, with a rush like that of a college eleven making a guards back play, burst through the gates and in a tumultuous throng were hurrying up the stairs. The great empty hall echoed and reëchoed with the rushing tread until it sounded like the roar of Niagara. Those who led the rush kept smartly to the front, and as the excitement grew peals of laughter rang out until it seemed as though a laughing chorus was the opening of the Symphony concert. When the second balcony had been reached and the seats claimed in a twinkling, triumph was exultantly waved in handkerchief signals between friends divided by the hall.

There was an unusual rush today for the left side of the hall. Why? Because the hands of the pianist are to be seen from the left side. In selling these tickets the man at the window was besieged with "I want to see his hands," or "which side am I to go for that?" until his head reeled

At last one woman came along and announced "I want to see his feet" (she had eyes for his pedaling). "Thank heavens!" said the ticket seller devoutly, as with a sigh of relief he pushed out a ticket and admonished, "Go to the left to see his feet."

Inside of one minute and a half from the time the gates were opened every one of those music lovers who had waited in the entrance for hours were seated in the balcony and on the stage steps. There for one hour they sat until the concert began. Hundreds were turned away disappointed because they could not secure a rush ticket.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 24, 1899.

PADEREWSKI AT THE SYMPHONY.

The first appearance here of Ignace Paderewski since his return from Europe drew out immense audiences at the symphony rehearsal and concert. In fact the seating and standing capacities of Music hall were tested to their limits, and for a week before his arrival the notices that "all tickets had been sold," which met the gaze of hundreds of would-be purchasers were amply justified in the statements. After an absence of about three years the pianist came back to Boston a trifle stouter, the same luxuriant orange hair wreathing his thoughtful face, and with his genius unimpaired. The pianist evidently has lost none of his artistic powers as a performer and virtuoso, and certainly the charm of his personality is as potent as ever, if the unmistakable tributes of admiration shown at the concerts augur aright. They were the same demonstrations that have marked his former appearances, the excess of feminine delight being specially in evidence. The seldom vouchsafed encore was conceded after numerous recalls at the close of the concerto, and this at a symphony performance speaks volumes because of its rarity.

The program was as follows: Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis," Beethoven's fifth concerto for pianoforte, and Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor. Paderewski's interpretation of the concerto was masterly throughout. Whether he is a greater artist now than when he was here before must be a matter of personal opinion, for the plane that he then reached was so lofty that criticism was almost disarmed. And yet his performance of the concerto seemed to be an achievement in advance of his previous efforts. The opening cadenza in the first movement was as brilliant as one could imagine, and the difficult ascending scales in the latter part were played with a delicacy and finish exquisite in every respect.

The characteristic traits of contrasts between the solo instrument and the orchestra were never in doubt, the pianist catching the true spirit of the work and not charging it with an individuality inconsistent with the composer's ideas. In the second and third movements, which are really connected, the arpeggio work was wonderfully clear and facile and all of the elaborate figuration was beautifully shown in the finger tracery of the gifted man. It is unnecessary to speak of Paderewski's technique, phrasing, energy or quality of tone; a master in all he surely is and needs no further praise. His welcome was of exceptional warmth and at the close the demonstrations by his auditors amounted to a furore.

The orchestral work in the concerto was magnificent, Mr Gericke and his band being thoroughly in sympathy with their portion of the interpretation. The Gluck overture was given with good effect, the different sentiments being expressed in an artistic manner, and the performance of the Cesar Franck symphony is to be commended, the work by the wind instruments in particular in the closing movement. But it was Paderewski the auditors came to hear and, for once at least, the orchestra to the majority of the attendants was of minor importance.

This week's program will comprise Moszkowski's suite No. 1, in F, Horatio Parker's "Northern Ballad," first time here, and Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, DECEMBER 24, 1899.

PADEREWSKI THE STAR.

Audience Seemingly Cared for Little Else at the Symphony Concert.

Ignace J. Paderewski was the soloist at the Symphony concert in Music Hall last evening, and the magic of his name was sufficient to bring together the largest evening audience of the present season.

He has apparently gained in popularity, for not only was every seat occupied, but hundreds of ladies as well as gentlemen were standing. As further evidence that it was Paderewski chiefly who was the centre of interest, at the conclusion of his concerto many left the hall without waiting to hear the Franck Symphony.

The Polish pianist has changed but little in personal appearance or mannerisms since he was last in Boston. The shock of chrysanthemum yellow hair, the incipient mustache, the movements of his chair until he has attained the proper linear distance from the keyboard, and the nervous rubbing of his hands when not actually engaged in playing, are still the prominent features of his performance and seemed to please his enraptured audience as much as ever.

His number was Beethoven's concerto No. 5 in E flat. It is not a work that offers exceptional opportunities for brilliancy, nor yet the display of especially fine phrasing, the orchestra playing nearly as important a part as the solo instrument. Yet withal the music is exquisitely sweet, with much that is melodic as well as inspiring.

The two other numbers on the programme were Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" and Cesar Franck's Symphony in D minor, both of which were admirably done. The programme this week for the rehearsal and concert will include Moszkowski's Suite No. 1 in F, D. W. Parker's "Northern Ballad" and Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony No. 6.

[illegible]
[illegible] EVERY SUNDAY [illegible]
VOL. CVL, NO. 177.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Paderewski Greeted with Wild Applause by the Audience.

His Playing of Beethoven Does No Justice to the Composer—As an Encore, He Gives a Rubinstein Barcarolle—Overture from Gluck Gloriously Read.

The programme for last evening's concert in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was:

Overture, "Iphegenia in Aulis"..........Gluck
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat..
Beethoven
Symphony in D minor..............Cesar Franck

The soloist was Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

An immense audience was in attendance, a considerable portion of it evidently attracted by the famous pianist, for it disappeared immediately after the solo performances were over. The welcome accorded him was almost frenzied in its acclaim. His interpretation of the concerto showed that during his absence he had not become any more felicitous as a Beethoven player than he was on his earlier visits here.

It was all very pretty, very fluent, very graceful and very amiable; but it was lacking in largeness of conception, nobility of style and vigor of emphasis, generally. The qualities of the concerto which won for it the title of "Emperor" became inconspicuous in the piano part, under the treatment to which it was subjected and were accented only in the reading of the prominent orchestral features of the work. The result was a most curious contrast; Mr. Gericke's share in the performance having the broad, manly Beethoven character, while Mr. Paderewski's was effeminate and resembling somewhat the vein in which he reads or was accustomed to read Chopin.

In other words the effort was unsatisfactory in its want of heroic breadth of style and of virility. It was smooth, eminently refined, and unquestionably perfect in its finger work. Now and then it was not rhythmically clear, and also now and then singular liberties were taken with the indications the composer gave for the phrasing, the most startling innovation being the change in the original markings of the opening theme of the finale.

It is true that one cannot always say with authority exactly what Beethoven meant in this or that of his masterpieces, but the difficulty is not so great in determining what he did not, or could not have meant; and it is quite clear that he never intended this noble and virile concerto to be given in the epicene vein in which Mr. Paderewski conceived and played it.

However, the audience as a whole approved the artist's performance with storms of applause, recalling him again and again, until at length the wise custom that has prevailed at these concerts of permitting no encores was again violated, and the soloist returned to the piano and played Rubinstein's Bacarolle in A minor. It was, however, so distorted by the remarkable phrasing, vagaries of tempo and of rhythm, and mawkishness of sentimentality with which it was performed, that it was not easy to recognize it until it was well on its way. All which is distressful enough in the stating, but Mr. Paderewski's eminence and popularity are of a nature that can well withstand it.

The Gluck overture was gloriously read and played. How these giants of old knew how to obtain massive and stirring effects with a few instruments and by simple means! There is undoubtedly much in the work that sounds quaint to modern ears, but how strong and effective, and, at times, supremely noble, is the tone color. Nothing could have been more just to the music and more satisfying to the critical understanding than the large interpretation Mr. Gericke gave it.

The Franck symphony became clearer on a new hearing, and its powerful originality and deep imaginativeness were more vigorously emphasized; but that it became more pleasing, that it appealed with any greater force to the warmer emotions, that it seemed less morbid, can hardly be conceded. Then too, the brief themes of the composer and his incessant repetitions of them in sequences, at last prove tiresome in the monotony of effect they produce. It was performed with exquisite finish, and in its more stirring moments, with a brilliancy and a spirit that were almost exciting.

The programme for the next concert is: Suite No. 1, in F, Moszkowski; "Northern Ballad," Horatio W. Parker (first time), and the "Pastoral" symphony, by Beethoven.

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1899

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Wilhelm Gericke, has continued as the city's principal musical attraction, and hundreds of students have availed themselves of the Friday afternoon rehearsals to hear this matchless organization. These same students have had countless opportunities to attend chamber concerts, piano recitals and the like. The Kneisel Quartet still maintains its high position, while the Apollo, Cecilia, Handel and Haydn and other singing societies have given their usual concerts. Various musicians and singers of high rank have been heard, among them Madeline Schiller, Paderewski, De Pachmann and Clara Butt; and the municipal concerts, organized by Mayor Quincy in the fall of 1898, have not only been kept up to a high standard but have met with marked popular success.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1899.

CÉSAR FRANCK.

His Symphony in D Minor Repeated Last Night.

A Work of Uncommon Beauty and Strength.

Mr. Paderewski Played a Beethoven Concerto.

The program of the ninth Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, in Music Hall, last night, was as follows:

Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis"..........
Gluck-Wagner
Piano concerto in E flat............Beethoven
Mr. Paderewski.
Symphony in D minor..........César Franck

The program was well arranged. The quietly tragic overture of Gluck led the way effectively to the concerto of Beethoven, and the audience, which by its conduct had evidently come to see and hear a virtuoso, would have hardly brooked a longer or more complex introduction. Nor did the music of Beethoven, noble as it is, lessen the strength or discount the beauty of Franck's remarkable symphony.

Indeed, the performance of this symphony was the musical feature of the concert. The virtuoso entrances, dazzles, stuns, and in a few years he is driven out by another, and soon he is merely a tradition, a legend, and in a century there may be dispute about his name. The concerto of Beethoven will outlive many virtuosos. The symphony of Franck will outlive even virtuoso conductors, as the coin and the bust reveal to us the Roman Emperor who centuries ago was dust.

I cannot understand the attitude of those who declare and deplore while they declare that the music of César Franck will never be popular. They do not mean, of course, the popularity of "Whistling Rufus" or a march by the ingenious Mr. Sousa; they speak of such popularity as was enjoyed for some years by, say, the Lenore symphony of Raff. But how trite and how cheap to many of the younger generation is that once applauded music; how incomprehensible that easily acquired popularity! It is true that to the musician there are certain characteristics of Franck's music that at first perplex. His system of building harmonic progressions on chromatic basses suggests the thought that perhaps he heard and had constantly in mind another scheme of tonality than that which is taught in the schools as natural and inevitable. There are composers who hear such exotic scales.

But the chief obstacles to genuine popularity of music with audiences that have for years been accustomed to the best are dullness, against which even the gods contend in vain—disguised vulgarity, which will always out, and insincerity. Now if there is any music that is pure, serious, noble, lofty to the verge of mysticism, free from earthly dross, it is the music of César Franck. This must be apparent to everyone to whom the names of Bach, Beethoven, and if you wish Brahms are something more than names. Then comes the question of dullness. I confess I do not see how this reproach can be justly brought. This symphony is fascinating throughout on account of its wealth of unostentatious natural melody, its rich harmonic structure, its strongly defined rhythmic feeling, its sonorous and well contrasted orchestration. There are passages in the first movement that are of elemental grandeur, music that might accompany the shifting of worlds in the divine plan. There are pages of poignant melancholy that is neither sour nor pessimistic. And in the finale there is the hint of mighty preparation, there is the authoritative, irresistible advance of rejoicing thousands. Throughout the symphony is there constant testimony to a strong, sane, sympathetic soul, a master creator and organizer, a master musician.

⁂

Mr. Paderewski was welcomed most heartily. He gave in many respects a most agreeable and I may say elegant performance of Beethoven's heroic concerto. For in connection with his interpretation the term "elegant" may be fitly used. Whether this elegance suits Beethoven's music is another question. Mr. Paderewski's tone in passages of delicate beauty and moderate strength was, as of old, delightful. In passages that demand robust strength, his tone was inclined to be forced and harsh. To praise his general technic, to dilate upon his use of the pedals at this late day would be an impertinence. Occasionally there was extravagant elasticity in rhythm, so that there was for the moment little or no rhythm. It is needless to say that he was tumultuously applauded. He responded to the demand and played a barcarole by Rubinstein in such curious fashion that the piece was hardly to be recognized.

Philip Hale.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1899.

THE real kernel of the musical life of a city is its orchestral work. No matter how well the many concerts given by renowned artists are patronized, no matter how liberally the opera is supported, or even how flourishing local societies devoted to the various forms of choral work may be, the true test of the serious musical life of any large city is the standard of its orchestral concerts, both in program and performance, and the extent of the appreciation, both artistic and financial, of these by its public. We musicians of Philadelphia therefore have been intently watching the rapidly growing interest that has been shown for at least the last five years in the orchestral concerts given here by visiting organizations, and recognize in it the most hopeful signs of a broadening public musical feeling.

The five concerts given every season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been so well attended that for the past two years all the reserved seats of the great Academy of Music were bought for the entire series by the old subscribers before the public sale was open. This has induced the management to give this year a second series, the sale of which has been as complete and successful as the first. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not better supported even in Boston, and there can be no doubt that the concerts of this unique and incomparable organization have played a most important part in the elevation and cultivation of musical taste in Philadelphia.

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn.

AT the Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday evening the works heard were the Beethoven "Egmont" overture, the Dvorák Concerto in B minor for violoncello, three of Brahms' Hungarian dances (Nos. 1, 2 and 6) and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 3. The last named, by the way, was heard for the first time in Brooklyn.

Mr. Gericke's reading of this great composition by the Russian composer was scholarly, but rather too severe and classic for some tastes.

The playing of the "Egmont" overture alone was worth the price of admission. As this was played as the opening piece, the late arrivals missed one of the treats of the evening. Brooklyn concert-goers probably never heard the Brahms dances played better.

The 'cello concerto did not arouse great enthusiasm. It is without doubt a great work, but Mr. Schroeder's reading proved rather colorless and his playing monotonous.

The audience last Saturday was much larger than at the opening concert five weeks ago. The third concert in Brooklyn is announced for Saturday evening, January 20. Leonora Jackson will be the soloist.

·LIFE·
NEW YORK, DECEMBER 28, 1899.

Two Varieties.

THE audiences at the opera and the audiences at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra form an interesting contrast.

The opera is primarily a spectacular show, with good music thrown in. The audience is also a spectacular show, with a few lovers of music thrown in. When the spectacle grows dull, a majority of the audience study one another and indulge in pleasant converse.

At the Boston Symphony concerts the audience never talks. It listens.

At the opera, the audience itself being on exhibition, dresses and behaves accordingly. It enjoys the contemplation of itself, its jewels and its raiment even more at times than it enjoys the stage. This is legitimate, as enjoyment is the object of the expedition.

The opera itself—the performance on the stage—is frankly artificial. This artificiality, while innocent and not to be despised, explains, perhaps, why so many people who love music for music itself prefer the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the grandest of grand opera.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 177.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Paderewski Greeted with Wild Applause by the Audience.

But His Playing of Beethoven Does No Justice to the Composer—As an Encore, He Gives a Rubinstein Barcarolle—Overture from Gluck Gloriously Read.

The programme for last evening's concert in Music Hall, by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke conductor, was:

Overture, "Iphegenia in Aulis"..........Gluck
Concerto for pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat.. Beethoven
Symphony in D minor............Cesar Franck

The soloist was Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski.

An immense audience was in attendance, a considerable portion of it evidently attracted by the famous pianist, for it disappeared immediately after the solo performances were over. The welcome accorded him was almost frenzied in its acclaim. His interpretation of the concerto showed that during his absence he had not become any more felicitous as a Beethoven player than he was on his earlier visits here.

It was all very pretty, very fluent, very graceful and very amiable; but it was lacking in largeness of conception, nobility of style and vigor of emphasis, generally. The qualities of the concerto which won for it the title of "Emperor" became inconspicuous in the piano part, under the treatment to which it was subjected and were accented only in the reading of the prominent orchestral features of the work. The result was a most curious contrast; Mr. Gericke's share in the performance having the broad, manly Beethoven character, while Mr. Paderewski's was effeminate and resembling somewhat the vein in which he reads or was accustomed to read Chopin.

In other words the effort was unsatisfactory in its want of heroic breadth of style and of virility. It was smooth, eminently refined, and unquestionably perfect in its finger work. Now and then it was not rhythmically clear, and also now and then singular liberties were taken with the indications the composer gave for the phrasing the most startling innovation being the change in the original markings of the opening theme of the finale.

It is true that one cannot always say with authority exactly what Beethoven meant in this or that of his masterpieces, but the difficulty is not so great in determining what he did not, or could not have meant; and it is quite clear that he never intended this noble and virile concerto to be given in the epicene vein in which Mr. Paderewski conceived and played it.

However, the audience as a whole approved the artist's performance with storms of applause, recalling him again and again, until at length the wise custom that has prevailed at these concerts of permitting no encores was again violated, and the soloist returned to the piano and played Rubinstein's Bacarolle in A minor. It was, however, so distorted by the remarkable phrasing, vagaries of tempo and of rhythm, and mawkishness of sentimentality with which it was performed, that it was not easy to recognize it until it was well on its way. All which is distressful enough in the stating, but Mr. Paderewski's eminence and popularity are of a nature that can well withstand it.

The Gluck overture was gloriously read and played. How these giants of old knew how to obtain massive and stirring effects with a few instruments and by simple means! There is undoubtedly much in the work that sounds quaint to modern ears, but how strong and effective, and, at times, supremely noble, is the tone color. Nothing could have been more just to the music and more satisfying to the critical understanding than the large interpretation Mr. Gericke gave it.

The Franck symphony became clearer on a new hearing, and its powerful originality and deep imaginativeness were more vigorously emphasized; but that it became more pleasing, that it appealed with any greater force to the warmer emotions, that it seemed less morbid, can hardly be conceded. Then, too, the brief themes of the composer and his incessant repetitions of them in sequences, at last prove tiresome in the monotony of effect they produce. It was performed with exquisite finish, and in its more stirring moments, with a brilliancy and a spirit that were almost exciting.

The programme for the next concert is: Suite No. 1, in F, Moszkowski; "Northern Ballad," Horatio W. Parker (first time), and the "Pastoral" symphony, by Beethoven.

Boston Transcript
SATURDAY, DECEMBER 30, 1899

The Boston Symphony Orchestra, under Wilhelm Gericke, has continued as the city's principal musical attraction, and hundreds of students have availed themselves of the Friday afternoon rehearsals to hear this matchless organization. These same students have had countless opportunities to attend chamber concerts, piano recitals and the like. The Kneisel Quartet still maintains its high position, while the Apollo, Cecilia, Handel and Haydn and other singing societies have given their usual concerts. Various musicians and singers of high rank have been heard, among them Madeline Schiller, Paderewski, De Pachmann and Clara Butt; and the municipal concerts, organized by Mayor Quincy in the fall of 1898, have not only been kept up to a high standard but have met with marked popular success.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 24, 1899.

CÉSAR FRANCK.

His Symphony in D Minor Repeated Last Night.

A Work of Uncommon Beauty and Strength.

Mr. Paderewski Played a Beethoven Concerto.

The program of the ninth Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke, conductor, in Music Hall, last night, was as follows:

Overture, "Iphigenia in Aulis".......... Gluck-Wagner
Piano concerto in E flat.............Beethoven
Mr. Paderewski.
Symphony in D minor..........César Franck

The program was well arranged. The quietly tragic overture of Gluck led the way effectively to the concerto of Beethoven, and the audience, which by its conduct had evidently come to see and hear a virtuoso, would have hardly brooked a longer or more complex introduction. Nor did the music of Beethoven, noble as it is, lessen the strength or discount the beauty of Franck's remarkable symphony.

Indeed, the performance of this symphony was the musical feature of the concert. The virtuoso entrances, dazzles, stuns, and in a few years he is driven out by another, and soon he is merely a tradition, a legend, and in a century there may be dispute about his name. The concerto of Beethoven will outlive many virtuosos. The symphony of Franck will outlive even virtuoso conductors, as the coin and the bust reveal to us the Roman Emperor who centuries ago was dust.

I cannot understand the attitude of those who declare and deplore while they declare that the music of César Franck will never be popular. They do not mean, of course, the popularity of "Whistling Rufus" or a march by the ingenious Mr. Sousa; they speak of such popularity as was enjoyed for some years by, say, the Lenore symphony of Raff. But how trite and how cheap to many of the younger generation is that once applauded music; how incomprehensible that easily acquired popularity! It is true that to the musician there are certain characteristics of Franck's music that at first perplex. His system of building harmonic progressions on chromatic basses suggests the thought that perhaps he heard and had constantly in mind another scheme of tonality than that which is taught in the schools as natural and inevitable. There are composers who hear such exotic scales.

But the chief obstacles to genuine popularity of music with audiences that have for years been accustomed to the best are dullness, against which even the gods contend in vain—disguised vulgarity, which will always out, and insincerity. Now if there is any music that is pure, serious, noble, lofty to the verge of mysticism, free from earthly dross, it is the music of César Franck. This must be apparent to everyone to whom the names of Bach, Beethoven, and if you wish Brahms are something more than names. Then comes the question of dullness. I confess I do not see how this reproach can be justly brought. This symphony is fascinating throughout on account of its wealth of unostentatious natural melody, its rich harmonic structure, its strongly defined rhythmic feeling, its sonorous and well contrasted orchestration. There are passages in the first movement that are of elemental grandeur, music that might accompany the shifting of worlds in the divine plan. There are pages of poignant melancholy that is neither sour nor pessimistic. And in the finale there is the hint of mighty preparation, there is the authoritative, irresistible advance of rejoicing thousands. Throughout the symphony is there constant testimony to a strong, sane, sympathetic soul, a master creator and organizer, a master musician.

⁂

Mr. Paderewski was welcomed most heartily. He gave in many respects a most agreeable and I may say elegant performance of Beethoven's heroic concerto. For in connection with his interpretation the term "elegant" may be fitly used. Whether this elegance suits Beethoven's music is another question. Mr. Paderewski's tone in passages of delicate beauty and moderate strength was, as of old, delightful. In passages that demand robust strength, his tone was inclined to be forced and harsh. To praise his general technic, to dilate upon his use of the pedals at this late day would be an impertinence. Occasionally there was extravagant elasticity in rhythm, so that there was for the moment little or no rhythm. It is needless to say that he was tumultuously applauded. He responded to the demand and played a barcarole by Rubinstein in such curious fashion that the piece was hardly to be recognized.

Philip Hale.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, DECEMBER 20, 1899.

THE real kernel of the musical life of a city is its orchestral work. No matter how well the many concerts given by renowned artists are patronized, no matter how liberally the opera is supported, or even how flourishing local societies devoted to the various forms of choral work may be, the true test of the serious musical life of any large city is the standard of its orchestral concerts, both in program and performance, and the extent of the appreciation, both artistic and financial, of these by its public. We musicians of Philadelphia therefore have been intently watching the rapidly growing interest that has been shown for at least the last five years in the orchestral concerts given here by visiting organizations, and recognize in it the most hopeful signs of a broadening public musical feeling.

The five concerts given every season by the Boston Symphony Orchestra have been so well attended that for the past two years all the reserved seats of the great Academy of Music were bought for the entire series by the old subscribers before the public sale was open. This has induced the management to give this year a second series, the sale of which has been as complete and successful as the first. The Boston Symphony Orchestra is not better supported even in Boston, and there can be no doubt that the concerts of this unique and incomparable organization have played a most important part in the elevation and cultivation of musical taste in Philadelphia.

Boston Symphony in Brooklyn.

AT the Brooklyn concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra last Saturday evening the works heard were the Beethoven "Egmont" overture, the Dvorák Concerto in B minor for violoncello, three of Brahms' Hungarian dances (Nos. 1, 2 and 6) and the Tschaikowsky Symphony No. 3. The last named, by the way, was heard for the first time in Brooklyn.

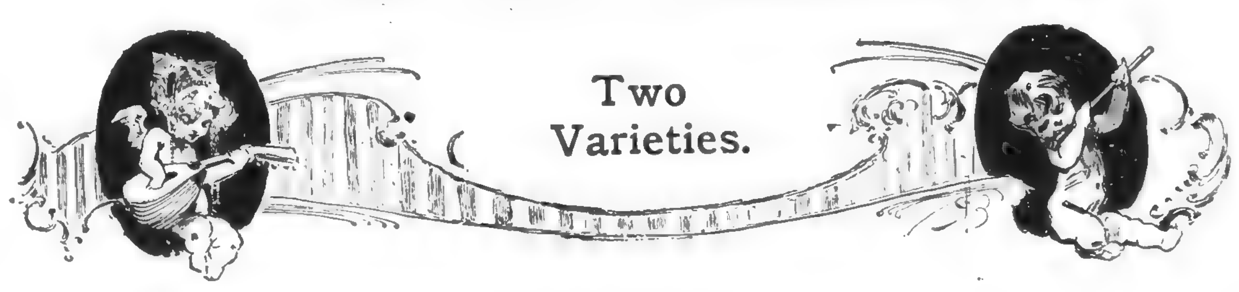
Mr. Gericke's reading of this great composition by the Russian composer was scholarly, but rather too severe and classic for some tastes.

The playing of the "Egmont" overture alone was worth the price of admission. As this was played as the opening piece, the late arrivals missed one of the treats of the evening. Brooklyn concert-goers probably never heard the Brahms dances played better.

The 'cello concerto did not arouse great enthusiasm. It is without doubt a great work, but Mr. Schroeder's reading proved rather colorless and his playing monotonous.

The audience last Saturday was much larger than at the opening concert five weeks ago. The third concert in Brooklyn is announced for Saturday evening, January 20. Leonora Jackson will be the soloist.

·LIFE·
NEW YORK, DECEMBER 28, 1899.



Two Varieties.

THE audiences at the opera and the audiences at the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra form an interesting contrast.

The opera is primarily a spectacular show, with good music thrown in. The audience is also a spectacular show, with a few lovers of music thrown in. When the spectacle grows dull, a majority of the audience study one another and indulge in pleasant converse.

At the Boston Symphony concerts the audience never talks. It listens.

At the opera, the audience itself being on exhibition, dresses and behaves accordingly. It enjoys the contemplation of itself, its jewels and its raiment even more at times than it enjoys the stage. This is legitimate, as enjoyment is the object of the expedition.

The opera itself—the performance on the stage—is frankly artificial. This artificiality, while innocent and not to be despised, explains, perhaps, why so many people who love music for music itself prefer the concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra to the grandest of grand opera.

Boston Transcript

DECEMBER 26, 1899

The Symphony Orchestra and Paderewski —Handel and Haydn Society's Eighty-Fifth Season

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its ninth symphony concert in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Gluck: Overture to "Iphigénie en Aulide" (the Coda by Wagner).
Beethoven: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 5, in E-flat major, opus 73.
César Franck: Symphony in D minor.
Mr. Ignace J. Paderewski was the pianist.

A more uncompromising performance of Gluck's "Iphigénie" overture one need not wish to hear; Mr. Gericke followed Wagner's instructions to the letter. The result was curious. There is no need of going into Wagner's arguments about the proper tempo of the main body of this overture; whether they are irrefragable or not, the spirit which prompted them is unmistakable. This spirit was essentially emotional and poetic. Note that, in his analysis of the overture, Wagner does not speak an academic word; it is no technical analysis, treating of first, second and conclusion-themes, working-out, recapitulation, etc., but essentially a poetic one. He speaks of "a theme of appeal from painful, gnawing heart-sorrow; a motive of violence, of commanding, overbearing demand," and continues in the same vein to the end. His very objection to the old, conventional tempo was that it was merely conventional and academic, and thus ran counter to the emotional, poetico-dramatic spirit of the music. I have said that Mr. Gericke followed Wagner's instructions to the letter; but I cannot think that he entered into the spirit of them. As played last Saturday evening, the overture sounded as if of castiron; never have I heard it sound so uncompromisingly academic before. Instead of "gnawing heart-sorrow," I heard, in the introduction, nothing but prepared and resolved suspensions. I could find no emotional or dramatic expressiveness. The only essence of the drama I could find reflected in it was a certain iron implacableness, as of inexorable fate—the very most dangerous idea to embody in music; ten or sixteen measures of it you can stand, but, keep harping on it, and the listener finds himself changing places with the victims of Fate, and suffering their torments.

The Franck symphony, which was heard here for the first time last season, suffered much from coming after the excitement of the Beethoven concerto and Paderewski's encore-piece. It is a work for which the listener needs to be fresh. I could again see beauties in it, moments of poetic suggestiveness, much elaborate workmanship, pages of glowing color; but it was impossible to listen sympathetically, to enter unreservedly into the spirit of the composition. After it was over it was as if I had not really heard it.

Of Paderewski's playing of the "Emperor" concerto much might be said. He had never played it here before, neither can I remember his playing anything by Beethoven that was in the same vein. It was not easy to imagine beforehand just what he would do with it. Well, he played it like a god! The work itself stands well in the heyday of Beethoven's second period; it has less of the modern spirit in it than the fourth concerto, in G major; the only hints one finds in it of the composer's third manner are certain occasional harmonic subtleties; its most salient characteristics are a wondrous fertility and beauty of melodic invention and a brilliancy of style which has, perhaps, never been surpassed elsewhere. But there is little of the pioneer spirit shown in it; the very perfection of its form shows a completeness of mastery which is seldom exhibited by anyone except in well-beaten paths. Save for the first few phrases of the pianoforte in the second movement—which you can hardly hear without wondering what Beethoven had left for Chopin to do after him—the concerto contains nothing that the composer had not done before, only seldom surely with such effulgent splendor. It is all heroic; one might call it an ode to the Hero.

This description of the work may well apply also to Paderewski's playing of it. His performance reflected every element pointed out therein. I can find nothing in the work that he did not show forth with convincing force and beauty. Save that he had the daring to let himself go unreservedly in the Dionysiac verve of the final rondo—unreservedly, yet without once disfrocking himself—there was no more of novelty in his rendering than in the work itself, none but a fresh newness of perfection. Seldom have I heard this great artist sink himself so completely and lovingly in a composition; and, what is best of all, there was plainly no self-abnegation in it: there was no less of Paderewski there for its being all Beethoven! One felt that, but for Paderewski, there would have been less of Beethoven there. Take the ineffably beautiful effects he produced in those wondrous apparitions of the second theme of the first movement, in C-flat major and D-flat major, and in the opening portions of the second movement; there was no striving after a wilful originality here, no "new reading;" he followed the text with meticulous exactness, adding nothing of his own; he played the music just as you read it in the score, but with its very soul audibly embodied. Throughout, you felt that here was a man large enough, deep enough, strong enough to afford to be faithful to the composer and forget himself. It was one of the greatest performances I have ever listened to. And how admirably Mr. Gericke and the orchestra did their part! The thing was perfect through and through.

Of course there was no escaping an encore. Paderewski played something by Rubinstein as only he can play.

The next programme is: Horatio W. Parker, "Northern Ballad" (first time); Beethoven, sympathy No. 6, in F major, "Pastoral," opus 68; Moszkowski, suite No. 1, in F major, opus 39. W. F. A.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1899.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

Horatio W. Parker's New Orchestral Work.

Moszkowski's Tuneful First Suite Heard Again.

Paderewski's Second and Last Recital in Music Hall.

The program of the 10th Symphony Concert in Music Hall last night, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Suite No. 1 in F major...........Moszkowski
Northern Ballad op. 46..........H. W. Parker
(first time here.)
Symphony No. 6, "Pastoral".......Beethoven

The official program-book says with reference to Moszkowski's suite No. 1: "Two movements of this suite (the third and fifth) were played here by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Arthur Nikisch, on April 8, 1893."

This statement is true; but the suite as a whole was first played here April 23, 1888, under Mr. Gericke, and it was repeated Oct. 20 of that year.

Moszkowski wrote the suite at the request of the Philharmonic Society of London, and it was performed for the first time by that society June 2, 1886, when the composer led. The first performance in New York was under Theodore Thomas, March 22, 1887.

The suite is agreeable, holiday music. Moszkowski, even in his many potboilers for the piano, is always well-bred and often elegant, and in this suite his orchestral conversation is often sparkling, at times epigrammatic, and always fluent and amiable. There is little deep thought, although some of the variations do credit to his technical skill. Perhaps the work is too constantly tuneful, as "tuneful" is understood by the multitude, but it must be remembered that Moszkowski wrote it for a London public, and he knew how to please. I doubt whether he has ever equaled this orchestral composition; surely his second suite is inferior, and "Joan of Arc," the symphonic poem, is seldom heard. The reproach was once brought against this suite that it was apparently thought out for the piano and then elaborately transcribed. The reproach is not just. There may be passages here and there that recall at once the piano, but there is a steady flow of orchestral thought, and there are frequent exhibitions of ingenious fancy and sparkle and piquancy in orchestral expression. It is a clever work throughout and it is at times more than clever. The weakest movement is the fourth, which might well be omitted. The suite was played brilliantly and the solo passages gave pleasure.

Mr. Parker's "Northern Ballad" was first played, I believe, April 17, 1899, by the New Haven Symphony Orchestra, of which he is conductor; or was the Festival of the Hampden County Musical Association, at which it was played, before that date? I do not know. At any rate, the work was finished and performed last spring. I was disappointed in the Ballad, for I recognize in Mr. Parker a man who is more than a Professor, even at Yale; I recognize in him a musician of uncommon technical facility, one that has triumphed on the battlefield of oratorio, one that in his "Cahal Mor" has shown high and splendid imagination. There are ample evidences of technical fluency in this Ballad; there are interesting passages; but the work as a whole is not authoritative. One reason for this is that the music is reminiscent. Now, do not misunderstand me; I do not hint at plagiarism; and, as some Englishman said lately, "I don't mind if a man steals, provided he makes good use of his plunder." Mr. Parker suggests the moods of other composers. There is not enough of his own voice—and there are "ancestral voices prophesying war" and other things. For instance, the mood of the opening measures of the Ballad is singularly like the mood of the opening measures of Tschaikowsky's symphonic poem, or Fantasie-overture, "Romeo and Juliet"; it is reminiscent in many particulars. Further on I am reminded of the Dvorák of the "American" or the Krehbielian period, rhythmically, harmonically, orchestrally; the same mood is in passages of Dovrak's "American" symphony. The mood of the finale is that of the mood of the Gounod of "Faust," and there is one ascending passage that is a striking bit of "gounodage," as Gautier-Villars puts it.

I suppose to many the Pastoral Symphony is a joy forever. I confess that I cannot share in this simple bucolic pleasure. Whether the movements are played a little faster or a little slower seems to me immaterial; the greater part of the music induces a desire to sleep and be at rest. The few passages in which the great Beethoven is revealed do not compensate for the pages of platitudes.

The symphony by Richard Strauss, which will be played at the next Symphony concert, will be the one in F minor, op. 12, and not the "In Italy," as has been announced.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA is beyond doubt and peradventure one of the few great orchestras of the world. This claim is made enthusiastically, and it is allowed by the critics and audiences of other cities and by foreign and visiting singers, violinists and pianists.

It is the more to be regretted that in this very city more and more attention is paid by Symphony audiences to the soloists, who, originally regarded as incidental to the series of concerts, are now considered by many as the chief feature.

The talk is more and more about the soloist and less and less about the orchestra itself or the pieces performed by it.

There was Sembrich night, when a Symphony concert was turned into a prima-donna show. There was Paderewski night, when, after the performance by the celebrated Pole, a large number of the audience left the hall, although the hour was early, and although one of the most remarkable symphonies of this century remained to be played.

We find even Mr. Apthorp, a professional critic, in his frantic and fashionable aderation of Mr. Paderewski—who had played Beethoven's concerto in E flat in an incongruously elegant and quasi effeminate manner, for Mr. Paderewcki never forgets the dear ladies, even in his most heroic moments—we find even Mr. Apthorp saying publicly, "It was impossible to listen sympathetically, to enter unreservedly into the spirit of the composition (Franck's symphony). After it was over it was as if I had not really heard it."

Far be it from me to disparage the worth of a really brilliant solo performance. But now that so many soloists appear at these concerts, is there not imminent danger that the purpose of the organization will be forgotten, that music which will be of long life will be slighted in the hurrah for the virtuoso who is a thing of a day and often merely the idol dear to passing faddists?

Not all the soloists that have appeared at these concerts were worthy of appearance. I do not propose to be unnecessarily disagreeable, so I shall not name the unworthy by name. We all know that for some of them, wires were adroitly pulled, and the influence of "patrons and patronesses" was exerted.

This, however, is a side issue. If all the soloists were miracles and beyond all whooping, I should still maintain that they should be fewer in number, and that when one appeared, the program should not include a new orchestral work, but it should be made up of pieces conspicuous for brilliance rather than for depth of thought.

Often after a superb orchestral performance, the audience has applauded languidly, as in doubt, indifference, or even consternation. Pray, what effect has such a reception on the spirit of an orchestra which numbers excellent musicians as well as admirable players in its ranks? What encouragement has the orchestra to do its best, when it finds that noble music finely played is as cavaire to hundreds?

And yet these hundreds are willing to pay premiums that in many instances are absurdly extravagant? Do they pay to hear the soloists or to be "in the swim."

There is much loose talk about the "musical culture" of this city. It is not a symptom of true culture when the first question is "Who is going to sing or play?" and no question is asked concerning the nature of the orchestral program. There is curiosity; there is the contagious enthusiasm that fires a mob; but where is discrimination, where is appreciation?

Perhaps we are too much accustomed to a good thing; perhaps we are too much inclined to take the perfection and the brilliance of the orchestra for granted. The fact remains that many are not eager to hear a new work, for they would then be obliged to think for themselves and pronounce an independent judgment. It is easy to roll the eyes in ecstasy when hearing a pianist, play he ever so badly, when parochial society has given out the decree that he is wonderful and to be worshiped. It is easy to applaud lazily a symphony by Beethoven, whose name is a guarantee of good faith. But this is by no means a symptom of healthy musical condition. The moment the orchestra with the conductor becomes an object of secondary interest, the purpose and the benefit of the organization are as naught. For in a symphony concert it is the orchestra that should be the great, constant and most heartily appreciated soloist.

⁂

Mr. Vernon Blackburn began a review of a Symphony concert in Queen's Hall, Dec. 9, as follows: "Despite Mr. Horatio W. Parker and other critics who, by the essential character of their minds, reject all purely modern things as morbid, as necessarily morbid, the very modern Tschaikowsky does not seem destined to the three years' or so mortality predicted for him by the American Yale professor. The splendor and glory of parts of this symphony are so evidently great that before it such criticism appears to be even a little grotesque."

⁂

What I have said about the undue attention paid to soloists in Symphony concerts may be applied also to the concerts of the Handel and Haydn Society.

Mr. Huneker writes as follows concerning Mr. Loeffler of this city:

The composer is a singularly sympathetic man, but it was his poetic music that first attracted me. Fancy the ascetic head of a medieval dreamer, one whose dreams possess him until they are wrought into enduring shapes; a man crucified by his art, a gentle fanatic, and by temperament a recluse. To this simplicity add the tortured, complex nature of the modern tone poet, and to disturb still more the human plan let this artist also be ridden at times by the virtuoso. Here we get a scheme of personality that is as morbidly fine as a Huysmans with the fantastic visions of a Berlioz. All this and something more is Loeffler. He is the musician of culture, of reflection, rather than the genius that blurts itself out at one savage burst. Involution after involution I discern in Loeffler's gray and haunting music, the delicate retreat upon itself of a soul that shuns the large places of the market-place and would fain build a palace of art. But Loeffler is also a violin virtuoso, and so the two temperaments are at war. A poet, a painter, if you will, and the lover of the splendid, sonorous phrase, the maker of dizzy decorative spirals for his instrument; now brilliancy, éclat and the cloistral dreamer is forgotten. From such an unique combination unique music must come. The songs, the "Divertimento"—which precedes the "Ukraine"—"Les Mort de Tintigailes," as yet unheard here, and the sextet are works that easily rank with any latter day productions. Loeffler is fascinated by the problems of timbre, and so the endless series of lovely and terrible sounds that may be made with an orchestra are to him worth living, worth dying, for. He should be sheltered in some half ruined château, flanked by a Gothic forest, and facing bright waters. Therefrom he would discern those Maeterlinckian ships that bore the Prince to the seven sleeping brides. But this same château must possess a French chef, for Loeffler is modern and knows that certain recondite art, silken in web and shot with more colors than the prism, must be fed, not as feed huge Germans who carved a symphony or an oratorio on bread and beef and beer.

An art aristocrat, if I may be permitted to say all these things, is Charles Martin Loeffler, and if his body were as strong as his soul—it is just as brave—he could be expected to compose big things. Yet I am a believer in physical delicacy existing within a coarse husk; witness Renan, and powerful music has come from a sick frame—Chopin, for example. Loeffler has been called a décadent because of his choice of themes, his sharp contrasts of melancholy and ecstasy, and the profoundly exotic character of his poetic subjects. Very well; let us admit this. He is décadent, for he prefers the twilight to the dawn and dawn to the glare of midday. There are trumpets in his orchestra, but their tone is veiled almost as Alfred de Vigny's sound of the horn in the woods at dusk. His exceeding fine color sense enables him to endlessly experiment and split hues into subtle splinters of light. It is this, with a pulsating orchestra, a passion for the beautiful and the strange, that—given his admirable musical equipment—singles Loeffler's compositions from his contemporaries and lends it a note of subtle distinction. He could set Baudelaire's lines "In undulant robes, with nacreous sheen impearled, she walks as in some stately saraband," and for Gogel and Turgenev's simple peasants he has sympathy. This versatility in taste but deepens the mystery of his temperament.

⁂

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, DEC. 31, 1899.

SUITE, BALLAD, SYMPHONY.

It was a trifle difficult for the assemblage at the symphony rehearsal last week to "warm up" in its applause, as it must have been somewhat of a task for Mr Gericke and his players to enter upon their work with zeal, so chilly was the atmosphere in Music hall. Nevertheless the orchestra accomplished excellent results, under the more than usually guiding hand of their leader, and there was no lack of marks of appreciation.

The program was longer than usual. It opened with Moszkowski's suite No. 1, in F major. Two movements of this work were given at the symphony concert of April 8, 1893, under the Nikisch baton, and the interpretation thereof gave recorded satisfaction. It was a pleasure to hear the suite in its completeness, for Moszkowski gives throughout evidence of skill and effect as a composer that is in every way enjoyable and notable. Nevertheless, it is unquestionably true that the third movement, which Mr Nikisch offered, with its adroit and captivating use of Russian and Hungarian themes, is much the best in the suite. Brilliant, considered in the light of a "show piece," as the closing movement of this suite is, it does not compare with any of the preceding fourth so far as genuine musical value is concerned.

As to the musical successes which it has been the privilege of Mr Horatio W. Parker to attain, in more than one line, this public scarcely needs to be informed. "A Northern Ballad," his 46th work, which was performed at these concerts last week for the first times, served to illustrate still further Mr Parker's skill in elaborating and bringing out in true musicianly style a definitely conceived and thoroughly consistent composition in his chosen art. The working out of the folk-song and the dance theme, which characterize especially this work, would simply demonstrate, were any other proof needed in this matter, that Mr Parker is as truly a master in the employment of orchestral resources as in the effective use of a chorus.

Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony ended Mr Gericke's offering for the week. Coming after two distinctively "modern" works this world-famous work, with its familiar themes, the village band concert, the "thunderstorm" and the rest, seemed to be played by the orchestra with peculiar interest, as if to emphasize the idea that Beethoven is as worthy of his high fame now as he ever was, and well worthy of careful, loving interpretation. No doubt the "Pastoral" would have been more appreciated by the audience had it been given under a different musical environment, so to speak, but it unquestionably gave no small measure of satisfaction to the hearers.

Mr Alwin Schroeder will play Dvorak's concerto for the 'cello at this week's offering. The orchestral selections include Brahm's "tragic" overture, the idyl from Wagner's "Siegfried" and R. Strauss' symphony, "In Italy."

[illegible] DAILY ADVERTISER.

Established 1813.

The Official Paper of the State

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—Parker's "Northern Ballad."

It was a light programme such as fitted to the festival season; indeed, there were so many sugar plums in it that it might have been labelled—"For a Good Audience"—and constituted Mr. Gericke's New Year's gift to the public. It began with the prettiest of suites and closed with the lightest of symphonies.

The first movement of Moszkowski's Suite in F was of more developed vein than is general in this form of composition. The suite generally occupies a lower niche than the symphony, yet in the opening allegro there was here a degree of thematic treatment that suggested the more ambitious school.

Immediately after this symphonic movement the style changed, and "Sweets to the suite" evidently became Moszkowski's motto. The second movement became popular in the most intense sense, and was one of those rhythmic trifles to which one is tempted to wag the head or tap the feet; it was as near to a "two-step" as our symphony orchestra will ever approach.

Yet there was sufficient originality of melody and some of that spice that makes "Carmen" such a perennial charm, wherefore even the classicist may join in commendation and even plead for more of the same confectionery to lighten the symphonic feasts.

The third movement, a set of variations on a simple song-form, was of a little more ingenious character, and such a movement serves to make an effective dress parade of the symphonic forces; violins, flute, harp, etc., went marching by in review, and enabled the musical auditor to take a pretty accurate account of stock and properly balance up the orchestral books.

After going through each department with Mr. Moszkowski we come again to the conclusion that there is no orchestra in the world that is the equal of our own.

The fourth movement was rather conventional, and had little to say for itself. The fifth, however, was again brilliant with a virtuosity that displayed the violins to best advantage. It was a "moto perpetuo," and not new, even if very difficult, in its galloping tempo, for several composers have discovered perpetual motion, in defiance of the scientists.

The flute player had a great opportunity in one of the variations, and made full use of it, so that a tribute of applause was won, in an orchestral work, by a solo performer. The horn player deserved a similar tribute in the first movement, for his work was excellent. The concert had swept from grave to gay in these movements; it now swung back from lively to severe, and Mr. H. W. Parker's "Northern Ballad" furnished the latter element.

With the mercury at very near zero, it was rather too cold to fully appreciate the Arctic subject. We found the work considerably stronger, from the dramatic standpoint, than any of the orchestral portions of the composer's St. Christopher" which was recently heard in Boston.

It contained a good deal of that brand of sadness which is copiously given to us by the firm of Tschaikowsky, Dvorak & Co.; there were oboe sighs and violoncello broodings; but there was also much interesting counterpoint and a degree of rhythmic iteration that gave a picturesque monotony. In the main it was music for musicians, for the initiate who could follow its ingenious imitations and development, rather than for the public who sought for direct inspiration or possibly melody.

It ended with a cadence on the heights, a la Wagner, so that we may suppose, with this celestial "Amen," that everything ended happily, spite of the hypochondriacal character of much that had preceded.

The concert ended with Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. There is always a little of fetich-worship attached to the name of any great composer. To say "Beethoven" is to make any composition "hors concours," to place it beyond criticism; and there are plenty who accept the dreariness of "Der glorreiche Augenblick," or the trio (Op. 87) for two oboes and an English horn, as "divine."

In like manner there are many who consider the "Pastoral" symphony as the perfection of the music of nature, and there are even a few erudite commentators who would have us believe that Beethoven chose the key of "F" for this work because "F is the key of Nature," forgetting the changes of diapason since Beethoven's time, and that, with the constant changes of pitch that mar musical history, "the key of F" is an unknown quantity.

To us the "Pastoral Symphony" seems aging fast; it is the only one of the nine that shows the tooth of time, although there are a few crevices in the first one also. The first movement is the most interesting part of the work, and its clean-cut development out of the first three measures still remains interesting.

The Scherzo, too, with its picture of the drunken bassoonist, its hearty merry-making, its village dance, is always a delight, were it only for the pleasure of seeing Beethoven at play. But the storm of the fourth movement no longer causes the auditor to reach for his umbrella; we have had much more severe tempests in music since that time, although it must be confessed that no composer has ever made such wonderful use of such limited orchestral resources in this direction. One cares but little for the musical studies in ornithology. The yellow-hammer pipes away on the clarinette with some beauty, but the obvious poultry that appears in the coda of the brook scene is neither [illegible] nor interesting. And the [illegible] is Tennyson's own, and goes

---

[illegible] orchestra cannot execute with the greatest of ease, and we have even the five-stringed contrabasses for the deepest passages of the thunder storm, but with all this perfection of execution and equipment one cannot place the sixth symphony beside the eighth, which deals with the same geniality, but in a more effective and spontaneous manner.

It is very heterodox to speak thus, but, if we love the "Pastoral Symphony" less, we appreciate its sisters all the more.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 184.

SUNDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Enjoyable Programme Provided for the Tenth in the Series.

Fine Work of the Orchestra in the Moszkowski Suite—"Northern Ballad," Mr. Horatio W. Parker's New Work—Paderewski Recital in Music Hall.

For its tenth concert of the season, in Music Hall, last evening, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, played the following programme:

Suite No. 1, op. 39	Moszkowski
"Northern Ballad," op. 46 (First time.)	Horatio W. Parker
"Pastoral" Symphony	Beethoven

Mr. Aptherp announces in the programme that two movements of the Moszkowski Suite, the third and fifth, were played here by the Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch, on April 18, 1893. It was probably not Mr. Apthorp's afternoon when he looked up the dates of the performances of this work. It was produced complete by Mr. Rericke, April 14, 1888, and also Oct. 20 in the same year, but the succeeding season. It is only a difference of five years, and another conductor, but there is no very great harm in having such things chronicled correctly.

The suite is a thoroughly delightful work, profusely and beautifully melodious, and scored with ripe skill, brilliant daintiness and charming variety and piquancy of instrumental effects and color. Of its five movements, it is not easy to single out one for preference. Each has its individual fascination. The theme with variations is, perhaps, the most brilliant, and the most exacting on the virtuosity of the orchestra. The fourth variation, a very florid one for the flute, and the fifth, in the style of a Hungarian dance, are especially interesting.

The finale, a perpetuum mobile, bubbles over with brightness, animation and graceful melodiousness. In the programme book Mr. Apthorp says very truly that this movement "adds one more to the already longish list of 'perpetual motions'; Paganini wrote one, Weber wrote one, and who not else?" If an answer is really required, it may be stated that the list of eminent composers who have not written a moto perpetuo would fill out three or four columns of The Herald—perhaps more; and that the eminent composers who have might be summed up in a paragraph of no very remarkable length.

The suite was wonderfully played throughout, and showed off the fine material of which the orchestra is composed and its splendid efficiency exceptionally well. Mr. Marquart calls for a word of special praise for the clearness, smoothness and admirable technique and taste with which he gave the flute variation.

Mr. Parker's "Northern Ballad" cannot be justly ranked among his most notable achievements. It is richly harmonized and effectively instrumented, but its themes are not particularly fresh nor interesting, and the composers of the North have done the same sort of thing much better. The score is lacking in individuality, now strongly suggesting Grieg, now giving forth a flavor of Tschaikowsky, now dallying with Rubenstein and now not wholly free from a memory of Gade. Then, too, in listening to it, one occasionally has Dvorak recalled to mind, and, oddly enough, even Wagner and Gounod. But the chief faults of the work are that it says nothing new, that it is prolonged unnecessarily and uninterestingly, and that, on the whole, it is much ado about nothing of moment.

Mr. Parker can do better and stronger; and why, after all, try to imitate northern composers at a time when there are so many composers of the North pouring forth the real thing so abundantly? It was read and played carefully and effectively, and, at the close, there was much of hearty applause, to which it was understood the composer bowed his acknowledgments from his seat in the hall.

The symphony was given a faultless interpretation by Mr. Gericke, and its performance was, of course, perfect in every way.

The programme for the next concert is: Tranc overture, Brahms; concerto for violoncello, Dvorak; Siegfried idyll, Wagner, and symphony in F minor, op. 12, Richard Strauss. Mr. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

The Official Paper of the State

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 25, 1899.

Paderewski's Return—A Franck Symphony.

The old symphonic landmarks are being swept temporarily aside; at the preceding concert Marcella Sembrich outweighed the symphonic composers, while at the concert of Saturday it was Paderewski and Paderewski alone that filled Music Hall with a crowd that was only limited by the cessation of the sale of tickets.

But at least this latter occasion was not entirely off the symphonic track, for the "Emperor" concerto, which the great pianist played, has aptly been characterized as "a symphony with an obligato piano part."

The programme began with Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" with Wagner's expressive and fitting coda. Generally we agree with the gentleman in the Bowery restaurant who pleaded that his butter and his hairs might be served on two different plates, and we do not care for modern additions to old classics; but this ending is superior to the finale added by Mozart to the old work and is a good example of the depth of thought that characterized Wagner when he had to deal with the composition of other composers.

It was finely played, with something of the Hellenic dignity with which Gluck invested the subject. But the audience were more interested in "Paderewski in Boston" than in "Iphigenia in Aulis," and at the end of the overture waited with hushed expectancy for their Northern deity.

Probably there is no American city that is so fomiliar with the two last concertos of Beethoven as Boston. There is one of our own resident pianists who has done much to familiarize us with excellent interpretations of the work, and all the way from Aus der Ohe to D'Albert we have heard its Olympian thunderbolts rumble at us.

On this occasion the bolts were dipped in honey and exquisite delicacy and caprice was substituted for massive power. We fancy that this mode of treatment might have suited better to the fourth piano concerto, the G major, than to the "emperor."

There was a certain breadth in the first preluding, (this preluding of the solo instrument was an innovation of Beethoven in the two last concertos and is much bolder in the fifth than in the fourth), and in the development there was something of fire, but in the exposition and the recapitulation there was an odd contrast between the bold style of the orchestra and the poetic langour of the piano.

The cadenza at the end of the movement was well-balanced and effective. But, the musical reader may respond, there is no cadenza in this concerto! It is true that Beethoven has marked at the organ point in the coda: "Non si fa una cadenza, ma attacca subito il seguente,"—but the "seguente," the part following, is one of the finest of cadenzas, one in which orchestra and soloist unite forces,—a standing reproof to those cadenzas which are made merely for the personal display of the artist.

The Adagio was delightfully played, for here all delicacy was permissible and commendable, and the glorious transition into the Rondo was as near perfect as could be imagined. The Rondo itself was not so disappointing as the first movement, and its coda-duet between piano and kettle drum was excellently balanced. But here, too, one missed something of the virility that one is accustomed to associate with the concerto. One cannot pay too hearty tribute to the clearness and surety of the playing of the great pianist, but we cannot help thinking that he individualized the work too much.

A patient in a lunatic asylum, on being asked what brought him there, replied: "Well, I said the world was mad, and the world said I was mad, and they carried it against me." The audience certainly carried it against the critic in this case, for the applause seemed never-ending, and culminated, as was evidently desired, with an encore. Paderewski now played a Rubinstein Barcarolle which contained many reminiscences of the "Feramors" music.

In this, his freedom of interpretation and dalliance with tempi were permissible, although the boat occasionally got into a heavy sea. More applause followed, and everybody was satisfied. A great many went out at the end of this; even the electric lights went out. How could Cesar Franck expect to shine after Paderewski? Nevertheless, the Franck symphony was worth a hearing.

It is certainly not the best work of the French Schumann and the public at large will undoubtedly omit frank incense in this case, for the symphony is "musician's music" from first to last. It is not a hilarious work, in fact it is gloomy in the highest degree, charcoal would make a white mark upon the Cimmerian darkness of its first movement, and the second movement super-poses the melancholy of the English horn upon the sorrow that has gone before.

The figure treatment in the work is of the greatest ingenuity and must be a good lesson to the music student, but decidedly cavaire to the general. The chief figure is of three notes and is practically the same as the "Fate-motif" of Wagner's trilogy, but lacks the impressive harmonies which Wagner manages to invest it with.

By diminution, by augmentation, by contrary motion, by every known device this figure is treated until one would suppose that the lemon was squeezed entirely dry. The same elaboration is found in every movement, and at [illegible]

[illegible] of any spont[illegible] otherwise might have attained. [illegible] hears the creaking of the machinery, one watches the development with no greater emotion than would be evoked by a mathematical demonstrator at the blackboard. We may not foreshadow the entire result but we are at once conversant with the means by which it is to be achieved. The art of concealing art is not attained.

There may be some occult meaning in the "damnable iteration" of the work, but if so we have failed to grasp its clue. Good scoring is constantly in evidence, and it is certainly a symphony that would not grow weaker by repeated hearing, for not all of its ingenious work can be understood even at a second audition. And nothing that Cesar Franck has written is unworthy of the musician's serious and continued study.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.

SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 31, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The suite No. 1, in F. Major, Op 39, Moritz Moszkowski was given under Mr. Gericke's direction in 1888, afterward two movements were played by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch in 1893. It consists of five movements and employs all the resources of the orchestra as regards variety of instruments since Glockewspiel piccoli a trio of kettle drums, triangle and harp beside the ordinary array of wood-wind, and strings—all figure in the scene.

The melodies are fresh and bright and the whole composition gives the impression of having been written in a holiday mood, so gay and spontaneous is it. In the finale movement the "Perpetual Motion" the violins, which have throughout had brisk work to do, are called upon to exhibit a wonderful rate of speed, such a rate in fact, as would preclude the idea of its being "Perpetual" since human endurance would soon find its limit in such a stress of motion. The work may not be a great work but it certainly is spiced with variety and is most pleasing.

Mr. Parker's "Northern Ballad" was given for the first time and played from manuscript. The melancholy that seems inseparable from anything connected with the northern zone (since its literature, art and music are all tinged with it) appears here and underlies the rich harmonies and will not yield to the gayer measures that strive in vain to lighten it. The orchestration is most interesting and the work one that will be gladly heard a second time.

Nearly one hundred years ago at this very Christmas season was performed for the first time the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven. In the sunny summer preceding, in the beautiful meadows of Heiligenstadt by the side of a rippling mountain stream and with nightingales and cuckoos singing in the tops of the tall trees, this true poem came into being. Beethoven disclaims the idea that it is to be understood as "actual description" but rather "expressive of sensations."

With his key to the "sensations" we are expected to experience, we cannot go amiss, and indeed it almost seems that without any hint or indication other than the music itself, one's imagination might lead him to the "Happy Valley" where, amid sylvan scenes, the simple folk make merry, are overtaken by the storm, and rejoice when it is over, with thankful hearts. The symphony was flawlessly given and demonstrated anon the perfection of detail which Mr. Gericke aims to achieve.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 3, 1900.

HAPPY New Year!

The last symphony concert of 1899 was given on Saturday, presenting three orchestral works and no soloist. The program was:

Suite No. 1	Moszkowski
Northern Ballad	Parker
Symphony No. 6	Beethoven

The Moszkowski Suite is a delicious bit of melody and orchestration, thoroughly refined, dainty and yet full of meat.

Parker's work, given for the first time, was well built, with originality and reminiscences blent. There was much that was graceful, and it was all healthy writing; too long for one movement and too strongly marked with Grieg to be a great work.

* * *

The week before Paderewski was the soloist. The work eliciting most delight to the musicians that night was a second hearing of the César Franck Symphony, which gained much on a rehearsing. At both concerts, and especially in the Beethoven accompaniment, the orchestra was superb, under the masterful baton of Gericke.

* * *

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 1, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—Parker's "Northern Ballad."

It was a light programme such as fitted to the festival season; indeed, there were so many sugar plums in it that it might have been labelled—"For a Good Audience"—and constituted Mr. Gericke's New Year's gift to the public. It began with the prettiest of suites and ended with the lightest of symphonies.

The first movement of Moszkowski's Suite in F was of more developed vein than is general in this form of composition. The suite generally occupies a lower niche than the symphony, yet in the opening allegro there was here a degree of thematic treatment that suggested the more ambitious school.

Immediately after this symphonic movement the style changed, and "sweets to the suite" evidently became Moszkowski's motto. The second movement became popular in the most intense sense, and was one of those rhythmic trifles to which one is tempted to wag the head or tap the feet; it was as near to a "two-step" as our symphony orchestra will ever approach.

Yet there was sufficient originality of melody and some of that spice that makes "Carmen" such a perennial charm, wherefore even the classicist may join in commendation and even plead for more of the same confectionery to lighten the symphonic feasts.

The third movement, a set of variations on a simple song-form, was of a little more ingenious character, and such a movement serves to make an effective dress parade of the symphonic forces; violins, flute, harp, etc., went marching by in review, and enabled the musical auditor to take a pretty accurate account of stock and properly balance up the orchestral books.

After going through each department with Mr. Moszkowski we come again to the conclusion that there is no orchestra in the world that is the equal of our own.

The fourth movement was rather conventional, and had little to say for itself. The fifth, however, was again brilliant with a virtuosity that displayed the violins to best advantage. It was a "moto perpetuo," and not new, even if very difficult, in its galloping tempo, for several composers have discovered perpetual motion, in defiance of the scientists.

The flute player had a great opportunity in one of the variations, and made full use of it, so that a tribute of applause was won, in an orchestral work, by a solo performer. The horn player deserved a similar tribute in the first movement, for his work was excellent. The concert had swept from grave to gay in these movements; it now swung back from lively to severe, and Mr. H. W. Parker's "Northern Ballad" furnished the latter element.

With the mercury at very near zero, it was rather too cold to fully appreciate the Arctic subject. We found the work considerably stronger, from the dramatic standpoint, than any of the orchestral portions of the composer's St. Christopher" which was recently heard in Boston.

It contained a good deal of that brand of sadness which is copiously given to us by the firm of Tschaikowsky, Dvorak & Co.; there were oboe sighs and violoncello broodings; but there was also much interesting counterpoint and a degree of rhythmic iteration that gave a picturesque monotony. In the main it was music for musicians, for the initiate who could follow its ingenious imitations and development, rather than for the public who sought for direct inspiration or possibly melody.

It ended with a cadence on the heights, a la Wagner, so that we may suppose, with this celestial "Amen," that everything ended happily, spite of the hypochondriacal character of much that had preceded.

The concert ended with Beethoven's "Pastoral" symphony. There is always a little of fetich-worship attached to the name of any great composer. To say "Beethoven" is to make any composition "hors concours," to place it beyond criticism; and there are plenty who accept the dreariness of "Der glorreiche Augenblick," or the trio (Op. 87) for two oboes and an English horn, as "divine."

In like manner there are many who consider the "Pastoral" symphony as the perfection of the music of nature, and there are even a few erudite commentators who would have us believe that Beethoven chose the key of "F" for this work because "F is the key of Nature," forgetting the changes of diapason since Beethoven's time, and that, with the constant changes of pitch that mar musical history, "the key of F" is an unknown quantity.

To us the "Pastoral Symphony" seems aging fast; it is the only one of the nine that shows the tooth of time, although there are a few crevices in the first one also. The first movement is the most interesting part of the work, and its clean-cut development out of the first three measures still remains interesting.

The Scherzo, too, with its picture of the drunken bassoonist, its hearty merry-making, its village dance, is always a delight, were it only for the pleasure of seeing Beethoven at play. But the storm of the fourth movement no longer causes the auditor to reach for his umbrella; we have had much more severe tempests in music since that time, although it must be confessed that no composer has ever made such wonderful use of such limited orchestral resources in this direction. One cares but little for the musical studies in ornithology. The yellow-hammer pipes away on the clarinette with some beauty, but the more obvious poultry that appears in the coda of the brook scene is neither beautiful nor interesting. And the brook itself is Tennyson's own, and goes [illegible] is nothing in the symphony that our orchestra cannot execute with the greatest of ease, and we have even the five-stringed contrabasses for the deepest passages of the thunder storm, but with all this perfection of execution and equipment one cannot place the sixth symphony beside the eighth, which deals with the same geniality, but in a more effective and spontaneous manner.

It is very heterodox to speak thus, but, if we love the "Pastoral Symphony" less, we appreciate its sisters all the more.

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVI., NO. 184.
SUNDAY, DECEMBER 31, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Enjoyable Programme Provided for the Tenth in the Series.

Fine Work of the Orchestra in the Moszkowski Suite—"Northern Ballad," Mr. Horatio W. Parker's New Work—Paderewski Recital in Music Hall.

For its tenth concert of the season, in Music Hall, last evening, the Boston Symphony orchestra, Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, played the following programme:

Suite No. 1, op. 39..................Moszkowski
"Northern Ballad," op. 46..Horatio W. Parker
(First time.)
"Pastoral" Symphony..................Beethoven

Mr. Aptherp announces in the programme that two movements of the Moszkowski Suite, the third and fifth, were played here by the Symphony orchestra, under Mr. Arthur Nikisch, on April 18, 1893. It was probably not Mr. Apthorp's afternoon when he looked up the dates of the performances of this work. It was produced complete by Mr. Rericke, April 14, 1888, and also Oct. 20 in the same year, but the succeeding season. It is only a difference of five years, and another conductor, but there is no very great harm in having such things chronicled correctly.

The suite is a thoroughly delightful work, profusely and beautifully melodious, and scored with ripe skill, brilliant daintiness and charming variety and piquancy of instrumental effects and color. Of its five movements, it is not easy to single out one for preference. Each has its individual fascination. The theme with variations is, perhaps, the most brilliant, and the most exacting on the virtuosity of the orchestra. The fourth variation, a very florid one for the flute, and the fifth, in the style of a Hungarian dance, are especially interesting.

The finale, a perpetuum mobile, bubbles over with brightness, animation and graceful melodiousness. In the programme book Mr. Apthorp says very truly that this movement "adds one more to the already longish list of 'perpetual motion'; Paganini wrote one, Weber wrote one, and who not else?" If an answer is really required, it may be stated that the list of eminent composers who have not written a moto perpetuo would fill out three or four columns of The Herald—perhaps more; and that the eminent composers who have might be summed up in a paragraph of no very remarkable length.

The suite was wonderfully played throughout, and showed off the fine material of which the orchestra is composed and its splendid efficiency exceptionally well. Mr. Marquart calls for a word of special praise for the clearness, smoothness and admirable technique and taste with which he gave the flute variation.

Mr. Parker's "Northern Ballad" cannot be justly ranked among his most notable achievements. It is richly harmonized and effectively instrumented, but its themes are not particularly fresh nor interesting, and the composers of the North have done the same sort of thing much better. The score is lacking in individuality, now strongly suggesting Grieg, now giving forth a flavor of Tschaikowsky, now dallying with Rubenstein and now not wholly free from a memory of Gade. Then, too, in listening to it, one occasionally has Dvorak recalled to mind, and, oddly enough, even Wagner and Gounod. But the chief faults of the work are that it says nothing new, that it is prolonged unnecessarily and uninterestingly, and that, on the whole, it is much ado about nothing of moment.

Mr. Parker can do better and stronger; and why, after all, try to imitate northern composers at a time when there are so many composers of the North pouring forth the real thing so abundantly? It was read and played carefully and effectively, and, at the close, there was much of hearty applause, to which it was understood the composer bowed his acknowledgments from his seat in the hall.

The symphony was given a faultless interpretation by Mr. Gericke, and its performance was, of course, perfect in every way.

The programme for the next concert is: Tranc overture, Brahms; concerto for violoncello, Dvorak; Siegfried idyll, Wagner, and symphony in F minor, op. 12, Richard Strauss. Mr. Alwin Schroeder is to be the soloist.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER.
Established 1813.
The Official Paper of the State
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, DEC. 25, 1899.

Paderewski's Return—A Franck Symphony.

The old symphonic landmarks are being swept temporarily aside; at the preceding concert Marcella Sembrich outweighed the symphonic composers, while at the concert of Saturday it was Paderewski and Paderewski alone that filled Music Hall with a crowd that was only limited by the cessation of the sale of tickets.

But at least this latter occasion was not entirely off the symphonic track, for the "Emperor" concerto, which the great pianist played, has aptly been characterized as "a symphony with an obligato piano part."

The programme began with Gluck's overture to "Iphigenia in Aulis" with Wagner's expressive and fitting coda. Generally we agree with the gentleman in the Bowery restaurant who pleaded that his butter and his hairs might be served on two different plates, and we do not care for modern additions to old classics; but this ending is superior to the finale added by Mozart to the old work and is a good example of the depth of thought that characterized Wagner when he had to deal with the composition of other composers.

It was finely played, with something of the Hellenic dignity with which Gluck invested the subject. But the audience were more interested in "Paderewski in Boston" than in "Iphigenia in Aulis," and at the end of the overture waited with hushed expectancy for their Northern deity.

Probably there is no American city that is so fomiliar with the two last concertos of Beethoven as Boston. There is one of our own resident pianists who has done much to familiarize us with excellent interpretations of the work, and all the way from Aus der Ohe to D'Albert we have heard its Olympian thunderbolts rumble at us.

On this occasion the bolts were dipped in honey and exquisite delicacy and caprice was substituted for massive power. We fancy that this mode of treatment might have suited better to the fourth piano concerto, the G major, than to the "emperor."

There was a certain breadth in the first preluding, (this preluding of the solo instrument was an innovation of Beethoven in the two last concertos and is much bolder in the fifth than in the fourth), and in the development there was something of fire, but in the exposition and the recapitulation there was an odd contrast between the bold style of the orchestra and the poetic langour of the piano.

The cadenza at the end of the movement was well-balanced and effective. But, the musical reader may respond, there is no cadenza in this concerto! It is true that Beethoven has marked at the organ point in the coda: "Non si fa una cadenza, ma attacca subito il seguente,"—but the "seguente," the part following, is one of the finest of cadenzas, one in which orchestra and soloist unite forces,—a standing reproof to those cadenzas which are made merely for the personal display of the artist.

The Adagio was delightfully played, for here all delicacy was permissible and commendable, and the glorious transition into the Rondo was as near perfect as could be imagined. The Rondo itself was not so disappointing as the first movement, and its coda-duet between piano and kettle drum was excellently balanced. But here, too, one missed something of the virility that one is accustomed to associate with the concerto. One cannot pay too hearty tribute to the clearness and surety of the playing of the great pianist, but we cannot help thinking that he individualized the work too much.

A patient in a lunatic asylum, on being asked what brought him there, replied: "Well, I said the world was mad, and the world said I was mad, and they carried it against me." The audience certainly carried it against the critic in this case, for the applause seemed never-ending, and culminated, as was evidently desired, with an encore. Paderewski now played a Rubinstein Barcarolle which contained many reminiscences of the "Feramors" music.

In this, his freedom of interpretation and dalliance with tempi were permissible, although the boat occasionally got into a heavy sea. More applause followed, and everybody was satisfied. A great many went out at the end of this; even the electric lights went out. How could Cesar Franck expect to shine after Paderewski? Nevertheless, the Franck symphony was worth a hearing.

It is certainly not the best work of the French Schumann and the public at large will undoubtedly omit frank incense in this case, for the symphony is "musician's music" from first to last. It is not a hilarious work, in fact it is gloomy in the highest degree, charcoal would make a white mark upon the Cimmerian darkness of its first movement, and the second movement super-poses the melancholy of the English horn upon the sorrow that has gone before.

The figure treatment in the work is of the greatest ingenuity and must be a good lesson to the music student, but decidedly cavaire to the general. The chief figure is of three notes and is practically the same as the "Fate-motif" of Wagner's trilogy, but lacks the impressive harmonies which Wagner manages to invest it with.

By diminution, by augmentation, by contrary motion, by every known device, this figure is treated until one would suppose that the lemon was squeezed entirely dry. The same elaboration is found in every movement, and at the end our three-noted friend reappears again in a new com-much reiteration the work remains interesting. Perhaps the chief fault is that this constant development robs the symphony of any spontaneiety that it otherwise might have attained. One hears the creaking of the machinery, one watches the development with no greater emotion than would be evoked by a mathematical demonstrator at the blackboard. We may not foreshadow the entire result but we are at once conversant with the means by which it is to be achieved. The art of concealing art is not attained.

There may be some occult meaning in the "damnable iteration" of the work, but if so we have failed to grasp its clue. Good scoring is constantly in evidence, and it is certainly a symphony that would not grow weaker by repeated hearing, for not all of its ingenious work can be understood even at a second audition. And nothing that Cesar Franck has written is unworthy of the musician's serious and continued study.

Louis C. Elson.

Boston Courier.
SUNDAY MORNING, DEC. 31, 1899.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The suite No. 1, in F. Major, Op 39, Moritz Moszkowski was given under Mr. Gericke's direction in 1888, afterward two movements were played by the Symphony Orchestra under Mr. Nikisch in 1893. It consists of five movements and employs all the resources of the orchestra as regards variety of instruments since Glockenspiel piccoli a trio of kettle drums, triangle and harp beside the ordinary array of wood-wind, and strings—all figure in the scene.

The melodies are fresh and bright and the whole composition gives the impression of having been written in a holiday mood, so gay and spontaneous is it. In the finale movement the "Perpetual Motion" the violins, which have throughout had brisk work to do, are called upon to exhibit a wonderful rate of speed, such a rate in fact, as would preclude the idea of its being "Perpetual" since human endurance would soon find its limit in such a stress of motion. The work may not be a great work but it certainly is spiced with variety and is most pleasing.

Mr. Parker's "Northern Ballad" was given for the first time and played from manuscript. The melancholy that seems inseparable from anything connected with the northern zone (since its literature, art and music are all tinged with it) appears here and underlies the rich harmonies and will not yield to the gayer measures that strive in vain to lighten it. The orchestration is most interesting and the work one that will be gladly heard a second time.

Nearly one hundred years ago at this very Christmas season was performed for the first time the "Pastoral" Symphony of Beethoven—the sunny summer preceding, in the beautiful meadows of Heiligenstadt by the side of a rippling mountain stream and with nightingales and cuckoos singing in the tops of the tall trees, this true poem came into being. Beethoven disclaims the idea that it is to be understood as "actual description" but rather "expressive of sensations."

With his key to the "sensations" we are expected to experience, we cannot go amiss, and indeed it almost seems that without any hint or indication other than the music itself, one's imagination might lead him to the "Happy Valley" where, amid sylvan scenes, the simple folk make merry, are overtaken by the storm, and rejoice when it is over, with thankful hearts. The symphony was flawlessly given and demonstrated anon the perfection of detail which Mr. Gericke aims to achieve.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 3, 1900.

HAPPY New Year!

The last symphony concert of 1899 was given on Saturday, presenting three orchestral works and no soloist. The program was:

Suite No. 1..........................Moszkowski
Northern Ballad..........................Parker
Symphony No. 6..........................Beethoven

The Moszkowski Suite is a delicious bit of melody and orchestration, thoroughly refined, dainty and yet full of meat.

Parker's work, given for the first time, was well built, with originality and reminiscences blent. There was much that was graceful, and it was all healthy writing; too long for one movement and too strongly marked with Grieg to be a great work.

* * *

The week before Paderewski was the soloist. The work eliciting most delight to the musicians that night was a second hearing of the César Franck Symphony, which gained much on a rehearing. At both concerts, and especially in the Beethoven accompaniment, the orchestra was superb, under the masterful baton of Gericke.

* * *

JANUARY 1, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra

The tenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Moszkowski: Suite No. 1, in F major, opus 39.
Horatio W. Parker: A Northern Ballad, opus 46.
(First time.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastorale," opus 68.

A delightful programme, admirably played. The Moskowski suite was well worth reviving; it was first played here under Mr. Gericke in the season of 1888-89, and Mr. Nikisch gave two movements from it in 1892-93. It is light music; the expression never gets deeper than the ballet-dancer's smile, in the theme of the third movement it even has a taint of the German thoosy-moosy. But the thing is infinitely graceful and brilliant, the composer does not over-value the weight of what he has to say, and the beauty of orchestral coloring is often entrancing. It is elegant music. The suite was read and played to perfection; the audience, for once, showed its taste in interrupting the variations to applaud the flute solo—the playing richly deserved it, and that sort of solo is not complete without its applause; applause is as much its natural crown as it is that of a ballerina's successful pirouette.

If contrast is a valuable element in a programme, no better preparation could have been devised for Mr. Parker's "Northern Ballad" than this suite of Moszkowski's. Two more utterly different handlings of the modern orchestra were hard to find; the Moszkowski suite all in a prismatic glow of color, Mr. Parker's ballad, for the most part, in cloudy grays, like an arctic December sky. Even if Mr. Parker had given no Scotch nor Irish tang to his themes, his orchestral coloring would have been enough to stamp his work as "Northern." As far as I know, this conception of the north is new in music; it is essentially poetic. A little dangerous, perhaps; for, in music, the physical ear craves delight, and tires of dull grays and drabs, no matter how poetic their suggestiveness; it is all very well for an arctic picture to suggest cold, but you don't want it to make you actually turn up your coat collar. Mr. Parker's orchestration at times makes the ear positively shiver. But this may be hypercriticism, for the ballad is all of a piece, it all hangs together; its coloring is, as a certain sculptor once said of that of Bunker Hill Monument, "the color of its form." It is full of melodic and rhythmic life, full of poetic imagination. It charms especially by its naturalness; there is nothing labored nor farfetched in it. It begins in E-minor, and ends in D-flat major; but the music so settles down into this foreign tonality, and finds itself so naturally at home in it, that the ear asks for nothing else. It is the same with the many fantastic passages in the work; they impress their own reason of being upon you at the first stroke, their fantasticism never seems wilful. To me this is one of the best things Mr. Parker has yet done; one hopes that he may do more in this vein.

The "Pastoral" was played as it has not been played here for many, many years. If not one of the greatest of Beethoven's symphonies, it is surely one of the most perfect in its way, in a sense, one of the most characteristic. In the matter of beauty of orchestration, it is unsurpassed. It is easy enough to spoil it in performance; you can make its simplicity seem cheap by overdoing the expression, or flat and foisonless by underdoing it. It is by no means a work that will tolerate perfunctory playing; and, on the other hand, over accentuation of effects can completely distort its character. On Saturday evening it was so read and played that all its poetry of conception, all its divine musical beauty were felt just as they should be felt. It was thoroughly a great performance.

The next programme is: Brahms's Tragische Ouvertüre, opus 81; Dvorak, concerto for violoncello; Wagner, Siegfried-Idyll; Richard Strauss, symphony, "Aus Italien," opus 16. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the 'cellist.

W. F. A.

Boston Transcript

THURSDAY, JANUARY 4, 1900

DELAY OVER THE NEW MUSIC HALL

Owing to Lack of Steel Required, Building Operations Are Not as Expeditious as Expected

There has been some unavoidable delay in the building of the new Music Hall in the Back Bay section, because of lack of steel required by the builders, and therefore the completion of the building will be later than was at first planned. The builders had expected to turn the completed building over to the stockholders by April 1, but it probably will be some months later than that, or some time in the summer, so it now is thought. Henry L. Higginson, to whose efforts and liberality the city is primarily indebted for the new hall, has offered to take a lease of the building for ten years, thus insuring the stockholders against the possibility of a loss to them on the investment. His proposition will be submitted at the annual meeting of the stockholders, and it is probable that the offer will be accepted.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A Program That Was Distinctly Modern.

Richard Strauss in His More Formal Mood.

Dvorak's 'Cello-Concerto Played by Schroeder.

The program of the 11th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Music Hall last night, was as follows:

Tragic overture .... Brahms
Concerto for 'Cello, in B minor .... Dvorák
A Siegfried Idyl .... Wagner
Symphony in F minor, op. 12 .... Strauss

The program book told the following story:

"Some years ago three young music students at the Hochschule in Munich were talking together one day in one of the public gardens of that capital; they were Richard Strauss, Horatio W. Parker and Ludwig Thuille. One of the three suddenly suggested: 'Why should not each of us write a symphony, and see which one writes the best?' His two companions jumped at the idea, and the three symphonies were duly written. Whatever became of Parker's and Thuille's, I do not know, but Richard Strauss's is the one played at this concert."

This is a pretty story; but just when was Strauss's Symphony in F minor performed for the first time?

His first symphony—the one in D minor—was performed March 30, 1881, at an Akademie concert in Munich.

Mr. Hermann Bischoff in his biographical sketch of Strauss says that the Symphony in F minor shows the influence of the life in Meiningen. But Strauss was not called to Meiningen as second conductor until October, 1885, and the symphony was performed before that date.

The Signale says that the first performance of this same symphony was at Cologne Jan. 13, 1885; but the symphony was played in New York by the Philharmonic Society under Theodore Thomas, Dec. 13, 1884. The first performance in Boston was Nov. 3, 1893.

When it was first played here it made a favorable impression, chiefly on account of the knowledge and freedom of orchestration shown by a young man. Within the last six years we have become better acquainted with Strauss, and although we have not heard—the more the pity—"Don Quixote" and "Heldenleben," nevertheless we are on terms of intimacy with the Strauss of the later period, the composer of the impressive "Tod und Verklärung," the singular "Thus Spake Zarathustra" with its superb first pages and uncanny ending, and the delightful "Till Eulenspiegel," which is so offensive to the sensitive, civet-craving gentlemen who sit in the critics' seats of the New York press. After these works, the earlier work seems tame, and yet there are abundant evidences of the composer's talent in this symphony. He had not yet learned to speak daringly with his own voice, and perhaps some will like the symphony the more on this account. I fear that when the artistic career of Strauss is summed up, the Symphony in F will be judged interesting chiefly as a stage in the development of this remarkable composer. A musician of renown said to me lately that he found no decided "stimmung" or mood in the later pieces of Strauss, except in "Tod und Verklärung," which is to me, so far as I know his compositions, his masterpiece. And yet I find decided moods in the symphony, especially in the first movement.

* * *

The noble overture of Brahms was read and played admirably, and full justice was done to the Siegfried Idyl which has the fatal gift of length. Mr. Schroeder was heartily applauded for his performance of Dvorák's concerto which he introduced here about three years ago. Would that this excellent artist had spent his sympathetic tone and technical skill on another work! I do not mean to be ungracious, and I appreciate Mr. Schroeder's art, and I know the poverty of the repertory for 'cello with orchestra; but Mr. Schroeder might have let us hear Boëlmann's Theme and Variations, or the piece by Massenet that was liked so much in London and Paris. He might answer, "They are not worth playing." But let us hear them and judge for ourselves. Surely they can be no more meretricious or no more insincere in the affectation of naiveté than this concerto of Dvorák's with its themes which are either ultra-sentimental or vulgar, and with gilded gingerbread orchestral decoration. The concerto reminds you often of passages written originally for the famous Congo-Indian-American symphony and finally rejected. It was played for the first time by Mr. Leo Stern, the husband of Suzanne Adams, and he undoubtedly played it sweetly.

Philip Hale.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII, NO. 7.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 7, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brahms' Overture Was Finely Interpreted by Mr. Gericke.

It Was Accorded an Impressively Emphasized Reading—The Wagner Idyll Played with Exquisite Finish—Fine Work of Mr. Schroeder in the Dvorak Concerto.

For the 11th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, the programme was:

Tragic overture, op. 81 .... Brahms
Concerto for 'cello, op. 104 .... Dvorak
A Siegfried idyll .... Wagner
Symphony, F-minor, op. 12 .... R. Strauss

The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The Brahms overture was nobly interpreted by Mr. Gericke. It seemed as if it had never before sounded as intelligently, as large and as interesting as it did in the broad, finely colored and impressively emphasized reading that was accorded it on this occasion; and the performance was wonderfully brilliant and effective.

The Wagner idyll was played with exquisite finish, but the composition is beginning to sound trite, its length to be wearying, and an aspect of premature old age to be slowly creeping over it. The symphony is the sanest of the composer's important works that have been heard here, and, in the main, the most genial, but its interest is neither large nor deep, and it is doubtful if it has come to stay. It lacks the impress of power and what is generally understood as inspiration, and is, perhaps, more notable for the ease of its slap-dash style, for its maker's command of technical brilliancy, than for its loftiness of aim or resourceful inventiveness. The scherzo is, on the whole, its most attractive and original feature in both themes and orchestral color, the latter in particular being full of gracefully spirited charm. The splendid performance of the work brought out all that was in it.

The Dvorak concerto has many beauties of melodiousness and of instrumentation, but it does not seem as if the solo part has been written in a way to bring out the best qualities of the instrument or the soloist. There is overmuch of brilliant passage work that is ineffective, and too little of cantabile in which the 'cello is heard at its best.

The demand made on the more florid technique of the artist is unfavorably disproportionate to the results achieved. Mr. Schroeder, who was received with hearty cordiality, of course, acquitted himself of his difficult task in the spirit of the profoundly able and conscientious artist that he unquestionably is. His large and beautiful tone, his perfect intonation, his fluent and faultless technique, his purity of style and of taste and the exquisite singing quality he brings from the instrument of which he is so thorough a master were all in full and delightful evidence. The storm of applause and the enthusiastic recalls that followed the close of his performance were inevitable. The orchestral accompaniment was admirably tempered for the soloist by Mr. Gericke.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Hiawatha," by Rubin Goldmark, first time; concerto for pianoforte, by Edward Schuett; Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff. Mr. Ludwig Breitner is to be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 7, 1900.

ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program for the 11th symphony rehearsal and concert introduced as the soloist Mr Alwin Schroeder, who played Dvorak's B minor cello concerto, the other numbers for the orchestra comprising Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the F minor symphony by Richard Strauss. The immense orchestral difficulties of the Brahms overture are well known to musicians and the many irregularities of form introduced in the score, and which must be played with absolute precision, are of a nature which demands perfection in ensemble playing or the effectiveness of the work is destroyed and its classic spirit becomes a mass of turbulent sounds, vague and valueless. The so-called "team work" of the men was admirably shown in this number and they followed Mr Gericke's lead with a promptness which gave to each portion of the orchestra its proper tonal value, each contingent acquitting itself in a manner up to the usual standard of this splendid organization. Possibly the Brahms overture may not specially interest the majority of symphony patrons as it is of a very strenuous nature, but the composition is certainly one which if not greatly enjoyed may be heartily appreciated when played by our orchestra.

Mr Schroeder's performance of the Dvorak concerto was masterly as a whole, the cellist repeating the success of a few seasons ago, when he first played the work here. The brilliant second movement calls for special commendation, the elaborate and complex development of many of the phrases being given with a purity of tone and rapidity of execution which strongly suggested the singing of a violin. Mr Schroeder's fingering of triple and quadruple chords are notably dexterous, and despite this fact he seldom sacrifies clarity or purity of [illegible] to rapidity in execution.

The Siegfried idyl, a poetic treatment of themes from the opera of the same name, was charmingly interpreted, the wood-wind players singing their phrases with great delicacy and grace of tone. The Strauss symphony went capitally. The changes in the second part seemingly could not have been bettered in performance, and the quartet of themes in the third part was presented in splendid fashion. The "surprise" in dissonance in the finale was given without exaggeration, as is too frequently the case in some readings, and the closing fantasia received a spirited and sympathetic interpretation.

Mr Ludwig Breitner will be the soloist this week. The program will comprise the overture to "Hiawatha," Goldmark, first time; concerto for pianoforte, Edward Schuett, and the Rimsky-Korsakoff suite, "Scheherazade."

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. JAN. 7, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme: Tragic Overture, Brahms; Concerto for violoncello, Dvorak; Siegfried Idyll, Wagner; Symphony, F minor op. 12, R. Strauss; Soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

What particularly melancholy mood inspired Mr. Gericke in his choice of music all in the gloomy minor strain we do not know, but the fact remains that from the beginning to the end of the concert there was no escape from its depressing influence.

The Tragic Overture was almost cheerful in comparison with the Symphony and the Concerto, in spite of bravura passages of great brilliancy, had an undertone of sadness which the vibrant and singing tone of the violoncello accentuated.

The overture is the second of the two remarkable overtures composed by Brahms. The first, in the key of F, is based on German student songs and widely different in spirit from this second, which from its first unusual chord (the tonic D minor in its first inversion with F for its bass, as well as the second chord with its indecisive tonality) prepares the listener for something powerful and emotion-compelling. It was beautifully given, and has much in it to enjoy.

The concerto, one of the last compositions of Dvorak before leaving the United States (possibly for that reason so tinged with sadness) had the cooperation of Mr. Schroeder, with its author in the composition of the difficult bravura passages, and was rendered by that player with such perfection of execution in the cantabile part as well as in the florid ornamentation, that the work elicited much applause.

The score is dedicated to Hans Wilran, a well known Czechd'cello virtuoso.

The Siegfried Idyll, written in the lovely country by the Lake of Lucerne, when happiness had come in full measure to Wagner with the birth of his little Siegfried (who he doubtless fancied was to embody some of the qualities of the famous Niebelungen hero) contains many themes used in the music drama, but their weaving is so different that the result forms an original and delightful work. The exquisite love motives in the duet between Brunhilde and Siegfried, the slumber motive and the Wanderlied and the carolling bird song all give the impression of deep peace and joy.

It was a restful bit—interposed between the tragic beginning and the sombre ending of the concul.

The Symphony, first given from manuscript in 1884, has made its way into the regular Symphony Concert repertories. Its themes are original, and the orchestration is by the hand of a master, but the impression derived is anything but cheerful. If this symphony is "In Italy" as was announced, it is Verona and the tragedy of the two immortal lovers is fore-shadowered in the mournful music.

The programme for the twelfth rehearsal and concert: Rubin Goldmark, Overture "Hiawatha," (Ms. First time); Edward Schuelt, Concerto for Pianoforte; Rinosky-Kowakoff, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade." Soloist: Mr. Ludwig Biertuer.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 7, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eleventh Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall, with Mr. Alwin Schroeder as the soloist. The programme consisted of Brahms's "Tragic" overture, op. 81; Dvorak's 'cello concerto in B minor; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Richard Strauss's symphony in F minor, op. 12.

Brahms's "Tragic" overture is a worthy companion to the "Academic" overture, though the former is not perhaps so interesting to the average listener. It received a very fine interpretation.

The gem of the evening was the "Siegfried Idyl," one of the choicest bits in the whole Wagner repertory. Always most enjoyable, it was never heard to better advantage than it was last evening, and it was received with an extra amount of applause.

The Strauss symphony, an early work of this erratic composer, is interesting in two movements, the other two being rather tame and commonplace. The whole work is very different, however, from what Strauss has written in the past few years.

Mr. Schroeder received an ovation for his masterly performance of the Dvorak 'cello concerto. Seldom has this really great artist been heard to better advantage. The work is rather more pleasing than most of its class, and was written while the composer was living in New York.

Mr. Ludwig Breitner, pianist, will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this week.

Boston Transcript
MONDAY, JANUARY 1, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The tenth symphony concert was given in the Music Hall last Saturday evening, the programme being as follows:

Moszkowski: Suite No. 1, in F major, opus 39.
Horatio W. Parker: A Northern Ballad, opus 46.
(First time.)
Beethoven: Symphony No. 6, in F major, "Pastorale," opus 68.

A delightful programme, admirably played. The Moskowski suite was well worth reviving; it was first played here under Mr. Gericke in the season of 1888-89, and Mr. Nikisch gave two movements from it in 1892-93. It is light music; the expression never gets deeper than the ballet-dancer's smile, in the theme of the third movement it even has a taint of the German thoosy-moosy. But the thing is infinitely graceful and brilliant, the composer does not over-value the weight of what he has to say, and the beauty of orchestral coloring is often entrancing. It is elegant music. The suite was read and played to perfection; the audience, for once, showed its taste in interrupting the variations to applaud the flute solo—the playing richly deserved it, and that sort of solo is not complete without its applause; applause is as much its natural crown as it is that of a ballerina's successful pirouette.

If contrast is a valuable element in a programme, no better preparation could have been devised for Mr. Parker's "Northern Ballad" than this suite of Moszkowski's. Two more utterly different handlings of the modern orchestra were hard to find; the Moszkowski suite all in a prismatic glow of color, Mr. Parker's ballad, for the most part, in cloudy grays, like an arctic December sky. Even if Mr. Parker had given no Scotch nor Irish tang to his themes, his orchestral coloring would have been enough to stamp his work as "Northern." As far as I know, this conception of the north is new in music; it is essentially poetic. A little dangerous, perhaps; for, in music, the physical ear craves delight, and tires of dull grays and drabs, no matter how poetic their suggestiveness; it is all very well for an arctic picture to suggest cold, but you don't want it to make you actually turn up your coat collar. Mr. Parker's orchestration at times makes the ear positively shiver. But this may be hypercriticism, for the ballad is all of a piece, it all hangs together; its coloring is, as a certain sculptor once said of that of Bunker Hill Monument, "the color of its form." It is full of melodic and rhythmic life, full of poetic imagination. It charms especially by its naturalness; there is nothing labored nor farfetched in it. It begins in E-minor, and ends in D-flat major; but the music so settles down into this foreign tonality, and finds itself so naturally at home in it, that the ear asks for nothing else. It is the same with the many fantastic passages in the work; they impress their own reason of being upon you at the first stroke, their fantasticism never seems wilful. To me this is one of the best things Mr. Parker has yet done; one hopes that he may do more in this vein.

The "Pastoral" was played as it has not been played here for many, many years. If not one of the greatest of Beethoven's symphonies, it is surely one of the most perfect in its way, in a sense, one of the most characteristic. In the matter of beauty of orchestration, it is unsurpassed. It is easy enough to spoil it in performance; you can make its simplicity seem cheap by overdoing the expression, or flat and foisonless by underdoing it. It is by no means a work that will tolerate perfunctory playing; and, on the other hand, over accentuation of effects can completely distort its character. On Saturday evening it was so read and played that all its poetry of conception, all its divine musical beauty were felt just as they should be felt. It was thoroughly a great performance.

The next programme is: Brahms's Tragische Ouvertüre, opus 81; Dvorak, concerto for violoncello; Wagner, Siegfried-Idyll; Richard Strauss, symphony, "Aus Italien," opus 16. Mr. Alwin Schroeder will be the 'cellist.

W. F. A.

Boston Transcript
THURSDAY, JANUARY 4, 1900

DELAY OVER THE NEW MUSIC HALL

Owing to Lack of Steel Required, Building Operations Are Not as Expeditious as Expected

There has been some unavoidable delay in the building of the new Music Hall in the Back Bay section, because of lack of steel required by the builders, and therefore the completion of the building will be later than was at first planned. The builders had expected to turn the completed building over to the stockholders by April 1, but it probably will be some months later than that, or some time in the summer, so it now is thought. Henry L. Higginson, to whose efforts and liberality the city is primarily indebted for the new hall, has offered to take a lease of the building for ten years, thus insuring the stockholders against the possibility of a loss to them on the investment. His proposition will be submitted at the annual meeting of the stockholders, and it is probable that the offer will be accepted.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 7, 1900.

SYMPHONY NIGHT.

A Program That Was Distinctly Modern.

Richard Strauss in His More Formal Mood.

Dvorak's 'Cello - Concerto Played by Schroeder.

The program of the 11th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, in Music Hall last night, was as follows:

Tragic overture	Brahms
Concerto for 'Cello, in B minor	Dvořák
A Siegfried Idyl	Wagner
Symphony in F minor, op. 12	Strauss

The program book told the following story:

"Some years ago three young music students at the Hochschule in Munich were talking together one day in one of the public gardens of that capital; they were Richard Strauss, Horatio W. Parker and Ludwig Thuille. One of the three suddenly suggested: 'Why should not each of us write a symphony, and see which one writes the best?' His two companions jumped at the idea, and the three symphonies were duly written. Whatever became of Parker's and Thuille's, I do not know, but Richard Strauss's is the one played at this concert."

This is a pretty story; but just when was Strauss's Symphony in F minor performed for the first time?

His first symphony—the one in D minor—was performed March 30, 1881, at an Akademie concert in Munich.

Mr. Hermann Bischoff in his biographical sketch of Strauss says that the Symphony in F minor shows the influence of the life in Meiningen. But Strauss was not called to Meiningen as second conductor until October, 1885, and the symphony was performed before that date.

The Signale says that the first performance of this same symphony was at Cologne Jan. 13, 1885; but the symphony was played in New York by the Philharmonic Society under Theodore Thomas, Dec. 13, 1884. The first performance in Boston was Nov. 3, 1893.

When it was first played here it made a favorable impression, chiefly on account of the knowledge and freedom of orchestration shown by a young man. Within the last six years we have become better acquainted with Strauss, and although we have not heard—the more the pity—"Don Quixote" and "Heldenleben," nevertheless we are on terms of intimacy with the Strauss of the later period, the composer of the impressive "Tod und Verklärung," the singular "Thus Spake Zarathustra" with its superb first pages and uncanny ending, and the delightful "Till Eulenspiegel," which is so offensive to the sensitive, civet-craving gentlemen who sit in the critics' seats of the New York press. After these works, the earlier work seems tame, and yet there are abundant evidences of the composer's talent in this symphony. He had not yet learned to speak daringly with his own voice, and perhaps some will like the symphony the more on this account. I fear that when the artistic career of Strauss is summed up, the Symphony in F will be judged interesting chiefly as a stage in the development of this remarkable composer. A musician of renown said to me lately that he found no decided "stimmung" or mood in the later pieces of Strauss, except in "Tod und Verklärung," which is to me, so far as I know his compositions, his masterpiece. And yet I find decided moods in the symphony, especially in the first movement.

⁂

The noble overture of Brahms was read and played admirably, and full justice was done to the Siegfried Idyl which has the fatal gift of length. Mr. Schroeder was heartily applauded for his performance of Dvořák's concerto which he introduced here about three years ago. Would that this excellent artist had spent his sympathetic tone and technical skill on another work! I do not mean to be ungracious, and I appreciate Mr. Schroeder's art, and I know the poverty of the repertory for 'cello with orchestra; but Mr. Schroeder might have let us hear Boëlmann's Theme and Variations, or the piece by Massenet that was liked so much in London and Paris. He might answer, "They are not worth playing." But let us hear them and judge for ourselves. Surely they can be no more meretricious or no more insincere in the affectation of naïveté than this concerto of Dvořák's with its themes which are either ultra-sentimental or vulgar, and with gilded gingerbread orchestral decoration. The concerto reminds you often of passages written originally for the famous Congo-Indian-American symphony and finally rejected. It was played for the first time by Mr. Leo Stern, the husband of Suzanne Adams, and he undoubtedly played it sweetly.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 7.
SUNDAY, JANUARY, 7, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Brahms' Overture Was Finely Interpreted by Mr. Gericke.

It Was Accorded an Impressively Emphasized Reading—The Wagner Idyll Played with Exquisite Finish—Fine Work of Mr. Schroeder in the Dvorak Concerto.

For the 11th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra in Music Hall, last evening, the programme was:

Tragic overture, op. 81	Brahms
Concerto for 'cello, op. 104	Dvorak
A Siegfried idyll	Wagner
Symphony, F-minor, op. 12	R. Strauss

The soloist was Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

The Brahms overture was nobly interpreted by Mr. Gericke. It seemed as if it had never before sounded as intelligently, as large and as interesting as it did in the broad, finely colored and impressively emphasized reading that was accorded it on this occasion; and the performance was wonderfully brilliant and effective.

The Wagner idyll was played with exquisite finish, but the composition is beginning to sound trite, its length to be wearying, and an aspect of premature old age to be slowly creeping over it. The symphony is the sanest of the composer's important works that have been heard here, and, in the main, the most genial, but its interest is neither large nor deep, and it is doubtful if it has come to stay. It lacks the impress of power and what is generally understood as inspiration, and is, perhaps, more notable for the ease of its slap-dash style, for its maker's command of technical brilliancy, than for its loftiness of aim or resourceful inventiveness. The scherzo is, on the whole, its most attractive and original feature in both themes and orchestral color, the latter in particular being full of gracefully spirited charm. The splendid performance of the work brought out all that was in it.

The Dvorak concerto has many beauties of melodiousness and of instrumentation, but it does not seem as if the solo part has been written in a way to bring out the best qualities of the instrument or the soloist. There is overmuch of brilliant passage work that is ineffective, and too little of cantabile in which the 'cello is heard at its best.

The demand made on the more florid technique of the artist is unfavorably disproportionate to the results achieved. Mr. Schroeder, who was received with hearty cordiality, of course, acquitted himself of his difficult task in the spirit of the profoundly able and conscientious artist that he unquestionably is. His large and beautiful tone, his perfect intonation, his fluent and faultless technique, his purity of style and of taste and the exquisite singing quality he brings from the instrument of which he is so thorough a master were all in full and delightful evidence. The storm of applause and the enthusiastic recalls that followed the close of his performance were inevitable. The orchestral accompaniment was admirably tempered for the soloist by Mr. Gericke.

The programme for the next concert is: Overture, "Hiawatha," by Rubin Goldmark, first time; concerto for pianoforte, by Edward Schuett; Symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," Rimsky-Korsakoff. Mr. Ludwig Breitner is to be the soloist.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 7, 1900.

ELEVENTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program for the 11th symphony rehearsal and concert introduced as the soloist Mr Alwin Schroeder, who played Dvorak's B minor cello concerto, the other numbers for the orchestra comprising Brahms' "Tragic" overture, Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and the F minor symphony by Richard Strauss. The immense orchestral difficulties of the Brahms overture are well known to musicians and the many irregularities of form introduced in the score, and which must be played with absolute precision, are of a nature which demands perfection in ensemble playing or the effectiveness of the work is destroyed and its classic spirit becomes a mass of turbulent sounds, vague and valueless. The so-called "team work" of the men was admirably shown in this number and they followed Mr Gericke's lead with a promptness which gave to each portion of the orchestra its proper tonal value, each contingent acquitting itself in a manner up to the usual standard of this splendid organization. Possibly the Brahms overture may not specially interest the majority of symphony patrons as it is of a very strenuous nature, but the composition is certainly one which if not greatly enjoyed may be heartily appreciated when played by our orchestra.

Mr Schroeder's performance of the Dvorak concerto was masterly as a whole, the cellist repeating the success of a few seasons ago, when he first played the work here. The brilliant second movement calls for special commendation, the elaborate and complex development of many of the phrases being given with a purity of tone and rapidity of execution which strongly suggested the singing of a violin. Mr Schroeder's fingering of triple and quadruple chords are notably dexterous, and despite this fact he seldom sacrifies clarity or purity of tonation to rapidity in execution.

The Siegfried idyl, a poetic treatment of themes from the opera of the same name, was charmingly interpreted, the wood-wind players singing their phrases with great delicacy and grace of tone. The Strauss symphony went capitally. The changes in the second part seemingly could not have been bettered in performance, and the quartet of themes in the third part was presented in splendid fashion. The "surprise" in dissonance in the finale was given without exaggeration, as is too frequently the case in some readings, and the closing fantasia received a spirited and sympathetic interpretation.

Mr Ludwig Breitner will be the soloist this week. The program will comprise the overture to "Hiawatha," Goldmark, first time; concerto for pianoforte, Edward Schuett, and the Rimsky-Korsakoff suite, "Scheherazade."

Boston Courier.
ESTABLISHED 1795. JAN. 7, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Programme: Tragic Overture, Brahms; Concerto for violoncello, Dvorak; Siegfried Idyll, Wagner; Symphony, F minor op. 12, R. Strauss; Soloist, Mr. Alwin Schroeder.

What particularly melancholy mood inspired Mr. Gericke in his choice of music all in the gloomy minor strain we do not know, but the fact remains that from the beginning to the end of the concert there was no escape from its depressing influence.

The Tragic Overture was almost cheerful in comparison with the Symphony and the Concerto, in spite of bravura passages of great brilliancy, had an undertone of sadness which the vibrant and singing tone of the violoncello accentuated.

The overture is the second of the two remarkable overtures composed by Brahms. The first, in the key of F, is based on German student songs and widely different in spirit from this second, which from its first unusual chord (the tonic D minor in its first inversion with F for its bass, as well as the second chord with its indecisive tonality) prepares the listener for something powerful and emotion-compelling. It was beautifully given, and has much in it to enjoy.

The concerto, one of the last compositions of Dvorak before leaving the United States (possibly for that reason so tinged with sadness) had the co-operation of Mr. Schroeder, with its author in the composition of the difficult bravura passages, and was rendered by that player with such perfection of execution in the cantabile part as well as in the florid ornamentation, that the work elicited much applause.

The score is dedicated to Hans Wilran, a well known Czechd'cello virtuoso.

The Siegfried Idyll, written in the lovely country by the Lake of Lucerne, when happiness had come in full measure to Wagner with the birth of his little Siegfried (who he doubtless fancied was to embody some of the qualities of the famous Niebelungen hero) contains many themes used in the music drama, but their weaving is so different that the result forms an original and delightful work. The exquisite love motives in the duet between Brunhilde and Siegfried, the slumber motive and the Wanderlied and the carolling bird song all give the impression of deep peace and joy.

It was a restful bit—interposed between the tragic beginning and the sombre ending of the concul.

The Symphony, first given from manuscript in 1884, has made its way into the regular Symphony Concert repertories. Its themes are original, and the orchestration is by the hand of a master, but the impression derived is anything but cheerful. If this symphony is "In Italy" as was announced, it is Verona and the tragedy of the two immortal lovers is fore-shadowered in the mournful music.

The programme for the twelfth rehearsal and concert: Rubin Goldmark, Overture "Hiawatha," (Ms. First time); Edward Schuelt, Concerto for Pianoforte; Rinosky-Kowakoff, Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade." Soloist: Mr. Ludwig Biertuer.

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.
SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 7, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The eleventh Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall, with Mr. Alwin Schroeder as the soloist. The programme consisted of Brahms's "Tragic" overture, op. 81; Dvorak's 'cello concerto in B minor; Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl" and Richard Strauss's symphony in F minor, op. 12.

Brahms's "Tragic" overture is a worthy companion to the "Academic" overture, though the former is not perhaps so interesting to the average listener. It received a very fine interpretation.

Th gem of the evening was the "Siegfried Idyl," one of the choicest bits in the whole Wagner repertory. Always most enjoyable, it was never heard to better advantage than it was last evening, and it was received with an extra amount of applause.

The Strauss symphony, an early work of this erratic composer, is interesting in two movements, the other two being rather tame and commonplace. The whole work is very different, however, from what Strauss has written in the past few years.

Mr. Schroeder received an ovation for his masterly performance of the Dvorak 'cello concerto. Seldom has this really great artist been heard to better advantage. The work is rather more pleasing than most of its class, and was written while the composer was living in New York.

Mr. Ludwig Breitner, pianist, will be the soloist at the rehearsal and concert this week.

[illegible]

ESTABLISHED 1813.

The Official Paper of the State.

The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 8, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Modern music was the bill of fare at the Symphony concert Saturday night. Brahms, Dvorak, Wagner and Strauss, whose names are synonyms for modernity in the treatment of themes, and their adaptation to orchestral conditions, furnished a programme of sufficient variety.

Dvorak's contribution, the concerto for 'cello, in B minor, certainly had the virtue of being new to a Boston symphony audience.

One cannot predict immortality for this composition. Had Dvorak confined his labors to the two last movements, the concerto would have been a positive success. The first movement, however, is tedious in its contrivances and confusing in the excessive display of orchestral effect, and not even the genius of Alwin Schroeder, who was the soloist on this occasion, could give it a title to the affections of a discriminating audience.

Wagner's "Siegfried Idyl," however, was a delightful souvenir of the great master in his lighter and simpler moods. The Idyl, it will be remembered, was written as a birthday gift to Frau Wagner. There was peculiar fitness, then, in the mood which prompted the expert in scoring and orchestration to lay aside, for a time, the more complex effects of his art, and to write what is in truth an "idyl," with his young son Siegfried to furnish a title for it. The composition furnishes a convincing reply to those who would argue that Wagner depends largely upon the devices of scoring for his effects.

Richard Strauss's symphony in F minor furnishes a total contrast to the later heavy scores which became so characteristic of the Viennese meister. This symphony was written in the early part of Strauss's career, when he was largely under the influence of Brahms; but in the work which was played admirably by the symphony concert Saturday night, Strauss is far simpler, more direct and more melodic than Brahms.

The echo of Brahms was placed at the end of the programme as a fitting counterpoise to the opening number. Brahms's tragic overture, which is a good offset to the academic, humorous overture of the composer, and was admirably played by the orchestra.

The orchestra, in fact, acquitted itself most creditably, and warmed up beautifully to its work after it had succeeded in acclimating itself to the frigidity of the atmosphere.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 8, 1900

Music Hall; Boston Symphony Orchestra

The programme of the eleventh symphony concert, given in the Music Hall, last Saturday evening, was:

Brahms: Tragische Ouvertüre, opus 81.
Dvorak: Concerto for Violoncello, in B minor, opus 104.
Wagner: Siegfried-Idyll.
Richard Strauss: Symphony in F minor, opus 12.
Mr. Alwin Schroeder was the 'cellist.

Brahms's noble overture was admirably, wonderfully read and played. This time, one could enjoy the music with redoubled satisfaction: for has not Mr. J. F. Runciman assured a trembling world that there will be no bloodshed about Brahms? Hitherto we who love him (that is, Brahms, not Mr. Runciman) have listened to his works in continual terror of being suddenly attacked by a horde of wild Tchaikovskyites, with tomahawks and savage warwhoops. Now we can listen in peace, without fear for our scalps.

It is always dangerous to use superlatives; but it seemed to me that the performance of the Siegfried-Idyll on Saturday evening was out-and-out the finest I had ever heard. The technical perfection of the playing was equalled only by the poetic beauty of the conception. I noticed one thing that was new to me, a point which the ingenious analyst of the programme-books had failed to note: this is, amongst the mass of thematic material in the Idyll, an ever-recurring allusion to the Kaiser-Marsch. I have just proved this discovery by referring to both scores; without being an exact quotation, note for note, the allusion is too often repeated to have been accidental. The idea is not without its poetry, it gives a certain "Philip, my King" shading to the composer's feeling toward his baby hero. As for that same analyst, why should not I have my whack at him, too? In detailing the score of the Dvorak concerto, he mentions four horns—and there are only three in the score! A most disquieting mistake; for seeing that fourth horn lying idle on the player's otherwise vacant chair gave one the most apprehensive qualms for our excellent fourth hornist's health; could he have been struck by apoplexy? Such inaccuracies are serious; think of the effect this one might have had upon any member of the player's family who was present, missing him from his accustomed place, when the programme-book plainly implied that he ought to be there!

It was interesting to hear Richard Strauss's first symphony again—written when the composer was only seventeen. It seems to me that, in this work, Strauss has pretty well broken the juvenile record, as far as symphonies are concerned. I will not attempt to determine whether his work equals, or surpasses, Mendelssohn's E-flat major octet for strings, written also at the age of seventeen; the comparison is of little value, for it takes more to set up an orchestral symphony firmly upon its feet than to write a chamber-composition like the octet. What Mozart's little G-minor symphony (written at seventeen) is, we have seen this winter; between it and this one of Strauss's there is no comparison possible. Beethoven wrote his first symphony when he was thirty; Berlioz wrote his "Fantastique" at twenty-five or twenty-six—it was first produced in 1830. Wagner's C-major symphony is surely neither so strong nor so mature a work as this F-minor of Strauss's. I think this composition can fairly stand as the strongest first symphony ever written by a man under twenty.

As to this second impression of the work—it was first played here under Mr. Paur in 1893-94—I am a little in doubt. Some of Mr. Gericke's tempi struck me as very strange; it is quite possible that he had them direct from the composer, but they still seem not entirely justifiable. The first movement, to be sure, is marked "Allegro ma non troppo, un poco maestoso"—two indications of moderation in speed: the "non troppo" and the "maestoso." But, considering that the movement is in 2-4 time, the slowness of his beat seemed out of character with an "Allegro" of any sort, no matter how moderate. The opening measures sounded, for all the world, like the conventional slow introduction, and this character was maintained throughout the movement. The Scherzo seemed, taken by itself, to warrant Mr. Gericke's moderate tempo, which a certain occasional heaviness in the instrumentation seemed still further to justify; but by what possible logic could it be made to agree with the composer's marking: "Presto"? The fact that the Finale is written in 2-2 time might be taken to warrant a certain breadth of tempo; but the marking: "Allegro assai, molto appassionato" seemed to be contradicted by Mr. Gericke's extreme moderation. Let me say, on the other hand, that, leaving the composer's tempo-marks out of consideration, and taking each separate movement by itself, Mr. Gericke read each one of them so precisely in the spirit of his tempo that the latter seemed to fit the music to a T. But, taking the symphony as a whole, one found this succession of very slow tempi simply ruinous; the work sounded like a protracted dirge, its F minor got at last to seem like F-flat minor. I cannot help thinking that, well as each movement sounded by itself, the symphony, as a whole, would gain immeasurably by the Scherzo and the Finale being taken decidedly more briskly, and by the first movement going recognizably faster. As played last Saturday, though with great technical perfection and poignant beauty of expression and shading, it too soon became tiresome; one perceived its beauties without feeling them. One even found occasional weaknesses, which might not have seemed such had the music been held more strongly together by less deliberate playing, and without that excessive emphasis upon detail work which a too slow tempo almost inevitably brings with it.

Mr. Schroeder played the Dvorak concerto like a consummate master of every secret of his instrument, like a master with fire and poetry in his soul. The composition itself struck me more pleasantly than when he first played it he[illegible] years ago. For one thing, the orchestral accompaniment was far better played last Saturday than then—an item of no mean importance. Dvorak had his favorite "Negro themes" singing in his ears when he wrote it; not all of them of indubitable authenticity, either, for the second theme of the first movement smacks plainly enough of the late lamented Stephen Collins Foster and the burnt-cork tenorino. But, if ever there were a man to feel luxuriously at home in sentimental-popular musical material, and to express all its juice with perfect frankness of gush, Dvorak is that man. Such is his inveterate geniality of sentiment that it often succeeds in making vulgarity seem no longer vulgar; only Beethoven could beat him at this game! Then, too, he has reduced 'cello virtuosity to practically innocuous proportions in this concerto; with Mr. Schroeder at the bow, the bravura passages do not sound like bellicose cats; they glide smoothly past the ear, and throw graceful lace-work around the thematic work in the orchestra. There is, too, the due proportion of expressive cantilena, without monotony. Upon the whole, an exceedingly clever work, if in no sense a great one. Mr. Schroeder was fitly applauded and recalled for one of the most entirely artistic bits of solo-playing ever heard at the symphony concerts.

The next programme is: Rubin Goldmark, overture to "Hiawatha" (MS., first time); Schütt, concerto for pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, opus 47; Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35. Mr. Ludwig Breitner will be the pianist.

W. F. A.

Marie Brema, who arrived from England on board the Lucania, will sing in a series of concerts with the Boston Symphony Orchestra this month, and will also be heard in opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, New York, in her special roles. She will be the soloist in the first New York concert of the Pittsburg Symphony Orchestra at Carnegie Hall Jan. 23. During the month of February Mme. Brema will make a Western tour of concerts and song recitals for which she has been engaged by the leading societies. She is under the management of Henry Wolfsohn while in this country.

Boston Journal.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 12, 1900.

AUDIENCE FLED.

An Explosion Emptied Sanders Theatre.

Primed Clock Had Been Placed in Closet.

A Premature Revelation of Student's Trick.

Just as the orchestra at the Symphony concert in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, last evening, was playing one of the heaviest parts in the "Thunderstorm" passage of Beethoven's pastoral scene in his Symphony No. 6, a loud explosion was heard near the right entrance. A sharp buzzing sound followed, and then smoke was seen to be pouring from one of the doors. A panic ensued, but the crowd managed to pass out without any one being injured.

There was a considerable scare in the theatre nevertheless, and the exit of some of the audience was next door to a scramble Prof. Gerricke was forced to stop for a time. Some of the windows of the theatre were broken and the smoke, pouring out, looked ugly.

Mrs. John L. Gardner was in the gallery. She hurried down stairs to see whether Mr. George W. Proctor, the soloist, who is a protege of hers, was hurt. He was not.

What was left of the infernal machine was then discovered in the closet from which the smoke issued. It consisted of an ordinary alarm clock with a number of arms and levers with binding about them.

The force of the explosion had rent the sides of the clock and it had stopped at 9.20.

The only reason for the act seems to be that the affair was planned for a surprise in History I. today at 9.20, but that the schemer had overlooked the fact that there was another 9.20 before the History came off.

Prof. Shaler took the machine in his charge, and another professor present among the angry dignitaries of the college swore that by morning he would have a full detective force at work on the case.

In the meantime the college looks on smilingly at what was probably a Freshman trick.

Boston Daily Globe.

FRIDAY, JAN. 12, 1900.

CAUSED PANIC.

Infernal Machine Left in Sanders Theater.

Exploded During an Evening Concert.

Hall Soon Filled With Smoke.

Glass in the Windows Was Shattered.

Rush Was Made for the Doors, and Women Shrieked.

Contrivance Was Timed to Go Off at 9.20.

Thought to Have Been Joke for a Morning Lecture.

An infernal machine exploded in Sanders' theater, Cambridge, last night, during a concert by the Boston Symphony orchestra, shattered the glass in several windows, filled the hall with smoke, and created a panic among the audience.

At 9.20, as the orchestra was rendering a storm-movement in Beethoven's symphony No. 6, a terrific explosion was heard under the front tier of seats at the right of the stage, followed by the crash of falling glass.

For half a minute the orchestra continued playing. Then, as a great cloud of smoke burst from the door of a closet at the right of the stage, the music ceased, women shrieked, and a rush was made for the doors.

Fortunately a number of cool-headed men were in the audience, who jumped on the seats and shouted for quiet and order. The audience escaped into Memorial hall, and the concert broke up.

Investigators of the cause of the explosion and smoke found an infernal machine of some new species in the little closet in which speakers in Sanders theater are accustomed to prepare to go on the platform.

The machine consisted of a small alarm clock, set at 9.20, with an intricate arrangement of cogwheels, balances and iron rods above the alarm bell and connected with the machinery of the clock. Nothing like it has ever been seen before in the precincts of Harvard.

Prof Shaler, dean of the scientific school, who was present at the concert, took the contrivance away for safe keeping. It was stated in the hearing of a number of the audience that a detective will be employed to work up the case and find the culprit.

Harvard students are inclined to take the matter as a joke, conjecture favoring the hypothesis that the machine was intended to go off in a course given from 9 to 10 mornings in Sanders theater. This course, known as history I, is conducted by Asst Prof A. C. Coolidge, and consists largely of freshmen, to whom the idea of such a joke would be attractive.

The janitor stated after the explosion that in the morning he found an ordinary leather bag, such as is often carried by students who live outside of Cambridge, on the seats in Sanders theater, and he had placed it in the closet for safe keeping until a claimant should appear. Various bits of leather scattered about the floor of the closet bear evidence that the bag contained the machine whose explosion created such a stir at the concert.

No such excitement has been known at Harvard since the alarm clocks went off at a lecture in Prof Wendell's course several years ago.

EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVII., NO. 12.

FRIDAY, JAN. 12, 1900.

WENT OFF TOO SOON.

Panic in Sanders Theatre Due to Bomb Bursting.

Machine Set to Surprise a Lecture in the Morning.

No One Hurt, but a Symphony Audience Melted Away.

The sixth Symphony concert which was being held last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, was sharply broken up about 15 minutes past 9 o'clock by a sudden explosion in a closet near the entrance to the theatre, on the right-hand side going in from the hall. The result was that, no sooner was the explosion heard, than the whole audience made a mad rush for the doors, and all attempts of the director to stop them were futile. No one was hurt, but all were thoroughly frightened.

So far as can be ascertained, the cause of the explosion was what is thought to be the tardy working of a trick by some student, who had no malicious intent, but simply did it for a joke. The fact is that the theatre is occupied three days out of the week by Prof. A. C. Coolidge, who gives at 9 o'clock his lecture in history, known to the students as history I. The course met there yesterday morning, and the would-be joker had arranged this clock contrivance to a small bomb, and set it to go off about quarter-past 9, but he made the mistake of setting the alarm hand for that time in the evening, instead of the morning.

The joke was like that which was played on Prof. Wendell two years ago, during his English lecture in the Fogg Art Museum, only of a more serious nature.

Prof. N. S. Shaler, dean of the scientific school, was present last night, and took the remains of the infernal machine, if that it may be called. He declares that he will hire a detective to investigate. As only a little of the machine is left, it is difficult to tell just what its nature was.

The explosion was very loud, and some are inclined to take the matter in a serious way. It is said that the machine was in a bag, and was originally placed in a seat, evidently to work its results on some student.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1900.

ANOTHER good concert was that of the Boston Symphony this week, in which Alwin Schroeder was the soloist. The program was nothing if not modern, presenting: ....Brahms
Tragic Overture, op. 81..Dvorák
Concerto for 'cello, op. 104..Wagner
A Siegfried Idyll..Strauss
Symphony, F minor, op. 12..

The Brahms Overture, a splendid and noble piece of work, was admirably presented; the nuances seemed the very acme of art, and the strong contrasts of color were most skillfully set forth by Gericke and his faultless organization. The Strauss Symphony certainly showed more form than most of the compositions we get from this font of modernity. There is much brilliancy in the work, and the Scherzo leaves it possible to say that there is much grace also. The andante cantabile was beautiful, and altogether the Symphony held the interest throughout.

The Dvorák Concerto was admirably played by Schroeder, but, with the exception of bits here and there, lacked the elements of a great work and hardly worth more than the one hearing. Schroeder was received with storms of applause, and the orchestral accompaniment left nothing to be desired.

* * *

At the next concert Ludwig Breitner, the great Parisian pedagogue, will be the soloist. Breitner is a pupil of Rubinstein and Liszt, and was one of the foremost teachers of Paris. His arrival in America is of no small importance to matters musical, and it is to be hoped that he will be accorded the position that he deserves.

* * *

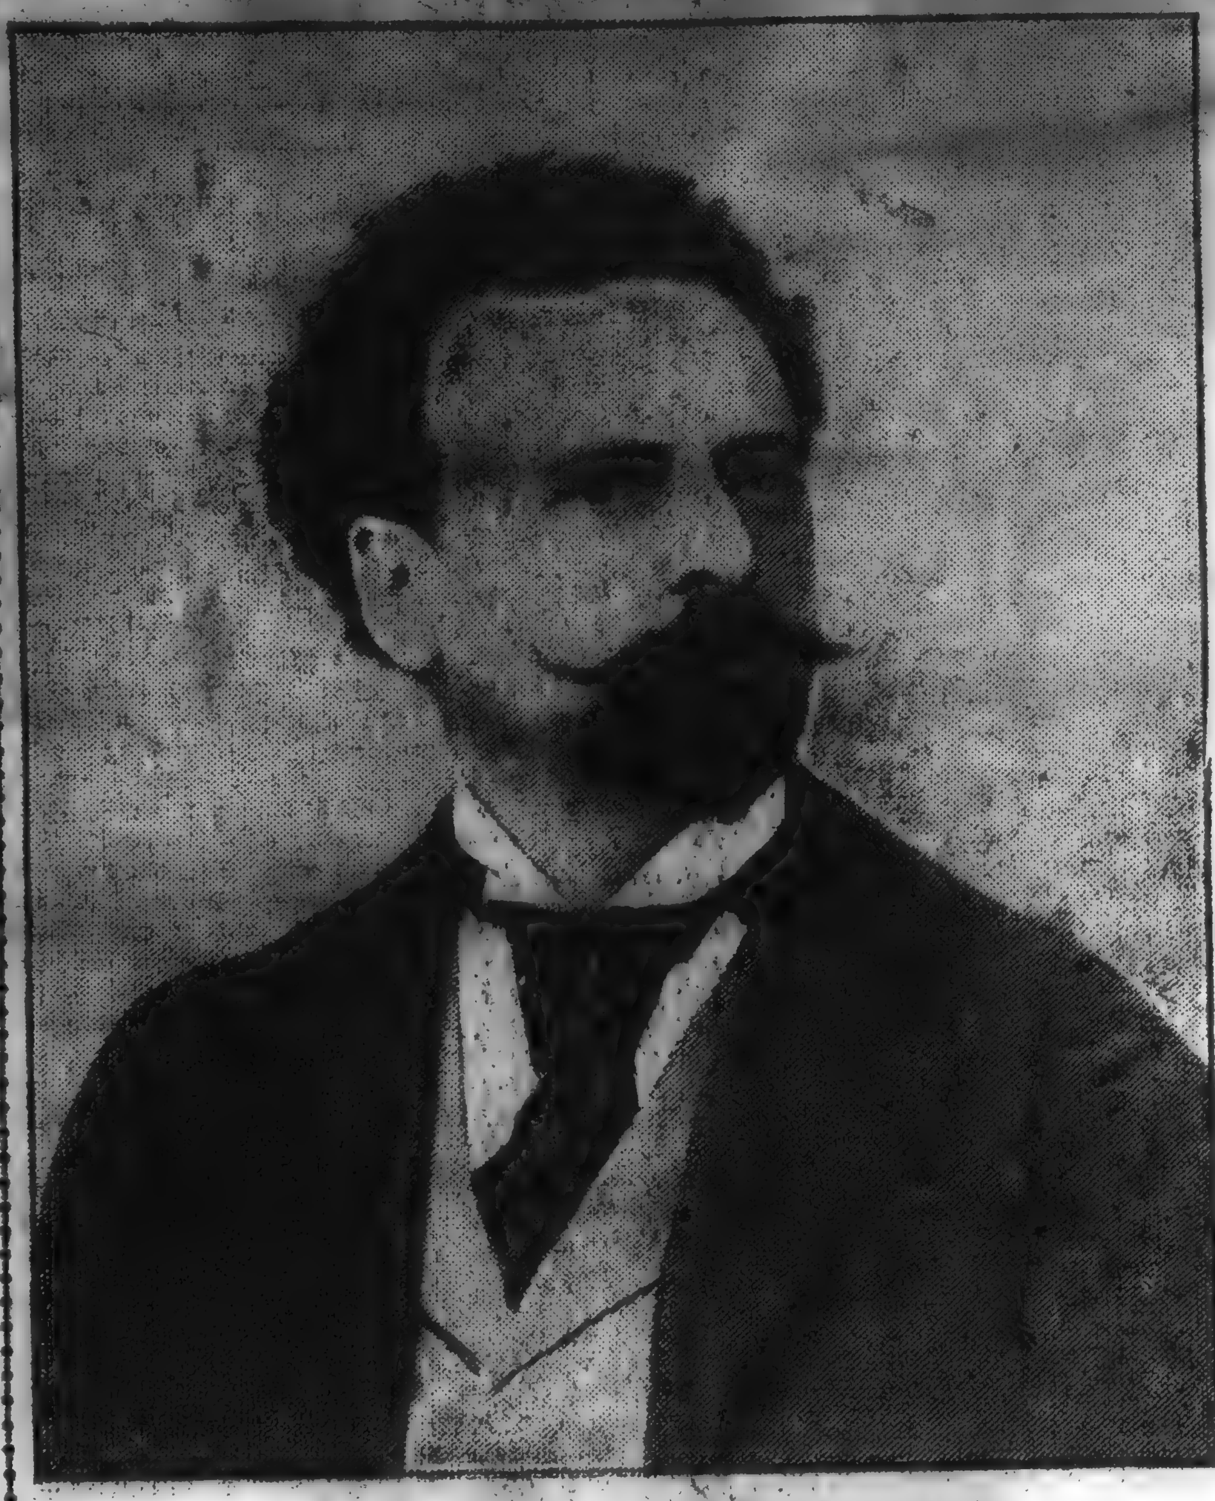
BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 14, 1900.
(Copyright, 1900, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twelfth Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. Mr. Ludwig Breitner was the soloist. The programme included an overture, "Hiawatha," by Rubin Goldmark; concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 2, in F minor, Schutt, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," op. 35.

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST.



(Photograph by F. Lostel, Villiers Sur Mer, France.)

LUDWIG BREITNER.

Ludwig Breitner, pianist, now teaching in New York, makes his first appearance in America with the Symphony Orchestra this week in Music Hall. He was born at Trieste, and as a boy went to the Milan Conservatory. Von Bülow heard him there and advised him to study with Rubinstein, who taught him for three years. After staying with Liszt for six months Breitner returned to St. Petersburg, where he was active as teacher and pianist. He afterward played in the chief European cities, and finally settled in Paris, where he met his wife, Berthe Haaft, a violinist of the Vienna Conservatory. In Paris Mr. Breitner is favorably known as a teacher and as a player, chiefly in chamber music. About two years ago he founded in that city a Philharmonic Society. They tell this pleasant tale of Mr. Breitner's early student days.

The lad, although one of the most timid in existence, went alone to the house of Rubinstein. In the absence of the latter it was his wife who received him. She having a penchant for Italians, entered into conversation with him. This, with his evident earnestness and sincerity, made an agreeable impression, and she pleaded in his behalf with her husband on his return. Rubinstein looked him over, and told him to return in eight days and bring a Chopin Sonata with him. He did bring it, but in his head, not in his hands. He had memorized the sonata thoroughly in eight days.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the twelfth symphony rehearsal and concert was:

Overture, "Hiawatha"..........Goldmark
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, F minor, Op. 47....................Schuett
Suite "Scheherazade," Op. 35.............................Rimsky-Korsakoff
Soloist: Mr. Breitner.

To the critic there is a certain sadness in the announcement that a new pianist is to appear, for old pianists have so closely approached the impossible, have gone so far beyond expectation that the new-comer must be a genius if he expects to gain more than a passing recognition. Geniuses, unfortunately, are becoming rarer and rarer, although men with wonderful fingers are unnaturally abundant, the conservatories throughout the civilized world turning them out with startling abundance. The result is that the greater number of pianist are piano players and not artists, and the critic's punishment is that he is not allowed to indulge in the virtue of silence. Mr. Breitner is not a genius, but as an artist he has many admirable characteristics; he plays with spirit and brilliancy, with intelligence and self-reserve. He does not efface the natural tones of the piano to produce a contrast between fortissimo and pianissimo; his style is large and manly, and the tone that he produces is rarely forced and unnatural. The work selected gave him but little opportunity of showing the higher qualities of his art; but what he did calls for high praise, it was sound, honest and sincere. Mr. Breitner's merits were most heartily recognized by the audience and he was called forth many times to bow his acknowledgments.

The "Hiawatha" overture is a well-written work, but it does not flow easily as from inspiration, but labors heavily. It is modern in that a few phrases are used over again, made to take the place of original ideas and developed to the point of exhaustion. The overture is more admirable from the technical than from the musical side; but it is most creditable to its young composer, creditable and promising of future excellence. It was read and interpreted with fine brilliancy and effect by Mr. Gericke and his orchestra.

There will be no rehearsal or concert next week.

STON HERALD.

UBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
VOL. CVII., NO. 12.

FRIDAY, JAN. 12, 1900.

WENT OFF TOO SOON.

Panic in Sanders Theatre Due to Bomb Bursting.

Machine Set to Surprise a Lecture in the Morning.

No One Hurt, but a Symphony Audience Melted Away.

The sixth Symphony concert which was being held last night in Sanders Theatre, Cambridge, was sharply broken up about 15 minutes past 9 o'clock by a sudden explosion in a closet near the entrance to the theatre, on the right-hand side going in from the hall. The result was that, no sooner was the explosion heard, than the whole audience made a mad rush for the doors, and all attempts of the director to stop them were futile. No one was hurt, but all were thoroughly frightened.

So far as can be ascertained, the cause of the explosion was what is thought to be the tardy working of a trick by some student, who had no malicious intent, but simply did it for a joke. The fact is that the theatre is occupied three days out of the week by Prof. A. C. Coolidge, who gives at 9 o'clock his lecture in history, known to the students as history I. The course met there yesterday morning, and the would-be joker had arranged this clock contrivance to a small bomb, and set it to go off about quarter-past 9, but he made the mistake of setting the alarm hand for that time in the evening, instead of the morning.

The joke was like that which was played on Prof. Wendell two years ago, during his English lecture in the Fogg Art Museum, only of a more serious nature.

Prof. N. S. Shaler, dean of the scientific school, was present last night, and took the remains of the infernal machine, if that it may be called. He declares that he will hire a detective to investigate. As only a little of the machine is left, it is difficult to tell just what its nature was.

The explosion was very loud, and some are inclined to take the matter in a serious way. It is said that the machine was in a bag, and was originally placed in a seat, evidently to work its results on some student.

THE MUSICAL COURIER.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 10, 1900.

ANOTHER good concert was that of the Boston Symphony this week, in which Alwin Schroeder was the soloist. The program was nothing if not modern, presenting:

Tragic Overture, op. 81 .... Brahms
Concerto for 'cello, op. 104 .... Dvorák
A Siegfried Idyll .... Wagner
Symphony, F minor, op. 12 .... Strauss

The Brahms Overture, a splendid and noble piece of work, was admirably presented; the nuances seemed the very acme of art, and the strong contrasts of color were most skillfully set forth by Gericke and his faultless organization. The Strauss Symphony certainly showed more form than most of the compositions we get from this font of modernity. There is much brilliancy in the work, and the Scherzo leaves it possible to say that there is much grace also. The andante cantabile was beautiful, and altogether the Symphony held the interest throughout.

The Dvorák Concerto was admirably played by Schroeder, but, with the exception of bits here and there, lacked the elements of a great work and hardly worth more than the one hearing. Schroeder was received with storms of applause, and the orchestral accompaniment left nothing to be desired.

* * *

At the next concert Ludwig Breitner, the great Parisian pedagogue, will be the soloist. Breitner is a pupil of Rubinstein and Liszt, and was one of the foremost teachers of Paris. His arrival in America is of no small importance to matters musical, and it is to be hoped that he will be accorded the position that he deserves.

* * *

BOSTON POST,
The Representative Democratic Paper
OF NEW ENGLAND.

SUNDAY MORNING, JANUARY 14, 1900.
(Copyright, 1900, Post Publishing Company.)

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The twelfth Symphony concert was given last evening in Music Hall. Mr. Ludwig Breitner was the soloist. The programme included an overture, "Hiawatha," by Rubin Goldmark; concerto for piano and orchestra, No. 2, in F minor, Schutt, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," op. 35.

ON JOURNAL—FRIDAY, JANUARY 12,

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST.

(Photograph by F. Lostel, Villiers Sur Mer, France.)

LUDWIG BREITNER.

Ludwig Breitner, pianist, now teaching in New York, makes his first appearance in America with the Symphony Orchestra this week in Music Hall. He was born at Trieste, and as a boy went to the Milan Conservatory. Von Bülow heard him there and advised him to study with Rubinstein, who taught him for three years. After staying with Liszt for six months Breitner returned to St. Petersburg, where he was active as teacher and pianist. He afterward played in the chief European cities, and finally settled in Paris, where he met his wife, Berthe Haaft, a violinist of the Vienna Conservatory. In Paris Mr. Breitner is favorably known as a teacher and as a player, chiefly in chamber music. About two years ago he founded in that city a Philharmonic Society. They tell this pleasant tale of Mr. Breitner's early student days.

The lad, although one of the most timid in existence, went alone to the house of Rubinstein. In the absence of the latter it was his wife who received him. She having a penchant for Italians, entered into conversation with him. This, with his evident earnestness and sincerity, made an agreeable impression, and she pleaded in his behalf with her husband on his return. Rubinstein looked him over, and told him to return in eight days and bring a Chopin Sonata with him. He did bring it, but in his head, not in his hands. He had memorized the sonata thoroughly in eight days.

THE BOSTON
SATURDAY EVENING
Gazette
ESTABLISHED 1813

The Symphony Concert.

The programme for the twelfth symphony rehearsal and concert was:

Overture, "Hiawatha" .... Goldmark
Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, F minor, Op. 47 .... Schuett
Suite "Scheherazade," Op. 35 .... Rimsky-Korsakoff
Soloist: Mr. Breitner.

To the critic there is a certain sadness in the announcement that a new pianist is to appear, for old pianists have so closely approached the impossible, have gone so far beyond expectation that the new-comer must be a genius if he expects to gain more than a passing recognition. Geniuses, unfortunately, are becoming rarer and rarer, although men with wonderful fingers are unnaturally abundant, the conservatories throughout the civilized world turning them out with startling abundance. The result is that the greater number of pianist are piano players and not artists, and the critic's punishment is that he is not allowed to indulge in the virtue of silence. Mr. Breitner is not a genius, but as an artist he has many admirable characteristics; he plays with spirit and brilliancy, with intelligence and self-reserve. He does not efface the natural tones of the piano to produce a contrast between fortissimo and pianissimo; his style is large and manly, and the tone that he produces is rarely forced and unnatural. The work selected gave him but little opportunity of showing the higher qualities of his art; but what he did calls for high praise, it was sound, honest and sincere. Mr. Breitner's merits were most heartily recognized by the audience and he was called forth many times to bow his acknowledgments.

The "Hiawatha" overture is a well-written work, but it does not flow easily as from inspiration, but labors heavily. It is modern in that a few phrases are used over again, made to take the place of original ideas and developed to the point of exhaustion. The overture is more admirable from the technical than from the musical side; but it is most creditable to its young composer, creditable and promising of future excellence. It was read and interpreted with fine brilliancy and effect by Mr. Gericke and his orchestra.

There will be no rehearsal or concert next week.

[illegible]ARY 14, 1900.

[illegible]ERAZADE."

A Superb Exhibition of Orchestral Technic.

A New Overture by Rubin Goldmark

Mr. Breitner, Pianist, in Schuett's 2nd Concerto.

The program of the 12th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night, in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "Hiawatha"....Rubin Goldmark
(M.S. First time.)
Concerto for Piano, No. 2, in F minor.. Schuett
[illegible] "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff

[illegible] Goldmark, a New Yorker by birth, wrote the overture to "Hiawatha" which was played last night for the first time at any concert, when he was about 24 years old. He wrote it in [illegible], when he was in Colorado, where he has lived since 1894 on account of his [illegible].

Although Mr. Goldmark has seen live Indians and watched their festival dances and heard their songs or chants, he did not endeavor to use their national or racial music in this overture, which is romantic rather than realistic, pseudo-realistic, or ethnological.

A nephew of Carl Goldmark, educated in Vienna as well as New York, it would not be surprising if we should find in this overture suggestions of "Sakuntala," and it is true that there are harmonic and orchestral hints at the peculiar sensuousness of the uncle; but there is not enough of avuncular thought and influence to cause the people to point derisive thumbs at the nephew; and so, although young, Mr. Goldmark knows his Wagner, especially the Wagner of "Siegfried," it would be unjust to insist on reminiscences and thus give out a false impression.

This overture is highly creditable to a young man, especially when you remember that for five years or so he has been cut off in a large measure from stimulation by hearing music and being with musicians. I prefer to regard the overture simply as absolute music, for Mr. Goldmark tells me that he had no definite program in mind when he composed the work. Another title would have served; and as a matter of fact, if the overture had borne no title at all, I doubt whether one person in the orchestra or on the floor would have ever thought of the Indians of Longfellow, although an Indian hearing it might at once name the composer "Young man who is not afraid of an orchestra."

I enjoyed the music—in spots. There were pleasing passages of sensuous beauty, there were agreeable harmonic progressions, there were some delightful orchestral effects; but I am sure that Mr. Goldmark will write more firmly knit and more authoritative music. He is probably his own severest critic, and when he has the opportunity of hearing how his music sounds—where it drags—where there is suggestion of crudeness or padding—where there is much orchestra and comparatively little effect, he will profit thereby.

I do not mean by this that the overture should not have been played; far from it. These concerts should not serve merely as a kindergarten school for young composers; but when a young composer writes as good music as this overture, he should be heard. This very overture, open as it is in some respects to adverse criticism, is a stronger work than are certain other overtures, signed by more familiar names, which have been performed within the last three or four years. I regret that it is not the custom here to perform a new work for two concerts in succession; it would be fairer toward audience as well as composer; but Mr. Goldmark, who was present, has no cause to complain of performance or reception.

***

Mr. Ludwig Breitner, who has left Paris where he had lived for many years to make New York his home, is an agreeable pianist. First of all he is a pianist, not a hypnotist, not a muscular, vain person who frets at the limitations of the instrument and insists that it should o'ercrow the orchestra. He plays with precision, elegance, brilliance, and with that supreme neatness that distinguishes many of the French school; for Mr. Breitner, although born at Trieste, and a pupil of Rubinstein, is now distinctly of the French school. He chose for his concerto the wretched thing by Schütt, the second concerto in F minor, a work that is insincere and heartless, wherein there is no real feeling or emotion. This music is inflated salon-music. A thin veneer of conventional elegance—or better yet, deportment—covers inadequately the rank vulgarity of the contents. Now undisguised coarseness is not necessarily inartistic; it is at times wholesome and refreshing; but this music of Schütt reminds me of musk and gaudy jewelry worn by a brass-voiced, thick-ancled woman who is careless in the matter of soap and water.

***

It was a great pleasure to hear again the beautiful, dazzling, characteristic music of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The suite is as fantastic as the tales told by Scheherazade. He that does not appreciate, does not love the Thousand and One Nights in Burton's, Payne's, or the old familiar school-boy edition [illegible] not care for this music; he will [illegible] what it is all about; he very [illegible] will regard it as absurd or im[illegible]. The hearer of such imagina[illegible] music must have some imagina[illegible] himself; he must have envied the [illegible] who lived with the forty [illegible] of kings, high-bosomed dam[illegible] like unto a full moon, the [illegible] who might still be in their [illegible] had he not opened the forbid[illegible] to this hearer Sindbad is [illegible] Captain Nickerson down [illegible] and there is no girl in [illegible] can rival [illegible] Princess [illegible] is music that is a long- [illegible] ever-fading mood. From [illegible]

[illegible] there is the [illegible]; there is the [illegible]; there is well-defined tragedy in the catastrophe. And the dying motiv of Scheherazade is as the exclamation of the third calender feasting on the mountain with the forty damsels: "This is life; 'tis pity it is fleeting."

***

The orchestra, admirable throughout the evening, arose to a supreme degree of technical and aesthetic power in the suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Each solo player excelled himself; and the ensemble was that of a great virtuoso, rejoicing in his might, and glorying in the talent of the composer whom he served.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 14.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 14, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture to "Hiawatha" Heard for the First Time Here.

Composition of Rubin Goldmark, a New Yorker—The Orchestration Rich and Brilliant—Mr. Breitner, Pianist, Makes a Favorable Impression.

The programme for the 12th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture to "Hiawatha"........Rubin Goldmark
(MS. first time.)
Concerto for pianoforte in F-minor, E. Schuett
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"........ Rimsky-Korsakoff

The soloist was Mr. Ludwig Breitner.

The composer of the opening overture is, according to the programme book, a native of New York and 28 years of age. He is also, on the same authority, a nephew of the Goldmark who wrote the "Sakuntala" overture. The work, heard for the first time here last evening is large in conception, and shows that Mr. Goldmark is admirably equipped in knowledge of the technique of his art and skilled in his use and application of it.

The overture is not in any sense programme music, the title indicating only the source of the composer's inspiration, and there has been no effort on his part to give local color to the work by making use of any recognized Indian tunes or rhythms. It is very long and exceedingly elaborate in treatment. There is, perhaps, over-much of it, and it may be urged that it would gain something in spirit if the "working out" portion of it were abbreviated, the interest halting owing to the many repetitions in which nothing new is said or suggested.

The orchestration is, on the whole, rich, brilliant and abundant in felicitously contrived contrasts of tone color; the only weakness being a too frequent resort to the lower notes of the wood wind, and sometimes of the horns, with foggy and ineffective results. It belongs to that large order of music whose meaning is not fully clear on a first hearing, but even under that drawback it was made quite apparent that the overture is the work of a clever, thoughtful and deeply conscientious composer, reaching out toward a high ideal, and with decided success. That it made a favorable impression was proved by the vigorous applause and the enthusiastic calls that brought the composer to the stage at the close of the performance.

The Korsakoff suite was heard again with pleasure. It is a splendid piece of orchestration, wonderfully impressive and effective from beginning to end, and with an astonishing command over every gorgeous resource of modern orchestral treatment, to which is added a strikingly brilliant originality. There is little of thematic development in the suite. The themes, generally charming in their novel piquancy, are repeated almost to satiety without change, except in regard to the instrumentation, but it is always interesting, sometimes delightful, in its graceful melodiousness, as in the third movement, "The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess." It was magnificently read by Mr. Gericke and perfectly played by the orchestra.

The Schuett concerto is not a notably interesting work. It is hard to understand why a soloist should desire to play it, unless for the last movement, which is its only attractive feature. Of difficulties there is a generous abundance, and perhaps therein lies the temptation to the artist ambitions to display his dexterity of finger. Mr. Breitner has a well developed technique that is seemingly equal to any emergency, a firm and musical touch, an excellent legato and he plays with ease and without unnecessary display for mere effect. His performance of this work was fluent, artistic and admirable in style and spirit. He is a player to be listened to with respect. Especially notable was the brilliancy, the fire and the flexibility of technique with which he performed the animated finale. His success was emphasized by the outburst of applause that greeted him at the close of the concert, and by the three recalls he received.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The programme for the next concert is: Unfinished symphony, Schubert; concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky; Symphonic Dances, Grieg, first time. The soloist is the Mrs. Alexander Petschnikoff.

Boston Courier.
ESTABLISHED 1795. JAN. 14, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program for the twelfth concert was:

Rubin Goldmark, overture to "Hiawatha. (manuscript, first time.) Schutt concerto for pianoforte, number two, in F minor, op [illegible]-seven; Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," op thirty-five; soloist, Mr. Ludwig Breitner.

Mr. Rubin Goldmark a nephew of the well-known composer Karl Goldmark was born in New York in 1872, received his education at the College of the City of New York which he left at the age of seventeen. He studied for two years in Vienna the pianoforte with Anton Door—theory and composition with the Fuchs brothers. After in America he studied the piano with Joseffy and composition with Dvorak. He is now at Colorado Springs, as director of the conservatory of music there.

The overture was composed in 1896 after a trip to the Rocky Mountains, whose wild scenery inspired him with poetic suggestions embodied in this work. Descriptive of the noble Indian Hiawatha and his adventure, it certainly is not, containing as it does, no hint of Indian music or life. Yet there is a majestic movement to the rich harmonies that might well suggest his stately figure gliding through the forest, whose myriad sounds are pictured by the wood wind and harp. It was interpreted with great beauty by the orchestra obeying as it does, Mr. Gericke's slightest wave of the baton.

The concerto by Edward Schutt played in Boston for the first time in 1897 was not fortunate in evoking much enthusiasm. Its composer, a Viennese, and friend of Leschitizky has good command of pianoforte and, orchestral resources but scarcely good judgment in the use of the latter, since what should be an opportunity for the pianoforte as solo instrument to lead and dominate the music is lost by the overwhelming force of sound of the full orchestra that, even wisely directed by Mr. Gericke could not but prove too forceful. Mr. Breitner, who has been a pupil of Leschitizky made an excellent impression by his intelligent reading and fine execution of that which in many respects is a most uninteresting composition. The second movement in which the pianoforte is allowed to be heard, has a really charming theme, and Mr. Breitner gives it with much grace and delicacy.

Nicolai Rimsky Korsakoff was born at Tichwin in 1844, and is now living in St. Petersburg. He was for several years an officer in the Russian Navy but his fondness for music led him to devote his life to its study. He was appointed professor of composition and instrumentation at the St. Petersburg Conservatory in 1871, and now occupies the position of head of the Free Music School of St. Petersburg. He is an exponent of the "young Russian" school and represents the national tendency in its extreme development. He has written several operas, a symphony, string quartettes, etc.

His symphonic suite performed at this concert is rich in tone color and without being an exact description of the scenes chosen yet is so pervaded by the Oriental atmosphere that one can easily transport himself in fancy to the court of the tyrannical Sultan and follow the course of the story fair Scheherazade weaves of Sinbad; of the Calender Prince; of the young Prince and Princess; of the fete at Bagdad and the catastrophe of the ship wrecked against the Mognitic Mountain.

The Scheherazade motive, a dainty bit for violin which loses nothing of grace in Mr. Kneisel's hands (whose fingers seem formed to draw forth most enticing tones from the violin), appears in the opening number and reappears throughout the piece connecting the movements into one coherent whole. As Korsakoff's life in the navy fitted him to depict the sea in all its moods, he is particularly successful in his sea and wave motives also the ship motive is most graceful.

The constant changes of system, the march-like theme, the curious bassoon solo, the melody, soft and plaintive with rushing sweep of notes on the clarinet like a breathing zephyr, all keep the listener in a pleased and responsive mood and cause him to feel indebted to author, director and musicians for a most enjoyable hour.

[illegible]
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 15, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—Goldmark's "Hiawatha" Overture.

The middle west and the middle east furnished themes for the symphony concert Saturday night. The concert began with Rubin Goldmark's overture to "Hiawatha," which overture by the way justifies everything but the associations suggested in its title—and ended with the gorgeous musical translation of the "Thousand and One Arabian Nights" of childhood, the symphonic suite "Scheherazade," by Rimski-Korsakoff (with the accent sharply on the last syllable).

Goldmark's overture, as announced in the programme, was played from manuscript and for the first time. The composer has not attempted, in spite of the Indian name with which he has associated his composition, to employ Indian themes, or to embody any other primitive folk-flavor in the overture to "Hiawatha." The overture is a romantic composition, in which the modern qualities and the Wagnerian influences are detectable even by the ear of the novice.

It should be said, however, that the overture to "Hiawatha" is in no sense a plagiarism, nor does it even suggest a plagiarism, whether in theme or in development.

Mr. Goldmark is a New Yorker by birth, and wrote his overture in 1896, when the composer was 24. The reception which the audience in Music Hall gave him after the performance of his number Saturday night was very appreciative and cordial. It is to be hoped that Mr. Goldmark will acquire more cogency, more [illegible] more of the quality of musical "tout ensemble," as he proceeds with his work [illegible] sician.

Ludwig Breitner, the soloist of the occasion, studied successively with [illegible]low, Rubinstein and Liszt. At present he teaches in New York. The composition in which he made his initial American appearance with the Symphony Orchestra (Schuett's concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 47) was not calculated in itself to please a symphony audience extremely but Mr. Breitner's brilliant precision of touch, his neat, clearly-defined method of execution, surely entitled him to more appreciation than he received at the hands of his audience. The fact that Mr. Breitner did not receive an extraordinary ovation was undoubtedly due to Eduard Schuett, and not to the performer.

The closing number on the programme furnished the highly-seasoned dish of the evening's feast—a dish in which garlic, paprika and cooling sherbets were mingled to produce an oriental course that cloyed the appetites of some and gave a voracious appetite to others of the audience.

Uulike some German and Italian comcomposers who have attempted to treat Oriental themes, M. Rimski-Korsakoff in "Scherherazade" has succeeded admirably in embodying a local color that is Turkish or Persian from beginning to end. The four movements of the suite present, in effect a lifelike, if at times somewhat overpowering, picture of bazaars, and feasts and dances. Through all the variations, running like a black string through a necklace of pearls, one detects the minor note of melancholy which pervades all Oriental thought and Oriental feeling. The laughter of the bazaar is furnished by the curious antics of the wood-winds and strings near the end of the third movement ("The Story of the Calender Prince"), in which a fantastic succession of tri-notes is repeated and taken up in turn, and produces an almost irresistible impulse to actual laughter.

The fourth movement, ("The Festival at Bagdad; The Sinking of Sindbad's Ship"), is partly made up of a succession of soli obligati, surrounded by the raging of the sea, which culminates in a terrific crash as Sindbad's craft strikes the cruel rock. The orchestra responded magnificently to the orchestral requirements of the work, which are exacting and complicated. The Russian composer of "Scheherazade" certainly could not have found fault with Saturday night's production of his work. The audience did not.

Boston Journal.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 14, 1900.

"SCHEHERAZADE."

A Superb Exhibition of Orchestral Technic.

A New Overture by Rubin Goldmark

Mr. Breitner, Pianist, in Schuett's 2nd Concerto.

The program of the 12th Symphony concert, Mr. Gericke conductor, given last night, in Music Hall, was as follows:

Overture to "Hiawatha"....Rubin Goldmark
(M.S. First time.)
Concerto for Piano, No. 2, in F minor.. Schuett
Suite, "Scheherazade".....Rimsky-Korsakoff

Mr. Goldmark, a New Yorker by birth, wrote the overture to "Hiawatha," which was played last night for the first time at any concert, when he was about 24 years old. He wrote it in 1896, when he was in Colorado, where he has lived since 1894 on account of his health.

Although Mr. Goldmark has seen live Indians and watched their festival dances and heard their songs or chants, he did not endeavor to use their national or racial music in this overture, which is romantic rather than realistic, pseudo-realistic, or ethnological.

A nephew of Carl Goldmark, educated in Vienna as well as New York, it would not be surprising if we should find in this overture suggestions of "Sakuntala," and it is true that there are harmonic and orchestral hints at the peculiar sensuousness of the uncle; but there is not enough of avuncular thought and influence to cause the people to point derisive thumbs at the nephew; and so, although young, Mr. Goldmark knows his Wagner, especially the Wagner of "Siegfried," it would be unjust to insist on reminiscences and thus give out a false impression.

This overture is highly creditable to a young man, especially when you remember that for five years or so he has been cut off in a large measure from stimulation by hearing music and being with musicians. I prefer to regard the overture simply as absolute music, for Mr. Goldmark tells me that he had no definite program in mind when he composed the work. Another title would have served; and as a matter of fact, if the overture had borne no title at all, I doubt whether one person in the orchestra or on the floor would have ever thought of the Indians of Longfellow, although an Indian hearing it might at once name the composer "Young man who is not afraid of an orchestra."

I enjoyed the music—in spots. There were pleasing passages of sensuous beauty, there were agreeable harmonic progressions, there were some delightful orchestral effects; but I am sure that Mr. Goldmark will write more firmly knit and more authoritative music. He is probably his own severest critic, and when he has the opportunity of hearing how his music sounds—where it drags—where there is suggestion of crudeness or padding—where there is much orchestra and comparatively little effect, he will profit thereby.

I do not mean by this that the overture should not have been played; far from it. These concerts should not serve merely as a kindergarten school for young composers; but when a young composer writes as good music as this overture, he should be heard. This very overture, open as it is in some respects to adverse criticism, is a stronger work than are certain other overtures, signed by more familiar names, which have been performed within the last three or four years. I regret that it is not the custom here to perform a new work for two concerts in succession; it would be fairer toward audience as well as composer; but Mr. Goldmark, who was present, has no cause to complain of performance or reception.

⁂

Mr. Ludwig Breitner, who has left Paris where he had lived for many years to make New York his home, is an agreeable pianist. First of all he is a pianist, not a hypnotist, not a muscular, vain person who frets at the limitations of the instrument and insists that it should o'ercrow the orchestra. He plays with precision, elegance, brilliance, and with that supreme neatness that distinguishes many of the French school; for Mr. Breitner, although born at Trieste, and a pupil of Rubinstein, is now distinctly of the French school. He chose for his concerto the wretched thing by Schütt, the second concerto in F minor, a work that is insincere and heartless, wherein there is no real feeling or emotion. This music is inflated salon-music. A thin veneer of conventional elegance—or better yet, deportment—covers inadequately the rank vulgarity of the contents. Now undisguised coarseness is not necessarily inartistic; it is at times wholesome and refreshing; but this music of Schütt reminds me of musk and gaudy jewelry worn by a brass-voiced, thick-ancled woman who is careless in the matter of soap and water.

⁂

It was a great pleasure to hear again the beautiful, dazzling, characteristic music of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The suite is as fantastic as the tales told by Scheherazade. He that does not appreciate, does not love the Thousand and One Nights in Burton's, Payne's, or the old familiar school-boy edition will not care for this music; he will wonder what it is all about; he very likely will regard it as absurd or improper. The hearer of such imaginative music must have some imagination himself; he must have envied the calender who lived with the forty daughters of kings, high-bosomed damsels, each like unto a full moon, the calender who might still be in their company had he not opened the forbidden door; to this hearer Sindbad is nearer than Captain Nickerson down on the Cape, and there is no girl in Boston who can rival [illegible] Princess Badoura. Here is music that is a long-continued, never-fading mood. From [illegible] and you are in the time of Haroun [illegible] Nor is this music nothing but vaporous fantasy: there is the rocking of the sea; there is the tale of amorous passion; there is the revelry of the crowd; there is well-defined tragedy in the catastrophe. And the dying motiv of Scheherazade is as the exclamation of the third calender feasting on the mountain with the forty damsels: "This is life; 'tis pity it is fleeting."

⁂

The orchestra, admirable throughout the evening, arose to a supreme degree of technical and aesthetic power in the suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff. Each solo player excelled himself; and the ensemble was that of a great virtuoso, rejoicing in his might, and glorying in the talent of the composer whom he served.

Philip Hale.

SUNDAY HERALD.

PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 14.

SUNDAY, JANUARY 14, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Overture to "Hiawatha" Heard for the First Time Here.

Composition of Rubin Goldmark, a New Yorker—The Orchestration Rich and Brilliant—Mr. Breitner, Pianist, Makes a Favorable Impression.

The programme for the 12th concert of the season by the Boston Symphony orchestra, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Overture to "Hiawatha"......Rubin Goldmark
(MS. first time.)
Concerto for pianoforte in F-minor..E. Schuett
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"........ Rimsky-Korsakoff

The soloist was Mr. Ludwig Breitner.

The composer of the opening overture is, according to the programme book, a native of New York and 28 years of age. He is also, on the same authority, a nephew of the Goldmark who wrote the "Sakuntala" overture. The work, heard for the first time here last evening is large in conception, and shows that Mr. Goldmark is admirably equipped in knowledge of the technique of his art and skilled in his use and application of it.

The overture is not in any sense programme music, the title indicating only the source of the composer's inspiration, and there has been no effort on his part to give local color to the work by making use of any recognized Indian tunes or rhythms. It is very long and exceedingly elaborate in treatment. There is, perhaps, over-much of it, and it may be urged that it would gain something in spirit if the "working out" portion of it were abbreviated, the interest halting owing to the many repetitions in which nothing new is said or suggested.

The orchestration is, on the whole, rich, brilliant and abundant in felicitously contrived contrasts of tone color; the only weakness being a too frequent resort to the lower notes of the wood, wind, and sometimes of the horns, with foggy and ineffective results. It belongs to that large order of music whose meaning is not fully clear on a first hearing, but even under that drawback it was made quite apparent that the overture is the work of a clever, thoughtful and deeply conscientious composer, reaching out toward a high ideal, and with decided success. That it made a favorable impression was proved by the vigorous applause and the enthusiastic calls that brought the composer to the stage at the close of the performance.

The Korsakoff suite was heard again with pleasure. It is a splendid piece of orchestration, wonderfully impressive and effective from beginning to end, and with an astonishing command over every gorgeous resource of modern orchestral treatment, to which is added a strikingly brilliant originality. There is little of thematic development in the suite. The themes, generally charming in their novel piquancy, are repeated almost to satiety without change, except in regard to the instrumentation, but it is always interesting, sometimes delightful, in its graceful melodiousness, as in the third movement, "The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess." It was magnificently read by Mr. Gericke and perfectly played by the orchestra.

The Schuett concerto is not a notably interesting work. It is hard to understand why a soloist should desire to play it, unless for the last movement, which is its only attractive feature. Of difficulties there is a generous abundance, and perhaps therein lies the temptation to the artist ambitions to display his dexterity of finger. Mr. Breitner has a well developed technique that is seemingly equal to any emergency, a firm and musical touch, an excellent legato and he plays with ease and without unnecessary display for mere effect. His performance of this work was fluent, artistic and admirable in style and spirit. He is a player to be listened to with respect: Especially notable was the brilliancy, the fire and the flexibility of technique with which he performed the animated finale. His success was emphasized by the outburst of applause that greeted him at the close of the concert, and by the three recalls he received.

There will be no rehearsal and concert this week. The programme for the next concert is: Unfinished symphony, Schubert; concerto for violin, Tschaikowsky; Symphonic Dances, Grieg, first time. The soloist is the Mrs. Alexander Petschnikoff.

Boston Courier.

ESTABLISHED 1795. JAN. 14, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The program for the twelfth concert was:

Rubin Goldmark, overture to "Hiawatha. (manuscript, first time.) Schutt concerto for pianoforte, number two, in F minor, op forty-seven; Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," op thirty-five; soloist, Mr. Ludwig Breitner.

Mr. Rubin Goldmark a nephew of the well-known composer Karl Goldmark was born in New York in 1872, received his education at the College of the City of New York which he left at the age of seventeen. He studied for two years in Vienna the pianoforte with Anton Door—theory and composition with the Fuchs brothers. After in America he studied the piano with Joseffy and composition with Dvorak. He is now at Colorado Springs, as director of the conservatory of music there.

The overture was composed in 1896 after a trip to the Rocky Mountains, whose wild scenery inspired him with poetic suggestions embodied in this work. Descriptive of the noble Indian Hiawatha and his adventure, it certainly is not, containing as it does, no hint of Indian music or life. Yet there is a majestic movement to the rich harmonies that might well suggest his stately figure gliding through the forest, whose myriad sounds are pictured by the wood wind and harp. It was interpreted with great beauty by the orchestra obeying as it does, Mr. Gericke's slightest wave of the baton.

The concerto by Edward Schutt played in Boston for the first time in 1897 was not fortunate in evoking much enthusiasm. Its composer, a Viennese, and friend of Leschitizky has good command of pianoforte and, orchestral resources but scarcely good judgment in the use of the latter, since what should be an opportunity for the pianoforte as solo instrument to lead and dominate the music is lost by the overwhelming force of sound of the full orchestra that, even wisely directed by Mr. Gericke could not but prove too forceful. Mr. Breitner, who has been a pupil of Leschitizky made an excellent impression by his intelligent reading and fine execution of that which in many respects is a most uninteresting composition. The second movement in which the pianoforte is allowed to be heard, has a really charming theme, and Mr. Breitner gives it with much grace and delicacy.

Nicolai Rimsky Korsakoff was born at Tichwin in 1844, and is now living in St. Petersburg. He was for several years an officer in the Russian Navy but his fondness for music led him to devote his life to its study. He was appointed professor of composition and instrumentation at the St. Petersburg Conservatory in 1871, and now occupies the position of head of the Free Music School of St. Petersburg. He is an exponent of the "young Russian" school, and represents the national tendency in its extreme development. He has written several operas, a symphony, string quartettes, etc.

His symphonic suite performed at this concert is rich in tone color and without being an exact description of the scenes chosen yet is so pervaded by the Oriental atmosphere that one can easily transport himself in fancy to the court of the tyrannical Sultan and follow the course of the story fair Scheherazade weaves of Sinbad; of the Calender Prince; of the young Prince and Princess; of the fete at Bagdad and the catastrophe of the ship wrecked against the Mognitic Mountain.

The Scheherazade motive, a dainty bit for violin which loses nothing of grace in Mr. Kneisel's hands (whose fingers seem formed to draw forth most enticing tones from the violin), appears in the opening number and reappears throughout the piece connecting the movements into one coherent whole. As Korsakoff's life in the navy fitted him to depict the sea in all its moods, he is particularly successful in his sea and wave motives also the ship motive is most graceful.

The constant changes of system, the march-like theme, the curious bassoon solo, the melody, soft and plaintive with rushing sweep of notes on the clarinet like a breathing zephyr, all keep the listener in a pleased and responsive mood and cause him to feel indebted to author, director and musicians for a most enjoyable hour.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.

MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 15, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—Goldmark's "Hiawatha" Overture.

The middle west and the middle east furnished themes for the symphony concert Saturday night. The concert began with Rubin Goldmark's overture to "Hiawatha," which overture by the way justifies everything but the associations suggested in its title—and ended with the gorgeous musical translation of the "Thousand and One Arabian Nights" of childhood, the symphonic suite "Scheherazade," by Rimski-Korsakoff (with the accent sharply on the last syllable).

Goldmark's overture, as announced in the programme, was played from manuscript and for the first time. The composer has not attempted, in spite of the Indian name with which he has associated his composition, to employ Indian themes, or to embody any other primitive folk-flavor in the overture to "Hiawatha." The overture is a romantic composition, in which the modern qualities and the Wagnerian influences are detectable even by the ear of the novice.

It should be said, however, that the overture to "Hiawatha" is in no sense a plagiarism, nor does it even suggest a plagiarism, whether in theme or in development.

Mr. Goldmark is a New Yorker by birth, and wrote his overture in 1896, when the composer was 24. The reception which the audience in Music Hall gave him after the performance of his number Saturday night was very appreciative and cordial. It is to be hoped that Mr. Goldmark will acquire more cogency, more logic, more of the quality of musical "tout ensemble," as he proceeds with his work as a musician.

Ludwig Breitner, the soloist of the occasion, studied successively with Von Buelow, Rubinstein and Liszt. At present he teaches in New York. The composition in which he made his initial American appearance with the Symphony Orchestra (Schuett's concerto for pianoforte, in F minor, op. 47) was not calculated in itself to please a symphony audience extremely, but Mr. Breitner's brilliant precision of touch, his neat, clearly-defined method of execution, surely entitled him to more appreciation than he received at the hands of his audience. The fact that Mr. Breitner did not receive an extraordinary ovation was undoubtedly due to Eduard Schuett, and not to the performer.

The closing number on the programme furnished the highly-seasoned dish of the evening's feast—a dish in which garlic, paprika and cooling sherbets were mingled to produce an oriental course that cloyed the appetites of some and gave a voracious appetite to others of the audience.

Unlike some German and Italian comcomposers who have attempted to treat Oriental themes, M. Rimski-Korsakoff in "Scherherazade" has succeeded admirably in embodying a local color that is Turkish or Persian from beginning to end. The four movements of the suite present, in effect a lifelike, if at times somewhat overpowering, picture of bazaars, and feasts and dances. Through all the variations, running like a black string through a necklace of pearls, one detects the minor note of melancholy which pervades all Oriental thought and Oriental feeling. The laughter of the bazaar is furnished by the curious antics of the wood-winds and strings near the end of the third movement ("The Story of the Calender Prince"), in which a fantastic succession of tri-notes is repeated and taken up in turn, and produces an almost irresistible impulse to actual laughter.

The fourth movement, ("The Festival at Bagdad; The Sinking of Sindbad's Ship"), is partly made up of a succession of soli obligati, surrounded by the raging of the sea, which culminates in a terrific crash as Sindbad's craft strikes the cruel rock. The orchestra responded magnificently to the orchestral requirements of the work, which are exacting and complicated. The Russian composer of "Scheherazade" certainly could not have found fault with Saturday night's production of his work. The audience did not.

[illegible] SYMPHONY CONCERT

[illegible] for the 12th [illegible] rehearsal and concert was of the modern type, the selections being made from works by composers now living. The soloist was Mr Ludwig Breitner, who made his American debut, and the program comprised Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, for the first time, Eduard Schutt's pianoforte concerto in F minor and the Renisky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Mr Breitner, unlike many other foreign artists, came here with little advance heralding as to his merits as a pianist and successes won abroad, and appeared content to win his way, so far as is possible in one concerto, by showing his ability in his chosen art.

There is nothing of the poseur about him; he is modest in bearing, very earnest in his demeanor and certainly gives one an idea that he is a conscientious and sympathetic interpreter of the composer whose work he is presenting. Schutt's concerto is so largely given over to the orchestral parts that the piano rarely is made prominent, and therefore it is rather difficult to judge of Mr Breitner's artistic skill, excepting in a general way. Allowances, too, are due him for the nervousness attending a debut in a strange land, and for unfamiliarity with an instrument whose action was somewhat easier than he was accustomed to. The opening bars in the first movement were given out in an admirable manner and the cadenza work was also excellent, being smooth and generally clear. In the fortissimo passage work, here as later, the bass rather overshadowed the right hand execution and the effect was clouded. The ornamental figurations in the second movement were deftly played and the brilliant and oddly arranged dance theme in the last movement showed that the artist was well equipped, technically and in finger dexterity.

Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, a poetic bit of writing, was beautifully played by the orchestra, the delicacy and grace of the interpretation making the work very interesting, although the forms being thoroughly free in treatment, the thematic figures were merely fragmentary, as a rule are episodic rather than arbitrary in the working out. The composition is not very elaborate in development, but rather simple, when compared to some of the modern musical "iconoclasts."

The Arabian narrative, "Scheherazade," by Renisky-Korsakoff, which was so favorably received when played here before, deserves the commendation received at the previous performances, the fantastic and melodic beauties of the work being again shown at their greatest value by the splendid work of Mr Gericke's men. The charming motifs, Scheherazade, the sea and the wave, were each given with their characteristic suggestions of love, calmness and tumult, and each contingent of the band did its share with unvarying excellence. The curious repeats in the third part, Mr Kneisel's solo work and the crashing phrases in the finale may be singled out for special commendation, although the whole suite seemed to be played as near to perfection as one could hope to hear.

The next rehearsal and concert will be given Jan 26 and 27. The celebrated violinist, Alexandre Petschnikoff, will be the soloist, and the selections will comprise Schubert's unfinished symphony, Tschaikowski's concerto for violin and Grieg's "Symphonic Dances."

The Boston Traveler
Jan 15
Published by the
BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.

THE SYMPHONY.

Nineteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; twelfth concert. Mr. Ludwig Breitner, soloist. The programme:

Overture to "Hiawatha".....Rubin Goldmark
(MS. first time.)
Concerto for pianoforte in F-minor. E. Schuett
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade".......
Rimsky-Korsakoff

The "Hiawatha" overture is Indian only in its name, for it is absolute music of the most pronounced type and may suggest anything the hearer may wish or nothing at all. In itself it is a credit to the young Goldmark who wrote it, nor does it in the slightest suggest that he had ever studied slavishly the effects of his renowned uncle. It is smooth and rich in orchestration, somewhat over-long in development and indicative of good talent rather than genius. But it is far in advance of some of the foreign works that have been played here, and arouses satisfaction that a man living in America can produce so excellent a composition. Mr. Goldmark came upon the platform in response to hearty applause and bowed his appreciation.

Mr. Breitner, the pianist of the evening, was, I believe, a pupil of Rubinstein and of Liszt, and was well considered by Von Bulow. But these highly pleasant circumstances do not make a great artist, as we found out. Mr. Breitner has a sufficient technique, a refined style and a gentlemanly bravura, but his tone is woodeny and his playing in general lacks the gift of beauty. He is an honest player of respectable attainments, whom it does not bore you to hear, but whom you are not specially anxious to hear again. But at any rate, he did more with the bombastic and uninspiring concerto of Schuett than did Mr. George Proctor three years ago.

Again did the "Scheherazade" suite make a tremendous impression on the musically broad of taste. How full of beauty and fire and poetic passion its themes, how striking and magnificent its effects of orchestration, how absolutely new and original its whole treatment! Surely the fascination it wields over us now is comparable to the weird charm the "Arabian Nights" exercised in other days. Mr. Gericke read it with the utmost intelligence and the orchestra played it beyond all praise.

WILDER D. QUINT.

MONDAY, JANUARY 15, 1900.

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twelfth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being:

Rubin Goldmark: Overture to "Hiawatha" (MS., first time).
Schütt: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, opus 47.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35.
Mr. Ludwig Breitner was the pianist.

It is hard to distinguish sharply between perception and imagination in listening to a composition by the son of a famous father, or the nephew of a famous uncle. How much of the great Richard was there really in Siegfried Wagner's "Bärenhäuter" overture? How much of Karl Goldmark is there in this "Hiawatha" by his nephew Rubin? Even if there were nothing at all, one would find it hard to persuade himself that there was not something; the captious critic, on hearing the younger man's work, could hardly resist crying out: "O my prophetic soul, my uncle!" Such stimulus to the imagination does this knowledge of kinship afford.

It seems to me, however, that there really is something of Karl Goldmark in this "Hiawatha" of his nephew's. There is nothing that suggests plagiarism in the work; but there is a certain similarity of mood, a fondness for the same sensuousness of color, for the same general sort of harmony. It is like what one calls a family likeness. Curiously enough, this new "Hiawatha" makes much the same impression upon me that the "Sakuntala" did, when it was first given here in 1877; few of us then saw the real beauties of the work, or suspected that it would hold its own as it has done for over twenty years. To be sure, we are now more familiar with the style; one would hesitate to predict twenty years of vigorous life for the "Hiawatha;" but who knows? It is melodious, sensuous music, very pleasant to hear; there is no hint at "racial" music in it, for which one can hardly be too grateful; a composer exposes himself to an almost inevitable loss of vigor when he treats themes that are not of his own blood. In construction the overture does not seem over-stout; the young composer has not yet acquired that subtile skill in welding together the different sections of his work that stamps the great masters. But the composition shows imagination, poetry, a more than common command of resources; it gives promise of better things to come. It was exquisitely played and very well received.

Rimsky - Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" seems better than ever. Here we have a wealth of "local" melodic color; but the Russian is half an Oriental, and can write Oriental melody as to the manner born; Rimsky-Korsakoff did not have to expatriate himself to feel at home at the court of Haroun Al Rashid. This suite is not what one would rightly call profound music; it makes no pretension to being that. It is poetically imaginative in a light, airy, but none the less genuine way; it shines especially by its esprit, it is thoroughly "geistreich." To me it is perhaps the most entirely modern thing we have had here; there is not a classic moment in it. The composer takes his effects where he finds them, anywhere but from the works of the old masters. It is all picturesque and suggestive; Rimsky-Korsakoff knows precisely what he wants to say, and says it convincingly; his methods are adequate to his purpose. Take that endless repetition of the theme in the first movement, with its combined suggestions of sea and ship; it is not in any true sense working-out, it is not musical development, it does not advance matters in the least; the music stays where it started (pardon the bull!). But it does not bore you, you do not complain of its monotony any more than you complain of one wave's being like its sister-wave. Then there is a certain elegance about the whole thing, even in its broader comic moments the expression is never loutish. Upon the whole, a work full of genius. It was admirably read and played.

Mr. Breitner comes here heralded only by his high Paris reputation, not by wordy press agents. Why he should have chosen to play that execrable concerto of Schütt's is not easy to understand; the work is all pasteboard and tinsel, with no backbone to it, no flesh, no blood. Although Mr. Breitner is not a Frenchman by birth—he has discarded his Parisian "Ludovic" for the original German "Ludwig"—he is distinctly an artist of the French school. His playing is highly polished, glib, elegant; his touch, hard and dry in fortissimo, acquires a more ear-wooing grace in the softer tints. His phrasing is impeccable. In the matter of expression, he may be said to express as much emotion as an intelligent consideration of the situation logically warrants; his expression is so nicely apposite that one doubts its spontaneity; it is all what the French call "Voulue"—which participle is considered high praise to bestow upon a work of art in France. To us Anglo-Saxons it seems a trifle cool. Somehow I could not get over the impression that Mr. Breitner had not forgotten that he had been a teacher. He was very warmly received and applauded; would that we could hear him play some real music!

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, Jan. 26, and Saturday evening, Jan. 27, there being no rehearsal nor concert this week—is: Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Tchaikovsky, concerto for violin, in D major, opus 35; Grieg, symphonic dances (first time in Boston). Mr. Alexandre Petschnikoff will be the violinist.

W. F. A.

THE MUSICAL COURIER
NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1900.

THE Boston Symphony presented this week the following program:

Overture, Hiawatha (MS. First time)........................Goldmark
Concerto for Piano...Schuett
Symphonic suite, Scheherazade.......................Rimsky-Korsakoff

The soloist, Ludwig Breitner, was a total stranger to Boston audiences, but he lost no time in proving himself artistic in everything save selection, and it will always remain a mystery just why he selected this concerto of Schuett. Just what Schuett himself might do with it is perhaps another matter; it is probable that he would make it sound like some of his Strauss paraphrases. At any rate, if Schuett meant it for a big work, it is too small; if he meant it for a small work, it is too big. Again the question forces itself: Why did M. Breitner, with his essential polish and refinement, his delicacy, and cameo-like work, which gleamed in bits throughout, select this?

M. Breitner is a fair sample of an all-around pianist and scholar—one who has studied the piano as a means to music, and not music as a means to virtuosity. He was certainly refreshing and enjoyable throughout. Totally devoid of mannerisms, pre-eminently sincere and straightforward, this man, whose entire atmosphere breathes the classical, is a pupil of Rubinstein and Liszt.

The overture, written by a nephew of Carl Goldmark, is the work of an American, and in what way it was inferior to its companions is not apparent. True, the Korsakoff Suite shows maturity and freedom of orchestration, which this young man has yet to gain, but he need in no way feel that his work was overshadowed, for it certainly was not.

Had Goldmark named the work "Minnehaha" it would never require a program note, for that seems to be the side which affected him, and which permeates the music, and like a true inspiration it is reflected there. As it is he must never present it without the note that the name stands for nothing; otherwise inevitably it will bring a criticism. The work itself is beautiful and interesting throughout, the orchestration is skillful for the most part, and much of it is naïve and fresh. In places it is laughing and rippling and playful; in others more serious, and, strangely enough, although forced away from the musical life which must be drink and food to such a temperament, it is not in the least morbid in any point.

The "Scheherazade" was graceful, but the preponderance of cymbal effects makes it almost trashy, notwithstanding much beautiful melody and artistic orchestral treatment. It seems needless to repeat that this splendid orchestra was up to the most exacting requirement, and, as Gericke is most exacting, and has the power to bring what he wants, there is nothing more that can be said.

Petschnikoff will be the next soloist.

There will be no concert next week, as the orchestra will be on tour.

* * *

At Cambridge last Thursday night the Symphony concert came to an abrupt ending by orchestral effect not on the program. An explosion occurred in the ante-room, and it was so severe that the audience could not be controlled thereafter. Just how it happened probably no one will ever know, but it is supposed to have been a bomb timed to go off at 9:20 the next morning, when a lecture was to have occurred. As it was it went off at 9:20 P. M., and so did the large audience and also the orchestra.

George Proctor was the soloist of the evening.

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 17, 1900.

Overture, Hiawatha (MS. First time)........................Goldmark
Concerto for piano in F minor, No. 2..............................Schuett
Symphonic Suite, Scheherazade, op. 35...............Rimsky-Korsakoff
The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
The Story of the Calender-Prince.
The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess.
Festival at Bagdad—The Sinking of Sindbad's Ship.
Soloist, Ludwig Breitner.

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 18, 1900.

Tragic Overture..Brahms
Aria, Two movements from Suite No. 1 in F major, op. 39...............Moszkowski
Aria, Symphony in D minor...Franck
Soloist, Madame Schumann-Heink.

Mlle. Ternina was engaged for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening, January 18, but is prevented by indisposition from singing. Mme. Schumann-Heink will appear by courtesy of Maurice Grau, who will receive one-half of her fee, as is the custom. No doubt this money is credited to the treasury of the opera company.

Rubin Goldmark, a nephew of Karl Goldmark, was born in New York on August 15, 1872. He received his education at the College of the City of New York, which he left at the age of seventeen. While in college he studied music under Alfred von Livonius. Two years were passed in Vienna in studying the piano with Anton Door, and theory and composition with the Fuchs brothers. On returning to America, Goldmark studied the piano with Joseffy, and composition with Dvorák. In 1894, on account of his health, he went to Colorado Springs, where he is at present the director of the Conservatory of Music. Among other compositions are a trio for piano, violin and 'cello, a sonata for piano and violin, a romanza for 'cello, and a theme and variations for orchestra, played by the late Anton Seidl.

The overture "Hiawatha," which was performed for the first time at the Boston concerts last week, was composed in 1896, while Goldmark was in the Rocky Mountain region. The title indicates only the poetic source and suggestiveness of the subject, with no attempt to employ or embody Indian folk music.

HOME JOURNAL.
NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—Programme for this Wednesday afternoon's concert at Carnegie Hall: Rubin Goldmark, overture, "Hiawatha," (MS. first time); Edward Schuett, concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2; Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," op. 35. Soloist, Ludwig Breitner. Programme for to-morrow, Thursday, night: Brahms, "Tragic Overture;" Moritz Moszkowski, two movements from suite No. 1, in F major, op. 39; 1, Allegretto giocoso; 2, Tema con Variazione; Cesar Franck, symphony in D minor. Soloist, Mme. Schumann-Heink, who will sing two arias, instead of Mme. Ternina, as previously announced.

The Evening Post.
New York, Thursday, January 18, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In discussing Mr. Hadley's concert yesterday in this journal, reference was made to the fact that he was one of the young American composers who were honored by a performance under the bâton of Anton Seidl. Last night, at Carnegie Hall, another young American was represented—Rubin Goldmark—whose merits also had been recognized by that eminent and sympathetic conductor, who performed his "Theme and Variations" for orchestra. Mr. Goldmark has other claims to consideration. He is a nephew of the eminent Karl Goldmark and was a few years ago a pupil, at the National Conservatory in this city, of Mr. Joseffy in the piano class, and in composition of Dr. Dvorák, who exclaimed one day, after examining one of his pieces, "Now there are two Goldmarks." And now Mr. Goldmark has had the good luck to have his "Hiawatha" overture performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was well worth such a compliment, for it is a skilfully constructed and admirably orchestrated composition. The thematic material is interesting, and its elaboration is such that the attention of the listener is constantly riveted as by an entertaining story. The title is obviously to be taken only in a vague Schumannesque way, for no attempt has been made to suggest American Indian music by the use of aboriginal melodies or otherwise. It is rather East India that we are reminded of, indirectly, because of the natural resemblance of Mr. Goldmark's overture to his uncle's "Sakuntala" overture. In some parts there is a dazzling glow of sensuous coloring that is remarkable, even in these days of saturated tone-painting. The orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's direction, did not fail to bring out all this enchanting beauty.

Mr. Goldmark's piece, in truth, was the best thing on last night's programme. Eduard Schütt's F-minor concerto proved to be an empty piece in the style of a Brahms concerto in so far as it is neither interesting musically nor effective from the performer's point of view. It was played by Mr. Ludwig Breitner from the notes. For the concluding number Mr. Gericke once more brought out the symphonic suite "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which hardly improves on closer acquaintance. Now that the Russians receive so much attention, why is it that Anton Rubinstein is so systematically neglected? One might think there was a conspiracy against him. Why not let us hear the "Dramatic" and the "Ocean" symphonies occasionally? There is infinitely more melody, more genius in them, than in Rimsky-Korsakoff. Bach and Liszt are two other composers who do not receive proper attention from our orchestral societies. Yet we read every week of the triumphs won and the enthusiasm excited in German cities by the works of Liszt as interpreted by Mott, Strauss, and Weingartner.

NEW YORK HERALD
NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

That admirable body of instrumentalists the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, which was greatly enjoyed.

The gods may indeed be said to smile on a young composer whose manuscript work secures a performance by this orchestra. This good fortune befell Rubin Goldmark, a nephew of Carl Goldmark, but himself a New Yorker by birth, at yesterday's concert. The work in question is an overture to "Hiawatha." It proved to be thoroughly modern in spirit, interesting in its themes and admirably orchestrated. Mr. Gericke led it admirably, and the audience was much impressed with it.

Ludwig Breitner, the pianist, made his New York début with Eduard Schutt's second pianoforte concerto. He played it brilliantly, and, although he had the music before him, which nowadays is unusual and disillusioning, he made a hit with the audience, and was several times recalled.

The concert concluded with a fine performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphony suite, "Scheherazade."

[62]

Sunday Globe.

SUNDAY, JAN. 14, 1900.

TWELFTH SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Mr Gericke's program for the 12th symphony rehearsal and concert was of the modern type, the selections being made from works by composers now living. The soloist was Mr Ludwig Breitner, who made his American debut, and the program comprised Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, for the first time, Eduard Schutt's pianoforte concerto in F minor and the Renisky-Korsakoff symphonic suite, "Scheherazade." Mr Breitner, unlike many other foreign artists, came here with little advance heralding as to his merits as a pianist and successes won abroad, and appeared content to win his way, so far as is possible in one concerto, by showing his ability in his chosen art.

There is nothing of the poseur about him; he is modest in bearing, very earnest in his demeanor and certainly gives one an idea that he is a conscientious and sympathetic interpreter of the composer whose work he is presenting. Schutt's concerto is so largely given over to the orchestral parts that the piano rarely is made prominent, and therefore it is rather difficult to judge of Mr Breitner's artistic skill, excepting in a general way. Allowances, too, are due him for the nervousness attending a debut in a strange land, and for unfamiliarity with an instrument whose action was somewhat easier than he was accustomed to. The opening bars in the first movement were given out in an admirable manner and the cadenza work was also excellent, being smooth and generally clear. In the fortissimo passage work, here as later, the bass rather overshadowed the right hand execution and the effect was clouded. The ornamental figurations in the second movement were deftly played and the brilliant and oddly arranged dance theme in the last movement showed that the artist was well equipped, technically and in finger dexterity.

Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture, a poetic bit of writing, was beautifully played by the orchestra, the delicacy and grace of the interpretation making the work very interesting, although the forms being thoroughly free in treatment, the thematic figures were merely fragmentary, as a rule are episodic rather than arbitrary in the working out. The composition is not very elaborate in development, but rather simple, when compared to some of the modern musical "iconoclasts."

The Arabian narrative, "Scheherazade," by Renisky-Korsakoff, which was so favorably received when played here before, deserves the commendation received at the previous performances, the fantastic and melodic beauties of the work being again shown at their greatest value by the splendid work of Mr Gericke's men. The charming motifs, Scheherazade, the sea and the wave, were each given with their characteristic suggestions of love, calmness and tumult, and each contingent of the band did its share with unvarying excellence. The curious repeats in the third part, Mr Kneisel's solo work and the crashing phrases in the finale may be singled out for special commendation, although the whole suite seemed to be played as near to perfection as one could hope to hear.

The next rehearsal and concert will be given Jan 26 and 27. The celebrated violinist, Alexandre Petschnikoff, will be the soloist, and the selections will comprise Schubert's unfinished symphony, Tschaikowski's concerto for violin and Grieg's "Symphonic Dances."

The Boston Traveler

Jan 15

Published by the BOSTON TRAVELER COMPANY.

THE SYMPHONY.

Nineteenth season Boston Symphony Orchestra; twelfth concert. Mr. Ludwig Breitner, soloist. The programme:

Overture to "Hiawatha".....Rubin Goldmark
(MS. first time.)
Concerto for pianoforte in F-minor.E. Schuett
Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade"......
Rimsky-Korsakoff

The "Hiawatha" overture is Indian only in its name, for it is absolute music of the most pronounced type and may suggest anything the hearer may wish or nothing at all. In itself it is a credit to the young Goldmark who wrote it, nor does it in the slightest suggest that he had ever studied slavishly the effects of his renowned uncle. It is smooth and rich in orchestration, somewhat over-long in development and indicative of good talent rather than genius. But it is far in advance of some of the foreign works that have been played here, and arouses satisfaction that a man living in America can produce so excellent a composition. Mr. Goldmark came upon the platform in response to hearty applause and bowed his appreciation.

Mr. Breitner, the pianist of the evening, was, I believe, a pupil of Rubinstein and of Liszt, and was well considered by Von Bulow. But these highly pleasant circumstances do not make a great artist, as we found out. Mr. Breitner has a sufficient technique, a refined style and a gentlemanly bravura, but his tone is woodeny and his playing in general lacks the gift of beauty. He is an honest player of respectable attainments, whom it does not bore you to hear, but whom you are not specially anxious to hear again. But at any rate, he did more with the bombastic and uninspiring concerto of Schuett than did Mr. George Proctor three years ago.

Again did the "Scheherazade" suite make a tremendous impression on the musically broad of taste. How full of beauty and fire and poetic passion its themes, how striking and magnificent its effects of orchestration, how absolutely new and original its whole treatment! Surely the fascination it wields over us now is comparable to the weird charm the "Arabian Nights" exercised in other days. Mr. Gericke read it with the utmost intelligence and the orchestra played it beyond all praise.

WILDER D. QUINT.

Boston Transcript

MONDAY, JANUARY 15, 1900

Music Hall: Boston Symphony Orchestra

The twelfth Symphony concert was given in the Music Hall on Saturday evening, the programme being:

Rubin Goldmark: Overture to "Hiawatha" (MS., first time).
Schütt: Concerto for Pianoforte, No. 2, in F minor, opus 47.
Rimsky-Korsakoff: Symphonic Suite, "Scheherazade," opus 35.

Mr. Ludwig Breitner was the pianist.

It is hard to distinguish sharply between perception and imagination in listening to a composition by the son of a famous father, or the nephew of a famous uncle. How much of the great Richard was there really in Siegfried Wagner's "Bärenhäuter" overture? How much of Karl Goldmark is there in this "Hiawatha" by his nephew Rubin? Even if there were nothing at all, one would find it hard to persuade himself that there was not something; the captious critic, on hearing the younger man's work, could hardly resist crying out: "O my prophetic soul, my uncle!" Such stimulus to the imagination does this knowledge of kinship afford.

It seems to me, however, that there really is something of Karl Goldmark in this "Hiawatha" of his nephew's. There is nothing that suggests plagiarism, in the work; but there is a certain similarity of mood, a fondness for the same sensuousness of color, for the same general sort of harmony. It is like what one calls a family likeness. Curiously enough, this new "Hiawatha" makes much the same impression upon me that the "Sakuntala" did, when it was first given here in 1877; few of us then saw the real beauties of the work, or suspected that it would hold its own as it has done for over twenty years. To be sure, we are now more familiar with the style; one would hesitate to predict twenty years of vigorous life for the "Hiawatha;" but who knows? It is melodious, sensuous music, very pleasant to hear; there is no hint at "racial" music in it, for which one can hardly be too grateful; a composer exposes himself to an almost inevitable loss of vigor when he treats themes that are not of his own blood. In construction the overture does not seem over-stout; the young composer has not yet acquired that subtile skill in welding together the different sections of his work that stamps the great masters. But the composition shows imagination, poetry, a more than common command of resources; it gives promise of better things to come. It was exquisitely played and very well received.

Rimsky - Korsakoff's "Scheherazade" seems better than ever. Here we have a wealth of "local" melodic color; but the Russian is half an Oriental, and can write Oriental melody as to the manner born; Rimsky-Korsakoff did not have to expatriate himself to feel at home at the court of Haroun Al Rashid. This suite is not what one would rightly call profound music; it makes no pretension to being that. It is poetically imaginative in a light, airy, but none the less genuine way; it shines especially by its esprit, it is thoroughly "geistreich." To me it is perhaps the most entirely modern thing we have had here; there is not a classic moment in it. The composer takes his effects where he finds them, anywhere but from the works of the old masters. It is all picturesque and suggestive; Rimsky-Korsakoff knows precisely what he wants to say, and says it convincingly; his methods are adequate to his purpose. Take that endless repetition of the theme in the first movement, with its combined suggestions of sea and ship; it is not in any true sense working-out, it is not musical development, it does not advance matters in the least; the music stays where it started (pardon the bull!). But it does not bore you, you do not complain of its monotony any more than you complain of one wave's being like its sister-wave. Then there is a certain elegance about the whole thing, even in its broader comic moments the expression is never loutish. Upon the whole, a work full of genius. It was admirably read and played.

Mr. Breitner comes here heralded only by his high Paris reputation, not by wordy press agents. Why he should have chosen to play that execrable concerto of Schütt's is not easy to understand; the work is all pasteboard and tinsel, with no backbone to it, no flesh, no blood. Although Mr. Breitner is not a Frenchman by birth—he has discarded his Parisian "Ludovic" for the original German "Ludwig"—he is distinctly an artist of the French school. His playing is highly polished, glib, elegant; his touch, hard and dry in fortissimo, acquires a more ear-wooing grace in the softer tints. His phrasing is impeccable. In the matter of expression, he may be said to express as much emotion as an intelligent consideration of the situation logically warrants; his expression is so nicely apposite that one doubts its spontaneity; it is all what the French call "Voulue"—which participle is considered high praise to bestow upon a work of art in France. To us Anglo-Saxons it seems a trifle cool. Somehow I could not get over the impression that Mr. Breitner had not forgotten that he had been a teacher. He was very warmly received and applauded; would that we could hear him play some real music!

The next programme—for Friday afternoon, Jan. 26, and Saturday evening, Jan. 27, there being no rehearsal nor concert this week—is: Schubert, unfinished symphony in B minor; Tchaikovsky, concerto for violin, in D major, opus 35; Grieg, symphonic dances (first time in Boston). Mr. Alexandre Petschnikoff will be the violinist.

W. F. A.

THE MUSICAL COURIER

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1900.

THE Boston Symphony presented this week the following program:

Overture, Hiawatha (MS. First time).......................Goldmark
Concerto for Piano.......................Schuett
Symphonic suite, Scheherazade.......................Rimsky-Korsakoff

The soloist, Ludwig Breitner, was a total stranger to Boston audiences, but he lost no time in proving himself artistic in everything save selection, and it will always remain a mystery just why he selected this concerto of Schuett. Just what Schuett himself might do with it is perhaps another matter; it is probable that he would make it sound like some of his Strauss paraphrases. At any rate, if Schuett meant it for a big work, it is too small; if he meant it for a small work, it is too big. Again the question forces itself: Why did M. Breitner, with his essential polish and refinement, his delicacy, and cameo-like work, which gleamed in bits throughout, select this?

M. Breitner is a fair sample of an all-around pianist and scholar—one who has studied the piano as a means to music, and not music as a means to virtuosity. He was certainly refreshing and enjoyable throughout. Totally devoid of mannerisms, pre-eminently sincere and straightforward, this man, whose entire atmosphere breathes the classical, is a pupil of Rubinstein and Liszt.

The overture, written by a nephew of Carl Goldmark, is the work of an American, and in what way it was inferior to its companions is not apparent. True, the Korsakoff Suite shows maturity and freedom of orchestration, which this young man has yet to gain, but he need in no way feel that his work was overshadowed, for it certainly was not.

Had Goldmark named the work "Minnehaha" it would never require a program note, for that seems to be the side which affected him, and which permeates the music, and like a true inspiration it is reflected there. As it is he must never present it without the note that the name stands for nothing; otherwise inevitably it will bring a criticism. The work itself is beautiful and interesting throughout, the orchestration is skillful for the most part, and much of it is naïve and fresh. In places it is laughing and rippling and playful; in others more serious, and, strangely enough, although forced away from the musical life which must be drink and food to such a temperament, it is not in the least morbid in any point.

The "Scheherazade" was graceful, but the preponderance of cymbal effects makes it almost trashy, notwithstanding much beautiful melody and artistic orchestral treatment. It seems needless to repeat that this splendid orchestra was up to the most exacting requirement, and, as Gericke is most exacting, and has the power to bring what he wants, there is nothing more that can be said.

Petschnikoff will be the next soloist.

There will be no concert next week, as the orchestra will be on tour.

* * *

At Cambridge last Thursday night the Symphony concert came to an abrupt ending by orchestral effect not on the program. An explosion occurred in the ante-room, and it was so severe that the audience could not be controlled thereafter. Just how it happened probably no one will ever know, but it is supposed to have been a bomb timed to go off at 9:20 the next morning, when a lecture was to have occurred. As it was it went off at 9:20 P. M., and so did the large audience and also the orchestra.

George Proctor was the soloist of the evening.

* * *

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

NEW YORK, WEDNESDAY AFTERNOON, JANUARY 17, 1900.

Overture, Hiawatha (MS. First time).......................Goldmark
Concerto for piano in F minor, No. 2.......................Schuett
Symphonic Suite, Scherherazade, op. 35............Rimsky-Korsakoff
The Sea and Sindbad's Ship.
The Story of the Calender-Prince.
The Story of the Young Prince and the Young Princess.
Festival at Bagdad—The Sinking of Sindbad's Ship.
Soloist, Ludwig Breitner.

THURSDAY EVENING, JANUARY 18, 1900.

Tragic Overture.......................Brahms
Aria, Two movements from Suite No. 1 in F major, op. 39.......................Moszkowski
Aria, Symphony in D minor.......................Franck
Soloist, Madame Schumann-Heink.

Mlle. Ternina was engaged for the concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra on Thursday evening, January 18, but is prevented by indisposition from singing. Mme. Schumann-Heink will appear by courtesy of Maurice Grau, who will receive one-half of her fee, as is the custom. No doubt this money is credited to the treasury of the opera company.

Rubin Goldmark, a nephew of Karl Goldmark, was born in New York on August 15, 1872. He received his education at the College of the City of New York, which he left at the age of seventeen. While in college he studied music under Alfred von Livonius. Two years were passed in Vienna in studying the piano with Anton Door, and theory and composition with the Fuchs brothers. On returning to America, Goldmark studied the piano with Joseffy, and composition with Dvorák. In 1894, on account of his health, he went to Colorado Springs, where he is at present the director of the Conservatory of Music. Among other compositions are a trio for piano, violin and 'cello, a sonata for piano and violin, a romanza for 'cello, and a theme and variations for orchestra, played by the late Anton Seidl.

The overture "Hiawatha," which was performed for the first time at the Boston concerts last week, was composed in 1896, while Goldmark was in the Rocky Mountain region. The title indicates only the poetic source and suggestiveness of the subject, with no attempt to employ or embody Indian folk music.

HOME JOURNAL.

NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 17, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.—Programme for this Wednesday afternoon's concert at Carnegie Hall: Rubin Goldmark, overture, "Hiawatha," (MS. first time); Edward Schuett, concerto for pianoforte in F minor, No. 2; Rimsky-Korsakoff, symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," op. 35. Soloist, Ludwig Breitner. Programme for to-morrow, Thursday, night: Brahms, "Tragic Overture;" Moritz Moszkowski, two movements from suite No. 1, in F major, op. 39; 1, Allegretto giocoso; 2, Tema con Variazione; Cesar Franck, symphony in D minor. Soloist, Mme. Schumann-Heink, who will sing two arias, instead of Mme. Ternina, as previously announced.

The Evening Post.

New York, Thursday, January 18, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

In discussing Mr. Hadley's concert yesterday in this journal, reference was made to the fact that he was one of the young American composers who were honored by a performance under the bâton of Anton Seidl. Last night, at Carnegie Hall, another young American was represented—Rubin Goldmark—whose merits also had been recognized by that eminent and sympathetic conductor, who performed his "Theme and Variations" for orchestra. Mr. Goldmark has other claims to consideration. He is a nephew of the eminent Karl Goldmark and was a few years ago a pupil, at the National Conservatory in this city, of Mr. Joseffy in the piano class, and in composition of Dr. Dvorák, who exclaimed one day, after examining one of his pieces, "Now there are two Goldmarks." And now Mr. Goldmark has had the good luck to have his "Hiawatha" overture performed by the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

It was well worth such a compliment, for it is a skilfully constructed and admirably orchestrated composition. The thematic material is interesting, and its elaboration is such that the attention of the listener is constantly riveted as by an entertaining story. The title is obviously to be taken only in a vague Schumannesque way, for no attempt has been made to suggest American Indian music by the use of aboriginal melodies or otherwise. It is rather East India that we are reminded of, indirectly, because of the natural resemblance of Mr. Goldmark's overture to his uncle's "Sakuntala" overture. In some parts there is a dazzling glow of sensuous coloring that is remarkable, even in these days of saturated tone-painting. The orchestra, under Mr. Gericke's direction, did not fail to bring out all this enchanting beauty.

Mr. Goldmark's piece, in truth, was the best thing on last night's programme. Eduard Schütt's F-minor concerto proved to be an empty piece in the style of a Brahms concerto in so far as it is neither interesting musically nor effective from the performer's point of view. It was played by Mr. Ludwig Breitner from the notes. For the concluding number Mr. Gericke once more brought out the symphonic suite "Scheherazade," by Rimsky-Korsakoff, which hardly improves on closer acquaintance. Now that the Russians receive so much attention, why is it that Anton Rubinstein is so systematically neglected? One might think there was a conspiracy against him. Why not let us hear the "Dramatic" and the "Ocean" symphonies occasionally? There is infinitely more melody, more genius in them, than in Rimsky-Korsakoff. Bach and Liszt are two other composers who do not receive proper attention from our orchestral societies. Yet we read every week of the triumphs won and the enthusiasm excited in German cities by the works of Liszt as interpreted by Mott, Strauss, and Weingartner.

NEW YORK HERALD

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

That admirable body of instrumentalists the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave a concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon, which was greatly enjoyed.

The gods may indeed be said to smile on a young composer whose manuscript work secures a performance by this orchestra. This good fortune befell Rubin Goldmark, a nephew of Carl Goldmark, but himself a New Yorker by birth, at yesterday's concert. The work in question is an overture to "Hiawatha." It proved to be thoroughly modern in spirit, interesting in its themes and admirably orchestrated. Mr. Gericke led it admirably, and the audience was much impressed with it.

Ludwig Breitner, the pianist, made his New York début with Eduard Schutt's second pianoforte concerto. He played it brilliantly, and, although he had the music before him, which nowadays is unusual and disillusioning, he made a hit with the audience, and was several times recalled.

The concert concluded with a fine performance of Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphony suite, "Scheherazade."

YORK EVENING JO
JANUARY 18, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra
AT CARNEGIE HALL, CRITICISED BY
L. D.

Music lovers welcomed the Boston Symphony Orchestra again yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The orchestra is here for the third of the series of matinees and concerts that it usually gives in New York during the Winter, and following its customary plan it presented some new music at yesterday's performance.

The programme opened with an overture, "Hiawatha," which has never been heard here before, and has not yet been published, although it was composed in 1896. The name of the composer, Rubin Goldmark, at once commanded attention for this number, because of the fame of his uncle, Karl Goldmark, notably a successful writer of music. His young nephew (he was born in 1872) shows a knowledge of effect and coloring rarely met with in the first works of a writer for orchestra, and this composition has a poetic atmosphere.

Full of Melody and Stirring Climaxes.

It is full of melody and rich musical ideas, with stirring climaxes. Perhaps it would have been just as well to have used the full force of the brass more discreetly in some of the climaxes, but this may be matter of taste.

"Hiawatha" is an admirable piece of work, and it will be gratifying to have more from the same composer's pen.

Mr. Ludwig Breitner, the soloist, played a new piano concerto by Eduard Schutt, No. 2, in F minor, which contains three movements. It cannot be said that the composition is marked by originality. On the contrary, it is uninteresting and commonplace, and strains the listener through its constant striving after something which it never reaches.

It gives plenty of opportunity for technical display, mostly of the loud bravura order, and that is sufficient to incite some part of an audience to enthusiasm. Mr. Breitner did not make the most of the meagre melodies which the concerto offered.

He has a hard, unsympathetic touch, and produces none of the contrasts in tone which a combined finger and pedal, with the proper management, would reveal. His technique is clear and certain, but his playing is mechanical and decidedly pedagogic in style.

Symphonic Suite "Scheherazade."

The Symphonic Suite, after the Arabian Nights, called "Scheherazade," by Nicolai Andreyevitch Rimsky-Korsakoff, is descriptive of the world famous Sultana of that name who staved off death day by day by keeping her husband interested in her tales for a thousand and one nights.

The music is in four parts, relating four tales, and in each the theme, oriental in character, representing the narrator herself, appears clearly and prominently defined. It is a marvel of orchestration and expressive coloring, and served to bring out the remarkable virtuosity of individual members of the orchestra.

Mr. Gericke can choose the most difficult music for his men with impunity, knowing that he has a band of first-class artists under him. The rendition of all the numbers brought out the usual excellence of this unique organization, and perhaps more than the usual amount of fire.

L. D.

The New York
"All the News That's Fit to Print."
PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, JAN. 19, 1900.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

Its Third Evening Concert at Carnegie Hall Last Night.

The third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place last night at Carnegie Hall. The instrumental numbers of the programme were the "Tragic Overture" of Brahms, two movements of the first suite of Moszkowski, and the D minor symphony of César Franck. The intervals between these numbers were filled with vocal solos. The symphony of César Franck was a novelty here, and one by no means unwelcome. The music of this gifted Belgian, in spite of the fact that he died in 1890, at the age of seventy-eight, is not at all well known to this public, and it is only of late that it has begun to command attention here. It has not always been the fortune of the composer to be so worthily represented as he was last night. The symphony in D minor is one of the compositions by which the full measure of his talents may be taken. It is not, indeed, a profound work, but it is interesting, and that is more than can be said of many of the new things which are brought to our notice. The style is modern, and the treatment is musicianly.

The work is in three movements, of which the first and the third are the most effective. The first is particularly happy in its thematic material, though the first motive has a familiar cut. But the subsidiary theme of this movement is a lovely one, and it is employed by the composer in a most felicitous manner. The writing throughout this movement is muscular and full of a fine orchestral mastery. Rich and solid scoring aid the admirable polyphonic exposition of the leading ideas to make a delightful effect for the hearer, and the entire movement holds the attention. The second movement, which is the least satisfactory of the three, is very elaborate in construction, and the first theme is striking in itself and in its orchestral presentation; but the general effect of the movement is not brilliant. The third movement is, on the contrary, rich and luminous in its nature. The theme which the composer has selected for the tutti passages does not at first seem especially well adapted to this sort of treatment, but it finally wins its way into favor by the skill of its exposition.

Mr. Gericke had prepared the performance of the symphony with his customary devotion to the composer's intent as understood by him, and the result was admirable. The magnificent precision of the orchestra was never exhibited to better advantage, and the noble, penetrating tone of the strings and the mellow fluency of the wood worked wonders for M. Franck's music. Indeed it must be said that in the readings of the works performed last night Mr. Gericke gave us more masculinity than he is wont to give us, and for this we should be duly grateful. In the second and third movements of the clever suite of Moszkowski the virtuosity of the orchestra was displayed to the highest advantage. It is a ceaseless delight to listen to such firmness of attack, such delicacy of gradation, such unanimity, and such flexibility as this orchestra has. The little collection of masters who play the wood instruments covered itself with glory in the suite. Long may the Boston Symphony men continue to come and play for us. There is a vast, and, we may add, aching, space for them in this metropolis.

For the sake of the record, it must be chronicled that, owing to the illness of Mme. Schumann-Heink, who was engaged for this concert Mlle. Rosa Olitzka of the Metropolitan Opera House company sang the aria, "Wohl denn," from Mozart's "Titus," and "Mon coeur s'ouvre a ta voix," from the "Samson et Dalila" of Saint-Saëns; but the dignity of criticism shall not be outraged in these columns by comment on her delivery.

New-York Daily Tribune.
THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1900.

The Boston Orchestra came yesterday and gave the first of its two concerts for January. If its objects outside of the obvious line were to be defined it would probably be said that it manifested a threefold purpose in yesterday's scheme, namely, to introduce a new composer native to America, to introduce a new pianist and to show to what a pitch of virtuosity (awful word!) the band has been brought. In each respect the concert was a signal success, though the brightest refulgence, perhaps, shone from its last endeavor, for which purpose Mr. Gericke chose Rimsky-Korsakow's marvellously ingenious suite entitled "Scheherazade," which has figured in the Boston list heretofore. The new composition was an overture by Mr. Rubin Goldmark, nephew of the composer of "The Queen of Sheba," of whose work in the department of chamber music a fractional element of the New-York public has had occasion to judge heretofore. Mr. Goldmark is a young musician who is inspired with a serious purpose and who has acquired a most commendable technical equipment. He knows how to say what he has to say in an agreeable and convincing manner.

That in yesterday's work, an overture entitled "Hiawatha" (extraneously and unnecessarily we are tempted to say), he made his comment on the subject matter rather longer than its intrinsic value called for will not be reckoned against him too rigidly by those who know what young composers are obliged to go through before they find their powers and learn the limitations enforced by good art. He disclaimed any purpose to employ local color through the agency of Indian themes, but there was, nevertheless, a curious resemblance between one of his subjects and the melody of an Omaha love song which Mr. MacDowell placed under tribute in his Indian suite. What was most admirable in his work was the fluency of the writing and his fine command of the orchestral voices. His instruments speak the language native to them—every one of them—and it is restful nowadays to hear that language after the Volapük of the modern school that has long ago out-Berliozed Berlioz.

Lovers of healthy pianoforte playing must rejoice in the coming of Professor Breitner, who introduced not only himself but Schütt's second concerto yesterday. The composition invites about an equal amount of cavil and praise, and its good points were admirably presented. Overorchestrated is the most obvious criticism that can be passed upon it, and this was emphasized by the fact that Professor Breitner is a pianoforte player—not a pounder; a musician who respects the character and limitations of his instrument and will not abuse it; who loves euphony for the sake of the predominant part which euphony plays, and must play, in music; who subordinates the things which can be enlisted in the service of sensationalism to the musical idea; who is first artist and musician and then virtuoso. He has ample technique and a beautiful tone in cantabile, a crisp, precise, rhythmical mechanism, a fine, sane insight into the composer's purposes. In a way Mr. Joseffy has opened the way for his appreciation, and it was gratifying to note the hearty recognition which he received.

The World.
d by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 1900.

SECOND BOSTON CONCERT.

Interesting Programme Played by Mr. Gericke's Musicians.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra played again at Carnegie Hall last evening. The programme, like all those with which Mr. Gericke's musicians favor their New York patrons, was interesting. It consisted of Brahms's tragic overture, two movebents from Moskowski's first suite, and Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor.

The overture was broadly played. Mr. Gericke renders Brahms with a sympathetic insight. The Moskowski suite served to exhibit the virtuosity of the orchestra. The allegretto with its jocular joyousness was played with the lightest of touches. In the theme with variations the several instruments in turn displayed their respective technical facility. The fourth variation, with its florid solo, was performed—after a slight mishap to the flutist in the opening phrase—with an exquisite tone and great fluency. The sixth, with its coloratura passage for the first violins in unison was a marvellous bit of precision in ensemble playing.

After Moskowski's dainty style and suave melody the Franck symphony produced a most impressive effect. This French composer, who died still unrecognized, is well represented in this work. It has his profundity, his broad proclamations, his warm, rich orchestration, his evident effort to make his music express all of his thoughts and musings. It is very individual music, with recurrent suggestions of a disappointed genius, with unconventional contrafuntal devices and a fondness for harsh harmonies. It is masterly, authoritative music, the creation of a man of intellect and instinct. This composition was played with superb force and sonority.

Ternina was to have been the soloist, but her engagement was cancelled owing to her recent illness. Then Schumann-Heink, who was to be her substitute, caught cold. At the last moment a third artist from the opera company was procured—Olitzka. Mme. Olitzka rarely does justice to her fine contralto voice. Last night she was unkind to it in the extreme. She sang very badly, with a vicious tone production and a slovenly execution.

The Sun.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 1900.

Boston Symphony Concert.

Cæsar Franck's Symphony in D minor was the principal number at the third evening concert of the Boston Symphony Orchestra given last night at Carnegie Hall. Like most of this composers work, it is not known here and was played yesterday for the first time. Its performances anywhere have been few. The programme noted one at Paris in 1889. Another at Brussels is recorded. But to most of the musical centres the Belgian composer is still a stranger. The first movement in the symphony departs from the regular form and resembles the first movement of Tschaikowsky's "Symphonie Pathetique" in the recurrence of the slow introduction in the body of this first part. The second movement, which is equally unconventional, is a remarkable series of variations all accompanied by the harp and abounds in beautiful harmonic effects. This movement was especially gorgeous in the matter of orchestration and new voices seemed to be speaking among the instruments. The third movement consists of a short theme and the extension and combination of the themes used in the two preceding movements. The fourth movement, necessary usually in a symphony, is lacking, but the treatment throughout the whole composition is symphonic and entitles the work to a place in that class of writing. It proved last night profoundly effective and the second movement in particular abounded in the gloomy beauty and individualism of a kind that Chopin imparted to his serious writings. The work was coldly received by the audience, in spite of a superb performance.

Brahms's "Tragic" overture, which has not been heard for several years, and the second and third movements from Moskowski's first suite in F major, were the other orchestral numbers. The overture was played with admirable solidity and balance. In the two Moskowski numbers was found complete contrast to the seriousness that preponderated on the programme, and while the audience enjoyed the relief, the change was too striking for artistic effect. Mlle. Olitzka took the place of Mme. Schumann-Heink, who is ill, and sang the aria from Mozart's "Titus," and "Mon Cœur s'ouvre à la Voix" from "Samson et Dalila," in her accustomed fashion.

Telegram.
HIGH WATER MARK
Circulation...... 330,900
NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1900.

Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture was performed with admirable spirit by the Boston Symphony Orchestra at their Carnegie Hall concert yesterday afternoon. The leading of Mr. Gerick was a source of much pleasure to the audience. In addition to the new piece, the orchestra rendered the symphony suite, "Scheherezade," of Rimsky-Korsakoff. The debut of Ludwig Breitner, pianist, was accomplished with entire success, the selection being Edward Schutt's second pianoforte concerto.

NEW YORK HERALD
NEW YORK, FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra gave its second concert of the week in Carnegie Hall yesterday evening.

Under Mr. Gericke's firm bâton Brahms' "Tragic Overture," two movements, from Moszkowski's suite, No. 1 in F major, and Cesar Franck's symphony in D minor were superbly played. The tone quality of this orchestra is a delight to the ear.

The non-appearance of Mme. Schumann-Heink, owing to indisposition, was much regretted, but Mme. Olitzka, of the Maurice Grau Opera Company, who took her place, was heartily applauded. Mme. Olitzka sang an aria from Mozart's "Titus" and "Mon Coeur s'ouvre à ta Voix," from Saint-Saens' "Samson et Delila."

New-York Daily Tribune.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 19, 1900.

THE BOSTON SYMPHONY ORCHESTRA.

Though the admirers of the Boston Orchestra are not accustomed to look to the solo feature in its concerts for their highest enjoyment, it was found last night that the feature can be a source of profound disappointment. When the plans for the concert were first made it was expected that Fräulein Ternina would take part in a performance of the last scene of "Götterdämmerung." The illness of the lady prevented her participation, and the management announced that it was anxious to provide a first class substitute and had therefore engaged Mme. Schumann-Heink. The admired contralto's numbers were to be the "Parto, ma tu ben mio" from Mozart's "La Clemenza di Tito," and Adriano's scene and air from Wagner's "Rienzi." The substitution under the circumstances could cause no serious disappointment. Yesterday forenoon, however, Mme. Schumann-Heink notified her indisposition to the management, and a second substitute became necessary. The dilemma was an awkward one, and the management met it by engaging Mlle. Olitzka, who occasionally sings at the Metropolitan Opera House. For those who have heard this singer the necessity of the change was made doubly grievous by her engagement. The solo feature, which the audience would willingly have foregone, became an affliction, instead of a joy, and memory of the concert was embittered for all who know that the highest pleasures of the year in the line of absolute music come from the Boston visitors.

Against this element of discouragement the orchestra contended with a more than usually brilliant performance of Brahms's "Tragic" overture, two movements from Moszkowski's Suite in F major, and a symphony in D by César Franck. The last work was new to the local public and proved to be more interesting to the curious inquirer into musical evolution than to the ordinary seeker after musical delights. A coterie in France, originally small but continually growing, has been trying to canonize the composer of this symphony for years. It will probably never succeed in the degree that it hopes, but his works are likely always to command a high degree of respect. The sense of form in its greatest amplitude and the capacity for logical, consistent and beautiful development of well conceived ideas, upon which the use of the large forms depends, has never been the possession of the French school, and is it not manifest in Franck's symphony. Splendidly sonorous is the orchestration, full of interest the harmonies, most commendable the ingenious use of the old device to compel a recognition of unity by community of themes between the movements, but the essential principle of sound and proper development, of consistency in idea and evolution is still wanting.

The Sun.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY CONCERT.

Some Music New Here and a New Pianist Introduced.

The programme of the Boston Symphony Orchestra's concert at Carnegie Hall yesterday afternoon possessed more than the usual share of novelty, as it introduced a new pianist who was heard in a concerto unfamiliar here, presented a novel overture by Rubin Goldmark, a young American composer, and concluded with Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scherazade," which has not been played here often enough to lose the interest of a new work. Rubin Goldmark, composer of the "Hiawatha" overture, is a nephew of the famous Karl of Vienna, although he was born in this city twenty-eight years ago and was educated here, with the exception of his musical studies continued for several years in Europe. The overture heard yesterday was composed in 1896 and is not to be regarded as programme music, since its title is merely intended to suggest the source of the composer's inspiration. Yesterday afternoon it made a favorable impression on the audience. It is richly orchestrated, its contrasts of tone color are effective in all cases, excepting when the composer has used some of the instruments with a purpose that is not always clear. The work seemed a little too long, and the audience found more to admire in its technical than in its musical phases. Its Indian character is not distinctly marked. The composition was, as a whole, decidedly creditable to the young composer, although it can scarcely be said that subscribers would be willing to have American musicians frequently encouraged by the practical method of putting their works on the programme.

The other orchestral number, "Scherazade," was a source of unmitigated delight as the orchestra under Wilhelm Gericke played it yesterday afternoon. The Russian composition, with its brilliant, barbaric music, seems a strikingly truthful realization of the spirit of the tales to be found in "A Thousand and One Nights." The orchestration, with its wonderful use of every force available to-day in such music: the originality, piquancy and novelty of the composition: the gorgeousness of its tonal color—all these elements so compensate for the frequent repetition of the same themes that they are never allowed to become tiresome. The playing of the orchestra in this music offered wonderful evidence of its virtuosity. The solo instruments were all played with a perfection that makes criticism necessarily eulogistic, and the general performance was remarkably fine, even for an orchestra which has accustomed New Yorkers to such finished playing.

Ludwig Breitner, the pianist, belongs to-day to the French school, although he was born in Italy and has been a pupil of Rubinstein and Liszt. He has recently come to New York to make his residence permanently here. M. Breitner played with great refinement and precision in a straightforward way that showed his freedom from affectation and his complete mastery of the piano. He did not play with an astonishing technique, which made it seem as if he could turn over the piano with his fingers if he desired to, nor did the work in which he was heard give much opportunity for the revelation of poetic or interpretative power. He proved himself nevertheless an admirable performer in a class that is not by any means to be called Titanic. His touch is musical and sympathetic and he is a pianist to be heard always with pleasure. The concerto in F minor in which he was heard is the work of Edouard Schuette, and it could have been selected by M. Breitner only from the desire to be heard here in a novelty. It gave him the opportunity to display his technical completeness, but was musically quite without interest.

The World.

ed by the Press Publishing Company, 53 to 63 PARK
New York.

THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1900.

BOSTON ORCHESTRA HEARD.

A Programme of Modern Music and a New Pianist.

Mr. Gericke and his musicianly men from Boston gave the public an afternoon of modern music at Carnegie Hall yesterday, and incidentally introduced a pianist of superior quality, heretofore known here by name only. The usual audience of refined, intelligent lovers of music was present.

The programme was ultra-modern in character. The three composers represented—one of them as yet still a junior—are masters of broad expression, complex scoring and vivid orchestral color.

The first number was a rhapsody in the form of an overture, suggested by the romance of the "Hiawatha" legend. No attempt to employ the song of the Indian has been made by the composer. He has used music as the universal language. This opus is by Rubin Goldmark, still under thirty, a New Yorker by birth, who lives in Colorado. He is a nephew of Karl Goldmark, the composer, and a pupil of Joseffy and Dvorak.

His "Hiawatha" has but a slender melodic basis. The impressions the legend have produced upon the composer find expression in musical figures, but his fancy has taken wide flights in the developments of these short rhythmical phrases. He has clothed his fantasies in the richest of colors. His orchestral effects are solid and sonorous.

Mr. Goldmark's future possesses special interest, particularly as he is an American, and toiling at present in the educational field.

The second number was a concerto for pianoforte No. 2 in F minor, opus 47, by Edward Schuett, the friend of Leschetitzky, whose muse seems to be of a frugal disposition, for his compositions come at long intervals only. The concerto is an interesting opus, vigorous and dramatic in character. The piano part is full of technical difficulties. It is made part and parcel of the orchestra, alternating in the formulations of the thematic matter. It is not a work for a mere virtuoso, but one for a musician of the highest class.

To say that Mr. Ludwig Breitner played the piano part in a most artistic manner is the highest compliment that could be paid to him. There was a consistent adherence to the composer's intent. No effort at self-assertion was made. Mr. Breitner, with a complete command of all the technical requisites, negotiated the intricate passages with a full sense of their relative importance in the general scheme of the concerto. It was certainly an impressive performance.

The final number was Rinsky-Korsokoff's symphonic suite "Scheherazade," which has already been heard here. It is one of the gems of ultra modern music, with all the fantasy, the glamor, the romance of the marvellous Arabian tales reproduced in glowing music; music in which every known orchestral device is employed to produce tone colors equal to those a Fortuny placed upon canvas.

The orchestra never played

The New York Times.

"All the News That's Fit to Print."

PUBLISHED EVERY DAY IN THE YEAR.

NEW YORK, THURSDAY, JAN. 18, 1900.

THE BOSTON ORCHESTRA.

The Third Afternoon Concert at Carnegie Hall Yesterday.

The third of the afternoon concerts of the Boston Symphony Orchestra took place yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. The programme consisted of Rubin Goldmark's overture to "Hiawatha," the second piano concerto of Eduard Schutt, and Rimsky-Korsakow's symphonic suite "Scheherezade." The pianist was Ludwig Breitner, who has recently come from Paris to live in New York. Let us take the music in its order. Young Rubin Goldmark is a nephew of Carl Goldmark, the composer of the famous "Sakuntala" overture, and was born in this city on Aug. 15, 1872. He was graduated from the College of the City of New York and then went abroad to continue the musical studies which had been begun here. He studied on the other side of the water two years, and then, returning to his native land, had the advantage of instruction from Joseffy and Dvorak.

His overture, heard yesterday for the first time here, is the work of a young musician without many ideas. There is a woeful lack of definite figure in the work and a deal of development of nothing. This is a pity, for the composer shows a considerable feeling for orchestral color, and a very thorough acquaintance with the methods of his distinguished uncle. This is, of course, natural. If one has a good model in the family it would be ungracious to go outside for guidance. There is a well-made climax near the end of this overture, which is entirely too far from the beginning. The piano concerto of Schutt has a good first movement, a very pleasing second (the slow one), and a fairly good finale in scherzando style. The musical theme, which appears as the principal idea of the first movement, is employed in slightly modified forms throughout the work, and this gives a sort of organic union to the parts. But it should be said, in justice to the composer that his style is sufficient in itself to preserve the unity of his work. The piano part is only tolerably favorable to the revelation of a player's powers, and the orchestration is at times too thick and ambitious.

Mr. Ludwig Breitner, who played the solo part in the concerto, is a respectable middle-class pianist, who will set no rivers on fire, but who will not annoy any one. He has a neat technic, taste, and a generally polished style. His playing is deficient in distinction, fire, and color. He is probably at his best as a teacher. Rimsky-Korsakow's suite was heard again with delight. It is such a delicious piece of orchestration that any one can enjoy it even without attention to the story which it tells without too much attempt at details. As played by the Boston Symphony Orchestra yesterday, it lost not a shade of the many orchestral tints in it. The performance was notable for its perfect clarity, its absolute balance, and its finished phrasing. But it would not have been difficult to secure a reading in which there was more brilliancy. Mr. Gericke is so very polite in his methods, so averse to rudeness of any kind, that he rubs off all the angles that make reflection of the sunlight. However, we ought to be glad to hear such finish. We get precious little of it at home, and we should rejoice to hear such virtuosi as the solo violin, 'cello, oboe, clarinet, and bassoon of this orchestra.

The Times

PHILADELPHIA, JANUARY 16, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT

Third Programme of the First Boston Symphony Series—Brema Soloist.

A large audience listened to the third concert of the first Boston Symphony series last evening. Madame Maria Brema, as the soloist, sang the aria and minuet from Rameau's "Castor and Pollux" and "La Fiancee du Timbalier," by Saint Saens.

The programme opened with a new composition by Rubin Goldmark, nephew of the famous Vienna composer, an overture for orchestra, called "Hiawatha."

Beyond being very well instrumented, the work merits little comment. The commencing of the allegro was too plainly influenced by a recollection of the "Leonora No. 3" of Beethoven to be misunderstood, and the composition closed with the last portion of the "Forest Wearing," from "Siegfried," grafted bodily from that excerpt, with horn passages from "Parsifal." Whatever was original in the composition was not spun out and suffered from too frequent repetition. The title had no connection whatever with the music.

Though Madame Brema's appearance was the signal for tumultuous applause, and though she was recalled four or five times, the majority of the audience laughed openly at her singing, which sounded distressingly amateurish, so much so that the general feeling aroused was one of unmitigated astonishment. As a Wagner heroine Brema is very great, but on the concert stage, with her peculiar method of forcing her notes, she is impossible. The Siegfried Idyl was taken too fast and the absence of defined phrasing made this beautiful concert piece sound monotonous. So erratic were the tempi that when the first return to the first theme on the horns was reached the subject (one of noble tenderness) was taken nearly twice too fast. The excellent playing of the strings relieved the otherwise surprisingly unsympathetic treatment of the work.

With the performance of the Pastoral Symphony, which closed the programme, the orchestra showed to advantage. In the second movement, especially, the strings did beautiful work. Were the general excellence of the other bodies of the orchestra equal to the strings, little would be left to be desired, always excepting the absence of that warmth of feeling, generosity of expression and magnetism personal, lacking in this case, which gets out of a modern orchestra orchestral effects, cresendos and climaxes that are such, and not a mere marshaling of string music augmented by insufficient utilizing of an augmentation of wood and brass wind instruments. Madame Brema sings again at the concert next Friday evening, the orchestral attraction being a symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," by the Russian composer, Rimsky-Korsakoff.

The [illegible] Press

TUESDAY, JANUARY 16, 1900.

BOSTON SYMPHONY.

Beethoven's Sixth Symphony the Feature of the Programme.

It was really quite al fresco; in the open air, in the Rockies, in the forest of "Nibelungen" fancies and last of all forty minutes in the country with Vienna in the distance. And all this outing (per musica) at the Academy of Music last evening was made possible by the Boston Symphony Orchestra's programme covering several periods and different climes from Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony to the "Siegfried Idyll" of Wagner and Rubin Goldmark's "Hiawatha" overture.

The soloist, Madame Brema, contrary to expectation, added but little to the musical enjoyment of the evening though giving a dramatic touch that told more than did her vocalization that a great operatic artist was singing to the audience. Save for this those present to whom the singer was unknown would have been puzzled to determine her exact status. To a poor choice of composition, Madame Brema added poor enunciation and was not in her best in voice. Her selection of the "Air de Telaire" from Rameau's "Castor et Pollux" had nothing to recommend it as she rendered it. As has been said once before this Winter, in these columns, the choice of the archaic cannot be excused unless by the definite results. The dust on many compositions should not be disturbed. It is quite fitting it should increase. There seems to be a craze, however, among the musically cultured artists, those who wish to give a distinctive note to their concert work, for eighteenth century numbers. In avoiding the pitfalls of the conventional of to-day they do not better things by choosing the conventional of yesterday. This was plainly shown in the stilted woe of the "Air de Telaire," and the "Menuet Chante" hardly improved matters, though more agreeable, while Madame Brema's modern selection, an aria by Saint-Saens, as rendered was by no means reassuring.

The orchestra was in glorious form, however, and Mr. Gericke's reading of the symphony was worth everything else on the programme. Three minutes with Beethoven even in a thunder-shower takes one into a musical world where expectation is aroused to be satisfied but without the palling of satiety. Beside the symphony, the concert was given over to a finely balanced interpretation of the "Siegfried Idyll," a hint of youth, a whiff of air from the land that never was, and was opened by the "Hiawatha" overture by Rubin Goldmark, a nephew of Carl Goldmark. The nephew, a New Yorker, now living in Colorado, in this overture has attempted to do justice, in a way, to the West—the West of the Rockies and its people. The overture is, however, marked by no bizarre or primitive effects, but in its composition proves how well the young modern composer, heir to the orchestral riches of his own century, assimiliates the superb material at his command, and produces tone poems and orchestral color sketches, given real ability, with comparative ease. The younger Goldmark writes fluently and is not wanting in ideas. As a result his overture was most interesting and agreeable in its use of the choirs and the climaxes with full orchestra.

On Friday night Madame Brema is again the soloist, and the orchestral compositions are Beethoven's "Egmont" overture, Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," and Brahms' Three Hungarian Dances.

THE RECORD

Philadelphia, January 16, 1900.

Frau Brema and the Boston Symphony Orchestra.

The triumphant readvent of Frau Marie Brema was the feature of last evening's concert by the Boston Symphony Orchestra. Her first selection was the aria and menuet chante, from "Castor and Pollux." The sombre first part was rendered with feeling and wonderful purity of tone, but in the second part this gifted soloist earned and received an ovation, singing with exquisite delicacy the limpid notes describing Lethe—forgetfulness. A change was made in the announced programme in Frau Brema's second song, Saint-Saens' aria "La Fiancee due Timbalier" being substituted. The story is that of a young girl betrothed to a soldier. Her joyous anticipation of his return, the baneful prophecy of a fortune-teller, the tramp of the returning troopers, the joy of the maiden as she believes she sees her lover and her crushing grief as she finds he is dead, all are given with a wealth of dramatic power and beauty, the rendition causing a whirlwind of applause from the magnificent audience. The overture "Hiawatha," by Rubin Goldmark, a young Western composer, was the novelty by the orchestra, this being the first local performance of the piece. The title is illustrative of the poetic source of the production, it being composed in the Rocky Mountain region, rather than indicative of any attempt to portray Indian folk-music. This youthful musician's production gives promise of much greater things in the future, though little crudenesses crop out at intervals in the present. Wagner's Siegfried Idyl, composed in honor of his wife's birthday, was the other minor offering, and the pastoral symphony in F major, No. 6, by Beethoven, was the piece de resistance. Frau Brema is rehearsing for her next concert in this city, on Friday evening, a series of chansons a dancer, by Alfred Bruneau. Their titles are: "Le Menuet," "La Gavotte," "La Bourree," a wild ant dance; "La Pavane," "Le Sarabande" and "Le Passe-Pied."

American

JANUARY 16, 1900.

MARIE BREMA BRIMFUL OF DRAMATIC INSTINCT

Her Singing at the Boston Symphony Concert Gave Evidence of Her Great Ability.

By Henry Gordon Thunder.

Marie Brema was the soloist at the third of the Monday night series of the Boston Symphony Orchestra. She sang the antique aria and menuet from Rameau's "Castor and Pollux," and "La Fiancée du Timbalier" of Saint-Saens. In the first number there seemed to be a lack of ease in tone production, and an uncertainty in tone color hard to understand in this gifted artist. The menuet was more successful than the aria, and was sung in a charming mezzo voce most artistic and telling.

A rather surprising discrepancy seemed to exist between voice and orchestra as to the value to be given to the long appogiaturas, which occur frequently, the result being the doubtful one of having the voice hold appogiatura while the orchestra played the resolution!

In the Saint-Saens number Mme. Brema gave a much more convincing evidence of her great art. She is brimful of dramatic instinct and made all that was possible out of the work. Mme. Brema has learned the French trick of singing through her nose since last she was here—purposely, of course, and with striking effect in two marked instances.

Goldmark Overture Irreproachable.

The Goldmark overture, "Hiawatha," by the nephew of the great Carl Goldmark, proved itself rather unmarked in character. There is a touch here and there of the passionate vigor and glowing color that the really great uncle gives to all his work, and young Rubin Goldmark may develop. The work, from a technical point, is irreproachable and the work of a deep musician.

The beautiful Siegfried Idyl received a perfect performance. Every touch of emotion, every poetic shading received reverent reading at Mr. Gericke's hands. The dreamy slumber motif in the cellos, melting into far and further off shadows of obscuring pianissimo and sighing in ending into the germ of the Brunnhilde motif of "Siegfried Herrlicher," was one of the most finished bits of work of the great orchestra.

An Ideal Performance.

Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony closed the concert. This symphony is rarely heard, though one of the master's greatest works. Needless to say, it was given an ideal performance. Specially noticeable was the charming repetition of the village band's little tune in the wooden wind instruments. There is just one little village that has an oboe and bassoon able to play the rustic phrases so delicately pianissimo the second time! A considerable diversity of bowing was observable in the first violins, and occasionally a falsity of intonation in the same department that is surprising in this organization.

The Evening Sun.

Subscriptions by Mail, Post Paid.
THE EVENING SUN, per month.................. .20
THE EVENING SUN, per year...................$2.00

THURSDAY, JANUARY 18, 1900.

The Boston Symphony Orchestra's third afternoon concert of this season was the event of yesterday afternoon at Carnegie Hall. All of the accustomed suavity and finish, more than usual novelty and less than usual of brilliant effect marked the performance. The delicacy and smoothness of the orchestra's work was characteristic of Conductor Gericke, who delights less in climax than in fluency. There was, however, nothing left to be desired in the performance of Rimsky Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherazade," which closed the concert. The brilliant, barbaric music was superbly played and as usual the solo instruments carried their share with honor. The concert opened with a new work of a young man of American birth, Rubin Goldmark, entitled "An Overture to 'Hiawatha.'" The composition was not an overture and it had no suggestion of Indian life. It did display, at some length, a considerable ability in rich orchestration and a barrenness of significant musical themes. The other novelty of the afternoon was a piano concerto by Edouard Schuette, which failed to impress the audience. It gave a hearing, however, to a new pianist who has come from Paris to make his home here, and who proved himself a skillful and sympathetic performer. M. Ludwig Breitner is a teacher of piano playing. As a soloist he may not travel up and down the country in a private car, but he is decidedly an addition to the list of this city's resident musicians.

Philadelphia Inquirer
TUESDAY - - - - - JANUARY 16, 1900

MUSIC AT THE ACADEMY

Apart from the brilliant and beautiful performance which it included of Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony, the third concert for the season of the Boston Symphony Orchestra which took place at the Academy of Music last evening under the direction of Mr. William Gericke, before the usual crowded house, was rather dull and disappointing. Besides the symphony the orchestral selections included an overture by a young American composer, Rubin Goldmark, entitled "Hiawatha," and Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll." Mme. Brema, better known on the operatic stage than in the concert room, was the soloist and she had chosen as the vehicle for the exhibition of her vocal powers an air from Rameau's old, obsolete and forgotten opera of "Castor and Pollux," and another air from an opera by Saint-Saens which is so excessively new as to be quite unfamiliar.

The first was too archaic to be either interesting or impressive and the second rather aroused than satisfied the curiosity. It is a powerfully written, deeply imaginative and highly dramatic composition and it is easy to believe that in its intended place it would be exceedingly effective. Even when heard as last night, without the appropriate scenic accessories and deprived of the significance which it would derive from the text, the extraordinary dramatic value of the music was readily recognizable. It was delivered by Mme. Brema with convincing authority and splendid force. She is a singer of the Wagnerian school, with a big, resonant voice and a broad, heroic method and she knows how to make music of this character properly effective. Those who can recall the first performance in this city of "Tristan and Isolde" will remember that she was the Brangaene upon that occasion, and they will also remember the wonderful intensity of her impersonation and the extraordinary significance which she could impart to a gesture and an attitude. As she stood motionless against the ship's rail while the tragedy was preparing she seemed the very impersonation of relentless fate. She is naturally less striking in concert, but the dramatic quality of her temperament is still very apparent.

It is hardly necessary to dwell upon the playing of the orchestra, yet, good as it was, it did not render the "Hiawatha" overture interesting, nor did it prevent the "Siegfried Idyll" from seeming somewhat prolix. This was the consequence of its environment, following as it did two numbers which had tried the patience of the house. But the performance of the Beethoven symphony was an unalloyed delight. It was so bright and eloquent and lucid; it so completely simplified the complexities and exhibited the beauties of the score; it was so artistically balanced and so symmetrically proportioned; it was so warm and genial and sunny that although it came at the end of a program which, as we have said, was somewhat tiresome it was listened to with the closest attention and with unmistakable enjoyment. It irradiated and redeemed the whole concert and made it pleasurably and honorably memorable.

The orchestra will give a second concert on Friday evening, when the program will comprise Beethoven's Egmont overture, some Brahms Hungarian dances and a symphonic suite by Rimsky-Korsakoff entitled "Schererazade." Mme. Brema will again be the soloist.

PUBLIC LEDGER
Philadelphia, Tuesday, Jan. 16, 1900.

Boston Symphony Orchestra.

Nothing could more clearly demonstrate the inadvisability of playing the symphony at the end of the evening than the arrangement of last night's programme, when the Boston Symphony Orchestra gave their third concert of the present season at the Academy of Music. Beethoven's pastoral symphony, (No. 6 in F major, op. 68) followed after Rubin Goldmark's overture, "Hiawatha;" Wagner's "Siegfried Idyll" and a trio of songs by Marie Brema. The whole programme was of an unusually light character, and the symphony itself is of the lightest and gayest description, yet coming after an hour and a half of music that demanded close attention, it became almost wearisome owing to its length. Had it followed after Mme. Brema's first brace of songs, leaving her third one and the "Siegfried Idyll" to end the concert, the audience would have departed in a far happier frame of mind. The playing of the symphony last of all seems to be an idiosyncrasy of Mr. Gericke's. Neither Paur nor Thomas does it; reason and experience are against it; what earthly reason is there for its continuance?

The overture, "Hiawatha," by Rubin Goldmark, a nephew of Karl Goldmark, was the most interesting number of the evening, partly owing to the fact that it was played here for the first time, from the MS., and partly because of its wonderful and unexpected beauty. Again the influence of Wagner on the world of music has been shown. Take the last act of "Gotterdammerung" and substitute "Hiawatha" in a canyon of the Rocky Mountains for Siegfried by the Rhine, and you have the "Hiawatha" overture; the call of his horn, the voices from the stream, the story of his life, even his death. The whole history of the wandering adventurer is there; yet, strange to say, although the music parallels that of Wagner's, it does not follow it. There is no slavish imitation, only the thoughts and the manner of expressing them run in the same lines. It is a most beautiful composition, and in the matter of orchestration as full and as rich as the combined influences of Wagner and Goldmark's master, Dvorak, could inspire him to make of it. Even the playing of Wagner's own "Siegfried Idyll"—not the excerpt from the music drama, but the one he wrote as a birthday gift to his wife—gave no cause for unfavorable comparisons; though the piece as given is far more beautiful than the operatic score, because the mysterious whispers of the woods, the humming of insects and the sighing of the wind through the trees are treated in greater detail.

Mme. Marie Brema was the soloist. Her first song, the Air de Telaire, from "Castor et Pollux," was so lugubrious that even the menuet chante from the same work which followed was insufficient to dispel the atmosphere of the "astres lugubres des tombeaux." She did better later in the Saint-Saens's aria, "La Fiancee du Timbalier," which she gave in a highly dramatic manner. On Friday next, when she appears with the orchestra a [illegible] time she will sing Wagner's [illegible] Traume and Bruneau's

---

Boston Journal.
FRIDAY, JANUARY 26, 1900.

THIS WEEK'S SYMPHONY CONCERT SOLOIST.

(Photograph by Gessford & Van Brunt, New York.)

ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF.

Alexander Petschnikoff, the Russian violinist, was born Jan. 8, 1873, at Jeledz, in the Province of Oral. He is a Russian of the Russians: his grandfather was a serf, his father was a common soldier. The first music that impressed him was produced by a barrel-organ. His family moved to Moscow. The boy was delicate, unfit for hard manual work, and it was determined that he should be a musician. A member of the Imperial Orchestra heard him play the violin and took him to the Conservatory, where Hrimaly recognized his talent, and gladly took him as his pupil. The ten-year-old boy, obliged to assist his family, gave lessons. At the Conservatory he won the first prize and a gold medal; and then he went to Paris, through the invitation of the house of Pleyel Wolff and Company, piano-makers, who promised him a yearly income, but insisted that he should study under a French master. This Petschnikoff refused to do on account of his loyalty to Hrimaly; and then he knew poverty. He played in a theatre orchestra; he gave concerts in Paris and other cities of France, and the Princess Ourousoff became his friend. Her brother, General Malzoff, the Duke of Saxe Meiningen, and others clubbed together and gave him the famous Stradivarius that had formerly been owned by the violinist Ferdinand Lamb. The boy was not then known, but their confidence in him took the substantial form of 12,000 roubles.

Petschnikoff made his first appearance after this at Berlin, Oct. 11, 1895, when he played Wieniawski's concerto No. 2, pieces by Bach (including the Chaconne), the Canzonetta from Tschaikowsky's concerto, and a Havanaise and "Le cygne" by Saint-Saëns. The judgment was unanimous and enthusiastic in his favor. Thus Otto Lessmann declared that he was "a gift from the Lord to the sinful world of music." Petschnikoff appeared for the first time in America at a Philharmonic concert, New York, Nov. 17, 1899, when he played Tschaikowsky's concerto and the fugue in C major from Bach's fifth sonata (unaccompanied).

HOME JOURNAL.
NEW YORK:
WEDNESDAY, JANUARY 24, 1900.

Boston Symphony.

Rubin Goldmark's overture to "Hiawatha," the F minor op. 47 pianoforte concerto of Edward Schuett, and Rimsky-Korsakoff's symphonic suite, "Scheherezade," formed an excellent programme for the Wednesday matinée of the Boston Symphony Orchestra last week. The overture was doubly interesting as the work of a New Yorker. Rubin Goldmark was born in New York in 1872 and studied here till he was seventeen, when he went to Vienna to study the piano under Anton Door, and composition under Fuchs. Returning to America, the young artist completed his studies under Rafael Joseffy and Dvorak, and he is at present director of a Conservatory of Music at Colorado Springs. The overture, which is an admirable work, well written and melodious, was favorably received by the audience, and, of course, was finely given. Mr. Ludwig Breitner, the soloist, a pupil of Rubinstein, and a most scholarly and refined artist, played the Schuett concerto beautifully. His tone was warm and rich, and there was an absence of harshness in the forte passages that showed the teachings of his master. Even Paderewski is harsh at times, but Mr. Breitner has certainly caught Rubinstein's secret of velvety chord playing. The concerto, which is surely one of the most remarkable contributions to latter-day pianoforte literature, is effective and brilliant, and Mr. Breitner's fine interpretation will doubtless go far towards making it a favorite with piano students here. The Rimsky-Korsakoff suite, now such a favorite with concert-goers here, was magnificently played by the orchestra.

Thursday evening's concert was highly interesting and enjoyable. The orchestra had not quite warmed to their work when commencing the Brahms Tragic Overture, which was somewhat coldly, if not dryly given, but the two movements from the Moritz Moszkowski suite, allegretto, giojoso and tema con variazione, and the César Franck Symphony in D, were absolutely faultless and exquisite in interpretation. After the Moszkowski suite Mr. Gericke had several recalls, but the symphony was not properly appreciated by the audience. The latter work is clever and more profound than might be expected from the composer's nationality, but it is unequal, and the form seems to have somewhat encumbered the composer, for although it is always scholarly it is not always interesting. Madame Olitzka sang the aria from Mozart's "Titus," and the aria "Mon Cœur S'ouvre" from "Samson et Dalila." The first was too much for her voice and execution, and the second absolutely devoid of the passionate pathos and intensity so necessary to the Saint-Saëns music. Nevertheless she had many recalls and pleased quite a part of the audience. Mention must be made of the delightful solo flute playing in the fourth variation of the Moszkowski suite.

BOSTON DAILY ADVERTISER
ESTABLISHED 1813.
The Official Paper of the State.
The Official Paper of the City.
MONDAY MORNING, JAN. 29, 1900.

The Symphony Concert—Appearance of Petschnikoff.

"But that piece of song,
That old and antique song we heard last night;
Methought it did relieve my passion much;
More than light airs and recollected terms
Of these most brisk and giddy-paced times."

In these lines Shakespeare has foreshadowed the style of the Unfinished Symphony by Schubert, and under the reading of M. Gericke the two movements became anything but "giddy-paced." Its simple measures became "silly sooth" when compared with the music of the northern bards which followed. But it was linked sweetness long and too deliberately drawn out. Just as Schumann is a piano-thinker and remains so even in his symphonies, as Beethoven is orchestral even in his string quartettes, so Schubert remains a vocal composer even when writing orchestral works. The charm of the B minor fragment is not in its scoring or in its development, but in its unapproachable melody. No wonder that Schumann's insanity received a distinct accession when he thought that Schubert was haunting him and begging him to complete the "Unfinished Symphony"—an impossible task. Of course the technical part of the performance was flawless, for Schubert, who was once thought very difficult, presents no trouble to our orchestra. But the tempo seemed, as above intimated, too slow for the best effect.

Petschnikoff suffers from the burden of a too great reputation, or possibly a fame acquired a few years too soon. Among the great violinists he is certainly an important star, but we were anticipating a new Joachim, and were correspondingly disappointed. He has not the Ysaye breadth nor the Joachim authority; he presents rather a sympathetic tenderness, a crystalline delicacy and a flawless intonation. His double-stopping, his pure harmonies, his ease in high positions, were all commendable, and in his cadenza, placed like that of Mendelssohn in the middle of the first movement of the violin concerto, he proved his technical ability beyond any cavil; but he awakaned the critic's respect and recognition, rather than enthusiasm, although there were many recalls after the end of the work, recalls which, however, seemed to speak of the canny shrewdness of the encore fiend rather than of wild excitement.

Tschaikowsky's violin concerto in D major is an unequal work. For the first two movements it is not essentially Russian, but presents the cosmopolitan composer who was reproached by his own countrymen with not being sufficiently Slavonic. There is in the Canzonetta a Chesterfieldian grief, suggestive of point-lace handkerchiefs held before feminine eyes by dainty gloved fingers. The skin is Esau's, but the voice is Jacob's; the theme is Russian, but the expression is Mendelssohn.

But in the last movement the composer seems to take the motto of young Russia—"Para Domoi!"—"Let us get home"—and returns to his own hearth. One Russian melody follows another in this Allegro, and some of them are themes of a most attractive savagery. There was a good amount of G string melancholy in the movement, and the Russian sadness is like no other sorrow in music, being several shades of deeper indigo than that of the Italian who sighs "Vorrei Morire" because of a damsel's frown, or of the German who wails "Ich weiss nicht was soll es bedeuten dass ich so traurig bin" even on the most joyful occasions.

It is not a concerto to rank with Bruch's G minor, but we would gladly hear its last movement again, and possibly even the second might become more virile if played in a broader manner. The dashing end is certainly exciting enough.

And now we sailed across the Baltic Sea and the Skager Rack to Norway. To follow Tschaikowsky with Grieg was a good deal of northern music for so cold a night. Grieg's four symphonic dances were fearfully and wonderfully made, and gave more dissonances than Richter and Jadassohn ever dreamt of. The composer plunged into "Medias res" in the first measures as one plunges into a cold douche, and gave "Pop Goes the Weasel" in Norse, with distracting harmonies. After the tune had been dragged through a thicket of syncopations, a theme not unlike a halling was introduced. The reviewer was once present at a halling, north of Christiana, and must confess that the excitement of the dance is contagious. One young man after another tried gracefully to kick the rafters of the barn wherein we were assembled, while the fiddles played more and more boisterously and the shouts of the spectators goaded on the energetic jumpers. If one can understand the scene, one can sympathize with the spirit of the music.

The oboes played charmingly in the second number, in which the odd harmony imparted a pleasant sour, an agreeable tang. Few know what a wealth of beauty exists in the folk-songs and dances of Norway. In vivid contrast with the halling is the Springtanz (at least suggested by the third movement), a graceful movement which Liszt has compared wit2h the Mazurka. It is a round dance, ¾ rythym, and danced in groups of two. The scoring of the movements was very bold and quaint; it was as if Grieg had attempted to bring in a suggestion of the typical instruments of Norway, the Hardanger fiddle (a type of the old Viol d'Amore), the Lur (a wooden trumpet such as Wagner copied in "Tristan"), or the old zither-like instrument which is called the Langspel.

But in the last movement the composer was seized by the demon of thematic development, and began to torment a simple little figure until one could have cried, with Falstaff—"Oh, thou hath damnable iteration!" Dissonances began to grow up on every hand, and what had been a pleasant sour now became a disagreeable bitter. There was a species of syncopated counterpoint present that spoke more of skill than of beauty, and the little figure was alternately whispered and thundered until the coda was reached. In its darker moments the work was a species of "Danse Macabre" translated into Norwegian.

It is an ungracious task to find fault with Grieg; he knows his limitations and attempts no symphonies; he is a man who almost always has something original to say; he is a model in the domain of the folk-music of his native land; but in this movement he has followed the ultra-modern style of blowing up the toad into an ox, of making very much out of very little, and covering paucity of idea with plentitude of noise. We doubt whether repeated hearing would remove the unpleasant impression of this finale. One can only agree with the old composer who was asked his opinion of a very involved work, and replied—"To judge of such a composition, one must hear it several times—and I shall not hear it again!"

Louis C. Elson.

SUNDAY HERALD.
PUBLISHED EVERY SUNDAY IN THE YEAR
VOL. CVII., NO. 28.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 28, 1900.

THE SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The Audience Warmly Greets Alexandre Petschnikoff.

His Playing of the Concerto for Violin by Tschaikowsky Evokes Enthusiasm—Fragment of a Beautiful Schubert Symphony Charmingly Rendered.

The programme for the 13th of this season's concerts by the Boston Symphony orchestra, Mr. Wilhelm Gericke, conductor, in Music Hall, last evening, was:

Unfinished Symphony................Schubert
Concerto for violin in D major, op. 35..Tschaikowsky
Symphonic Dances, op. 64...............Grieg
(First time in Boston.)

The soloist was Mr. Alexandre Petschnikoff. So much in the way of superlative praise of the artist had preceded his coming hither, that expectation regarding his powers had been screwed up to a great tension. It must be confessed that the results last evening were something of a disappointment. He has an exceedingly brilliant and fluent technique, which, however, now and then merges into slovenliness of execution.

The difficulties of the concerto are exacting to the highest degree, and the finale has work enough to tax the fingers to an exceptional extent. These, on the whole, the player met and conquered without apparent effort. He bows largely and freely, and his intonation is exquisitely pure and true. Beyond these points there did not seem to be much on which any very ardent enthusiasm was called for. His tone is small, and the same may be said of his style. His feeling for rhythm is not very marked, and there were moments when his accent was so confused that it was not easy to recognize the emphasis of the tempi, especially in the more bravura passages.

There was enough and to spare of showy physical display, which, though effective enough in its way as an appeal to the eye, at last became irritating by reason of its exaggeration. These features, as well as an excessive tendency toward effeminate pianissimo in and out of season, a lack of variety in regard to necessary contrasts of tone color and mawkish affectation of sentiment, made the performance of the work, which, at the best, is not among the masterpieces that have been written for the violin, monotonous, and, taken altogether, uninteresting. It was not wanting in fire and brilliancy, notably in the finale, but, as one interpretation, despite its showiness, it was hollow and insincere.

It is scarcely probable that Mr. Petschnikoff's reputation as an artist of the first rank is undeserved, but in his reading of this concerto, it surely was not made clear. His playing was never large, never emphatic, never impressive, and was rather indicative of the skilled virtuoso than of the seriously thoughtful artist. In the slow movement, in which his cantabile was warm and flowing, he achieved his most satisfying results. Possibly in another work better suited to his style and temperament he would leave less to censure and more to praise. However, it must be added, that his audience went fairly wild over him, and applauded tremendously and recalled him some half-dozen times.

The grief dances proved to be insufferably monotonous, in their persistently sustained eccentricities of extreme chromatic harmonies, cranky rhythmic accents, noisy orchestration and ugliness generally. They were read by Mr. Gericke, with almost exciting vigor and splendidly, but it is doubtful if they have come to stay, for they have little charm, even in their Norwegian folk-song themes.

The lovely Schubert fragment of a symphony was the one tribute to the melodiously beautiful that the programme presented. It was charmingly played; but it seemed as if the first movement dragged a little in the unusually slow pace at which it was taken, and somewhat anticipated the effect of the slow movement itself.

At the next concert a new work by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Avonais Elegiac Overture, will be given for the first time. The other selections are Serenade for strings, No. 1, in D major, by Fuchs; the Entr'acte, act 3, of "le Meistersinger," Wagner, and Beethoven's symphony No. 8, in F major.

Boston Journal.
SUNDAY, JANUARY 28, 1900.

PETSCHNIKOFF

His First Appearance at a Symphony.

Violinist Indulges in WeepingSentiment.

Grieg's Symphonic Dances the Novelty.

The program of the 13th Symphony concert given last evening in Music Hall, Mr. Gericke conductor, was as follows:

Unfinished symphony, B minor.......Schubert
Concerto for violin...............Tschaikowsky
Symphonic Dances, Op. 64................Grieg
(First time in Boston.)

Mr. Alexander Petschnikoff made his first appearance in Boston. He chose the concerto by Tschaikowsky.

Mr. Apthorp in the Program-Book speaks of Tschaikowsky's concerto in D major, op. 35, as "No. 2." Has Mr. Apthorp ever seen a copy of Tschaikowsky's concerto "No. 1?" Does he know what key it is in? Or can he tell who played the "No. 1" for the first time? Perhaps Tschaikowsky did write two concertos; but you will find no mention of them in th ebooks. Tschaikowsky in his memoirs speaks of his "violin concerto." But he was a shy man and undoubtedly thought he should be contented with one work of this kind. Futhermore, the title-page of the score of this "No. 2" says "Concerto for violin." I fear that here is another instance of Mr. Apthorp's Olympian indifference to facts, another instance of his dazzling inaccuracy. I say "I fear," for I cannot believe that Mr. Apthorp made such a blunder. He surely has the other concerto up his sleeve.

Tschaikowsky himself tells the story of this concerto, and as it is a curious tale I give it in substance. It is taken from Tschaikowsky's "Musikalische Erinnerungen" p. 29.

"In 1877 I composed a violin concerto and dedicated it to Auer. I do not know whether he was flattered by this dedication; at any rate in spite of our friendship he never cared to conquer the difficulties of the composition; he said that it was almost impossible to play it, and such an opinion from an authority like the virtuoso of St. Petersburg hurled my unlucky child into the deepest abyss of oblivion. About five years later—I was then living in Rome—I saw one day in a café a copy of the Neue Freie Presse, and I found therein a criticism by Professor Hanslick on a concert given just before by the Vienna Philharmonic Society. My unlucky concerto was on the program and Hanslick reproached the violinist, who was no other than my friend Brodsky, for having chosen it." Tschaikowsky then discusses the criticism itself, in which the eminent Viennese critic had described the music as "stinking"—"uebelriechende." He also alludes to the fact that Halir as well as Brodsky played the concerto in European cities. And only the other day I read that Auer was now playing it. There is a story, well authenticated, that a later edition of the work bore a dedication to Brodsky on the cover, while the original dedication was on the title page.

Mr. Listemann played a movement of this concerto in Boston Feb. 11, 1888; but the whole work was played for the first time in this country at New York by Maud Powell, Jan. 19, 1889. The first performance of the whole work in this city was by Brodsky at a Damrosch concert Jan. 13, 1893.

⁂

Mr. Petschnikoff has been praised superlatively by the critics of various cities in Germany. His performance last night was therefore a serious disappointment. It would be fairer to say that his performance of this particular concerto was a disappointment; for in the first place the controlling mood was one of rank sentimentalism, which is utterly at variance with the character of the work. Mr. Petschnikoff's intonation was excellent; his tone was often charming, but never virile, never heroic; his technic was fluent, deceptive, calculated to surprise an audience, but this technic is not deeply rooted, nor is it to be named with that of other virtuosos who have visited us. His rhythm was capricious, and often there was no semblance of rhythm. There were few tonal contrasts, and there was frequently absolute indifference to the indications of the composer and the character of the music. There were pleasing moments in the canzonetta; but as soon as he came to the second theme, which should have been delivered strongly and with contrasting animation, he dawdled and was most delicate. Thus did he fritter away the simple melancholy of the whole movement into a dragging sentimental wail. He took the allegro of the finale at such absurd speed that he effect was destroyed, and furthermore you did not hear the notes; and whenever the "meno mosso" occurred, instead of playing the tune frankly and in Cossack fashion, he wept and wailed on the G string. Undoubtedly Mr. Petschnikoff was honest in his performance. That was the way he understood and felt the music. But he did not play the concerto of Tschaikowsky. The audience was pleased and recalled him several times.

⁂

The Symphonic Dances of Grieg, played here for the firt time, were played at Chicago by Thomas's orchestra Feb. 18, 1899. They show that Grieg, to use a homely phrase, has run emptings. Page after page of this music is forced, ugly, dull. These dances may be "characterized"; they may delight hugely hilarious Scandinavians who recognize folk-songs in the themes; but any one who admires the poetic spirit of Grieg's earlier works must deplore the present weakness of the composer.

The [illegible] movement of Schubert's unfinished symphony dragged. There is dispute, I know, about the proper pace of [illegible]; but last night it seemed as though it were too tender and too slow.

Philip Hale.

Boston Sunday Globe.
SUNDAY, JAN. 28, 1900.

SYMPHONY CONCERT.

The feature of last week's symphony program was the first appearance here of the Russian violinist, Alexandre Petschnikoff, who proved to be an artist of exceptional ability. The program was as follows: Schubert's "Unfinished Symphony," Tchaikovsky's D major violin concerto and Grieg's symphonic dances. The soloist very quickly demonstrated that he is one of the foremost violinists of the day, and despite the evident nervousness which somewhat marred his earlier efforts, he convincingly showed his mastery of the instrument and his title to be ranked as a great artist. His stage appearance is that of an earnest and unaffected man, without any marked peculiarities of face or manner. He is of medium hight, rather slight in physique, enthusiastic, and in playing bends over the violin and accentuates the rhythm of some passages by vigorous movements of the body. The Tchaikovsky concerto is very long and difficult, and taxes the endurance of the performer as well as his skill, the violin part running nearly through the entire composition, and in the finale movement the work is fairly boisterous. It was very evident that Petschnikoff was a sympathetic interpreter of his countryman's concerto, for the more highly colored and uncouth phrases and melodies were played with splendid verve and brilliancy, and roused the auditors to demonstrations of applause at the close almost before the finale was ended.

The work abounds in splendid opportunities for the soloist, but it is so largely "characteristic" of the writer's nationality that the full extent of the artist's musical equipment cannot be determined by this single performance. His tone is full, and of beautiful quality, a technique seemingly able to surmount any difficulty, and an ability to vary the color of his execution to suit the sentiments of the measures. His finger work in double and triple chords was particularly true in harmonic qualities, and, although the purity of the strenuous rhythms were specially noticeable by reason of the nature of the composition, there was great beauty shown in the delicate and cantibel passages, which were beautifully sung by the strings under his control. An unaccompanied cadenza in the first movement was played in a masterly manner, and in the second part the melancholy themes of the Slav composer were given with a breadth of sympathetic tone that resembled the notes of a cello. The last movement was full of significant fire and dash, and lacked nothing in its performance to suit the tastes of those who admire peculiar and rude harmonies. At the close of the concerto the soloist was greeted with tremendous enthusiasm, being recalled to the platform many times. The orchestral work in the concerto was admirable throughout, although in the rapid changes in harmony and tempo in the closing part of the last movement the unison with the solo instrument was not at all times perfect.

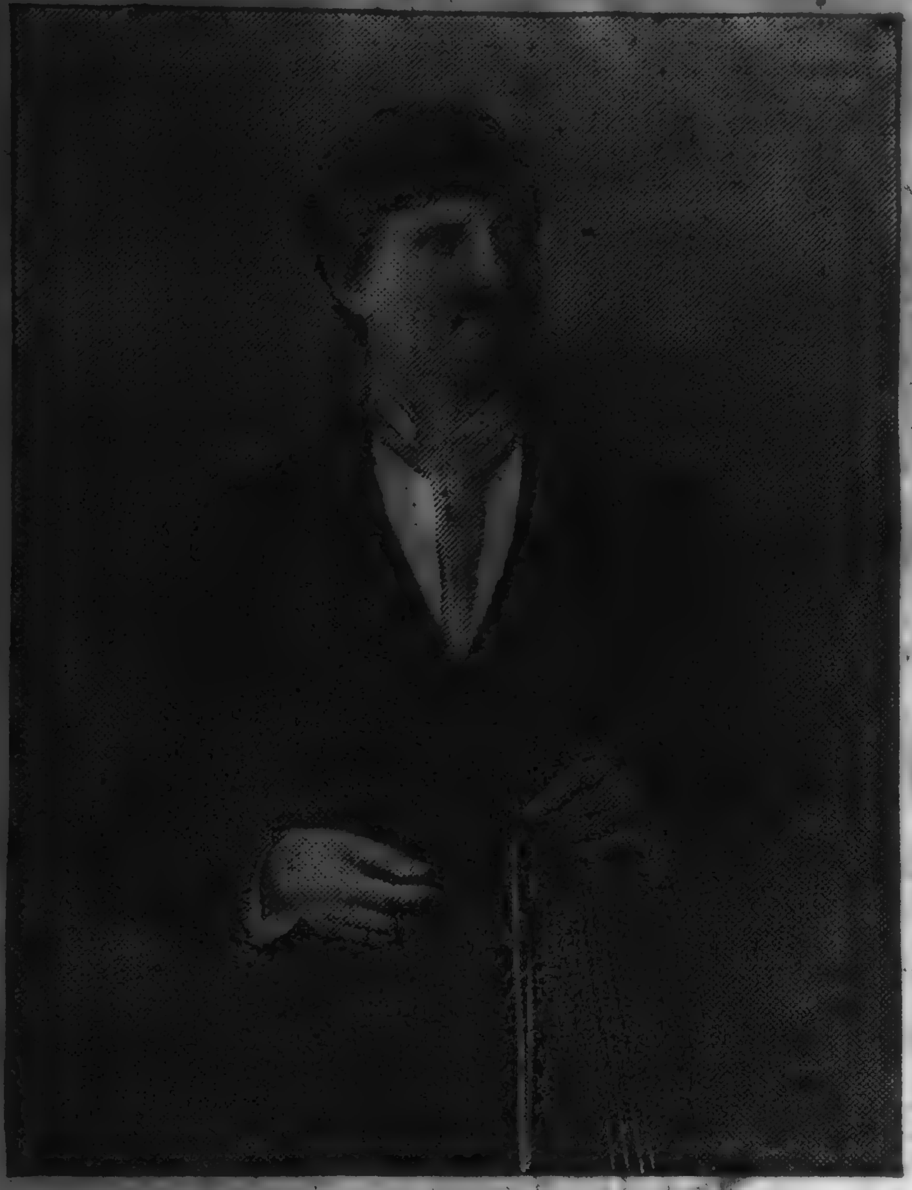
The Schubert symphony was interpreted in an exquisite manner, all the delicacy and beauty of the charming melodies being set forth with the most charming effect. The Grieg dance movements, four in number, were given for the first time here. They are dance rhythms of the Norwegian type, strongly syncopated and rather barbaric in character. The second one is the most interesting and comprehensible of the four, although the fourth more nearly resembles our idea of dance movements in time and construction. The orchestra played the works satisfactorily.

This week's program will comprise the "Avonais Elegiac" overture by Chadwick, serenade for strings by Fuchs, excerpts from Wagner's "Die Meistersinger" and Beethoven's eighth symphony.

OF NEW ENGLAND.
MORNING, JANUARY 28, 1900.
Publishing Company.)

ETSCHNIKOFF AT THE SYMPHONY

Great Russian Violinist Scorcs a Success Before Boston Audience.



ALEXANDER PETSCHNIKOFF.
The Russian violinist, who played at the Symphony yesterday.

The feature of the thirteenth Symphony concert, given last evening in Music Hall, was the playing of Alexander Petschnikoff, the Russian violinist, who made his first appearance in Boston on this occasion. He comes here with a great European reputation. His selection was Tschaikowski's second concerto for violin and orchestra in D major, Op. 35.

